9. The division of every district of these provinces into assistant collectorships of about four or five lacks each, subordinate to the principal Collector, whose immediate jurisdiction or huzzoor tehsil should, exclusive of large estates, the proprietors of which might prefer paying their rents at the Sudder treasury, be restricted to the same limit, would supersede the necessity of employing native Tehsildars, whose present establishments would defray the whole expense of the proposed appointments. But even if it should not be found practicable to dispense altogether with the Tehsildars at the commencement, any additional expense attending the measure would be more than counterbalanced by the probity with which the revenue would be administered, and by the insight which would be obtained into the characters and resources of every landholder.

10. The British Government is principally known to these provinces through the unpopular measure of the compulsory sale of lands and the more ungracious medium of the adawluts. But however invidious the character of tax-gatherer may be, a Collector has so many means and opportunities of doing good, that popularity is within his reach. A facility of access, conciliating manners, great temper, and above all, a scrupulous adherence to his word, will ensure to him the confidence and attachment of the landholders. A Judge and Magistrate may, indeed, be respected and esteemed for his public virtues; but the nature of his office precludes that personal converse with the natives at large, which might bring his private virtues into general notice. A Collector, on the contrary, will find the performance of his duties facilitated to himself, and rendered useful to the public, in proportion as he extends his direct intercourse with the landholders, and even with the tenantry of his district, and the intimacy of the intercourse will necessarily be in proportion to the contracted sphere of its operation.

11. Examples might, indeed, be cited, even in the present extent of the districts in these provinces, of Collectors who would be found to have practically realized what is intended to be enforced in the preceding paragraph. But the naming them might imply an invidious distinction; and we may be permitted to observe, as a general principle, without any disparagement of the gentlemen who now fill the revenue situations in these provinces, that the present districts are of such a size as to weaken the beneficial effects of a Collector's direct influence.

12. It may be proper to point out some of those abuses which the introduction of a greater number of European officers is expected to remove: unlimited exactions, in the shape of tulubana, sheanquee, bhete, nuzeranna, &c.; irrecoverable balances thrown upon Government by pretended khas management, of which the Tehsildar and landholder divide the profit; and on the occasion of a general settlement, a combination between them to defraud Government, by fictitious defalcation of assets. The extent of these fraudulent practices is not easily estimated; but there can be no doubt that an assistant Collector at Etawah

Letter from the Board of Commissioners, 30th May 1815.

Etawah would have saved to Government, at the expiration of the quartennial settlement, a loss of one lack and a half of rupees, in that and the neighbouring pergunnah of Lucknow only.

13. If the strength of a government depends on the attachment of its subjects, and if that attachment can only be acquired by making the system of Government practically beneficial to them, an easy method offers for effecting the object, by bringing into full scope the benefits which that system holds out, and by obviating those abuses through the medium of which it is now only known in its perversion. While Government is daily called upon to enact additional penalties for the suppression of crimes, and to accumulate expensive establishments in aid of the police, it naturally occurs that any measure which should tend to meliorate the situation of their subjects, by recalling them to the arts of peace and to habits of industry, through the influence of a direct intercourse with the European officers, must be more effectual than all acerbation of punishments or multiplications of tribunals.

P. S. Having done ourselves the honour to submit this address to the perusal of the Right Honourable the Governor-General, we beg leave to annex two explanatory statements which have been prepared on his lordship's requisition, for the purpose of being laid before him.

Explanatory Statement by the Board of Commissioners, 30th May 1815.

In the letter submitted by the Board, the comparative advantages of the ryotwar over other settlements are in a great measure admitted; but reasons are given why, under our present system, it could be introduced but partially, without offending against existing engagements or legislative pledges: and it is also stated, that at any rate our present European establishments are inadequate to its effective execution. The abuses incident to the farming system have been every where felt and acknowledged; and in the same manner as Colonel Munro, at Madras, adopted the ryotwar settlement to avoid them, so have we latterly given the preference to the mokuddumee, where circumstances may have prevented a settlement with the proprietors. The mokuddumee settlement is the ryotwar, adapted to our limited agency, and the benefits of it have been felt whenever sufficient personal superintendence has been devoted to it. That the system has not been more generally followed, and that its advantages where introduced have not been universal, must be attributed to the following, amongst the other causes, stated by the Board.

1st. Our zillahs are of that extent, that it is impossible a Collector can become personally acquainted with each individual Mokuddum, with the capability of his lands, his influence over the other Ryots, or any of the other circumstances connected with him. Native agency is necessary in every stage. The Omlah introduce each Mokuddum to the Collector, the Putwarry furnishes the accounts by which the resources of the village are judged of, and in many cases to touch the nuzur is all the personal intercourse he has had with the Collector.

2d. Collectors are seldom long enough at a zillah to acquire an adequate acquaintance with its inhabitants or local information of any sort; neither are they all of equal judgment or general information. This is particularly felt at present, when the judicial line runs away with so large a proportion of the best public officers.

3d. A mokuddumee settlement, where not made with a proper person, and when not subject to the constant superintendence of the Collector, would become come a farm in effect; for the Mokuddum is the organ of assessment to the other Ryots. He adjusts the jumma of each, and having the sole responsibility may assume all the powers of a farmer, unless restrained by considerations of private friendship and fellow-feeling.

Explanatory Statement by the Board of Commissioners, 30 May 1815.

2. All these arguments, however, resolve themselves into the insufficiency of our European agency; and if this is found insufficient for a mokuddumee, how much more so would it be for a ryotwar settlement, in which a personal acquaintance is necessary with each individual cultivator, and at least nuzurundauz of his land must take place every year, if not at every planting season? If, therefore, the Court of Directors wish this system to be introduced, or even if the more limited mokuddumee is to be extended, a large addition to our European agency is obviously necessary. Native agency has been universally deprecated. It was the number of European assistants that enabled Colonel Munro to carry it on with effect; and until our Collectors are, in some way, furnished with equal assistance, it will be impossible that they should be able to introduce the system with any hope of success.

3. Experience has shown, that the principles of no natives are proof against the temptations of a situation giving any concern with land or with the land-revenue. This has been felt so strongly, from the time of our first concern with the administration of the country, that we have every where felt the necessity of abolishing the office of Tehsildars, as soon as ever we could do without them. Government have, however, at all times felt a repugnance to this measure, from feeling that it was almost the only situation in the Revenue department open to natives of respectable character and family. The reason of this want of principle, comparatively, with that possessed by Europeans, is evident; for the latter can have no personal interest in the land or its possessors, while the Tehsildar looks to his situation as furnishing the means of securing for his family a landed property, besides enabling him to provide for a number of poor dependents. This can only be done by intrigue; and considering the stake and the means within his power, no control can be so efficient as to prevent his hazarding an attempt. It is certainly to be much regretted, that our system leaves so few situations open to our native subjects; but still they should feel gratitude to us for leaving to them the exclusive possession and enjoyment of the land. The balance is certainly in their favour, even taking their number into the calculation, and it is believed that, even should the Tehsildarees be abolished, the natives would be pretty sensible that they had forfeited the situation by misconduct. Should, however, the immediate and total abolition of these offices be thought precipitate, the new system might be introduced, in the first instance, partially, or so as to supersede the present, as the Tehsildarees might fall vacant. This would be attended with the great advantage of enabling the natives, as well as ourselves, to compare each system in its operation; and should the comparison be in our favour, besides greatly strengthening the attachment of the natives to us, it would bring more home to them the conviction of the necessity of substituting European agency for their own. The trial might be made, for instance, in the Bareilly district, by doubling the amount (five lacks) to be allotted to each assistant Collector, leaving the agency of the Tehsildars to be employed in the collection of one half of the district.

4. Prior, however, to forming any determination on the subject, it will be necessary to ascertain at what rate per centage on the whole jumma the collection may be expected to be made under the system now proposed (of establishing assistant collectorships of every five lacks, the whole to be under the superintendence of the Collector at the Sudder station). An estimate of this is wanted, compared with the rate at which Colonel Munro realized his assessment (seven and a half per cent.), and also with the rate at which the revenue of these provinces is at present realized. An estimate is also wanted of the amount which may be saved by the reduction of the Tehsildaree establishment, of the degree and period in which this may be effected, and of the proportion this saving will bear to the expense of the proposed additional establishments.

 5. There

Explanatory Statement by the Board of Commissioners, 30 May 1815.

5. There is also a consideration which must necessarily weigh materially in this question; and that is, the capability of supplying so many assistant Collectors in the present state of the civil service, without depriving the judicial line of so many useful Registers. A more remote consideration also offers itself, whether in the event of a supply of covenanted servants equal to this demand being sent from Europe, the ordinary scale of promotion will be such as to become an object with the assistants to enter the Revenue line.

Board of Commissioners,
Furruckabad, 30th May 1815.

Explanatory Statement submitted to His Excellency the Right Honourable the Governor-General.

1. THE two subjoined statements will shew the present establishment of general collectorships, the amount of the mofussil tehsildarees which might be ultimately retrenched on the appointment of assistant Collectors, and the expense which would be incurred by carrying the latter measure into full effect.

2. The present establishments, exclusive of those charges which do not directly appertain to the collection of the land revenue, amount to Rupees 1,27,651 per mensem, or Rupees 15,31,812 per annum, which on a revenue of above three crores does not exceed five per cent. In the last year's accounts the land revenue actually realized stands at Rupees 313,60,195, and the charges of collection, including the Board of Commissioners, at Rupees 20,29,690, being something less than six and a half per cent. Every source of revenue besides the customs are there stated at Rupees 326,17,386, and the charges of every description, exclusive of pensions, at Rupees 22,83,215, being somewhat less than seven per cent.

3. The amount of the mofussil tehsildarees, which it is conceived may be retrenched on the adoption of this measure, is Rupees 65,868 per mensem, and the expense of carrying the measure into full effect is calculated at Rupees 54,250. In this calculation an extra establishment, as per annexed statement, is allowed to each assistant Collector, inclusive of Burkundosses, equal to the average number now entertained in every two tehsildarees. But supposing that it should be found necessary, at the first introduction of the measure, to retain nearly half of the present mofussil establishments, the temporary increase of expense will not exceed Rupees 30,000 per mensem, or four lacks per annum, and the entire charge of collection will still fall within Colonel Munro's estimate of seven and a half per cent.

4. It is evident that the state of the civil service will not admit of the requisite supply of thirty-five assistant Collectors for carrying the measure into full effect. But as the settlement of Benares has been declared permanent, the measure may be dispensed with in that province, and the introduction of it into the Ceded and Conquered Provinces may be made gradually, such zillahs and portions of zillahs being originally selected for the experiment where the assistance may be more particularly needed.

5. In this selection the assistant Collector proposed for the northern pergunnahs of zillah Furruckabad, and two of the assistant Collectors proposed for each of the zillahs of Alligurh and Etawah, appear to be most urgently needed, exclusive of Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Forde, who are already in charge of the northern pergunnahs of Seharunpore and the southern division of Goruckpore. The stations proposed for these five experimental appointments to be as follow:

Zillah Allygurh	Saidabad, Secundra Rao.
Zillah Etawah...............	Shekoabad, Khas Gunge.
Zillah Furruckabad.........	Putteealee.

6. Although

6. Although it has been above suggested to postpone the introduction of assistant Collectors into Benares, it may be observed that, notwithstanding the permanency of the settlement, one Collector is wholly inadequate to the sole charge of so extensive a province; and were it not for the permanency of the settlement, which precludes every additional source of revenue towards the reimbursement of additional charges of management, there can be no doubt that the interests of Government, and the well being of the community at large, would be materially furthered by a subdivision of the province into three collectorships, corresponding with the three adawluts.

MADRAS REVENUE SELECTIONS.

EXTRACTS REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE, Dated 24th October, 1808.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 24 October 1808.

Par. 4. We had the honor to acquaint you, in our dispatch dated the 24th December, 1807, that we had too much reason to apprehend that an error had occurred in fixing the amount of the permanent settlement of Dindigul.

5. We have received a very long and able report on this subject from Mr. Hodgson,* who was deputed, as we apprized your Honourable Court, to conduct a local investigation of the causes of the failure of that assessment.

6. Your Honourable Court will observe, that in the report which Mr. Hodgson has laid before us of the result of his examination, he has given a short history of the district from such materials as he was enabled to collect, and that he has traced the different modes of management which obtained previously to the cession of it to the Company.

7. From the information which has been submitted by Mr. Hodgson, it appears that the revenue has been realized from the punjah, or high lands, in money, and from the nunjah, or lands on which the crops are usually inundated, the Government had always received a share of the produce until the territory was transferred to the Company. From the conquest, in 1792, to the establishment of field-rents, in 1799-1800, Mr. Hodgson observed that the inhabitants of the villages generally contracted to take the whole or a portion of the circar share for money, and that the remainder was received into store. At one time the district was rented by divisions to one person: the villagers were at liberty to take their share only in kind, or to contract with the renter for the whole produce, paying him a value mutually agreed on for the circar share.

8. The revenue from the high lands, as before observed, was collected in money. The rates of assessment were regulated both by the extent and quality of the land. They are stated to have differed in a large proportion of all the villages in the district, if not in each village, from circumstances which are explained in the report to have been connected with attempts, on the part of the ruling authority, to enhance the assessment, and with the usual means of counteraction practised on the part of the inhabitants in opposition to arbitrary authority.

9. The same causes have been described to your Honourable Court as producing similar effects in most of the provinces subject to this Government, previously to their acquisition by the Company.

10. Mr. Hodgson has traced the systems followed in realizing the revenue in detail, in order to shew the effect which they may have had on the amount of the permanent settlement, and in producing its ultimate failure in the province of Dindigul; and he has been led into a comparison of the landed tenures in that district with those of your other possessions, in which he has traced a general similitude.

11. With this view of the tenure by which the cultivators hold possession of their lands, Mr. Hodgson has connected a discussion of the limited rights of Zemindars; and we doubt not that your Honourable Court will derive satisfaction from the clear and conclusive manner in which Mr. Hodgson has traced this subject.

12. Without pursuing this question further, we shall return to the examination of the details of the settlement.

* Consultation, 16th August.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 24 October 1808.

13. The introduction of a field rent on survey, applied to the punjah or dry lands, was, in fact, a continuation of the system to which the inhabitants had been accustomed: but by establishing an uniformity of land measure it corrected the abuses which had crept into the administration of the revenue from the causes before described, it equalized the assessment and must have augmented the payments of some of the inhabitants, while those of others were reduced; but it was intended to have generally a more favourable operation than the former modes of collection. "But the introduction of the survey "field-rents on nunjah or paddy land," as stated by Mr. Hodgson, "was a po- "sitive innovation on ancient custom, introducing a responsibility hitherto "unknown."

14. It does not appear that the survey rates of assessment on any of the descriptions of land were excessive, although the purchasers of the estates were induced, in many instances, to lower them; for while a combination of causes may be assigned for this measure, the fact that Mr. Hurdis made his collections according to these rates before the estates were sold, and that his successor, Mr. Parish, collected the revenue from the cultivators by the same rule after the sequestration of the estates, neither of those gentlemen having experienced any difficulty in realizing the demand, stands as a proof that the survey rates were adjusted with accuracy, in regard to the quality and extent of the land while under cultivation. It is also satisfactory to know, that these rates have served as a protection to the Ryots from oppressive exaction, and that although disappointment has been experienced in the failure of the intended permanent settlement, the resources of the cultivators have not been impaired.

15. In pursuing the subject of the settlement of that province, it is apparent that the rapid advancement of the revenue under the management of Mr. Hurdis, and the settlement which he concluded with the inhabitants for three years (the last terminating in fusily 1214), were so disproportioned to the former accounts of the revenue, as to destroy all grounds of comparison; but the result of the triennial settlement would appear to have been almost exclusively relied on, in determining the amount of the permanent demand.

16. Mr. Hodgson has ascribed this mode of proceeding to oversight, concluding that it never could be the intention of the Board of Revenue to depart so widely from the principles prescribed for the permanent settlement, or from their practice in all former settlements, where an average of the collections for a period of years had invariably formed the basis of the calculation, although contingent circumstances might be taken into consideration and allow some deviation from the result.

17. In the instance of Dindigul, it appears that the proposed permanent assessment partook too much of the nature of an estimate founded on the ultimate survey valuation of the lands, and on the engagements entered into with the inhabitants for a triennial lease; engagements which had only been partially discharged at the time when the estates were disposed of at a fixed rent, and in which the inhabitants ultimately failed. The expectations of the inhabitants and those of the Collector were too sanguine, and were liable to be defeated by an adverse season.

Mr. Hodgson has stated, that "this average of Star Pagodas 1,18,118 was "what the Collector proposed as the permanent jumma. This proposed jumma was, as already stated, $54\frac{13}{16}$ per cent. above the average of fusilies 1206, "1207, and 1208; $21\frac{15}{16}$ per cent. above the average of fusilies 1209, 1210, "and 1211; and only $7\frac{9}{16}$ below the average of fusilies 1212, 1213, and 1214; "and $10\frac{13}{16}$ per cent. below the ultimate survey value.

" After this exposition," Mr. Hodgson observes, "it must be admitted, " that the deduction from the resources or collections, as stated in the public " accounts, ought to have been more in the one case than in the other; that " in the case of a previous ryotwar collection, sixteen deducted from the hun- " dred, which appeared in the accounts, would only give a benefit of sixteen; " but that sixteen deducted from every hundred, under the collections which " appeared in accounts from large rents, or village rents, would give a benefit " exceeding sixteen in all, the sum which had been the renter's profit and " charges, and which might amount from ten to fifteen or twenty per cent. " more.

" In elucidation of this reasoning, I have, in an appendix, subjoined an ab- " stract of the permanent settlement of all the government lands settled in " perpetuity, shewing the nature of the data on which the permanent rent was " determined, the rate of deduction in favour of the proprietors from that " data, and the per-centage that those deductions bore to each of the items of " account.

" From a review of all these documents, I have no hesitation in declaring " my conviction that the amount of rent fixed on the estates of Dindigul was too " high; because the deduction, small in amount (viz. about sixteen per cent.) " was not made on any average produce but from an estimated rent, higher " than the country had ever yielded since it came into the possession of the " Company, while in all other districts, with more or less variation, the deduc- " tions in favour of proprietors had been made from the average revenue of " several years."

19. The foregoing extracts from Mr. Hodgson's report appeared to us conclusive; and although it is to be regretted that the error escaped detection before the jumma was declared permanent, it is impossible to resist the conviction, that the principles of the permanent settlement were entirely misapplied in the instance of Dindigul, and that a revision of the assessment has become indispensably necessary.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 24 October 1808.

20. It is to be observed, that a series of adverse seasons succeeded the permanent settlement of Dindigul, and no doubt contributed, in a great degree, to its failure; but it cannot be denied, that the allowance made in favour of the Zemindars was too small, and that although their payments might have been more considerable in better seasons, the expectations that they could have continued to discharge the demand of Government from the produce of their estates was absolutely hopeless.

21. Under all the circumstances connected with this failure, it will be satisfactory to your Honourable Court to observe that the Collector has been enabled to realize a revenue from the district, during the three years of fusilies 1214, 1215, and 1216, the average of which * falls below the average gross collections of the three preceding years, † when the collections were the highest, only fourteen per cent., and may therefore be considered equal to the amount which would have been received from the districts, had the principles of the permanent settlement been correctly applied.

22. The consequences of the error committed in declaring the revenues of the province of Dindigul permanent at the amount which has been stated, have therefore, as observed by Mr. Hodgson, been confined to the loss entailed on those persons who speculated in the purchase of the estates.

23. Mr. Hodgson brought the cases of these persons under our particular consideration. In consequence of the failure of all attempts to dispose of the estates by public sale, the persons of the purchasers were kept under restraint; and as it was clearly established that the district had been over-assessed, Mr. Hodgson recommended that they should not be made the sufferers, that they should not only be liberated from restraint, but that the amount of the premium and of their payments above the collections from their estates should be repaid to them. The sum, your Honourable Court will observe, is stated at Star Pagodas 14,557,2,30.

24. Mr. Hodgson also proposed that a remission on the permanent assessment of the estates which had been purchased by the Poligars to increase their lands, should be made in their favour to the extent of the over-assessment.

25. With regard to the purchasers of the estates whose persons were in confinement, we had authorized their liberation, on the recommendation of the Board of Revenue, on condition of their relinquishing all claim to the estates; but as the accounts on which the jumma was formed were open to their inspection when they purchased the estates, and as they had consequently the means of estimating the eligibility of their speculation, we did not feel ourselves called upon to indemnify them for its failure.

26. With regard to the proposed remission in favour of the Poligars, although it is apparently founded in justice, we did not think proper to authorize the measure without a reference to the Board of Revenue, as there may be reasons connected with the local advantages of those estates, and with the means of the Poligars to draw forth their resources at present dormant, which may render it inexpedient.

27. Your Honourable Court will observe, that Mr. Hodgson has taken the opportunity of pointing out several parts of the Regulations which have been found to be defective or to require explanation, and has submitted a draft, containing the necessary modification, on which we have deemed it proper to require the opinion of the Board of Revenue.

28. The intended permanent settlement of the revenues of Dindigul having entirely failed, it became necessary to consider the measures proper to be pursued for realizing the future revenue. It was proposed by the Collector, and recommended by the Board of Revenue, that engagements should be entered into with the inhabitants for a village rent for three years. The adoption or rejection of the measure having been confided to the discretion of Mr Hodgson, that gentleman authorized the Collector to conclude the settlement, for reasons stated in his report, which we consider to be satisfactory.

34. In submitting the triennial settlement of Dindigul, the Board of Revenue reported also on the settlement of Madura for fusily 1217 †, to which period it was limited, owing to the severe indisposition of the Collector, and to the impediment experienced in establishing a village rent in Dindigul. The Board of Revenue did not, however, consider this deviation from their instructions of importance, as a lease will be introduced, in the present year, in the province of Madura, as well as in the other provinces subject to this government, and the experience of one year of village rents will assist the judgment in determining the amount of the future demand.

35. Your Honourable Court will observe, in reference to the report of the Board of Revenue,‡ that the cultivation of the province of Madura has been extended Cawnies 10,772 15¼, and that the land revenue has been raised in consequence to the amount of Star Pagodas 13,455 26 41 above that of the preceding year.

58. In our dispatches from this department* we have progressively reported the measures which have been adopted for realizing the revenues of the territories under our authority, and for obtaining the most accurate information of their permanent resources, with a view to the ultimate establishment of a fixed land-rent.

59. We deem it to be desirable that the transition from the present system of revenue management to the permanent settlement should be gradual, and we accordingly called on the Board of Revenue, as reported in the 159th paragraph of our dispatch dated the 24th December last, to state their sentiments on the expediency of changing the detailed system of revenue economy, in which the rent is collected from each individual Ryot by Tehsildars, for a plan of settlement approximating more nearly to that of estates permanently assessed, by farming out the lands for a term of years to persons who should be interested in preserving and improving the resources of the country.

60. At our consultation of the 24th May, we took into consideration the report of the Board of Revenue on this important subject.

61. Referring your Honourable Court to the report itself for particular information, we proceed to state, in abstract, the principal points which are noticed in it.

62 With the exception of the provinces of Malabar and Canara, and other districts in which the traces of private property existed when they became subject to the British Government, or perhaps, more correctly speaking, where the assessment on the land is comparatively light, the provinces subject to the presidency of Fort St. George are described as exhibiting nearly the same system of landed property and revenue policy. The interest in the soil was divided between the Sirkar and the Ryots, and the share of Government constituted so large a portion of the produce as to leave little more to the Ryot than the interest of an hereditary tenant.

63. The country was divided into villages, comprising tracts of territory of various extent, but including collectively every acre of land in our Indian possessions. A village, in a political sense, is described as a little republic, or rather corporation, having within itself its municipal officers and corporate artificers; and though liable to be injured by the calamities which afflict mankind, the same name, boundaries, interests, and even families, have continued for ages.

64. The various productions of agriculture, differing materially in value and liable to peculiar contingencies, appear from the earliest times to have been assessed assessed for the benefit of the ruling authority, on principles applicable to each description of culture. The productions of nunjah lands, which are always covered with water by natural or artificial means, have been divided between the Government and the Ryot. Punjah lands, which are only watered by the falling rain, have been usually assessed with a money-rent; and lands allotted in small extent to the culture of the more valuable productions, have been assessed with reference to the value of the articles produced on them.

* To England, dated 6th March, 21st October, and 24th December, 1807.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 24 October 1808.

65. The reasons for these variations in the assessment do not appear to have been ascertained. They are, perhaps, referable to the general principle of procuring the highest revenue from the land. The nunjah depending on copious irrigation, the crops must entirely fail under a failure of the supplies of water; and to this cause has the system of dividing the produce, and consequently sharing the responsibility, been ascribed. The punjah lands requiring only partial supplies of water, are not so frequently exposed to absolute failure, and the risk incurred by the cultivator in paying his rent in money is consequently less, while the varieties of articles cultivated on the same ground, ripening at different periods of the year, oppose almost insuperable obstacles to a division of the produce. The lands allotted for the culture of the more valuable articles are generally secured against a failure of water by artificial means, and the risk attending an engagement for a money-rent is consequently still less, while the value of the produce must increase with the scarcity of grain.

66. The several modes adopted for realizing the aggregate revenue derived from the land are described by the Board of Revenue to have been an individual settlement, in which each Ryot paid to the officers of Government their share of his produce, or the amount for which it might be commuted in money; a village-rent, in which the revenue of each village was rented to an individual who arranged with the inhabitants, or to the community of the village, who adjusted the detail of the assessment among themselves. The remaining mode of collecting the revenue was by farming large tracts of territory to individuals, some of whom were hereditary renters under the denomination of Zemindars, others were strangers, Soucars who had advanced money on the security of the farms, or persons who made this kind of farming their profession; sometimes they were revenue officers of various descriptions.

67. The reasons for considering the Zemindars to be only farmers of the revenue are stated at length in the report of the Board of Revenue, as well as in numerous other authorities, long since brought under your attention.

68. The Board of Revenue proceeded to describe a plan* which had been proposed by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, a short time before his departure from India, for the settlement of the Ceded Districts. That plan may be comprised in the following words: that the present assessment in detail should be lowered twenty-five per cent., with a still greater remission on lands watered by machinery.

69. That the proposed remission should provide for all contingencies, and nothing further be allowed for bad crops or failures of an ordinary description; but that the village should be liable to an extra assessment, to the extent of ten per cent., in the event of an occurrence of failure, which could not be made good from the property of an individual defaulter.

70. That the waste lands should be retained as the property of Government, and taxed when brought under cultivation.

71. That the repair of all tanks, not rendered private property, should be made by Government; that the advances for cultivation should be gradually discontinued; that the village officers should remain, as heretofore, under the Collector; that private creditors, who might distrain the property of Ryots, should give security for discharging the public demands against such Ryots, before they should be allowed to distrain.

72. Upon these data Lieutenant-Colonel Munro founded a calculation, shewing a more favourable result than could be obtained by permanently fixing the assessment on the land on the principles which have been observed in other districts. But allowing that the immediate net receipts from the districts should not not exceed, under Lieutenant-Colonel Munro's plan, what could be obtained from them under a permanent settlement, he considered it to be the most eligible, because while the latter system limited the public demand in perpetuity, the plan which he proposed would provide for the augmentation of the land revenue with the extension of agriculture; and arguing from the tendency of population to increase, Lieutenant-Colonel Munro contended that augmentation of the public resources, from this cause, would be improved, to the extent of three lacks of pagodas per annum, at the end of a period of ten years.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 24 October 1808.

73. Your Honourable Court will observe, on reference to the letter of the Board of Revenue, * that they were disposed to concur in the plan recommended by Lieutenant-Colonel Munro, as applicable not only to the Ceded Districts, but to all other districts not permanently settled, and as calculated to produce great advantages, provided Government could relinquish the proposed reduction of assessment, the general principle to which every one must assent, that the condition of the Ryots must be improved in proportion to the alleviation of their burden.

74. But acknowledging the impracticability of Government making so considerable a sacrifice as one-fourth of their present revenue, while the objects of the detailed system of management had been generally accomplished, the Board of Revenue proceeded to recommend a transition from the ryotwarry system to that of village rents, which had been suggested by Mr. Hodgson, and which they stated to be best adapted to secure the revenue of the state and the prosperity of the country.

75. We beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to the letter recorded on our proceedings, † for a more detailed explanation of the particular advantages which are considered to be attached to a system of village rents, and of the difficulties and disadvantages which must attend an attempt to continue a fixed system of ryotwar rents, under the operation of the courts of judicature; from which your Honourable Court will observe, that the proposed system of Lieutenant-Colonel Munro involved continual interference with the cultivators and a constant exercise of domiciliary controul, which it is the object of the constitution recently established for the internal government of these territories to remove, while the practicability of effecting a settlement of that nature in perpetuity, even under the considerable sacrifice proposed, appeared more than questionable.

76. The Board of Revenue hesitated whether to recommend a rent for three or for five years; but we decided on the former period, as it would admit of an earlier correction of any errors that might be committed in the settlements and would facilitate the introduction of the permanent settlement so soon as that measure may be deemed advisable.

EXTRACT FORT ST. GEORGE REVENUE CONSULTATIONS, The 24th May, 1808.

READ the following Letter from the Board of Revenue.

To the Honourable Sir George H. Barlow, Bart. K. B. Governor in Council.

Honourable Sir:

1. We have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the orders of Government, conveyed in Mr. Secretary Greenway's letters, dated the 28th November and 5th December last, enclosing copies of the reports of Mr. Hodgson on Coïmbatore and Tinnevelly.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 25 April 1808.

2. On some of the subjects discussed in those reports, and referred for our consideration, we had anticipated the orders of the Honourable the Governor in Council respecting them, and we adopted the necessary measures to enable us hereafter to report with regard to others.

3. On the same occasion we were directed to state our sentiments as to the expediency of changing the detailed system of revenue economy, which has now

* Consultations, 24th May, 1808. † Consultations, 24th May.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 25 April 1808.

now been prosecuted for several years in the new territorial acquisitions of the Company, with a view to the more complete development of their resources, according to which system the rents assessed by survey were collected from each Ryot by Tehsildars paid by the Collectors of Government, and to consult the propriety of substituting a plan of settlement approximating more nearly to that of estates permanently assessed, of farming out the lands for a term of years, to men who should be interested in preserving and improving the resources of the country.

4. Our sentiments on this point constitute the subject of this address. The topic, indeed, has been so amply and ably discussed on former occasions, that we now enter upon it with diffidence, and more from the necessity of obeying the commands and procuring the orders of Government, than with the idea of illustrating it with new observations.

5. The provinces subject to the Government of Fort St. George, with the exception of Canara, Malabar, and other districts, in which the traces of private property still existed when they came under our government, exhibited nearly the same system of landed property and revenue policy. The land was the property of the Sirkar and of the Ryots. The interest in the soil was divided between these two; but where the Sirkar share absorbed nearly the whole landlord's rent, the Ryots possessed little more interest in the soil than that of hereditary tenancy.

6. The country was divided into villages. A village, geographically, is a tract of country comprizing some hundreds or thousands of acres of arable and waste land. A village, politically, is a little republic, or rather corporation, having within itself its municipal officers and corporate artificers, its boundaries are seldom altered, and though sometimes injured or even desolated by war, famine, and epidemical disorders, the same name, boundaries, interests, and even families, continue for ages.

7. The Sirkar share, or land-rent, was generally received from paddy land in kind, at rates varying from forty to sixty per cent. on the gross produce, after deducting certain portions distributed before the threshing commences. The share or tax of the Sirkar from dry grain land was generally received in cash, either at so much for a fixed measure of land, or so much for the same measure of land, but varying with the produce.

8. We have observed, that the Sirkar rent or share generally absorbed the whole net produce or landlord's rent, because in bad years a remission became necessary, and the assessment was in many places so heavy that the Sirkar officers were more fearful of losing what the present occupant paid, than hopeful to get more from a new Ryot.

9. There appear to be three modes of collecting this share or rent, which have existed prior to the introduction of the system of permanent rents.

10. Of the three former modes, the first is the ryotwar kulwar, or individual settlement; the second is the mouzawar gainganah, or village settlement; the third is the Ijarah muttah zemindarry, or farms of several villages.

11. Under the ryotwar settlement, the officers of Government were supposed to settle and collect the rent from each farmer.

12. Under the mouzawar, the officers of Government farmed out the lands of the whole village to an individual, who again sub-rented each field and settled with each Ryot or to the community of the village, who settled among themselves the land and rent they were respectively to occupy and to pay.

13. Sometimes neither individuals nor village rents were adopted. The Sirkar farmed out tracts of country containing several villages to great farmers, who were sometimes strangers, Soucars who had advanced money, or persons who made this kind of farming their profession: sometimes they were revenue officers of various descriptions, but generally termed Zemindars.

14. Previously to the introduction of the permanent settlement, the ancient hereditary Zemindars were farmers of this description; because their cowles were annual or for the period of a few years; because Government, at its discretion, cretion, raised or reduced the amount of the tribute; and because Government, when necessary, exercised the power of removing an obnoxious member of the family, or on just cause even the whole family from the management of the Zemindarry. These ancient Zemindars, however, as they were more permanently connected with the land, and less liable to removal than mere farmers, were less oppressive in their exactions from the cultivators.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 25 April 1808.

15. The Government seeing the evils of these temporary settlements, introduced the permanent system of revenue, which was perpetuating the third system on an improved principle, by making the farm hereditary, and limiting the demand on the hereditary farmer of the revenue.

16. Because the Zemindars, thus confirmed or created, have in the new revenue and judicial code of Regulations been styled proprietors of their respective lands, some have supposed that the rights of the people have been thereby impaired. But those rights, on the contrary, as we conceive, have been strengthened rather than invalidated by that code.

17. Among numerous papers which have been composed on this subject, we received, and have the honour herewith to submit, a report from Colonel Munro,* written a short time before his departure for Europe, in which he has proposed a new plan for the permanent settlement of the Ceded Districts. Of this plan we shall offer a concise account, without discussing all Colonel Munro's arguments for and against the permanent settlement hitherto established.

18. He begins with stating his opinion respecting the property in the soil; and we concur with him in thinking that the Government is virtually the proprietor in the Ceded Districts, and in other provinces, where the Sirkar demand has been raised so high as to absorb the whole landlord's rent; in fact, that a low rate of assessment is the sole cause of actual property in land.

19. The Company, by the present assessment, in the Ceded Districts draw the full landlord's rent, which may be calculated, on an average, at forty-five per cent. of the gross produce. But in order to constitute property in the soil, it would be necessary to remit such a portion of rent as should reduce the demand of Government to about one-third of the gross produce. This remission, which would amount to about twenty-five per cent. of the present survey rent, would give the persons constituted proprietors such an interest in the soil as might justly be termed landed property, viz.

Total gross produce	100
Government rent, according to the present assessment, is	45
Deduct twenty-five per cent. as the remission proposed	11¼
Government share or land-tax, by the proposed assessment	33¾

20. The principles of this plan for a permanent ryotwarry settlement of the Ceded Districts are to remit twenty-five per cent. on the survey rate of assessment, with a still greater remission on lands watered by machinery; to permit the Ryot to retain or relinquish land according to his circumstances; and to consider each Ryot the absolute proprietor of the land he occupies, so long as he pays its revenue.

21. No remissions or bad crops or other accidents are proposed to be allowed on ordinary occasions. Should failures occur which cannot be made good from the property of the defaulter, the village in which they happen shall be liable for the loss, to the extent of ten per cent. additional assessment, but no further, on the revenue of the village.

22. The waste land should be retained as the property of Government, and the rent, or more properly speaking, the land-tax, of such as might hereafter be occupied should be added to the public revenue.

23. The repairs of all private tanks not rendered private property should be made by Government. Tuccavy should be gradually discontinued. The village officers to remain, as heretofore, under the Collectors. Private creditors, who might distrain the property of Ryots, should discharge the public public demands against such Ryots, and give security for doing so before they were allowed to begin the distraint.

* See the Bengal Revenue Selections, page 94.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 25 April 1808.

24. This is the outline of the plan proposed by Colonel Munro for the settlement of the Ceded Districts. He then endeavours to shew by calculation, that a settlement on these principles would not only tend incalculably to invigorate the agricultural resources of the country, but would actually afford a greater immediate revenue to Government than a zemindarry system, formed on the principles of that already introduced into other districts.

25. Colonel Munro shews, by a calculation to which we refer your Honour in Council, that if a permanent zemindarry settlement be formed on the principle hitherto observed, it would amount to .... Star Pagodas 10,24,050

If a ryotwarry settlement be formed on the principle proposed, the amount of the settlement will be 11,15,608

26. But even if the net revenue which is immediately expected from either system be reckoned the same, on account of the charges incident to ryotwarry, or to answer any mistake in the calculation, yet still the zemindarry rent would be no more ten years hence than it is at first, whereas the ryotwarry would have risen within that period about three lacks of pagodas, from the encouragement which the remission would afford to agriculture.

27. It is the high assessment upon the land which Colonel Munro justly considers the chief check to population. Were it not for the pressure of this heavy rent, population, he thinks, ought to increase even faster than in America, because the climate is more favourable, and there are vast tracts of good land unoccupied, which may be ploughed at once, without the labour and expense of clearing away forests. As there are above three millions of acres of this kind in the Ceded Districts, he is of opinion that a great increase of population, and consequently of land revenue, might be expected, in the course of twenty-five years, from the operation of the remission; but a remission to a few Zemindars, he apprehends, would not remedy the evil, nor remove the weight which at present depresses population.

28. Under the system proposed, Colonel Munro conceives that cultivation and population would increase so much, that in the course of twenty-five years, lands formerly cultivated, amounting to Star Pagodas 5,55,962, would be retrieved and occupied, together with a considerable portion of waste never before cultivated. The extension of cultivation, however, would not make the farms larger, and thereby facilitate collection. The enlargement of farms or estates is at present prevented by the want of property; hereafter it would be prevented by its division.

29. This is the outline of Colonel Munro's plan, which is not less applicable to all the districts as yet unsettled than to the Ceded Districts; and if the exigencies of Government allowed of so great a sacrifice as a remission on the present standard rents, to the extent of twenty-five per cent. or even of fifteen per cent., we should consider the measure highly advisable, and calculated to produce great ulterior advantages. Indeed, it would be absurd to dispute, that the less we take from the cultivator of the produce of his labour, the more flourishing must be his condition.

30. But if the exigencies of Government do not permit them to make so great a sacrifice, if they cannot at once confer the boon of private property, they must be content to establish a private interest in the soil, as effectually as they can under the farming system; if they cannot afford to give up a share of the landlord's rent, they must be indulgent landlords.

31. Under such circumstances, the transitions from ryotwarry to village rents, as suggested by Mr. Hodgson, appears to us best adapted to secure the revenue of the state and the prosperity of the country.

32. Our sentiments on this occasion will equally apply to the reference made to us on the 30th April 1806, on which our opinions were required, with respect to some objections which had occurred to the establishment of large zemindarries zemindarries in perpetuity, and with regard to arguments then advanced in favour of making the ryotwar system permanent.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 25 April 1808.

33. In provinces newly subjected to the Company's Government, whose resources had not been ascertained, whose judicial tribunals had not been established, and where the Collectors, unfettered by the restrictions of law, were free to follow their discretion in retrieving the energies of the country and reforming the manners of the people, no policy could be better calculated than that of ryotwar rents for effecting a survey classification and assessment of the lands, for detecting alienations of revenue, frustrating the interested confederacies of the inhabitants, emancipating the inferior from the thraldom of superior Ryots, developing the capacity of the country, and by a firm and summary, yet a just and prudent mode of proceeding, of remedying the inveterate abuses of the Mahomedan government.

34. This course of proceeding has been accordingly pursued in all unsettled districts, from the periods of their acquisition until the present time; and it is hoped that the objects above mentioned have, by this time, been in a great degree attained.

35. Whatever room there might be for a difference of opinion as to the preferable policy of these two modes of revenue economy, anterior to the introduction of the constitution of internal government recently prescribed as a general system in these territories, it is unnecessary for us, we imagine, at this time to discuss.

36. Very strong reasoning has been advanced in favour of each; but it occurs to us that, under the new code of revenue and jurisprudence, a plan has been propounded, with which the ryotwar mode of administration could not be brought to assimilate, and from which it would be inconsistent, if not unsafe and impossible now to deviate. For the difficulty, if not impossibility, of one Collector being able to attend to all the legal formalities prescribed by the new code on the various occasions, real or fictitious, which would occur for resorting to them, among the numerous inhabitants of an extensive province under ryotwar leases; the danger of delegating authority to an interested, unfeeling, or perhaps corrupt tehsildar; the general incompetency of individual Ryots to pay, in all seasons, the money-rents assessed on their fields; the constant change of field occupants, and consequent probable deterioration of agriculture; the expense to the Government, the trouble to the courts, the difficulty of collection, the interference with the private concerns of the cultivators and with the public functions of the officers of Government, under such a detailed system, would, we apprehend, be found insurmountable embarrassments to a ryotwar mode of administration.

37. The village (mouzawar) system is at least as old as the age of Menu. That venerable legislator alludes to the disputes about village boundaries just as they occur at present, and directs a space of four hundred cubits wide round small villages, and of twelve hundred round large ones, to be left for pasture. This could not have been done had land been exclusive private property; for, in that case, the owner would have made the most of his land, and not left it waste for the public use of the inhabitants, and boundaries of fields and farms, rather than of villages, would have been disputed.

38. Every village, with its twelve agagandeas, as they are denominated, is a petty commonwealth, with the Mokuddum, Potail, Rapod, Reddy, or chief inhabitant at the head of it; and India is a great assemblage of such commonwealths. The inhabitants, during war, look chiefly to their own head inhabitants; they give themselves no trouble about the breaking up and division of kingdoms while the village remains entire; they care not to what power it is transferred, on whomsoever it devolves the internal management remains unaltered: the head inhabitant is still the collector, and magistrate, and head farmer.

39. From the age of Menu to the present day, the settlements have been made either with or through the head inhabitants. When the revenue was thought to be high enough, and the head inhabitant agreed to it, he was usually left to settle with the Ryots: if it was too low, and the head inhabitant objected objected to an increase, the Aumildar settled with the Ryots in his presence. This system has stood the test of time; and as under it whole provinces have often been in a highly cultivated state, it must certainly be well calculated for the great object of promoting agriculture.

40. When the Sircar was moderate and satisfied with a reasonable assessment, villages often remained for many years at the same rent; and the Ryots knowing that no increase had been demanded by the Sirkar, paid none to the Potail, and by enjoying their lands at a fixed rent, they were enabled to improve them greatly. In this case, the situation of the Ryots was nearly what it would be under a permanent Ryotwar settlement; but it had this great disadvantage, that the Ryots had never any security for its lasting another year.

41. Under a village system, when once completely established, there could not be the smallest danger of internal disturbances unless the country were over assessed, a circumstance which under any system would excite discontent. The influence of the head inhabitant among the people is much greater than that of a Zemindar or Poligar; and when he is not over-assessed he will always exert that influence in favour of Government, for he is properly one of its officers, and feels that he is of more consequence, and is more secure in the enjoyment of his rights under it than under a Zemindar.

42. A principal objection to village estates is, that the influence of the head inhabitants may be exerted to the oppression or injury of the common Ryots.

43. We trust, however, that the security provided by the law is quite sufficient to shield the latter from this danger.

44. We hesitated whether to recommend a period of three or five years. A farm for five years would encourage improvement, but a farm for three years will not depress the spirit of agriculture, while it will admit easily of a transition to a permanent settlement, or to an extended term of lease.

45. The amount payable by each village should be fixed on the average collections of former years, except in those districts where the survey rent has been completed and can be depended upon. In such districts, the rent of the village should be fixed with a reference to the payments under the survey rent.

46. We fully explained to Government, on the 15th September last, the principles upon which Colonel Munro had completed the survey of the Ceded Districts. Where a survey has been conducted properly on those principles, it must be the best possible standard for assessment; because all the intellect, all the accounts, all the experience of the country, were drawn out to assist the Collector in forming the survey. The rent was not fixed upon the supposed fertility and produce of the land, so much as upon what it had actually paid.

47. The chief advantage which we expect from the plan of village rent is facility of collection.

48. In other respects, the plan which we propose is adopted to the customs of the country, and the constitution of a village as we have described it.

49. The sum to be paid is fixed. The chief Ryot is the renter, and the corporation of the village are left to settle among themselves the land and rent which they are respectively to occupy and pay. In case of disputes, the Collector is referred to in the first instance; if he cannot settle them, the court must decide according to custom and the survey-rent.

50. The most striking objections which have been urged against the zemindarry system cannot be made to this village settlement, because the advantages will not be diverted from the land.

51. The chief cultivators will be the renters, and any advantages (and we hope the terms of the farm will be moderate enough to allow of advantages) will go to increase agricultural stock.

52. Under a village-rent we estimate that a considerable reduction, as the charges of collections, will be found practicable; but we must also admit that there will be a diminution of revenue to a certain extent. We hope, however, however, that on an average of years the revenue will rise above the present amount.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 25 April 1808.

53. The protection of the Ryots will be transferred to the courts of judicature; and we confide in the zeal of the Judges for justifying our recommendation of a system, in which so much must depend upon the prompt and efficient administration of justice.

54. The observations of Colonel Munro on the courts of justice are, we think, worthy the full consideration of Government; but, on the whole, we hope that the defects and inconvenience of the judicial system, pointed out by Colonel Munro, may be remedied by good Judges, and especially by a liberal construction of the Regulations, and the adoption of an equitable rather than a strictly legal or formal rule of inquiry, and decision in the civil courts.

55. As far as we may be allowed to speak on the administration of justice, and as every individual, still more a public Board, entrusted with the immediate superintendence of the public revenue, has a natural privilege to discuss the question of right and wrong, to blame or to praise the administration of justice, to suggest improvements, and point out errors, we take the liberty to observe, that our system of courts compose one great court of equity, that they are not to be confined by narrow maxims, but should take an enlarged view, and be allowed a considerable latitude in their proceedings. Under a literal construction of the Regulations, we think that able and zealous Judges would soon find remedies for the inconveniences, and supply the defects pointed out by Colonel Munro. Under this impression, we recommend a village rent, because we trust the court will protect the body of the Ryots from the oppression of the renters, and that, under section 41, Regulation XXVII, A. D. 1802, the zillah court will be able to give prompt redress.

56. For the foregoing reasons we shall, with permission of the Honourable the Governor in Council, exercise our discretion, in establishing on lease village rents in the several unsettled districts, from the commencement of the ensuing fusily.

EXTRACTS REVENUE LETTER to FORT ST. GEORGE, Dated the 18th December, 1811.

Revenue Letter to Madras, 18 Dec. 1811.

Letter from, dated 24th October, 1808. (Par 4 to 40.) Failure of the permanent settlement in Dindigul. Return to the system of village rents for the three fusilies 1217, 1218, and 1219, in that province. Settlement of Madura and Manapara for fusily 1217.

Par. 169. We have perused with attention the voluminous collection of papers recorded in your proceedings upon the revenues of Dindigul, and we contemplate with deep regret the consequences which have been already felt, and which may hereafter ensue, from the error which appears to have been committed, in applying the principles of the permanent settlement to the land revenue of that province.

170. The mistake is clearly shewn in Mr. Hodgson's very able report to have consisted in this: that the deduction (amounting to about sixteen per cent.) granted to the Zemindars, when the settlement was made in fusily 1214, was calculated not on the average produce for a number of years, but on an estimated rent, higher than the country had ever yielded since it came into the possession of the Company, while in all other districts, with more or less variation, the deductions in favour of the proprietors had been made from the average revenue of several preceding years.

117. This radical error, aided in its operation by the calamity of adverse seasons, the ignorance of speculative adventurers, and the competition of cultivators tivators excited by the restoration of several pollams to the Poligars, was unhappily productive of ruin to many of the proprietors, occasioned a loss of revenue to Government, and may have an injurious influence upon our future revenue administration.

172. Of thirty-five estates which were disposed of by the Sircar, the Board of Revenue state, in their letter dated 21st July, 1808, that only six remained in the hands of the proprietor; and the consequence to individuals of the seizure and resumption of their lands is stated in the twenty-third paragraph of your letter to have been a pecuniary loss of Star Pagodas 14,557 2 30, besides the confinement of their persons and the probable extinction of their prospects.

173. Upon the twenty-nine estates which were placed under attachment in fusilies 1214, 1215, and 1216, the loss to Government amounted to Star Pagodas 30,418 9 12, the permanent rent for each year having been fixed at Star Pagodas 73,140 41 3, and the average collections for these years having amounted only to Star Pagodas 63,001 23 79. To this may be added the further difference between the net revenue contemplated in the permanent settlement and the actual gross collections under an expensive aumany management.

174. It may, indeed, be observed, that the disappointment of an unreasonable expectation ought not to be considered as a loss; and, strictly speaking, this may be true, though to the case before us the remark is applicable only to a certain extent. The effect of immoderate exaction is not merely to disable the contributor from paying the amount of the surcharge, but by discouraging his industry and impairing his productive capital, it incapacitates him from afterwards discharging what might have been at first a moderate demand. A landholder, who could without much difficulty pay one thousand Pagodas rent, if assessed at twelve hundred, may pay that the first year, but the second year he may not be able to pay six hundred.

175. But the most serious injury likely to result from errors of the description to which we are now alluding, comes from their tendency to render our Government unpopular, by loading the subject with exorbitant imposts, to alienate the landholders from a system dictated by the most beneficent intentions, and which, when wisely introduced, experience has shewn to be, in many respects, well adapted to the purposes for which it was framed: it tends also to shake the confidence of the inhabitants in the prudence of our counsels, the stability of our measures, and the consistency of our administration.

176. The responsibility of this mistaken measure rests in part, certainly, with Mr. Hurdis, the former Collector, by whose advice it was adopted. But in all cases of this sort we must consider the Board of Revenue as especially responsible, and, in the present instance, we are constrained to remark, that we do not observe that distinctness of perception and accuracy of investigation generally so conspicuous in their researches, and which have on many occasions attracted our approbation.

177. Could any thing have diminished our regret at an oversight which has caused so many practical evils, it would be the valuable information embodied in Mr. Hodgson's excellent report, respecting not merely the revenues and present state of the province of Dindigul, but the general, and, as he thinks, uniform nature of the tenures, by which the cultivators of land in all parts of India hold possession of their lands, and the limited right of Zemindars.

178. In the one hundred and twelfth and following paragraphs of that report, Mr. Hodgson brought before you the question of what ought to be done with those unfortunate persons who made purchases of the over-assessed estates in the first instance, and again when they were put up for sale on account of the failure of the first purchasers to make good their engagements; and his recommendation was that they should be released from confinement, and that the purchase-money should be restored to them, as well as to the Poligars who bought up some of the estates to add to their pollams. This recommendation you have acted upon, in so far as it went to liberate the defaulters who have been placed under restraint, upon condition of their giving up all claims to their estates; but with the second part of the recommendation you have declined clined to comply, upon the ground that the accounts on which the jumma was formed were open to their inspection, and therefore that they had the means of judging of the expediency of their speculations; and the remission in favour of the Poligars, though acknowledged to be apparently founded in justice, you have decided to postpone.

179. Of the propriety of releasing the persons of the defaulters no doubt can be entertained, since no fraudulent intention has been imputed to them. They were merely unfortunate; and it well deserves consideration, whether their misfortune arose solely from their own imprudence, or whether, as Mr. Hodgson believes,* they were led into it from a well-founded persuasion of the faith of Government having been pledged, that the terms of the permanent settlement on the estates were moderate, while they are now proved to have been excessive, and beyond their ability to discharge. On the latter supposition, it would be the most manifest injustice that the Poligars should be made the victims of an acknowledged oversight and rashness in your own calculations.

180. It is, however, to be recollected, that as the terms of the settlement were declared before the purchases were made, they were in some degree parties with Government in the mistake respecting the capacity of the land to bear the rent imposed upon it, which may be perhaps considered as affecting their claims to full indemnification. With respect to the second purchasers, their right to indemnification is certainly more questionable than that of the first, because they bought the estates after having witnessed the failure of the former occupants to make good their engagements.

181. There are other considerations, however, which forbid us to sanction the decision you have come to. The proprietors of twenty-nine out of thirty-five estates have become bankrupts. Some of these estates having been repeatedly attached and sold, it is not improbable that from forty to fifty families have been involved in ruin. The unfortunate speculators have suffered two or three years' imprisonment, and though now released, are doomed to indigence for the remainder of their lives; and the fact being acknowledged by you, that more was paid for the land than the land was worth, however reluctant we may be to add to the sacrifices already brought upon our revenue by an improvident arrangement, we think it would be unbecoming the dignity, and discreditable to the character of our Government, as well as repugnant to every humane feeling, not to restore to the former owners of the distrained estates the original purchase-money. The sum to be restored will, according to Mr. Hodgson's statement, be 9,950 pagodas, which being deducted from 14,557 pagodas, the total loss sustained by the proprietors for premiums, and money paid to the Collector over and above the collections, will still leave them sufferers to the amount of Star Pagodas 4,607.

182. We approve of your having postponed deciding upon that part of Mr. Hodgson's recommendation which proposed a remission in favour of the Poligars who purchased six of the settled estates to add to their pollams, till you have ascertained whether these estates possess any particular local advantages which may render such remission unnecessary. If they possess no superior advantages, in point either of soil or situation, the mere circumstance of the Poligars having hitherto continued to discharge their jumma would not justify your continuing them as exceptions from the general law of assessment.

183. After the failure of the intended permanent settlement, the reasons stated by Mr. Hodgson, in the one hundred and ninth paragraph of his report, have satisfied us of the propriety of reverting to a village settlement on lease for three years of the forfeited lands of Dindigul, which was the customary practice in that province previous to the survey. And considering the depressed state of cultivation from successive unfavourable seasons, the revolutions of proprietary rights, and the recent changes in the system of management, we agree with the Board of Revenue in thinking the terms of the settlement as favourable upon the whole, and as creditable to the zeal and judgment of Mr. Parish, the Collector.

* Vide Report.

Revenue Letter to Madras, 18 Dec. 1811.

184. The total village rent for the three years,* when compared with what would have been the total amount of the permanent rent for the same period,† exhibits an excess, in favour of the village settlement, to the amount of three thousand four hundred and twenty pagodas; but this excess will be more than counterbalanced by the additional expense attending a more detailed system of management.

185. We observe that the indisposition of the Collector prevented a settlement of the revenues of Madura and Nuttom on a triennial lease; but it is satisfactory to find, from the Report of the Board of Revenue, that the cultivation of these districts has been extended, and that the total jumma for fusily 1217 amounts to Star Pagodas 1,35,459 11 19, exhibiting an increase, when compared with that of the preceding year, of Star Pagodas 15,003 32 29; so that the total amount of the jumma of the joint collectorships of Dindigul, Madura, and Manapara, for that fusily, was fixed at Star Pagodas 3,17,004 21 3.

Letter from, dated 24 October 1808. (Par. 58 to 76.) Instructions given, after a mature deliberation upon the advantages and disadvantages of the different modes of Revenue management, for the establishment of a system of village-rents on a triennial lease in all the unsettled districts of the Presidency.

216. In communicating to us, in these paragraphs, the measures you have adopted for introducing, at the commencement of fusily 1218 triennial village leases into the unsettled districts under your Presidency, as a plan of settlement more nearly approximating to that of estates permanently assessed, you have, as being necessarily connected with this general change of system in those districts, brought under our view the merits of the different modes of revenue administration of which experiment has been made, and which you deem more or less applicable to the situation and circumstances of our territories in the peninsula.

217. We are thoroughly sensible that there are questions connected with a decision on this subject, which are of essential moment to the prosperity and happiness of the people as well as to the interests of the state; and we entertain a confident hope, that the numerous local enquiries which you have of late years instituted, and the valuable information which has been furnished you by some of your ablest servants, will ultimately lead to the establishment of a system, liberal in its principles, equitable and beneficial in its operation, and desirable from the soundness of its constitution.

218. It was our intention to have communicated to you our sentiments on the general subject to which those paragraphs relate by the present dispatch; but the conviction which we entertain of its great importance in all the practical bearings and relations which belong to it, has induced us, for the present, to postpone the execution of this intention, in order that we may bestow upon it that full and deliberate consideration to which it is undoubtedly entitled, and which we propose to give to it at no distant period.

219. We shall, therefore, at this time content ourselves with stating, that as far as we have yet been able to form a judgment on the subject, we are disposed generally to approve of the village leases which you have granted, and of your having limited them to a period of three years as admitting of an earlier correction of errors.

220. We observe that these leases are intended as preparatory to the conclusion of permanent settlements. We desire it, however, to be understood by you, that we are by no means anxious for the early adoption of that system in any part of our territories to which it has not been hitherto extended. We have always entertained a full persuasion, and have uniformly pressed it upon your minds, that before any settlements be formed that are intended for permanency, it is highly necessary that the most correct knowledge which it is practicable to obtain should be acquired, respecting the actual state and resources of the lands, their capacities of improvement, and of the tenures and rights of individuals. Strong and decisive as our opinion has invariably been on this point, it it has received no small confirmation from the experience which, we are sorry to say, has been recently afforded us, of the frequent failure of assessments formed on the principle to which we allude, in our possessions subject to your immediate authority; and we hereby think it proper to restrict you from concluding any settlement of a district in perpetuity, without having previously received our specific sanction for that purpose: nor shall we grant that sanction, unless we are put in possession of every information necessary to direct our judgment in a matter of such essential concern. EXTRACTS REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE, Dated 6th February, 1810.

General Letter, 24th October, 1806. Par 60 to 77.

Revenue Letter from Madras, 6 February 1810.

Par. 7. In our dispatch of the 24th October 1808, we stated at length to your Honourable Court the reasons which induced us to authorize a transition from annual to triennial settlements in the districts not permanently settled, and the substitution of village rents for that of the Ryotwary system. The districts already settled on a lease of three years, as communicated in that dispatch, were stated to be those of Dindigul and Tanjore. We shall now proceed to lay before your Honourable Court the result of our further progress in the introduction of village rents, and although this desirable change has not been fully accomplished in all the collectorates, the success with which it has hitherto been attended is, in general, highly satisfactory, and we have confident expectations that the change will be wholly effected in the course of the current fusily 1219.

8. At our consultation of the 5th September, we took into consideration the reports of the Board of Revenue upon the settlements of the Collectors in the Ceded Districts for fusily 1218. Your Honourable Court are aware that these districts consist now only of two collectorates, Bellary and Cuddapah. In the former the introduction of village rents did not take place during the last fusily, the Collector having urged strong objections to any immediate change of system, and the impracticability of concluding a favourable lease settlement so shortly after the sufferings experienced by the Ryots from two successive years of drought. The settlement was accordingly concluded by Mr. Gahagan, the Collector, in the usual mode, Kulwar and Mouzawar, and proved extremely favourable.

9. The jumma of the Bellary District amounted to the sum of Star Pagodas 9,32,790 26 6, being an increase on that of fusily 1217 in the sum of Star Pagodas 90,032 24 37. The actual increase would have been Star Pagodas 95,761 32, had the peshcush paid by the Nabob of Kurnool, continued the same as heretofore at Star Pagodas 28,645 35; but by the operation of the orders of the Right Honourable the Governor General in Council, on the transfer of that chieftain from the authority of the Nizam to that of the Company, the tribute payable by him became reduced to the sum of Star Pagodas 22,916 30, the fixed sum in future, in addition to the quota of horse to be furnished when required.

10. The collections of Customs in Bellary exceeded those of the preceding year in the sum of Star Pagodas 11,442, raising consequently the surplus of gross revenue in fusily 1218 beyond that of 1217, to the amount of Star Pagodas 101,474 38 7, making the aggregate receipts from this Zillah to be Star Pagodas 9,74,261 7 17.

11. The same causes which oppose the introduction of village rents into the Bellary Zillah did not exist in Cuddapah; on the contrary, the two last favourable seasons tended to facilitate the accomplishment of this object in most of the districts composing that collectorate. In some particular instances, the Collector, Mr. Chaplin, found it expedient to postpone the village rents. Want of adequate offers, from the hesitation of the inhabitants to become renters of those villages in which the cultivation of wet produce preponderated, and the difficulties under which some of the villages still continued to labour from the severity of the drought in fusily 1216, were the reasons that induced a partial deviation from the general system. The same causes have operated, more more or less, in all the districts in which the introduction of village rents has been attempted. The arrangements preparatory to so general a change of system could scarcely be completed within the period of the fusily.

12. Of the total number of villages in Cuddapah, 1834, there have been leased for three years 1099, the rent of which for fusily 1218 amounts to Star Pagodas 5,16,481 30 60; for fusily 1219, to Star Pagodas 5,28,706 18 69; and for fusily 1220, to Star Pagodas 5,38,493 44 38. The number of villages rented for one year is one hundred and eighty-three, yielding a revenue of Star Pagodas 1,51,169 28 66; and the number settled ryotwar, as formerly, five hundred and fifty-two, amounting to Star Pagados 1,27,841 30; exhibiting a total land revenue for fusily 1218 of Star Pagodas 795,492 44 46, which together with the licences, amounting to Star Pagodas 17,799 22 1, makes the aggregate amount of the settlement Star Pagodas 8,13,292 21 47, affording an increase on the preceding year of Star Pagodas 36,581 1 10, exclusive of customs. The increase derived from this source is Star Pagodas 6,685 28 78, making the gross increase on the preceding fusily Star Pagodas 43,266, and the aggregate revenue from this zillah Star Pagodas 8,28,733 34 47.

13. We subjoin a statement of the aggregate revenue derived in fusily 1218 from both divisions of the Ceded Districts, compared with that derived in fusily 1217, showing a net increase in favour of fusily 1218 of Star Pagodas 1,44,741 23 15.

14. We trust that the foregoing abstract of the revenues of these districts will evince to your Honourable Court the prosperity of their condition, and that their rapid improvement, from the period of their cession to the present time, already yielding a large surplus above the schedule valuation at which they were made over by the Nizam, together with the extraordinary punctuality with which that revenue has been realized, will afford you sufficient proof of the sound principles upon which it has been administered.

26. In their report of the 9th September*, the Board of Revenue submitted for our consideration the settlement formed by Mr Ravenshaw, in the southern division of Arcot, for fusilies 1218, 1219, and 1220.

27. The general instructions for concluding a triennial settlement have been successfully applied in effecting the terms of the lease in this district. Of the total number of villages, amounting to 3,988$\frac{5}{16}$, only 245$\frac{8}{16}$ remained unrented. The villages rented on a triennial lease, 3,742$\frac{13}{16}$ in number, were to pay in the first year Star Pagodas 5,36,846 15 50; in fusily 1219, the second year of the lease Star Pagodas, 5,42,886 17 4; and in 1220, the last year, Star Pagodas 5,42,945 27 42, inclusive of shotrium and peshcush. The villages retained under aumany were to pay Star Pagodas 22,452 35 10, yielding a total of land revenue for the southern division of Arcot proper of Star Pagodas 5,59,299 5 60; to which if the revenues of Pondicherry and Cuddalore be added, together with the amount arising from farms and licences, the aggregate will be Star Pagodas 5,92,156 13 41, giving an immediate increase of the resources of fusily 1218 above those of fusily 1217, to the extent of Star Pagodas 37,749 26 69, as will be exemplified in the following abstract.

Revenue Letter from Madras, 6 February 1810.

28. Of the villages not included in the triennial settlement, the Collector has succeeded in renting some since closing his jummabundee accounts; and as keeping the remainder under the immediate management of the Collector, where the general result has been so favourable, appeared to be unadvisable, we directed the Board of Revenue to take measures for the disposal of the whole, in the course of the current fusily, for the unexpired period of the lease.

29. The survey of the southern division of Arcot, which has been in progress for some time past, was not concluded at the period of the Board of Revenue submitting their report upon this district. We shall cursorily observe, that some further expense was estimated to be incurred on this account, though, at the same time, the reduction in the general estimate of charges for this division is expected to amount to the sum of Star Pagodas 48,505 in fusily 1219.

30. In taking into consideration the Reports of the Board of Revenue* upon the settlement of the northern division of Arcot, concluded by Mr. Græme for a period of three years, the result proved to be equally satisfactory to us with any of the preceding.

31. The gross revenue of fusily 1218, arising from land rent, licences, sayer, offerings at Tripetty, amounted to Star Pagodas 7,35,012 44 38, being an increase on the revenue derived in fusily 1217 from the same sources of Star Pagodas 63,851 6 55. For fusilies 1219 and 1220 a progressive increase is expected, viz. for the former Star Pagodas 7,40,776 28 16, and for the latter Star Pagodas 7,43,011 9 3, the whole of which, we have reason to hope, will be duly realized under the administration of Mr. Græme, unless extraordinary calamities should occur.

32. The comparative amount of the revenues of fusilies 1217 and 1218 your Honourable Court will find detailed in the annexed abstract.

33. We have satisfaction in noticing the favourable result of the foregoing comparison, particularly with reference to the land revenue derived from the talooks transferred from the southern division of Arcot, the amount of which may be considered to be very favourable, when it is recollected that these districts suffered more from the famine in fusily 1216 than any in the Carnatic, Nellore excepted.

35. In the consideration of the merits of the settlement of the district of Nellore, as reported to us by the Board of Revenue,* we were concerned to observe that a decrease was apprehended below the revenue of fusily 1217, in the sum of Star Pagodas 20,000, although a reference to the annexed comparative abstract shows an increase from land revenue, to the extent of Star Pagodas 18,574 7 2; but this, as we shall hereafter explain, is delusive.

General Letter, 24 October 1808. Par. 5 to 33.

Revenue Letter from Madras, 6 February 1810.

40. The circumstances attending the original settlement of Dindigul, its subsequent abrogation, and the conclusion of a progressive increasing village rent, were fully discussed in a former dispatch to your Honourable Court. We shall only further observe, with regard to this district, that the increase of the late fusily year upon the revenue of the preceding, amounted to Star Pagodas 14,702 39 16, and that the renters have been punctual in the fulfilment of their engagements.

41. At the period above referred to, we stated the causes which precluded the introduction of village rents in the province of Madura during the year 1217, and the expectation of the Board of Revenue that the Collector would be able to carry their orders into execution in the course of the succeeding fusily.

42. This expectation has been fully realized; and although, in forming the settlement, it was found necessary to commence the lease by a jumma for the first year below that of the preceding, in the sum of Star Pagodas 1,971 4 1, this diminution will be found to be amply provided for by the increase in the two following years, the average of the lease settlement being Star Pagodas 1,37,542 19 22, while the average of the three former years, from 1215 to 1217 fusily inclusive, was Star Pagodas 1,27,137 6 54, making a difference in favour of the present settlement of Star Pagodas 10,405 12 48.

43. For further information on the settlement of these districts, and the amount of revenue derivable from branches of revenue distinct from the land rent, we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to the annexed comparative statement, shewing a gross jumma of Star Pagodas 5,35,064 19 68, and a net increase on fusily 1217 of Star Pagodas 23,510 35 31.

Revenue Letter from Madras, 6 Feb. 1810.

44. We have already informed your Honourable Court, that a triennial settlement had been effected in the province of Tanjore, in the course of fusily 1217, with the exception of nine hundred and forty-one villages.* Of the above-mentioned number a triennial settlement has been effected in five hundred and seventy-five, upon principles nearly similar to those on which the triennial was concluded. For the remaining number of villages the Meerassadars refused to incur the risk of a lease, in consequence of which the Collector was induced to form an annual settlement for three hundred and three of those villages. With regard to the remaining sixty-three, the inhabitants refused coming into terms, even for an annual rent, though the actual state of the crops at the time was offered as its basis.

45. This obstinate refusal was to be attributed to particular Meerassadars, whose concern extended no further than the receiving their allotted portion of the produce, without contributing thereto either by labour, stock, or otherwise.

46. As considerable inconvenience might result from conceding too much to the indolent Meerassadars, who refused to enter into engagements for their lands, we adopted a recommendation submitted to us, of limiting their advantages to ten per cent. of the cultivators' share of the produce, leaving it however at their option to enter into engagements for their lands at the conclusion of the existing settlement.

47. No subsequent communication having been received from the Board of Revenue, regarding the final settlement concluded by the Collector of Tanjore during the late fusily, we are unable to enter into any further particulars for the information of your Honourable Court.

60. We have much satisfaction in reporting to your Honourable Court the favourable conclusion of a triennial settlement in the province of Tinnevelly,* notwithstanding the many difficulties which presented themselves in the progress of executing our orders.

61. Under the former system, the Government might be considered the monopolizers of all the grain in the country. By withholding the sale of their own share of the produce until that of the Ryots had been consumed, and then issuing from their own stores this stock to the inhabitants upon mortgages of future years produce, the Government virtually became the corn-factors of the country, deriving its revenue from a monopoly of the produce instead of a tax upon the land. The disadvantage immediately resulting from this system, and which constituted the chief difficulty in effecting village rents, was the balance left outstanding at the end of the year on account of the sirkar grain remaining unsold, and the difficulty of converting it into money, so as to realize the revenue within the year. The inhabitants aware of this difficulty, were averse to the responsibility of a money-rent, and the actual experience of many years justified their apprehensions.

* Consultations, 23d May 1809.

62. From the foregoing abstract it will be observed, that the total jumma of the province of Tinnevelly, including the pollams annexed to this collectorate, during the last year, amounts to Star Pagodas 5,93,094 3 62, and independently of the pollams, to Star Pagodas 4,87,389 33 43, being a net increase, in fusily 1218, above the revenue of the previous year, from the same sources, of Star Pagodas 65,475 17 1.

63 In the pollams the increase of Pagodas 2,744 21 36 arises from salt, sayer, and licences, making a total increase of Star Pagodas 68,219 41 37.

64. The average of the three years settlement lately concluded, exclusive of the pollams permanently assessed, is Star Pagodas 4,48,672 15 29, which is less than the average of fusilies 1213, 1214, and 1215, the gross collections during which period averaged Star Pagodas 4,62,221 25 69. It is not, however, by a comparison of the gross sum exhibited in a jummabundee, that the merits of a settlement are to be appreciated, but by the net revenue which remains in the treasury an available resource to the state. The net collections for the three years before mentioned, averaged only Star Pagodas 4,05,402 32 $74\frac{1}{2}$, while the actual annual disbursement for the same period averaged Star Pagodas 56,818 34 $67\frac{1}{2}$. The amount of charges estimated for each year of the lease is Star Pagodas 27,695 37 64, and the net collections will probably amount to Star Pagodas 4,20,976 22 46, being a clear net increase, above the revenue of the former period, of Star Pagodas 15,573 34 $50\frac{1}{2}$.

65. With respect to the amount of the settlement of the land revenue, therefore, we have every reason to be satisfied. The transition from the aumany system to that of village rents could not be effected without some diminution of gross revenue, because the recent commutation of a payment in kind for the payment of a money-rent, the novelty of the system, and the consequent risk and exertions undertaken by the renters, demanded compensation. The decrease of gross revenue, however, will be counterbalanced by a diminution of charges, and by a general improvement of the resources of the country, by the introduction of an ameliorated system of collection.

Revenue Letter from Madras, 6 February 1810.

66. Of the remaining districts not permanently settled, namely, Canara, Coimbatore, Palnaud, and Trichinopoly, we are unable to communicate to your Honourable Court particular information, in as far as regards the settlements which may have been concluded for the late fusily, as we have not yet received the reports of the Board of Revenue upon the subject; but we can assure your Honourable Court, that the general result has been equally favourable as in those already reported upon.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 17 Dec. 1813.

Par. 70. In these paragraphs, and in other parts of the dispatch to which we are now replying, you have brought under our view the progress which you had then made, in introducing into the unsettled districts under your presidency the system of triennial village leases, which, as we had been previously informed by your letter in the Revenue Department, of the 24th October 1808, you had come to the resolution of adopting at the commencement of fusily 1218. We find ourselves relieved from the necessity of entering at large into a discussion of these proceedings, in as much as the general reasoning and instructions contained in our Revenue letter of the 16th December 1812, though more immediately relating to the further measures you had subsequently taken for extending the same system for a period of ten years, and eventually in perpetuity, may be considered as practically involving a decision on the change which you had previously effected in the principles of your revenue management, and with the early operation and effects of which we are made acquainted in the dispatch now under our consideration. This is a subject which, as you will observe on a perusal of the Fifth Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed to enquire into the Affairs of the East-India Company, engaged their especial attention; and every consideration we have ourselves been able to give to it, and it has much occupied our thoughts, induces us substantially to concur in their sentiments and reasonings on this particular topic. Under these circumstances, we shall confine our observations principally to the facts and circumstances, as connected with the transition from ryotwar settlements to triennial village leases, which are directly brought under our notice in the dispatch to which we are now replying.

71. With reference to the two collectorates, Bellary and Cuddapah, into which the Ceded Districts were divided, the attempt to establish village rents on a triennial lease, in fusily 1218, we find to have been confined to the latter.

72. The settlement concluded for fusily 1218 by Mr. F. Gahagan, the Collector of Bellary, in the mode which has hitherto prevailed, has given us great satisfaction. The jumma of Bellary, exclusive of customs, we perceive amounted to Star Pagodas 9,32,790 26 6. If from this sum the kurnoul peshcush be excluded, which by order of the Supreme Government has been reduced from Star Pagodas 28,645 35 to Star Pagodas 22,916 30, the remainder of the jumma will exhibit, in fusily 1218, an increase above the revenue derived from the same sources in fusily 1210, the worst year under the Company's government, of Star Pagodas 3,48,906 12 74; an increase above the revenues of fusily 1215, the best year, of Star Pagodas 6,354 15 53; and an increase on the revenues of fusily 1217, the year immediately preceding, of Star Pagodas 95,761 32 37.

73. The customs (not included in the foregoing statement) having amounted in fusily 1218 to Star Pagodas 41,470 26 11, exceeded the collections under the same head, in the preceding year, by the sum of Star Pagodas 11,442. 13. 50. The gross revenue, therefore, of fusily 1218, amounted to Star Pagodas 9,74,261 7 17, showing a net increase upon the revenue of fusily 1217 of Star Pagodas 1,01,474 38 7.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 17 Dec. 1818.

74. With respect to the division of Cuddapah, it appears that of 1,834 villages comprehended in that collectorship, 1,099 were leased by villages for three years, 183 for one year, and 552 continued under aumany. On comparing the settlement of Cuddapah for 1218 with the revenues of 1217, there appears to be an augmentation under the head of land-rent, of Star Pagodas 33,870 11 52; under the head of licenses, of Star Pagodas 2,710 37 38; and under the head of customs, of Star Pagodas 6,685 28 78 The gross revenue for fusily 1218, amounting to Star Pagodas 8,28,733 31 47, shows an augmentation on the gross revenue of the preceding fusily of Star Pagodas 43,266 30 8. The land-rent alone exhibits an increase above that of fusily 1210, the first year of the Company's government, of Star Pagodas 3,24,556 4 76; above that of fusily 1215, the best year in respect of season, of Star Pagodas 10,863 12 53; and above that of fusily 1216, a year of drought and famine, of Star Pagodas 1,75,790 14 35. In the villages which have been rented for three years, an increase of revenue has been obtained, in the first year of the lease, of Star Pagodas 23,610 12 79; and in the two following years a further gradual increase of Star Pagodas 22,012 13 58 is represented by you to be expected.

75. From the comparative statement contained in the thirteenth paragraph of your address, of the aggregate revenue derived from both divisions of the Ceded Districts, in fusilies 1217 and 1218, it appears that the total collections in the latter fusily amounted to Star Pagodas 18,02,994 41 64, exceeding those of the preceding fusily in the sum of Star Pagodas 1,44,741 23 15.

76. When, however, we bear in mind that the survey-rents in these districts, with reference to which the land revenue was collected under the former system (a system certainly better calculated than any mode, proceeding on the principle of farming out the revenues, for realizing to the Goverment the largest possible receipts from the land) were in the opinion of Colonel Munro considerably higher than "they ought to be, and higher than they ever had been, "or than could be realized, as long as there are bad crops and poor Ryots," we can by no means regard the total increase in the year 1218 as of a permanent nature; still less can we calculate upon the further augmentation of revenue which you expect to derive, under the progressive jummas stipulated for in the two next years of the triennial leases. The following facts, which we find to be stated by the Collectors in the papers now before us, are of themselves quite sufficient to discourage us from placing any confidence in that expectation, viz. that an unfavourable season would render the village renters unable to keep to the terms of their leases; that a great part of them, in point of circumstances, were not more substantial than common cultivators; and that the Potails had, for the most part, entered into engagements merely to prevent strangers from becoming the farmers of their villages, and thus supplant them in the situation of chiefs; and that, for the purpose of giving effect to the new system, the Board of Revenue had it in contemplation to resort, and as it would appear under your implied sanction, to the very unwarrantable expedient (an expedient of which we cannot in too pointed terms express our disapprobation) of authorizing the Collectors to deprive such of the Potails who should decline renting the villages to which they belonged of their enaum lands, lands which either pay no rent or are very favourably assessed, and which they and their ancestors have, by prescriptive usage and hereditary succession, enjoyed in the character of village collectors, as a part of their remuneration for performing the duties attaching to that character, and of which they cannot, in justice, be deprived, unless in any instances it can be shewn that the alienations have not been duly and regularly granted, or unless they become forfeited by personal misconduct in the parties, of a very aggravated nature. The disinclination, and even positive refusal of the Potails, not only in the Ceded Districts, but as we also observe in other parts of the country, to consent to the terms of the village leases, is, as has been expressed in the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, "a circumstance which in itself affords "a strong presumptive ground for concluding that the terms of the rent de"manded must have been excessive."

77. The circumstances which we have briefly referred to, and others which we deem it unnecessary to particularize, but none of which are stated in your letter, letter, appear to have formed the subject of an important correspondence between the Board of Revenue and the acting Collectors in Bellary and Cuddapah. In that correspondence it is admitted by the Board of Revenue and by yourselves, that the Collectors were placed in a most difficult and perplexing situation, a situation in which "address, ingenuity, and ability," could alone enable them to proceed, and that, if the exercise of these qualities on the part of the Collector should not be attended with the desired effect, the new system must be abandoned.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 17 Dec. 1813.

82. As to the change of system which you have introduced into one of the divisions of the Ceded Districts, and which, as it appears from the correspondence before us, was only prevented from being also carried into effect in the other by the insuperable difficulties which opposed the attempt, it is impossible for us to contemplate your proceedings without peculiar anxiety as to the ultimate consequences, nor without a very sensible concern that any considerations should have led you to interfere with an existing system, which in the short space of a few years had conduced, in a degree perhaps unparalleled, to the general improvement and welfare of those districts. When Colonel Munro resigned the important charge of administering the affairs of this extensive territory, he recorded it as his opinion, that it "was essential to "its welfare that there should not only be no actual change, but that nothing "should be done which might excite suspicion that any was intended; that "the disturbances by which it was formerly agitated had been too recently "settled, to render it either prudent or safe to hazard any experiment of innovation; that the country was quiet and well affected; that no troops were "required in it; that the revenue was collected with the greatest ease; and "that the way most likely to secure these advantages would be to continue, as "nearly as possible, the system of management which had been observed "during the last seven years." The executive arrangement which was made by your Government for supplying the loss of Colonel Munro's services in these districts, had proceeded avowedly on the intention "that the principles he "had acted upon with so much success might still continue to be the guide of "the revenue administration in that province:" and in conformity with this settled purpose, the new Collectors were directed not only to refrain from introducing any innovation on the system of management then obtaining, but to avoid even the least appearance of any change, as it might involve the affairs of the province in confusion, and produce consequences detrimental to the public interests. Notwithstanding, however, these facts and proceedings, a year had not elapsed before you resolved upon the abandonment of that very mode of revenue management, from which such good effects had resulted, and continued to result, and for the preservation of which unimpaired, such an earnest solicitude had been so naturally manifested.

Letter from, dated 6 February 1810. (Par. 25 to 29.) Triennial settlement of the southern division of Arcot, Cuddalore, and Pondicherry.

87. With respect to the southern division of Arcot, we mark that of the 3,988 villages, of which this district consists, a triennial lease of the lands belonging to 3,742 had been concluded by the Collector: that the remaining 245 villages continued unrented, and that instructions had been issued for carrying it into effect in those villages in the following year.

88. The settlement of the rented villages appears to have been fixed at the assessment of Star Pagodas 5,36,846 for fusily 1218, Star Pagodas 5,42,886 for fusily 1219, and Star Pagodas 5,42,945 for fusily 1220, omitting fractions.

89. The revenue derived, in addition to the fixed rents, from the villages retained under aumany, together with the land revenue of Cuddalore and Pondicherry, and the produce of farms, licenses, &c. make the first year's jumma amount to Star Pagodas 5,92,156 13 14, shewing an increase in fusily 1218 of Star Pagodas 37,749 26 69 beyond what was obtained under the settlement of fusily 1217, and an increase of Star Pagodas 50,206 11 39 beyond the average collections of seven years, from fusily 1211 to fusily 1217. If we add to the above-mentioned sum of Star Pagodas 5,92,156 the sum of Star

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 17 Dec. 1813.

Star Pagodas 50,500, for articles not included in the jumma, such as town duties, betel, tobacco, and salt, the aggregate demand for fusily 1218 in this collectorate will amount to Star Pagodas 842,656, the whole of which sum, with the exception of Star Pagodas 10,812, was realized within the year, and has been accompanied with a decrease, in the charges of collection, to the amount of Star Pagodas 48,505 35 46. When, however, we advert to the opinions expressed by Mr. Ravenshaw on the subject of the village rents, which he had been instructed to form, we are far from entertaining any sanguine expectations of their being fully realized in the remaining two years of the leases, unless the seasons prove unusually favourable; or that they can, even in that case, be collected, without in some measure retarding the progress of agricultural prosperity, and encroaching on the necessary means of the cultivator which ought ever to be avoided in the revenue administration of our Indian possesions, and a cautious attention to which, on the part of Mr. Ravenshaw, appears to have been one great cause of that improvement which has been effected in the internal condition of the southern division of Arcot, during the few years it has been under the able and judicious management of that Collector.

90. It is first stated by Mr. Ravenshaw, in allusion to a communication which he had previously made to the Board of Revenue against the new plan of settlement, but which communication we do not find in the papers before us, that "his opinion on that subject he saw little reason to alter, but that, on the "contrary, every thing he had seen since the introduction of the system con- "firmed its justness; that he had, however, obeyed the orders of the Board, "and, as he trusted, not less zealously than any of the advocates for it."

91. "Whether or not," he observes, "the settlement is consistent with the due "realization of the rent and the prosperity of the country, will depend on "many circumstances. If seasons are good; if leaseholders do not, by "oppressing their Ryots, materially injure the resources of their farms, I have "no doubt but the settlement made is perfectly consistent in both these "points. If seasons are bad, they will be unable to pay the present rent "without numbers of them being ruined, and the prosperity of the country "suffering in proportion. This, however," he adds, "would have been the "case, if the settlement was half a lack less than it is."

92. The Board of Revenue, however, take no notice of these remarks and opinions of the Collector, but state, in their report to Government, "that "it was to be expected that the stock and spirit of the Ryots would be in- "creased to such a degree, that if the seasons were favourable, the whole of "the land which had been waste for so many years that it was overgrown with "jungle would soon be brought into culture."

93. But supposing, what general experience will by no means justify, that the district should enjoy the advantage of three good seasons in succession, it nevertheless appears, as is stated by the Select Committee of the House of Commons, in their report to which we have already referred, that evils had already there resulted, during the first year of the triennial lease, "which "threatened a revival of those oppressions on the inhabitants which were "formerly practised under the village system," and which, we may add, had very much contributed to reduce this province, in particular, to the verge of ruin. "My apprehensions," says the Collector, "are very strong, that even "in good seasons the prosperity of the country will suffer considerably from "the oppression of the farmers on the inferior Ryots. This, indeed, is "almost past apprehension; it already admits of some proof. I have not "been able to learn that a single pottah has been issued by them, yet they "have made the Ryots pay for all shavee* and poolathy which was remitted "to them under the former system. They have, in many cases, made them "pay more than their rent, and in most cases the full rent for all waste lands "cultivated by them, for which, under the old system, they had a remission "granted them for the first three years. Hundreds of complaints on these "subjects, and other similar acts of oppression, have been made to me; but I "have no power to grant redress. I can only refer them to the court; and "the court, if it did nothing else, would not have time to redress all such "grievances, even if they came before it. But the road to justice is so "clogged

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 17 Dec. 1813.

"clogged with forms, &c. that nine out of ten of such grievances never can "come before it. It is cheaper for complainants of that description to submit "to be plundered than to attempt to seek redress. Their humble situation, "their ignorance, and their poverty, compared with the power, affluence, "influence, and ability of those they have to contend with, are, I fear, insu-"perable obstacles in their way."

94. We would observe upon this passage, that if the village farmers go on collecting without regard to the regular rents and the established rules of assessment, as is therein stated, they may for a few years, provided he seasons are not very adverse, make good their undertaking with the Government. But in what a condition will the country be left? Impoverished, ruined, and deserted; its productive powers, which were reviving, exhausted; left without any capital or stock to enable the inhabitants to carry on the business of cultivation. This could not happen under the mode of collection which you have superseded; for it accommodated itself to the means of the Ryots. They knew the utmost that they would be required to pay: there was a standard rent limited and defined by survey, which they were liable to be called upon for, but the strict enforcement of it was made to depend upon the abundance or scantiness of the crops. This mode of settling the rents with each individual cultivator, through the direct agency of accountable officers employed under the directions and authority of the British Collector, was, we are satisfied, the only one by which so high a scale of demand as obtained in the southern division of Arcot, and in most of the other Havelly districts under your Presidency, could be secured, without impairing their internal resources.

95. Mr. Ravenshaw's observations on the urgent expediency of taking some measures for protecting the Ryots against the oppressions and abuse of authority to which they were exposed on the part of the renters, very loudly call for your attention, not only in the south of Arcot but in all districts where a similar plan of administration has been adopted. It will, indeed, be to us the cause of the deepest regret, if the change of system, which you have thought it proper to resort to in the unsettled districts, should be attended, as we are greatly apprehensive it will be, with a renewal of those irregularities and unjust practices, which it was one of the primary objects of the ryotwar system to remove, and which it is certainly, in our opinion, better calculated to prevent, than any other mode of administering the revenues of an Indian country, that has ever been adopted by the British Government.

96. Some good may possibly be effected by the appointment of the Tehsildars as Commissioners, under Regulation XVI, 1802, to see justice done between the farmers and under-tenants; but we cannot indulge the expectation that any arrangement, under which the farmer may refuse or evade the granting of pottahs to the latter (and such an arrangement we must consider the village settlements you have formed), will succeed in the attainment of its object.

97. We are at a loss to conceive how, under the provisions of the existing judicial regulations, which are, to say the least, adverse to the exercise of any interference on the part of the Collector, the village farmers can be obliged to issue pottahs, otherwise than by the intervention of the authority of the zillah judge, who must have suits instituted in his court, and a regular process gone through in each case before he can regularly exercise the powers of his office. We are ourselves strongly persuaded, that the protection and security of individual rights, and the prevention of extortionate demands on the inhabitants, can in no manner be so well accomplished as by a return to the ryotwar system of management, and a modification of the existing plan of judicature, agreeably to the principles which we briefly explained to you in our revenue letter of the 16th December last. The latter of these subjects still engages our serious consideration, and we shall shortly communicate to you, more particularly than we have yet done, our sentiments and instructions upon it.

(30 to 33.) Triennial Settlement of the northern division of Arcot.

98. We observe that the gross revenue of fusily 1218, derived from land, licenses, sayer, and offerings at Tripetty, amounted to Star Pagodas 7,35,012 44 33, exceeding ceeding the amount derived from the same sources, in fusily 1217, in the sum of Star Pagodas 63,851 6 55, and that you expect a progressive increase of about Star Pagodas 5,766 in fusily 1219, and of Star Pagodas 8,000 in fusily 1220. The season is represented to have been particularly favourable in fusily 1218, which sufficiently accounts for the realization of the increased rent of that year; but we are led to apprehend, from the sentiments and reasoning of the Collector and assistant, that unless the two following years should prove equally favourable (which, from past experience, it would be sanguine to expect) the advanced rents cannot be realized, without diminishing also, in this collectorship, the agricultural stock and the general resources of the country.

99. It appears, from the letter of the assistant Collector, dated 7th May 1809, that in some parts of this district the assessment is fully as high as the land can bear, and that in others it is considerably too low. On this subject Mr. Ross thus expresses himself: "In making the settlement, I have laboured "under one great inconvenience; and as these districts are, perhaps, a soli- "tary instance of it, I consider it but justice to you (the Collector) and to "myself particularly to point it out. I allude to the want of a regular survey. "I have every where experienced this want, but most of all in the Vellore "talook, where the lands are very unequally assessed. The terwah is still "complained of as too high in some places, and I am sure it is too low in "others. The accounts are throughout incorrect, and in many villages inten- "tionally false." And in order to shew the great irregularity even of the measurement of the lands, he states the following circumstances: that "when "the Curnums of Bengaum and Polcondah gave in above a thousand cawnies "of land as uncultivated, the pottah Meningars offered me a moochilka, sub- "jecting themselves to a fine, if upon examination one single cawney of waste "was discovered." This omission is the more to be regretted, because Mr. Ross seems to be very doubtful whether an attempt can be made with advantage to remedy it during the existence of the lease: an opinion which is confirmed by the proceedings of your Board of Revenue, who when called upon, in the year 1807, by Lord William Bentinck, in consequence of instructions his Lordship had received from the Bengal Government to state their sentiments as to the expediency of substituting the system of village leases for three years in lieu of the ryotwar amount settlements then obtaining, objected to the proposed measure, as being calculated to impede the progress of the surveys then making. This, in our minds, furnishes a strong reason why you should, at all events, have delayed the introduction of the village system, until the lands had been regularly surveyed, and until the irregularities unavoidably attendant on the early stages of this operation had been duly adjusted.

100. The ruinous state of the tanks and water-courses in this province, as described in the Collector's correspondence, and further represented in the report of the Board of Revenue, dated 31st August 1809, has, we trust, before now engaged your serious attention. Whatever engagements the renters may have come under, it cannot be expected that they will execute the necessary repairs with only a three years' interest in the land, supposing even that they possessed capital to disburse on such an object, which from their general poverty can hardly be the case: the expense, therefore, must, in the first instance, be incurred by Government, and we must look for indemnity in the more favourable terms of a future settlement.

101. We perfectly concur in opinion with the Board, that it is highly expedient to continue Tuccavy advances to the cultivators, according to the custom of the country and the usage of the Company's Government, wherever security can be obtained for their proper application, and for repayment of the sums advanced within a reasonable time.

Letter from, dated 6th February, 1810.

(Par. 40 to 48) Settlement of Dindigul, Madura, and Ramnad, for fusily 1218.

104. In our reply to paragraphs 4 to 40 of your Revenue letter, dated 24th October 1808, we adverted to the failure of the permanent zemindarry settlement which had been introduced into the zillah of Dindigul, and to the conclusion of a new arrangement for the collection of the revenues of that district by a village settlement under a triennial lease.

105. From

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 17 Dec. 1813.

105. From the Collector's letter, dated 16th August 1809, we observe that the engagements entered into by the renters for the payment of a russud jumma of Star Pagodas 95,864 23 25 in fusily 1218, being the second year of the lease, have been punctually fulfilled there, by establishing an increase upon the jumma of fusily 1217 of Star Pagodas 14,702 39 16.

106. In the district of Madura, where owing to accidental causes a triennial lease had not been concluded in fusily 1217, this arrangement seems to have been completed in fusily 1218, for that and the two succeeding years. The average settlement of these three years, amounting to Star Pagodas 1,37,524 19 22, and the average settlement of the three years immediately preceding having amounted to Star Pagodas 1,27,137 6 54, the balance in favour of the existing settlement will be, as stated in the report of the Board of Revenue, Star Pagodas 10,405 12 48.

107. The peshcush from the Dindigul, Manapara, and Madura pollams, and from the Ramnad and Shevagunga zemindarries, being permanently fixed, does not, of course, admit of increase.

108. The abstract statement subjoined to paragraph 43 of your letter, including peshcush, farms and licenses, sayer, salt, and still rents, exhibits an aggregate jumma for fusily 1218 of Star Pagodas 5,35,064, and a net increase on fusily 1217 of Star Pagodas 23,510 35 31.

Letter from, dated 6th February 1810.

(Par. 44 to 47.) Proceedings respecting some unsettled villages in Tanjore.

109. The settlement of the revenues of Tanjore for fusily 1218 not having been reported at the period when your letter was written, the only point which appears to require attention, in the paragraphs noted in the margin, is the proceeding which you have authorized Mr. Wallace, the Collector, to adopt respecting the villages in that province which the Meerassadars have refused to rent.

110. It appears that a temporary settlement for three or two years was concluded, in the course of fusilies 1217 and 1218, with the proprietors of all the villages in the district (4,818 in number) with the exception of 366; that the Meerassadars of 303 of these villages agreed to a settlement of the jumma for the current year, but that the Meerassadars of the remaining sixty-three villages resisted all propositions by which they would be rendered responsible for the revenues of their villages for three years, for two, or even for one year, preferring to receive their fixed share of the actual produce, rather than to undertake the trouble and responsiblity of the rent.

111. This refusal having been ascribed to obstinacy and indolence on their part, it was proposed by the Collector (and the proposition, we observe, has been adopted by you) that where Meerassadars, not concerned in the cultivation of their lands, should refuse to agree to a rent, the whole of the produce, after paying the expenses of cultivation, amounting to about twenty-five per cent., should be taken by the Sirkar or renter, and that a stipend, equal to ten per cent. of the produce, either in grain or money, should be allowed to the Meerassadars, in lieu of three-eighths of the produce, to which they were entitled by the usage of the country.

112. The Board of Revenue, however, apprehending, and as we certainly think with good reason, that this might be considered as an invasion of the meerassy rights, were of opinion that Government would not be satisfied, for the purpose of giving general practical effect to any plan of administration, in reducing the allowance of any class of Meerassadars beyond the lowest standard authorized by past experience, which is stated to have been three-eighths of the actual produce.

113. In this opinion we entirely concur, and we cannot too strongly express our disapprobation that it had not been acted upon. The extension and complete establishment of all new systems of policy, with a view to durability, should be the work of a slow and gradual experiment, and nothing can be more unwise than to force, even beneficial institutions, upon an unwilling and reluctant population.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George 17 Dec. 1813.

Letter from, dated 6th February 1810.

(Par. 60 to 65) Settlement of Tinnevelly for fusilies 1218, 1219, and 1220.

123. The plan of administration under which the revenues of Tinnevelly were realized during the government of the nabobs of the Carnatic has, we believe, been justly represented by the Board of Revenue, as having been equally detrimental to the morals of the people and to the agriculture of the country.

124. Gross and palpable as these evils were, it is easy to conceive that the system to which they adhered could not be superseded without the application of considerable judgment and address; it being in the nature of bad institutions to vitiate and debase the minds of the people who live under them. We consider, therefore, the success which attended the Collector's endeavours to introduce into the province the plan of village rents on a triennial lease, under all the difficulties by which it was opposed, as a creditable testimony to his capacity as a revenue officer.

125. Though the average of the three years settlement, exclusive of the pollams permanently assessed, amounting to Star Pagodas 4,48,672 15 29, is less than the average gross collections of fusilies 1213, 1214, and 1215, by the sum of Star Pagodas 13,549 10 40, yet an annual reduction having taken place in the charges, estimated at Star Pagodas 29,122 41 3½, there appears to be reason to expect a comparative increase in the net average receipts during the lease, in the sum of Star Pagodas 15,573 34 50½.

126. The aggregate revenue of the province, including the peshcush of the pollams, salt, sayer, farms and licenses, &c. amounting for fusily 1218 to Star Pagodas 5,93,094, exhibits a total increase on the jumma of the year immediately preceding of Star Pagodas 68,219 41 37.

Letter from, dated 6th February 1810.

(Par. 66) Reports upon the remaining unsettled districts not received, but the general result of the settlements for fusily 1218 is stated to be equally favourable with those reported on.

127. Will be replied to when we receive the reports in question.

Letter from, dated 6th February 1810.

(Par. 160.) Mr. Thackeray's report on the provinces of Malabar, Canara, and the Ceded Districts transmitted.

164. We have carefully perused Mr. Thackeray's report, containing the result of his judicious and well directed enquiries into the past and present state of Malabar, Canara, and the Ceded Districts, respecting which he was deputed to collect information by Lord William Bentinck. To this valuable document we have already referred, in our letter in this department of the 16th December last, as furnishing a very strong confirmation of our general sentiments and reasonings contained in that letter on the subject of a permanent system of revenue administration, not only throughout these extensive and interesting provinces, but also in the districts under your presidency which yet remain unsettled. The whole of the facts and arguments embodied in this report are undoubtedly worthy of your most deliberate consideration.

165. In framing fiscal arrangements applicable to the existing state of society in Malabar and Canara, it is most important not to lose sight of the strong ground upon which the proprietary rights of the landholders in those provinces are founded. By attempting to introduce an intermediate class of persons (call them Zemindars, Mootahdars, or what we may) between the Government and the Jelmkars, or hereditary proprietors of the soil, we should not be creating an order of great proprietors, since we have not property in the land to confer, with the exception of some forfeited estates, but we shall be raising up a set of farmers of revenue, with interests distinct from, and at variance with the interests both of the sovereign and the subject. Fortunately, the thriving condition of the provinces, and the improving state of the public revenue nue under the present mode of collection, remove every inducement to hazard experiments upon a system which, though it may have its inconveniences in common with every other system, a trial of several years has shewn to be in its operation highly beneficial.

166. The state of society and of property in the Ceded Districts certainly differs in a material degree from that described as existing in the other two provinces visited by Mr. Thackeray: we nevertheless consider the arguments stated with so much force in the report of Mr. Thackeray, as well as in that of Colonel Munro of the 15th August 1807, in favour of a ryotwar settlement and against a mootah plan of management, as equally applicable to the districts in question, convinced as we are that the latter system, even in a state where private landed property is unknown, would be found of precarious advantage to Government, and of still more doubtful benefit to the cultivators, while your records afford us abundant testimony of the highly beneficial effects which had marked the progress of civil administration in that large portion of our territories, during the few years it remained under the operation of the former system of individual rents. Different gradations in the scale of society and in proprietary rights have, from time immemorial, been established throughout India. They may be, and unquestionably are, susceptible of improvement; but this should be left to the slow operation of time, to the application of superior skill and industry, and of capital accumulating under the protection of laws, which secure to every individual the enjoyment of the fruits of successful exertion. Instead of trying to fashion society to our institutions, our aim must be to adopt our institutions to the state of society. In countries where on the first introduction of our authority we found Zemindars already in existence, we had in many cases the duty imposed upon us, by the circumstances in which we were called upon to act, of assigning to them a place in the community and a support adequate to their rank; but in the Ceded Districts, and in other parts of our peninsular territory, where there are no Zemindars, or at least but a few partially scattered through the country, an attempt to create them would be equally unjust, ineffectual, and unwise.

167. The report of Mr. Thackeray, which you have transmitted to us with your dispatch of the 6th February 1810, now under our consideration, bears date so long ago as the 4th August 1807, and your receipt of it was notified to us in the 224th paragraph of your Revenue letter of the 21st October in the same year. The cause of this long delay in forwarding to us a document of so interesting and important a nature, remains unexplained in the dispatch before us; but we find a memorandum inserted on the face of the report itself, purporting that it had been mislaid, and was supposed to have been taken by Lord William Bentinck with him to England. We know not whether this memorandum was intended to account to us for our not having been earlier put in possession of the report; but if it be, it is a very unsatisfactory reason for this irregularity, and more especially as it is stated in the letter forwarding it, to have been recorded on your Consultations of the 4th April 1809. But what is still more unsatisfactory to us is, and we cannot too strongly express our surprize at the circumstance, that this document should not have been taken into your particular consideration, and into that of your Board of Revenue, in the course of your proceedings and deliberations in the year 1808–9 upon the discontinuance of the ryotwar mode of revenue management. We cannot imagine a reason for this not having been done, as the minutes of Lord William Bentinck, of the 22d January and the 29th April 1806, on the objects of Mr. Thackeray's deputation, and the instructions with which he was furnished some months afterwards, were in themselves quite sufficient to have called your attention to it, and to shew that the result of that gentleman's investigations could not well fail of being essentially relevant to the important question which you then had under discussion. Yet we do not find that the Board of Revenue, in their report of the 25th April 1808, nor your Government, in their reply to that report, have even alluded to this communication of Mr. Thackeray. We feel the more concern that it should thus have been overlooked or disregarded, because, judging from the convictions it has established in our minds on some very important points connected with the principles of our land revenue administration under your presidency, we cannot help entertaining a belief that a full and dispassionate passionate consideration of its contents would have at least had the effect of restraining you from the adoption of any immediate change in the revenue system then in operation, if it did not altogether decide you against any fundamental departure from it.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 17 Dec. 1813.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST GEORGE,

Dated the 29th February, 1812.

Letter to, dated 30th August 1809. (Par. 102 to 108) Remarks on the settlement of Tanjore and Trichinopoly for 1215, and the report of the Committee appointed to examine and correct the error into which it was supposed Mr. Wallace had fallen in forming the settlement, and to inquire what system it would be proper to introduce into Tanjore.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 29 February 1812.

Par. 65. WE directed that a copy of these paragraphs should be transmitted to the Board of Revenue for their consideration, and upon receiving their report we shall take an opportunity of stating at length, for the information of your Honourable Court, our sentiments on the system which it will be advisable finally to adopt for the settlement of the revenues in Tanjore. Your Honourable Court will observe on our proceedings noted in the margin,* a correspondence with the Board of Revenue on the subject of the renewal of the lease which expired in fusily 1219; and as it may be satisfactory to your Honourable Court to be informed of the principles upon which it was proposed to renew the lease, we shall take this opportunity of stating the principal conditions of the new settlement which has been concluded in the greater part of the villages in Tanjore.

66. The village rents shall, in all practicable cases, be renewed for a period of five years, with the Meerassadars, on the principles of the triennial leases just expired.

67. The triennial settlement being considered too high in general in its amount, and the period of the rent being extended from three to five years, an abatement of ten per cent. on the amount of the jumma of the Nunjah lands shall be made.

68. But as there may be cases of particular villages where this abatement may not be necessary, and where the amount of the triennial settlement may even admit an increase; and as, on the other hand, there may be cases where the abatement of ten per cent. may not be sufficient to admit of the Meerassadars becoming responsible for the jumma of their villages for the period of five years, the Collector is authorized, in all such cases, to form a settlement with the Meerassadars, on such terms as may be deemed just and equitable, reporting the circumstances of the case for the information and approval of the Board of Revenue, and finally of Government.

69. As during the last year of the triennial settlement the lands of some of the Meerassadars suffered so severely from the inundation of December, as to have reduced considerably the means of the proprietors, the Collector is authorized, in such cases, to form a temporary settlement for fusily 1220 with the Meerassadars, on terms suited to the present circumstances of such villages, they engaging for the subsequent four years to pay the jumma fixed on their lands, according to the arrangement proposed in the third articles of these rules. All cases of this nature to be reported for the information and approval of the Board of Revenue, and finally of Government.

70. Where the Meerassadars may refuse to accede to a ready-money settlement for five years, on any of the terms above set forth, a grain moree shall be fixed for their villages, which shall not be variable for the ensuing five years of the grain moree thus fixed. Fifty-five is declared to be the proportion of Government, and forty-five the proportion of the Meerassadars. In cases where the Meerassadars may, from permanently unfavourable local circumstances of their villages, have been allowed hitherto a higher proportion of the produce than that here stated, such high rates shall be continued to them in apportioning the moree.

Revenue Letter from Fort St George, 29 February 1812.

71. The Government proportion of the moree shall be paid for by the Meerassadars according to the current selling prices of the day, to be determined in the month of January for the Cuddapoorcar crop, and in the month of April for the Sumba peshaunum crop. The prices to be reported to the Board of Revenue, and to be approved of by Government, previously to their being declared the fixed prices of the year.

72. In villages where the grain moree may be adopted as the mode of settlement, the jumma on the punja, baughiet, and tope lands, shall remain as determined on the formation of the triennial settlement, except in cases where alteration may appear to the Collector to be expedient.

73. Where the Meerassadars may refuse to accede to the settlement of their villages by either of the modes above set forth, agreements shall be entered into with the Paragoodies, or other Ryots of the villages, either for a ready-money rent, or a moree on the principles above-mentioned; and should neither the Paragoodies or other Ryots of a village agree to become responsible for the jumma, the village shall be rented out to such of the Meerassadars of the talook, or other responsible person, as may be willing to engage, with sufficient security, for the payment of the jumma for the ensuing five years.

74. Where the Meerassadars shall not accede to either of the prescribed modes of settlement, the Collector is authorized to declare them incapable of any interference with the cultivation or the produce of lands, and the whole of the produce, after deducting the usual sotanterms and Paragoodies' warum, shall go to the renters, whether Paragoodies or others.

75. In cases where the Meerassadars, by the above rule, may be removed from the management of their lands, they shall be allowed ten per cent. on the jumma realized from their villages, payable in money from the treasury of the Collector.

76. Where the Meerassadars of a village may refuse a money-rent or a moree, and where no individual may be found willing to undertake the rent of a village, the Tehsildars, under the orders of the Collector, shall depute Aumeens to manage the affairs of such village, and shall place watchmen for the security of the produce until it can be disposed of. The charges thus incurred to be defrayed out of the produce of the village.

77. In villages where the Meerassadars shall refuse a money-rent or a moree, and where there may be no Paragoodies, and for the revenues of which other individuals may not be willing to engage, the Collector shall be authorized to grant to the Pullers attached to the soil a proportion of the crops adequate to their labours.

78. The foregoing rules to be adopted in the settlement of the revenue of those villages which had not been included in the triennial settlement, but which had been settled for one or two years, in which an aumany division of the crops had been made with the Meerassadars.

79. The practice which has lately prevailed in Tanjore of an aumany division of the crops, with the Meerassadars of such villages as were not willing to accede to a ready-money settlement, is to be hereafter discontinued, and is in no instance to be permitted.

80. We have not received the report of the Board of Revenue on the settlement; but we have been informed that a considerable degree of success had attended the measures of Mr. Wallace for the introduction of the proposed settlement, and that the majority of the Meerassadars had preferred the renewal of the lease on the conditions of a money-rent, to the alternative which had been proposed to them of a fixed grain moree.

Letter to, dated 24th April 1811. (Par 145 to 162.) Remarks on the settlement of the revenues of Tinnevelly for fuslies 1216 and 1217,

176. Your Honourable Court will have observed the success with which a triennial settlement upon the system of village rents was introduced in Tinnevelly, as reported in and on the correspondence and report upon the general state and the revenues of that district. The state of the revenues in fusily 1216 satisfactory, but less so in fusily 1217. Mr. Hepburn's suggestions for the improvement of the revenue judicious. The discretionary power of the Collector to moderate the assessment sanctioned. Approving the commutation of the tannah tax. Directing that a system of village rents be introduced into Tinnevelly as in Tanjore, but five years' lease preferable to three years.

in the proceedings noted in the margin, and in our letter of 6th February 1811.

177. The epidemic disorder, which has produced so much distress and so great a mortality in the Southern Districts, may render it impracticable to form an immediate settlement for a term of years with advantage to the public; but when the inhabitants shall have, in some degree, recovered from the state of debility and distress to which they have been reduced, the system of permanent village rents, which it is in contemplation to introduce generally, may be extended to the district of Tinnevelly with the most beneficial effect.

195. The triennial village settlement of the land revenue in the Cuddapah division of the Ceded Districts, the northern and southern divisions of Arcot, and the province of Coimbatore, having expired with the fusily year 1220,* the arrangements for the future settlement of the revenues of these provinces have been for some time under our consideration.

196. The Board of Revenue, in their report under date the 25th April 1808, submitted the grounds upon which it was proposed to introduce the triennial village settlement, and they received our sanction for the adoption of that measure.

197. The Consultations noted in the margin † contain our correspondence with the Board of Revenue respecting the details and result of the triennial lease, and also regarding the future settlement of the revenue of the provinces under this presidency.

198. When the Government, by their orders to the Board of Revenue under date the 25th May 1808, authorized the conclusion of the triennial village settlement which has now in several of the provinces recently expired, the measure was declaredly intended to be preparatory to the introduction of permanent settlements.

199. The important benefits of a fixed assessment upon the lands, as affecting the relative interests of the state and the people, have been too well established, and are too generally admitted, to require discussion. Of the expediency of the measure, therefore, abstractedly considered, there is no question. The only essential points which require deliberation appear to be:

1st. The proper period for proceeding to the execution of so important and so desirable an arrangement; and 2dly. The mode by which its accomplishment may be best effected.

200. If the resources of the several provinces have been developed, and the revenue raised as high as the present state of the population and agricultural stock will admit, the principal motive for deferring a final settlement (namely, the prospect of an augmentation of revenue) ceases to operate. It is manifest that from a country so circumstanced, the only increase of revenue which can be anticipated is that gradual increase which may be expected to result from the gradual extension of population and stock; while it is equally manifest, that to postpone a final settlement with a view to this progressive and perhaps precarious improvement, would be to postpone the proposed settlement to an indefinite period, or rather to abandon it altogether, and with it those enlarged principles of policy upon which it is founded.

201. If, indeed, there be any provinces in which the present revenue is decidedly too low, in proportion to the population and stock whence it is derived, this circumstance would undoubtedly furnish a valid objection against proceeding proceeding immediately to a final settlement of such provinces; but before an objection of this nature should be admitted, it would be reasonable to expect not only that the inadequacy of the present revenue should be pointed out, but the probability shewn upon clear and distinct grounds, of the revenue being raised within a reasonable period to its supposed proper standard.

202. Objections to a final settlement, founded upon vague expectations of future improvement, or indeed upon any opinions merely conjectural, are undeserving of attention. Were such objections to be admitted, the hope of ever accomplishing the settlement in view might be relinquished.

203. The Board of Revenue notice a case which may serve to exemplify this observation. The Collectors of Bellary and Cuddapah are mentioned as having objected to the proposed settlement upon grounds diametrically opposite: one, because he was of opinion that the present revenue could not be realized; the other, because he expected an increase of revenue which it would be imprudent to forego.

204. With reference to this discordance of opinion between two gentlemen placed in nearly similar situations, the Board of Revenue justly remark, that "it is unquestionably preferable to adopt a plan which is founded on principles "universally acknowledged to be calculated to promote improvement generally, "than to submit longer to plans suggested by doubtful views of supposed and "temporary expediency."

205. The chief point to be considered is, as already stated, whether the present revenue be adequate to the present resources of the country.

206. If credit be due to the reports of the Collectors and to the concurrent testimony of the Board of Revenue, it would appear that the present amount of the land revenue, so far from being below, considerably exceeds the just proportion which it ought to bear to the actual resources of the respective districts, and that instead of an increase being at all probable, a diminution is rather to be apprehended.

207. It is observed by the Board of Revenue, that prior to the establishment of courts of judicature* the revenue system was a system of restriction; that the Collectors possessed a degree of authority, which knew no other check than the apprehension of trenching upon the permanent sources of prosperity; that under this system the revenue was upheld, and it is believed was in some cases raised higher than was consistent with the accumulation of agricultural stock, and consequently higher than was consistent with the improvement of the country.

208. No reason appears for supposing that this representation is overcharged: it is borne out as well by the reports of the Collectors themselves, as by experience and observation of the state of the collections and of the country. It is distinctly admitted by the local authorities (by Colonel Munro as well as by his successors), that more than one-half of the gross produce of the land is paid by the Ryots in the Ceded Districts. There are sufficient grounds for believing that the case is not materially different elsewhere. In none of the provinces does it appear that the land revenue is in a progressive state of improvement: on the contrary, the Board of Revenue expressly declare that it has for some years pressed hard upon the country, and that it is collected with increasing difficulty.

209. In what measure this stationary, or perhaps it should be said, this declining state of the land revenue may be ascribed to each of the several untoward causes which are discussed in the proceedings of the Board of Revenue; in what respective proportions it may be attributed to the radical evil of a too burthensome assessment, to the loss of power on the part of the Collectors, or to the other more adventitious causes noticed in those proceedings, the unusually low price of grain and the short duration of the lease, it would not perhaps be easy to ascertain; nor is it, we apprehend, very material to examine. If the main position be established, that the land revenue is arrived at a height beyond which there is little probability of its advancement under a system of temporary temporary settlement; if, in other words, there be sufficient grounds to be satisfied that its present amount is fully proportionate to the existing resources of the districts respectively, no adequate reason, it is presumed, can be assigned for delaying to proceed to the introduction of a system, the principles of which are known and admitted to be favourable to the improvement and permanent prosperity of the country.

210. Assuming, however, that the resources of some of the districts may not have been completely ascertained, that the land revenue has not every where been raised to the height of which it is susceptible, yet if the increase likely to result from the acquisition of the farther information supposed to be attainable should not be of considerable magnitude, it might still be questioned whether the relinquishment of this contingent benefit would be too great a sacrifice for the obvious and certain advantages which a well established system of permanency is calculated to produce.

211. It will, of course, be the duty of the Board of Revenue to examine this point, and to satisfy themselves and the Government with respect to the particular districts, if any, the final settlement of which it may be desirable should be deferred. On a general view, it would seem to be very doubtful whether a final settlement, founded upon existing information, would in any instance be unfavourable to the interests of Government. It is believed, and with every probability of reason, that the information and experience now possessed is superior to that which was possessed with respect to those districts into which a final settlement has been already introduced, and that the permanent jumma of those districts, where formed (as was not in every instance the case) upon the actual collections of former years, was found upon an average revenue, less rigidly administered than that of the districts which remain to be settled in perpetuity. A period has elapsed, of sufficient length, it may be presumed, to have admitted of the acquisition of the fullest information; and though the information already acquired should be still defective, a doubt may reasonably be entertained, whether much farther information is likely soon to be obtained.

212. Upon the whole, the conclusion may be safely drawn, that at the present period, if ever, we may proceed generally to a final settlement of the land revenue, without any risk of compromising the public interests.

213. The next principal point for consideration is, the mode by which a final settlement may be best or most advantageously effected.

214. A final settlement, it is scarcely necessary to remark, must be effected by perpetuating one or other of the three modes of settlement by which the land revenue is usually collected, namely, the ryotwarry or settlement with individual Ryots,—the mouzawar or village settlement, and the settlement by mootahs or zemindarries comprehending several villages, or as is sometimes the case, extensive tracts of country.

215. The expediency of perpetuating the ryotwar settlement having been formerly discussed, the same reasons which influenced the determination of Government to relinquish that system preparatory to the introduction of a final settlement, might be considered to preclude, or at least to render superfluous, any further discussion with respect to the policy of recurring to it.

216. However well calculated that system may be for bringing to view the resources of a country, it is questionable whether it be equally well calculated for its improvement. The great argument in speculation in favour of this system is, that every advantage reaches at once the Ryots, from whom all rent is derived: on the other hand, it has been considered to be too detailed, and too intricate at least for a permanent system. Its due and successful administration, it has been justly said, supposed a degree of knowledge, experience, and application, which if not rare, are certainly not likely to be generally possessed by those on whom the administration may devolve. It has also been said, with equal justice, that the detail is too minute for efficient inspection and control on the part of the superintending authorities at the presidency; and it has been objected to, upon similar grounds, that it does not well concert with the formality of our judicial proceedings. But the great objection to this system is, that it operates to the discouragement of agriculture, as the demand of the Government ment on the landholders and Ryots increases in proportion as they extend the culture of their lands.

217. In considering the third mode of settlement which has been mentioned (the zemindarry system), it may be proper to premise that the term "Zemin-"dar" appears to have acquired rather loose acceptation. It is applied to all who have inherited, or who have been vested with the right, or by whatever means have become possessed of the power of collecting the sovereign's share of the produce.

218. Some of those now denominated Zemindars have been originally such in the proper acceptation of the term, hereditary possessors of land. Others were originally revenue officers of different descriptions, and were chieftains of different degrees and denominations, Rajahs, Poligars, &c., who in times of confusion rose to power, and collected the sovereign's share of the produce from the inferior landholders and cultivators, either reserving the whole to themselves, or paying a greater or less proportion thereof as tribute, according as the government to which they were nominally subject may have been weak or vigorous. Of this last description were many of the ancient Zemindars in the Northern Circars, as well as the Poligars to the southward and westward, now also known under the general denomination of Zemindars.

219. Prior to the introduction of the permanent settlement, it appears that, with the exception of some particular cases where a fixed tribute had been before customary, the settlement with these Zemindars was formed either annually or for a short period of years. It was sometimes raised, and sometimes reduced, according to circumstances, at the discretion of the officers of Government.

220. There can be no question of the propriety and excellent effect of the measure by which the amount of their future payments was determinately fixed.

221. On the introduction of the permanent settlement into the more ancient territories of the Company upon the coast, all the lands which had been previously khas were formed into estates, bearing generally an annual jumma of from one to five thousand, as far as from ten or twelve thousand pagodas. The estates so formed were assessed upon a certain calculation of collections of former years, a remission or abatement being allowed at various rates; trifling in some instances,* but averaging in the districts of Salem and Chingleput about fifteen per cent. The estates so formed and assessed, it appears, were sold to the highest bidders, without regard to the rights of the Meerassadars or other descriptions of landholders.

222. Independently of the disadvantage or the abatement or remission which this system involved, and which did not reach the actual landholders, unless where these may have become the purchasers of the estates, it appears evident that the extension of this mode of settlement must be injurious to the country. This system has, indeed, undergone the most ample discussions; and the Board of Revenue state it as their own opinion, and as an opinion generally received, that the sale of the lands in the first instance, and the introduction of strangers in the cases in question, was an erroneous measure. It would be superfluous, therefore, to enter into any arguments to establish the justness of the conclusions which they have drawn, that the mootahdarry system should not be extended.

223. The only mode of settlement, therefore, which remains to be considered, is the mouzawar, or village settlement, the perpetuation of which is recommended by the Board of Revenue.

224. It is proposed to commence generally with a settlement for a term of years, a decennial settlement, to become a fixed settlement if approved by the Honourable the Court of Directors, by the establishment of a standard revenue,

* The khas lands in the Northern Circars (the Havellies, as they were termed) were in many cases assessed at the highest amount of the ascertained collections of an average of years, and in some few cases, at a higher amount than any traceable average of collections.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 29 Feb. 1812.

revenue or "shist," for each village, to be determined with reference to the collections of former years and to the general capabilities and permanent resources of the village.

225. A settlement, in the first instance, of considerable duration, to become permanent eventually, it is reasonably supposed will insure the attainment of the renewal, upon satisfactory terms, of the engagements which expired with the late lease, and afford the strongest inducement to the landholders and cultivators of every description to extend and improve the cultivation of their lands.

226. It is proposed that the settlement shall be formed with the principal cultivators of each village, or with the head inhabitant, including such of the principal cultivators as may be willing to become jointly responsible with him, and whose circumstances may be considered to be sufficiently respectable to give a value to their responsibility.

227. The condition of the general body of the Ryots, as represented in the minutes and proceedings of the Board of Revenue, while it leaves them without any plea of right to a direct participation in the settlement, will render the exclusion in no respect an injury; for, as explained by the Board of Revenue, the persons with whom the settlement may be formed will be vested with nothing more than the rights heretofore vested in the Sirkar, and will be deprived of the arbitrary power to enforce those rights which the Sirkar possessed, and sometimes, it would appear, too rigorously exercised.

228. It will be in the power of the person with whom the settlement may be made, to enter into permanent engagements with the inferior Ryots of the village, where custom has established no rules for regulating the demands on them; and it will be for their interest to grant as reasonable terms as may be compatible with the discharge of their own engagements with the Sirkar, in order to prevent the migration of Ryots, for whose services there will no doubt be a competition. The Ryots holding lands upon such terms will have secure possession, and consequently an interest in improving them, scarcely inferior to that of the persons who may be immediate parties to the settlement; and the operation of this principle of reciprocal advantage, it is hoped, will in a great degree supply the place of the restraint which appears to have been heretofore exercised, and for which, if such effect be introduced, it must be a beneficial substitute.

229. It is explained by the Board of Revenue, in their proceedings of the 12th August, that the state of the Ryots in other provinces, which were not so long or so completely subject to Mahommedan rule, is considerably different from that of the Ryots in the Ceded Districts, to which the previous minutes of the Board more immediately referred; and that while in the Ceded Districts there are few Ryots (the Potail, or head inhabitant excepted), whom it would be either requisite or desirable to comprehend in the public engagement, there are in other districts Ryots, besides the head inhabitants, who have pretensions to be included; and it is proposed that they be admitted to a direct participation in the settlement, unless where special reasons may oppose it.

230. It is suggested, that the muzras, or dependent hamlets, may in some cases be settled to advantage separately from the mouzahs; and it is suggested, that the subdivision of large villages should also be permitted, wherever the disposition or interests of the Ryots may suggest a subdivision. This, it is observed, may be the means of enabling the more substantial Ryots, in progress of time, to become independent landholders; but though it may be proper to admit of this arrangement, it will be necessary, it is observed, to keep the villages united as heretofore, so far as respects boundaries, servants, accounts, &c.

231. It is proposed that the settlement shall be formed exclusively of all personal and professional taxes, licenses, house and shop taxes, and of every species of revenue independent of the immediate produce of the land, as well as exclusively of all enams or alienated lands, which may now or hereafter be authorized.

232. The settlement, it is to be understood, will be open to the adjustment, which the including any items of this nature, whether from mistake or temporary expediency, may render necessary. Such a reservation is absolutely requisite, and it may be made, as the Board of Revenue have observed, without creating any doubt in the minds of the renters with respect to the permanency of the standard rent, as applying to the sirkar lands exclusively.

233. It can scarcely be expected, that an arrangement in its nature so comprehensive and important as the final settlement of a large province, can be at once rendered perfect or complete in all its parts. The general plan of settlement may be laid down and carried into execution; but there may be several subordinate matters in the detail, requiring future adjustment or correction, and for these it will be the particular duty of the Board of Revenue, in conjunction with the Collectors, to provide. The general rule relating to the plan of settlement will, as soon as practicable, be framed into a Regulation, with the view that the rights of the Government, of the persons with whom the settlement may be made, and of the mere cultivating Ryots, may be clearly defined, and that each party may be maintained by the courts of judicature in their respective rights.

234. Supplementary Regulations may hereafter be framed, according as the points arise, which may require to be defined. It will also, of course, be in the power of Government, at any future period, to interpose its authority in prescribing, from time to time, such rules as may be requisite, whether for the support of its own rights, or for the security of the inferior Ryots against exaction or oppression, on the part of those with whom the permanent settlement may be made. It will, in short, be in the power of Government to frame Regulations, of whatever nature, which may be deemed to be salutary or expedient, and which have not for their object any addition to the public revenue after it has been once fixed, or any tendency to disturb the possession of lands after such possession has been once confirmed.

235. The object of the proposed plan of settlement is to fix the demand upon the lands, and by satisfying the people that the Government will abstain from taxing improvements, so to excite their industry as to enable them, in progress of time, to pay with ease a fixed land tax or revenue, equivalent to what, on a fair average, may be considered to be the present revenue, which under a system of temporary settlements is now realized with difficulty.

236. The plan provides for the continuance, in the first instance, if necessary, of limited advances of tuccavy by Government, for the expense of repairing the larger tanks, and for occasional remissions which extraordinary calamities may render requisite. These drawbacks, it is correctly explained by the Board of Revenue, are to be regarded as contingencies, the risk and burthen of which are preferable to the certain loss which would be occasioned by a permanent reduction of the jumma, with the view of enabling the persons with whom the settlement may be made, to meet such contingencies, and which, after all, might not prove effectual to the accomplishment of the intended object.

237. It is evident, as the Board of Revenue observe, that when the improvement of the country shall have proceeded so far, that the fixed land-tax or revenue shall not exceed one-third of the gross produce of the land, where it now amounts to one-half, land will have become a valuable and saleable property, and consequently an ample security to the Government for its dues. The necessity for granting occasional remissions, and for expenses of tuccavy and tank repairs, which may for some time be requisite, will diminish by degrees, in proportion to the gradual improvement of the country, and ultimately will entirely cease.

238. These are not speculative views. There can be no doubt that the high advantage resulting to the landholders from the knowledge of the utmost amount which they can be called upon to pay, must operate as a powerful incitement to improve and extend the cultivation of the lands. That the tenure will become valuable necessarily follows; and with respect to the provision which admits of remissions on extraordinary occasions, though this may appear to be a defect in the system, it will not, perhaps, on examination, be found to be any defect. The jumma or demand will invariably remain the same; the remission allowed in any particular year will not extend beyond it. The circumstances cumstances which may render a remission necessary must be fully and distinctly explained. It may sometimes be only conditionally granted, and never in any way without the special authority of Government. If the seasons prove commonly favourable, the extent of these occasional remissions will not be important; and when the productive principle inherent in the system is considered, it is not, perhaps, unreasonable to expect that the necessity of granting them will soon cease altogether.

239. But though these views should prove to be sanguine; though the results here anticipated should not ensue so soon as it is thought may be reasonably expected, there are yet, exclusive of those ulterior advantages, other and more immediate advantages, which the proposed settlement is unquestionably calculated to produce.

240. By the measure of fixing the jumma or demand, the revenue system will be greatly simplified, much of the labour attendant on temporary settlements will cease to be necessary, and one of the immediate consequences will be a considerable decrease in the charges of collection, occasioned by the reduction which it will become practicable to effect in the district or talook establishments.

241. It may not be expedient to reduce the establishments inconsiderately, or in too great a degree, in the first instance; but when the settlement shall have been completely effected, there is no doubt that the establishment will be susceptible of very considerable reduction, and it will be the duty of the Board of Revenue to call the particular attention of the Collectors to this point.

242. Another advantage of some importance, which will immediately result from the adoption of the proposed settlement, is the increased attention which it will enable the Collectors to devote to the superintendence of the other branches of revenue.

243. It is satisfactory to observe, as the Board of Revenue have remarked, that the subordinate branches of revenue are generally in an improving state; but when the land revenue is fixed, and no further improvement is consequently to be expected from that source, it becomes the more requisite to give attention to those branches from which only an increase of revenue can be derived.

244 The several Regulations recently submitted for the department of the customs seem to be well calculated for improving the state of that branch of revenue. The same observation may be made with respect to the Regulations some time since enacted for the monopoly of tobacco, in the provinces of Malabar, Canara, and Coimbatore, and the revenue arising from the salt monopoly continues to increase; but besides the advantage which may be expected to result from attention to the improvement of the existing sources of revenue, there is no doubt that, if necessary, other means may be found to afford ample compensation for any possible immediate loss which may arise from the limitation of the land revenue.

245. In a letter to the Collector of Cuddapah, dated the 13th May last, a copy of which accompanied their minutes and proceedings, the Board of Revenue, adverting to the contingency of remissions becoming necessary, observe, that " whatever may be the amount of these occasional remissions (and if the " seasons prove commonly favourable it is apprehended that they cannot be " considerable), the Board are satisfied that an equivalent may at once, and " with very little difficulty, be derived from some other cause. The reinstitu- " tion of the licences for the sale of betel and tobacco would certainly produce " a revenue more than sufficient to cover these eventual remissions. This " source of revenue was, in the opinion of Colonel Munro, relinquished with- " out any adequate reasons, and the Board have in view to recommend its " immediate re-establishment."

246. The attention of the Board of Revenue has been recalled to this subject; for certainly wherever a loss in land revenue may be likely to take place under the operation of the proposed settlement, it is desirable, not to say necessary, that the loss should be made good by some other means, since the public public exigencies will not admit of any diminution in the aggregate amount of the present revenue.

247. It appears that the tax denominated the veessabuddy in the Ceded Districts, requires to be regulated and secured, and the Board of Revenue have required the Collectors to submit the draft of a Regulation for this purpose. If the Collectors have not already complied with these directions, their attention will be recalled to the subject.

248. From the reports of those Collectors who have already received instructions to commence the introduction of the proposed settlement, it is satisfactory to observe a general concurrence of sentiments in favour of it, and we have little doubt that it will be carried into effect in a satisfactory manner.

249. The Collector of Bellary, indeed, (the leases in which district expire with the current fusily 1221), has advanced objections to the measure; but as these objections are answered fully and satisfactorily in the minute of the Board of Revenue of the 1st July, it is sufficient briefly to advert to them.

250. Mr. Chaplin, it seems, apprehends a considerable loss of revenue, in consequence of the diminution of the Collector's power, and of what is termed the "emancipation" of the Ryots; that is, their present freedom from the coercion and compulsion to which they were subject under the ryotwar system, and by which they were obliged to occupy and pay rent for more land than it was consistent with their interest or inclination to cultivate.

251. Although the settlement of Bellary, during that portion of the triennial lease which has yet expired, has been almost wholly realized, the Collector states that the renters have suffered considerably from the cause above-mentioned, and that its operation will increase as the Ryots become more sensible of the freedom which they have acquired.

252. That some temporary loss may result from this cause, the Board of Revenue seem to admit; but they justly argue, that if the system of compulsion, which has been abandoned, cannot be, as it ought not to be, restored, the probable consequences of this change cannot constitute a foundation for objections to the particular plan of settlement which is recommended. On the contrary, it is maintained by the Board of Revenue, with apparent reason, that a fixed settlement, under such circumstances, is the system most likely to be attended with the least loss; that it rests upon a principle quite different, indeed, from compulsion, but of force sufficient, it is conceived, to secure the revenue from any serious loss.

253. Whatever temporary inconvenience may result from the cause adverted to, it is conceived that these inconveniences will be chiefly felt during the first years of the perpetual settlement, and that they will cease, so soon as a regular and permanent distribution of the lands amongst the Ryots shall have taken place. There can be no stronger argument in favour of the early establishment of the settlement which is proposed.

254. It appears, from the reports of the Collector, that the short duration of the last lease has been productive of ill effects; that this, combined with other causes, has tended to reduce the resources of the districts below the state in which they were at the period of concluding the triennial settlement.

255. It is, perhaps, to be regretted, that the settlement now proposed was not commenced at the time when the triennial lease was established; but as the causes which have produced the present depression are of a temporary, not of a permanent nature, it is hoped and expected that their effects will afford no ground for a reduction of the permanent revenue to which the Government is entitled, founded upon a review of permanent resources and former payments.

256. The adverse circumstances of the present season, superadded to the depression before referred to, will not, however, it is understood, admit of such a settlement being formed, as shall at once be capable of being realized, and be at the same time equivalent to what may be considered to be a fair assessment upon the country in perpetuity. The course of proceeding proposed posed to be adopted under these circumstances, will not, however, it is presumed, involve any reduction in the amount of the permanent demand, but only a temporary abatement. In other words, it is proposed that the settlement, as applying to the current year, shall be formed more with reference to the state of the season and the exhausted means of the renters, than to the general basis intended for the fixed settlement.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 29 Feb. 1812.

257. The occurrence of an adverse season at the outset of the proposed settlement is certainly unfortunate, and much to be regretted; nevertheless, as its principles appear to be well understood, we entertain little doubt, as already stated, that it will ultimately be established in a satisfactory manner.

258. There is one subject to which the Board of Revenue do not appear to have adverted, the coin in which the new engagements should be made payable. Care should certainly be taken, that no loss accrue to either party from any change which may hereafter take place in the denomination of the coinage, and to this point the attention of the Board of Revenue has been directed.

259. We informed your Honourable Court in the paragraphs referred to,* of the progress which had been made for concluding a triennial settlement in the unsettled districts, and of our expectation that they would be wholly effected, in the course of fusily 1219, in the districts which still remained, namely, Bellary, Coimbatore, Nellore, Trichinopoly, and Palnaud.

260. We shortly after received from the Board of Revenue the reports of the Collectors of Bellary and Coimbatore, regarding the settlements which had been concluded for those districts, and proceeded to take them into consideration.

261. The assimilation of the rates of teerwa in the southern, to those established in the northern division of the Coimbatore collectorate, was effected by the Collector, Mr. William Garrow, with the best effects, as we have stated in a former part of this letter.

262. As the triennial settlement framed by Mr. Garrow was considered by the Board of Revenue to embrace so many of the objects, for the attainment of which the lease settlement was introduced, although not strictly speaking a village lease settlement, we had the less reluctance at concurring in approval of it; and considering that many villages had been exposed to peculiar suffering from adversity of season, as well as depopulation by the epidemic disease, which raged with much violence in that part of the country, we accordingly confirmed the settlement for three years, amounting

For fusily 1218 to .... Star Pagodas 6,07,239
For fusily 1219 to 6,17,120
For fusily 1220 to 6,22,259

263. The difficulties experienced in forming the settlement in the collectorate of Bellary, in fusily 1218, continued to exist in a greater degree in fusily 1219.

264. The Board of Revenue had led us to expect † a considerable reduction in the amount of the land revenue of that year from various causes. The high amount of the assessment of the preceding year, the fall in the price of grain at the close of that fusily which obliged the Ryots to dispose of their stock, the mortality occasioned by a pestilential fever, and the unusual emigration of the cultivators to the Mysore country in consequence of the failure of the harvest, were assigned as the reasons for the deficiency; ‡ and we were induced to rest satisfied with the amount at which the Collector, Mr. Chaplin, had estimated the rent for the whole of the villages. We therefore confirmed the settlement of fusily 1219, the first year of the triennial village lease at Star Pagodas 7,68,547 23 18.

265. The terms concluded with the renters having provided also for an increased rent for the succeeding years, subject, however, to a condition stipulated lated for by them, that the tanks should be fully supplied with water, we confirmed the amount under this contingency, being for fusily 1220 Star Pagodas 77,816 2 56, and a farther increase for fusily 1221 of Star Pagodas 36,945 27 70.

266. Although, from the causes above stated, the decrease in the amount of land revenue for fusily 1219, compared with that of fusily 1218, was considerable, being Star Pagodas 82,953 9 70, we had the satisfaction of observing that the actual difference between the total jummas of the two fusilies was reduced to the sum of Star Pagodas 68,900 28 29, from the improved collections of the customs.

267. We informed your Honourable Court in the 66th paragraph of our last dispatch,* that we were unable to communicate any information regarding the particulars of the settlement for the Trichinopoly districts for fusily 1218, in consequence of the report from the Board of Revenue not having been submitted to us. The separate report of the settlement concluded for that year yet remains to be laid before us, but it is now of less importance, as we have understood that the present Collector, Mr. Travers, has concluded a triennial lease for the three following years.

268. We have just received from the Board of Revenue the report upon the triennial settlement concluded by the Collector of Nellore for fusilies 1219, 1220, and 1221, which we informed your Honourable Court, in the thirty-eighth paragraph of our last dispatch, was about to be introduced into that district; but we are precluded from entering into a particular consideration of it at present, owing to the late period at which it has been submitted. We can only assure your Honourable Court, that the result is favourable and creditable to the management of the Collector, Mr. Fraser.

269. We have not received from the Board of Revenue any reports upon the revenues of Canara, Malabar, Seringapatam, or Palnaud, either for fusily 1219 or 1220; but it is, however, understood that they are in progress, with a view to being submitted for our ultimate confirmation at an early period after the present dispatch.

283. Your Honourable Court will observe, on reference to our proceedings,† that we were induced to accede to a proposition of the Board of Revenue for affording relief to the Zemindar of Vizianagrum, and at the same time effecting the recovery of the considerable arrears due by him, by allowing him to pay the amount by instalments within the period of three years;‡ but that on his failing to discharge the amount of the instalments with punctuality, we directed that the zemindarry should be sold, conformably to the principles of the Regutions: and we have the satisfaction of informing you, that this measure produced the liquidation of the amount of the instalments.

284. For particular information respecting the measures adopted for the recovery of the balance due from other estates in the zillah of Vizagapatam, we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to our proceedings noted in the margin,§ and to those of the Board of Revenue.

328. We are concerned to state, that in consequence of the deficiency in the harvest of the present fusily year, occasioned by the failure of the usual rains, as reported in the letters recorded at our Consultations noted in the margin,‖ we had reason to expect some degree of inconvenience from a scarcity of grain, and and some loss of revenue in the territories under this Government, particularly in the Carnatic and southern districts.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 29 Feb. 1812.

329. Your Honourable Court will observe, on reference to our proceedings noted in the margin,* that we have exempted from duties all grain imported into, or transported from place to place, within the territories under this Government, and from Canara into Travancore; that we have obtained a similar exemption from duty in favour of all grain imported from the Mysore and Travancore countries into the territories under this Government; and that the Commissary-General has been directed to supply the troops with grain at those stations where a scarcity might be apprehended.

330. The good effect of these measures, with a due degree of forbearance in the settlement and collection of the revenue of the year, will, we trust, prevent any serious and general distress, and tend considerably to alleviate the sufferings of the people in the districts of Madura, Dindigul, and Tinnevelly, where the season has been particularly unfavourable, and where an epidemic distemper had previously occasioned a great mortality, and reduced the inhabitants to a state of extreme debility and distress.

331. On reference to our proceedings noted in the margin,† your Honourable Court will observe, that the disorder is attributed to the extreme unhealthiness of the seasons, occasioned by the excessive rains, and that those suggestions of the Medical Board, and the Committee of Medical Gentlemen appointed at the recommendation of the Board of Revenue to investigate the causes of the disease, which were practicable and not inconsistent with the usages of the natives, have been adopted; and we have satisfaction in informing your Honourable Court, that the disorder had abated with the unusually dry and clear weather which succeeded.

332. The Committee having conducted their inquiries to our satisfaction, we consented, in compliance with the recommendation of the Medical Board, to grant the members the batta of their ranks and palanqueen allowance, for the time they were employed.

EXTRACTS REVENUE LETTER to FORT ST. GEORGE,
Dated the 16*th December* 1812.

Revenue Letter from Fort St George, 16 Dec. 1812.

Par. 1. Our last dispatch in this department was dated the 18th December 1811.

2. On the 21st July last we received, by the Baring, your Revenue letter dated 29th February 1812, and shall reply to it in detail, after we have had time to examine your Consultations upon the various topics to which it relates.

3. We embrace, however, the earliest opportunity of apprizing you of the regret we have felt, at the deficiency of the information conveyed in your last letter respecting the general state of our revenues, more especially after the long suspension of your correspondence in this department. We naturally expected that, after suffering an interval of more than two years from the date of your preceding letter (6th February 1810) to elapse, you would have made a point of transmitting the most ample intelligence that could be procured, down to the latest possible period, of the result of those settlements which were then notified to us as being in train, and about which you must have been aware that, upon many grounds, we could not but feel the liveliest anxiety; whereas, in the dispatch lately arrived, we find no information upon that important subject, that might not, or ought not, to have been communicated much more fully at an early period in 1811.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 16 Dec. 1812.

4. The intention announced to you, in paragraphs 195 to 258, of concluding a settlement of the land revenue in the valuable and extensive provinces under the administration of your Government, upon village leases for ten years, and provisionally in perpetuity, involves considerations of so much importance, with respect to the future resources of the state, as well as the prosperity and eventual security of the actual proprietors and of the cultivators of the soil, that we must express to you our surprise that you should have determined to adopt an arrangement of this kind, without having first informed us of the success that had attended the experiment you had already made of leases upon this principle for three years, and thereby have enabled us to have conveyed to you our final orders. If any thing could add to that surprise, it would be the very extraordinary and unwarrantable discretion assumed by the Board of Revenue, as appears from their report of the 30th January 1812, but which you pass over in silence in the dispatch before us, of having, of their own accord, issued instructions to the Collectors of several districts to form village leases for the term we have described, to become at the expiration of such term perpetual, and this subject to no reservation whatever, rendering the permanency of such leases conditional, with reference to the eventual approbation of the Government at home; an omission which, we conclude from the terms of your letter, must have been afterwards supplied, in consequence of the general resolutions you came to on the proceedings reported to you by the Board of Revenue. Two reasons are assigned by the Board, in their general report of the 30th January 1812, for having acted in the manner they did. The first of these reasons we give in their own words. "It might possibly be "considered that discussions, involving so important a measure as that which "was in contemplation, should have been laid officially before the Honourable "the Governor in Council, and his orders obtained previously to our issuing "any instructions upon the subject to the Collectors. We remarked, if the "early establishment of a system of permanency, upon the principles recom-"mended, should receive the approbation of the Honourable the Governor in "Council, of which, possessed as we were of his sentiments in favour of the "measure, we entertained little doubt, it was obviously of importance that the "Collectors should be in possession of instructions as soon as possible." We consider this statement to be most unsatisfactory; for, in the first place, we cannot conceive any good reason why an earlier communication could not have been made to you by the Board, so as to have received an answer in due time from you, on the subject of the arrangements to be made on the conclusion of the triennial leases; and in the next place, it is highly objectionable for the Board of Revenue, a subordinate authority, to have proceeded to the adoption of decisive measures in a matter of so grave and serious a nature, on unofficial intimations made by the members of Government. Such a line of proceeding is necessarily destructive of all responsibility, and cannot be too strongly disapproved and discountenanced.

5. The other reason adduced by the Board for having taken upon themselves to authorize the decennial leases to be considered as permanent on the expiration of them, without any reference to the final approbation of the Government at home, is that the orders from us, "tending," as they express it, "to "prohibit the further extension of a permanent settlement without their au-"thority, related to the zemindarry settlement, the extension of which was "not contemplated." The directions, however, which we have at different times conveyed to you, since the first introduction of settlements in perpetuity, against the extension of such arrangements without our previous sanction, will be found to have a clear and explicit reference, not to the principle on which arrangements of that nature should be founded, but to the importance of deferring an unalterable adjustment of the public demand on the land, until every necessary information should be obtained of its value and resources, and of the rights of those connected with it; and if any new arguments were wanting to convince us of the necessity there was for furnishing you with those instructions, they would be supplied by the facts and conclusions contained in your dispatch now under reply, upon which we shall have further occasion to remark in this letter. The Board of Revenue are not less incorrect, when they describe our orders on the above subject as tending to prohibit the formation of permanent settlements without our sanction previously obtained; for not only only did those orders from the first, which we transmitted to you on the 11th February 1801, evince a disposition more and more adverse to any early proceedings for extending the measure further than it had hitherto gone, but in several instances they positively restricted you from so doing. We here particularly allude to the instructions contained in our Revenue letters of the 21st July 1802, of the 10th April 1804, and of the 30th August 1809. In the former of these letters, after expressing our hope that it would reach you before any considerable progress should have been made in the actual conclusion of the permanent settlement, and directing that, in such districts where it had not been finally arranged, the measure should be suspended until you should have been able to ascertain whether every possible degree of information had been obtained as to the real value of their resources, we added: "We at the "same time think it proper further to direct, that a permanent settlement of "the revenue in the provinces of Malabar and Canara, and of the lands lately "ceded by the Nizam, be not concluded, until all the previous measures lead-"ing thereto shall have been specifically reported to us, accompanied by every "possible information that can be procured upon the subject." These orders were repeated in our letter of the 10th April 1804, in the following paragraph. "From the peculiar circumstances connected with the revenues of the pro-"vinces of Malabar and Canara, and of the districts ceded by the Nizam, we "have already directed that a permanent settlement of the lands in those dis-"tricts be not carried into execution without our previous sanction, which "direction we now repeat. We much fear that the state of those countries, "and the defective information which we at present possess of their real re-"sources, or what they would produce under proper management, will not "admit of a fair and adequate settlement for some time to come." And in the last of the dispatches to which we have referred, dated the 30th August 1809, in answer to paragraphs 112 to 117 of your letter in the same department, of the 21st October 1806, which represented to us that the Ceded Districts were prepared for a permanent settlement, we observed as follows. "Our "leading motive, in adopting the great measure of settling the lands in per-"petuity, was to improve the condition of the native subjects of British India, "and this motive has still all its original influence on our minds: but many "weighty considerations connected with this system, and the experience already "had of it where it has been longest in practice, recommended great caution "in the extension of it, particularly in provinces yet imperfectly known by "us. Notwithstanding, therefore, the opinion you appear to entertain, we "are much disposed to proceed with more deliberation to a permanent assess-"ment of those districts, and you will therefore consider our former direc-"tions, reported in our letter of the 10th April 1804, prohibiting the conclu-"sion of a permanent settlement in these districts without our previous "sanction, as still in force." We also, in the same dispatch, positively refused our sanction to the adoption of that measure in the northern division of Coimbatore. The arrangements, therefore, that have been made in the Ceded Districts and in the northern division of Coimbatore, although rendered by you conditional as to their eventual permanency, are clearly in violation of our orders.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 16 Dec. 1812.

6. If our instructions, under date the 18th December 1811, should have reached Fort St. George before you shall have finally carried those arrangements into effect, which you have communicated to us in your present dispatch, we must conclude that the opinions we therein expressed will have caused you to have resumed the consideration of this question; and, in that event, we shall expect either that you have desisted from your purpose, or if you shall have proceeded in the execution of it, that you will be able to show us that cogent reasons have induced you to disobey our orders.

7. The doubts which we entertain upon this very interesting subject, have since been greatly strengthened by the observations of the Governor-General in Council, who, in a letter of the 14th December 1811, on the subject of the revenues under the Bengal presidency, has stated that errors of considerable magnitude had been committed in forming the permanent settlement of the lands under that presidency. But our attention has been arrested, in a still greater degree, by the judgment you have passed, in the letter to which we are now replying, against the system of permanent rents that was established in in the Havelly Lands of the Northern Circars, and some of our modern possessions under your government; for while we certainly concur in the opinion you have pronounced against the Mootahdarry system then established at the recommendation of your Board of Revenue, and under the authority of the Supreme Government, we are not able to distinguish any substantial difference between that system and the one you have proposed, and as we find, have actually authorized to be carried into effect.

8. The Potail, or head man of a village, was considered to be eligible, under that system, to the more elevated situation of being constituted a Mootahdar of a district comprehending many villages, and thus becoming, in point of fact, a Zemindar placed by our creation in power and authority over the Potails of these villages, and over all other proprietors of lands within his Mootahdarry.

9. In the plan which you adopted of triennial village leases, and which it appears, by your letter of the 29th February 1812, you had allowed to be extended to the lengthened period of ten years, the situation of a Potail is changed from that of being the head man and hereditary officer of a village, in which there may be, and generally are other landed proprietors, into a tenant in capite of all the village, the other proprietors becoming accountable to him, and therefore of necessity falling into the situation of under-tenants. The difference between the two systems appears to us to be in degree, and not in principle, both having a tendency to affect the interests, feelings, and rights of the small landed proprietors.

10. In the permanent settlement of the Bengal provinces, the protection of the Ryots against the oppressions and exactions of the Zemindars was justly held to be the main spring from which the improvement of the country, and of its internal resources, was to be expected; and an express provision was accordingly made in the Regulations that were passed when that settlement was formed and the principles of it promulgated, requiring that pottahs should be given by the Zemindars to the Ryots. There are, however, but too strong proofs on the records of the Supreme Government, that this Regulation has almost become a dead letter. We have also before us, in the reports of the Collector of the province of Ganjam, made to your Board of Revenue in the latter end of the year 1807, a striking instance of the disregard of the Zemindars to the provisions of a similar Regulation, enacted by you, as applying to the districts which have been permanently settled under your presidency.

11. The justice and policy upon which those Regulations were founded, appear to have been distinctly in your contemplation, by the 233rd paragraph of your letter of the 29th February 1812, in which you state, "that the "general rules relating to the plan of settlement will, as soon as practicable, "be formed into a Regulation, with the view that the rights of the Govern-"ment and of the persons with whom the settlement may be made, and of "the mere cultivating Ryots, may be clearly defined, and that each party "may be maintained by the courts of justice in their respective rights." But we must not conceal from you, that the confidence we should have derived from the design therein expressed, of ascertaining and guarding the rights, not only of the proprietary Ryots but those of the mere cultivators of the soil, has been a good deal shaken by the words in the seventy-third paragraph, where, adverting to the Meerassadars, or hereditary proprietors in the districts of Tanjore, you say, "where the Meerassadars may refuse to accede to the "settlement of their villages, by either of the modes above set forth, agree-"ments shall be entered into with the Paracoodies, or other Ryots of the "villages, either for a ready-money rent or a moree, on the principles above-"mentioned; and should neither the Paracoodies or other Ryots of a village "agree to become responsible for the jumma, the village shall be rented out "to such of the Meerassadars of the talook, or other responsible person, as "may be willing to engage, with sufficient security for the payment of the "jumma, for five years;" thereby rendering the hereditary right of the small proprietor, if it should be found to interfere with the arrangement under the permanent settlement, subject to be absorbed in the larger right which you design to create and vest in the village renter: for though you qualify the proposition, proposition, by leaving an opening for responsible Ryots to be admitted into the provisions of the village leases, the greater number of the Ryots must, we apprehend, from the smallness of their property, be precluded from participating in this advantage.

12. In our Revenue letter of the 24th August 1804, we observed that, "in "forming the materials at a distant period, for the permanent settlement of "the lands of Malabar and Canara, great caution should be used, lest you "interfere with rights which had hitherto been considered inviolable, or "disturb those ancient boundaries or landmarks which at that time had "determined the extent of private property, and by which the proprietors of "land have been governed from time immemorial." In our Revenue letter, also, of the 6th November 1805, when referring to your request to be permitted to settle the lands of Canara in perpetuity, and when noticing the strict regard due to the proprietary rights which individuals in Canara enjoyed in the soil, we took occasion to state, "that not only ought this kind of right, where "it was proved to exist, to remain undisturbed, but the perpetual settlement "ought not, for the sake of official or revenue divisions of the country, to "place the smaller estates under any kind of subordination to the greater, or "at all affect the boundaries by which property had hitherto been separated "and distinguished."

13. We recite these passages, because they show that, as soon as we were apprized by you that individual proprietary rights existed in any portion of the territories under your Government, we were most anxiously desirous that they should be respected and maintained. You have now recognized the rights of proprietorship to be possessed by Meerassadars; and yet, speaking of those in Tanjore, you say that, "where they may refuse to accede to the settlement "of the villages by either of the modes above set forth, agreements shall be "entered into with the Paracoodies, &c.," thus proposing to act not only in opposition to the principle of the 23d paragraph of your letter of the 29th February 1812, already quoted, by which you had professed your intention of being guided, but in disregard of the sentiments we had so pointedly conveyed to you, in August 1804 and November 1805.

14. These considerations operate so powerfully on our minds, that even if we could devise the means of removing the other objections which we feel against the measure you have submitted for a permanent settlement, we should most reluctantly sanction its adoption; and we do therefore most anxiously hope, that the authority of Government may not have been extensively committed by you upon it.

15. As far as we can collect from your correspondence, you seem to have been principally induced to propose the settlement upon villages leases on account of the supposed incompatilibity of the judicial system, which had recently been established in the unsettled districts, with the ryotwar mode of collection. We applaud the principle which first suggested the introduction of that system into the British possessions in India, and we venerate the character from which it emanated: but the experience of nearly twenty years in Bengal has furnished unequivocal evidence that it has not been possible, by every practicable extension of the judicial establishment, to render it adequate to the great end for which it was instituted, namely, the speedy, as well as the impartial administration of justice; but that while the expenditure has been augmented from the sum of £220,000, at which the annual charge for the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, not including the charge of police and the diet of prisoners, was calculated by Lord Cornwallis, to the sum of £306,000, at which the correspondent expenditure had arrived in those provinces, by the accounts for 1809-10, and which, by its extension to the Ceded and Conquered Territories under that presidency alone, amounted, in that year to the alarming expenditure of £870,000, still the arrear of causes has gone on increasing, until it has attained a height that calls imperiously for the application of some effectual remedy.

16. The growing accumulation of undecided suits under your presidency, and which, at so early a period since the first introduction of the Bengal Judicial code as December 1807, appears to have amounted in the zillah courts alone alone to 31,482, should in its progress rather have directed your attention to the adoption of some mode, whereby the process might have been simplified and other causes of delay removed, than have made you solicitous for the extension of a system, out of which that accumulation had arisen, accompanied as it has been by an increase of expense, which the resources of your Government are not calculated to meet, and which we find to have amounted, at the same period of 1809-10, to £344,890, exclusive of the supreme court, the police, and the diet of prisoners at the presidency; thus making the whole of our judicial charges in India (if we include the expense of the courts under the Bombay presidency, being £45,950) to be no less than £1,260,840.*

17. The expedients which we observe you have since adopted for reducing the judicial arrears, had been some years before resorted to by the Supreme Government, but they have not been found adequate to remedy the evil, which still continues to be extensively felt in the Bengal provinces, notwithstanding the further measures which have been more recently devised for the same purpose. We do not see any reasonable ground to hope that a better result will attend the application of similar remedies on your side of India. The delay of justice must, in a great degree, restrict the positive benefits that might otherwise be derived from the judicial system, and must have the effect of inducing many persons rather to submit to injuries, than to seek for redress under the discouraging circumstances of procrastination, waste of time, and uncertain though perhaps ruinous expense.

18. The incongruity which you represent to exist between the judicial system and the mode which formerly obtained, of collecting the land revenue from each Ryot through the officers of Government, we must confess appears to us to be a species of objection to that mode of collection, which may also be brought against a zemindarry or a village system of revenue management; the only difference being this, that under a ryotwar settlement, the obstructions which are occasioned, by the nature of the judicial process, to the realization of the land revenues, are experienced by the European Collector; whereas, under the other kinds of settlement, the inconvenience is transferred to the Zemindars and renters, who are left to seek the recovery of balances, and the payment of revenue in disputed cases, by the same methods and according to the same course. It is therefore, as we conceive, the formalities of proceeding in the courts of justice, and not the manner in which the Government administers its territorial revenues, that we must consider to be the causes of those impediments and difficulties to which you have alluded in your Revenue dispatch of the 28th October 1808, and in the one now before us, as having rendered it, in your judgment, necessary no longer to continue the principle of ryotwar annual settlements.

19. After the fullest consideration that we have been able to give to the important subject to which we have now adverted, we are led to think that we could not better consult the interest, both of the British Government in India and of the people living under its protection, than by resorting to an ancient usage of the natives in their village communities, as well for the adjudication of small suits and differences, as for the management of the revenue; and that, by giving the sanction and aid of our authority to the ministration of Potails or head men; assisted by the punchayets or juries, to which the people have been accustomed, we should provide more efficaciously for the speedy and equitable decision of questions of limited value, than we could hope to do by any Regulations to be carried into effect through the tedious process of courts constituted on the principle of our zillah tribunals.

20. We are aware that it may be said the Potails might pervert the influence which such a reference would give them, and make it a source of oppression and vexation to their weaker neighbours; but every measure that can be devised, and is to be administered by man, is liable to abuse. It is the duty of Government to apply the best practicable guards and correctives; and it may reasonably be hoped, that the exercise of a vigilant inspection and control over the native judiciary functionaries, together with the aids of rewards and punishments prudently applied, would serve to restrain the unfeeling and corrupt, and to encourage the honest and well-disposed.

21. Colonel Read, Colonel Munro, and other Revenue Superintendents under your Government, appear to have availed themselves of the usage to which we have referred, and which has been sanctioned by immemorial custom; and all our inquiries induce us to be strongly of opinion, that justice could not be administered in a way so consonant to the feelings and habits of the people, nor on the whole so satisfactorily, as through the intervention of the village Potails and punchayets. We find the same opinion to be strongly maintained and enforced by Lieutenant Colonel Wilks, in his "Historical Sketches of the South of India," recently published in this country, as well as in an official report which he made to the Bengal Government, in 1799, on the internal affairs of the Mysore country. The sentiments which he has expressed on this subject were founded on practical observations made in the territories belonging to the Rajah, where, under the wise and efficient management of the Dewan Poorneah, the ancient institutions of the natives were preserved, but purged of those glaring abuses and defects which had crept into them, under the reigns of Tippoo Sultaun and his father, Hyder Ally. Distributive justice appears, from the account of Colonel Wilks, to have been there chiefly conducted through the medium of the Potails and punchayets, and in his report, above referred to, he stated his firm belief (a belief which the facts and circumstances related by him seem fairly to warrant), that the substantial objects of the administration of justice, and the protection of the people in their most important rights, were obtained in a respectable degree.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 16 Dec. 1812.

22. In the review which you have presented to us of the zemindarry, the mootahdarry, the village, and the ryotwar modes for conducting the affairs of land revenue, the chief objection urged by you against the latter is its detail, which though calculated to give minute information upon every point, is supposed to be of too complicated a nature to be adopted as a permanent system for the territorial assessment of an extended dominion.

23. Colonel Munro, when in charge of a part of the Baramahl, and successively of Canara, and of Cuddapah and Bellary, which togther comprehend a large portion of the territory under your government, did not find his administration impeded by the detail of this system. Your present secretary, Mr. Thackeray, in the very valuabl memoir he composed some years ago upon the land revenue management of the country, distinctly answered the objection you have suggested. "The detail must," he observes, "be carried on by "somebody: the question is, therefore, whether it had better be carried on "under Collectors or Zemindars. The detail will not be very complicated "after the rents have been permanently fixed. The making of the jummabundy is the grand source of fraud, and trouble, and difficulty: when that "is done, the collection will go on of itself. Whenever this is fixed, detail "does not much signify, because it is only the business of a few additional "writers."

24. The remarks of Colonel Munro on this subject, contained in his report of the 15th August 1807, are equally appropriate. "The chief arguments "against the ryotwar system are," he observes, "the great detail of accounts "and the consequent difficulty of management, the interference of Revenue "officers in the cultivation, the expense of collection, and the fluctuation of "the public revenue. But there seems to be nothing very serious in these "objections. When a country is surveyed, and the rent of every field "fixed, the accounts become perfectly simple: they are nothing more than a "list of Ryots and fields; and if the Ryots do not next year take new, or "throw up old land, the same register will serve again. The accounts of the "customs, which yield so small a portion of revenue, are infinitely more "intricate and troublesome than those of the land rent. The additional "expense of collection in the ryotwar settlement would be gradually com- "pensated by the rent of waste lands brought into cultivation." And in other passages of his report he observes, "that it is the system which has always "prevailed in India, that no other can be permanent, and that however "different any new one may be, it must resolve itself into it at last; that it "admits of all gradations of large and small farms, as there are Ryots who pay "from one to one thousand pagodas, and is the best to promote industry "and to augment the produce of the country."

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 16 Dec. 1812.

25. The elaborate and judicious report of Mr. Place upon the jaghire, is an evidence in confirmation of the foregoing observations, and all tend strongly to oppose your opinion, and to recommend the ryotwar mode of management as the most expedient to be adopted, with a view to the equal assessment of the land revenue, while at the same time it affords the opportunity of applying the corrections of economy and of expedition to the administration of justice, and has a necessary tendency to stimulate the industry, and enlarge the views of the hereditary proprietors, and to strengthen the confidence of all descriptions of the natives in our Government.

26. The example of Canara may be adduced in corroboration of what we have advanced from other authorities. This province appears, from the reports of the Collectors, to have arrived at a high state of improvement, and its inhabitants to be in possession of the substantial benefits which invariably accompany the independent feelings of proprietary right and personal security. The beneficial influence of the ryotwar system may be considered to have been brought to a most satisfactory demonstration in Canara, and we are strongly encouraged, by the examination we have made into the official communications of your Collectors, to hope that the adoption of that system in the unsettled districts would, at no great distance of time, produce a spirit of industry, an extension of agricultural undertaking, and with it an augmentation of the public revenue, similar to what has taken place in Canara.

27. The minute of Lord William Bentinck, recorded on your Revenue Consultations of the 28th November 1806, so immediately bears upon this subject, and so perfectly coincides with the sentiments we have here expressed, that we are induced to make the following quotation from it.

" From the first transfer of Canara to the British authority, it has continued " a solitary example, I believe, of tranquillity, of an easy and regular realiza- " tion of the revenue, and of general prosperity. The causes of such happy " effects are, in my opinion, to be found in the tenure of landed property " peculiar to the province, and in the moderation with which the rights of the " Sircar to a proportion of the land revenue have been exercised. The local " situation of Canara is no doubt favourable to the advantageous disposal of its " produce, and a strong secondary cause of its state of agricultural improve- " ment; but the two first circumstances I conceive to be the primary causes " of the prosperity of Canara. These causes appear to me to contain the "certain principles of prosperity wherever they may be introduced.

" I had been early impressed with the great advantages of the ryotwar settle- " ment, as an annual settlement. Those advantages consisted in the equal " distribution, and the defined amount of the land-tax, and in the security " afforded to the poor against extra assessment from head inhabitants. Every " man knew his exact obligations to the Sircar, and was assured of the quiet " enjoyment of the surplus produce of his labour. Hence arose the true en- " couragement to industry, and from this principle has flowed increased cul- " tivation, and contrasted with the revenue of former times, the easy realiza- " tion of the public revenues.

" From an attentive consideration of these effects, it appeared to me that if " an annual settlement with the Ryots, founded upon fixed principles, the " essential part of which was to secure to the Ryot for a year the fruits of his " industry, had actually been productive of such decided advantages, a per- " manent settlement, founded upon the same principles, but carried to a " greater extent in regard to the benefit of the Ryot, would produce the same " effects in an increased ratio.

" It is not my intention, at present, to argue these positions, but to pre- " sent to the Board the progress of my own ideas upon this particular question. " I had been struck with this opinion before I became acquainted with the " exact nature of the tenures of land in Canara, with the average extent of se- " parate estates, and with the rates of the Sircar assessment. When these cir- " cumstances were made known to me, I was astonished with the close resem- " blance between the actual state of property in Canara and the proposed " permanency of the ryotwar settlement. Among other peculiarities, the " greater part of the estates, though fully assessed, pay less than ten pagodas

" per annum to the Sircar. I shall not enter into further details; I shall only " state my satisfaction in finding theory reduced to practice, and speculation " proved by the test of the most successful experiment.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 16 Dec. 1812.

" Canara," his Lordship adds, " thus became the great landmark by which " I hoped to trace out those principles and regulations, which might be appli- " cable to the unsettled districts, when the permanent tenures are to be intro- " duced. I have reason to believe, though I cannot speak with any positive " certainty, that the same tenures as in Canara existed originally throughout " every part of the Peninsula. In other parts, the boundaries of individual rights " have been trodden down by the oppression and avarice of despotic authority; " but still there exists, in almost every village, the distinction of Meerassy " inhabitants or hereditary cultivators. Now the hereditary right to cultivate " certain lands, and to reap the benefits of that cultivation, seems to be nearly " one and the same thing with the right in the land called property."

28. Mr. Thackeray, then a member of your Board of Revenue, who was, on the proposition of his Lordship, deputed to Canara, Malabar, and the Ceded Districts, for the purpose of ascertaining by statistical inquiries the correctness of those general views and principles, the outlines of which Lord William Bentinck had unfolded in his minute, has, by the result of his investigations, as contained in the valuable report he made on this important subject, afforded an ample confirmation of those views and principles, as deduced, not only from the state of Canara, but also from the improved condition of Malabar and the Ceded Districts under the operation of the ryotwar mode of management. With respect to the latter extensive portion of territory, we have the concurring opinion of the Board of Revenue and your Government, expressed in October 1808, upon a review of the administration of Colonel Munro, during a period of seven years, that it had advanced those districts, and this too, as it appears, under a high scale of rents, from the almost ultimate point of declension, to which they had been sunk by a weak and improvident Government, to the degree of prosperity and promise in which they then were; that a mass of revenue, amounting to Star Pagodas 1,19,90,419 had been collected, with a remission on the whole of only Star Pagodas 3,415. It further appears from the memorandum of Colonel Munro delivered in to the Acting President in Council, that he therein declared, that " if no alteration was attempted, the Ceded " Districts would yield, one year with another, eighteen lacks of pagodas, " and that it would never be necessary to call out a single sepoy to support " the collections."

29. There are two circumstances, as connected with the question of a ryotwar settlement, which, in addition to the practical illustration here exhibited of the wisdom and efficiency of this system of revenue administration, we deem it proper to mention, as weighing also very strongly in our minds in its favor.

30. The first is, that it secures to us what can, as we conceive, under no other system be secured effectually, the eventual advantage of an adequate revenue from the waste lands of the country, as they are brought into cultivation, a source which, under a judicious and enlightened administration of our territorial interest, it is not unreasonable to expect, from past experience, will yield a considerable and annually increasing augmentation to the public resources, and may gradually enable your Government, without reducing the public income, to lower the rate of assessment upon the lands already in cultivation.

31. The other consideration to which we allude is suggested by the natural tendency of the Hindoo law to occasion the division of property, according to which it descends in equal portions to the male children, whether of natural issue or by adoption: an effect which must operate to a very wide extent, and must, of course, be accelerated by the practice which universally obtains in the East, of early marriage. Whatever arrangement might, therefore, be made in the districts to which these observations particularly refer, for apportioning lands, or rather for farming as an hereditary property the revenues of them to one or more individuals, could but be of temporary duration, and would, even though opposed by artificial restraints, in direct variance with the established law of Indian inheritance, become in a few generations, under a system of permanent village rents, so divided and subdivided as to proprietary rights in in the hereditary farm, as to bring things to a state similar to that in which they would be under the ryotwar management, where the collections of a village would not be made from a few persons but from many. This circumstance alone seems to dictate the principle of collecting the rents according to the ryotwar system, in preference to any other, as being best suited to the local state of the country; whereas a village permanent settlement is one which, in the ordinary course of things, is constantly tending, and must soon give rise to nearly as much trouble and still more difficulty than a ryotwar assessment. We say more difficulty, because there will be two descriptions of property, dividing and subdividing, viz. the property of the hereditary farmer of the revenue, whom we should create, and the territorial property of the Meerassadars and other cultivators.

32. Such has been the inconvenience and embarrassment experienced, in regard to the realization and security of the public revenue assessed on the Zemindars, in consequence of the fraudulent and collusive allotments of it on the shares of estates that had become divided, that it was thought necessary to pass a regulation in 1807, to prevent any estate from being divided which was assessed by Government at less than one thousand rupees, and for preventing a smaller partition than bore an assessment of five hundred rupees. It being, however, found that this Regulation was inadequate to the correction of these evils, and it being also found that the restriction which had been thus laid on the partition of estates,* "had been, and was the cause of considerable injury "to numbers of individual shares in such estates, thereby inducing a "sacrifice of private rights, which the degree of public inconvenience "arising from the minute division of landed property did not appear of suffi- "cient magnitude to justify or require," another regulation was enacted in the year 1811,† providing "that any putteedar or sharer of a joint undivided "estate, having the exclusive and acknowledged right to and possession of one "or more villages in such estate, shall be at liberty to cause such village or "villages to be separated from the general estate;" so that, in progress of time, the large zemindarries in Bengal will be reduced to village zemindarries, a state to which they are already fast approaching, and might, but for the legislative restriction still in force, which we have just noticed, in the end dwindle into estates as small as those belonging to the Meerassadars and other Ryots in the Peninsula.

33. It remains for us, on the grounds and for the reasons stated, to signify to you our directions, that in all the provinces that may be unsettled when this dispatch shall reach you, the principle of the ryotwar system, as it is termed, shall be acted upon, and that where the village rents upon any other principle shall have been established, the leases shall be declared terminable at the expiration of the period for which they may have been granted; and that, if such a measure be not already adopted, an express stipulation be made, requiring the issue of pottahs by the renters to the Ryots, on pain of forfeiting their leases.

34. Considering it also to be essentially necessary, in order to obtain correct accounts of the cultivation and produce of the land, that the Curnums of the villages should be kept as free as possible from the controul and influence of the renter during the terms of their leases, we further direct, if this has not been done, that measures be taken to place them under the direct authority and superintendence of the Collectors of the Districts, so as to be immediately responsible to them for the due discharge of their duty.

35. We also direct, that you cause inquiry to be made by the Collectors, as to how far, and in what manner, the Regulations under your Government, in regard to the issue of pottahs to the Ryots, has been and is attended to, not only in the unsettled districts, but also in those permanently settled, and that you put us in possession of the result of the information you shall receive on this subject.

36. We cannot conclude the subject to which this dispatch more immediately relates, without remarking that the reasoning of the Board of Revenue appears to us to be often in opposition to the facts and circumstances they have themselves adduced in their report.

37. They

* Preamble to Regulation IX. † Regulation XI.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 16 Dec. 1812.

37. They admit that the triennial lease settlement had failed; that the rate of rent at which that settlement had been formed was too high; that two of the three years during which it was in operation had been unfavourable, one of them having been a season of extraordinary drought; that the stock and subsistence of the Ryots had continued to be in a state of declension under our Government, from the too heavy pressure of the public assessment upon the land; that the season of the present year threatened to be unfavourable; that the poverty of the Ryots would, in many instances, disqualify them from becoming the Renters of their villages. And yet, under an admission of all these circumstances, they recommend to you, and you authorized them to carry into immediate effect, a settlement of the provinces upon a standard land-rent, to be then fixed for ten years certain, and in perpetuity, unless disapproved by us; and both you and they have recorded your opinions, that from the encouragement which such a tenure would hold out to the Ryots, the standard rent might generally be fixed so as to prevent any considerable reduction in the amount of the present land revenue, a result which, if the facts and circumstances adduced in the Report should prove to be founded, cannot take place without aggravating the evils therein represented, more especially at it is assumed by you and the Board of Revenue, that as the poverty of some Ryots may render it necessary to lower the rate of assessment in some villages, the deficiency must be provided for by raising that rate in other villages, where the remaining substance of the Ryots might enable them to bear it, the natural effect of which would be, to lower the substantial farmer to the level of the poorer one, while in many instances the latter would be made to feel all the bitterness of his poverty, by being degraded from his immediate relation with the Government into an under-tenant to his fellow Ryot, vested by you with the larger land rights of the state.

38. The principle of the proposition that was suggested by Mr. Grœme for confining the leases to the lands that have been considered and are classed under the head of lands in cultivation, might, we conceive, if it had been adopted, have had a beneficial effect upon the minds of the Ryots; and wherever they were in circumstances that would have rendered them responsible tenants for a rent equal, or nearly equal in amount, to that which their lands had paid, we should have approved of your granting long leases, and would have confirmed them in perpetuity to such Ryots individually, because we are of opinion that the effect of such separate settlements would be not only to stimulate the industry of those who should be thus permanently established in their property, and enable them gradually to apply for portions of the waste lands, upon the terms at which it has been customary to allot such lands, convertible into a perpetuity at a reasonable assessment, but because the example thus held out of the benefits derived from exertions could not fail, in the course of time, to have a general influence upon the other occupants of land.

39. Having apprized you of the sentiments we entertain respecting the practical operation of the judicial system, it is scarcely necessary for us to state, that it is our intention to give it our most serious and deliberate consideration, the result of which we shall take an early opportunity of communicating to you.

40. Before we conclude this letter, we must take notice of several other paragraphs of your dispatch of the 29th February 1812, which we have read with much concern.

41. In paragraph 267, you state that the separate report of the settlement concluded in Trichinopoly for fusily 1218, (1808-9) yet remained (in 1812) to be laid before you by the Board of Revenue, and you add, that it is now of less importance, as you understood that the present Collector, Mr. Travers, had concluded a triennial lease for the three following years.

42. In paragraph 269, you state that you had not received any reports upon the revenues of Canara, Malabar, Seringapatam, or Palnaud; and you add, without animadversion, "it is however understood, that they are in progress, "with a view to being submitted for your ultimate confirmation at an early "period after the present dispatch."

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 16 Dec. 1812.

43. In paragraph 275, you give a comparative statement of the revenues of Madras, for fusilies 1218 and 1219; and though fusily 1220 had expired eight months prior to the date of your letter, you acknowledge, in paragraph 277, that no account has been received of the revenue of that year.

44. Of the causes to which this extraordinary tardiness is owing on the part of the Board of Revenue, or the subordinate functionaries, in preparing and submitting the periodical revenue reports, you have not informed us.

45. We should be wanting to the trust reposed in us, did we permit such instances of remissness to pass without censure.

46. You must be fully aware of the responsibility that will attach upon the Governor in Council, for any detriment that our interests may sustain from a relaxation of authority over the subordinate departments, and from a want of attention to the communications received from us. It is your positive duty to act up to the spirit of our instructions, and not to embarrass our final decision by measures, which a due regard to the sentiments we have expressed might enable you to collect, were not likely to be in conformity to our opinion.

47. This dispatch we expect shall be taken under your consideration with this view, and we trust that it will lead to such a course of proceeding as may ultimately meet with our approbation.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to FORT ST. GEORGE,
Dated 6th June 1814.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 6 June 1814.

Par. 32. In reference to the conditions (as detailed in paragraphs 66 to 80 of your letter) of the new settlement of the lands of Tanjore, which was concluded at the expiration of the triennial lease in fusily 1219, we are not quite satisfied, after a careful review of the whole correspondence, that the arrangement is unobjectionable in its provisions, or that the amount of revenne derivable from the province under its operation is likely to answer every reasonable expectation.

33. In reply to paragraphs 58 to 76 of your letter dated 24th October 1808, communicating the instructions which you had issued for the establishment of a system of village rents on a triennial lease in all the unsettled districts subject to the presidency of Fort St. George, we informed you, that "in so far as we had then been able to form a judgment on the subject, we "were disposed generally to approve of the village leases which you had "granted, and of your having limited them to a period of three years, as "admitting of an early correction of errors.*" Having considered that mode of settlement as an experiment, the renewal of which ought entirely to depend upon its success, we were naturally anxious to discover what had been its results in Tanjore.

34. In the letter from the Collector of that province to the Board of Revenue, dated 28th March 1810, paragraph 5, we find it stated as his opinion, that "under the operation of two unfavorable years in the course of "the three for which engagements were entered into, and the other year not "presenting any uncommon advantages, either in price or produce, to the "renters, it is scarcely to be expected, that they will generally encounter a "chance of the recurrence of such difficulties as they have experienced, on "terms similar to those on which they have hitherto engaged to rent their "lands." The obstructions to the renewal of the lease did not, in the Collector's judgment, arise from over-assessment; on the contrary, he pronounced "the basis of the leases to be fair and equitable, and the rate of "taxation to be probably more moderate than in other districts.†" He goes on to state, that though the price at which the sirkar share of the produce was commuted had been formed on the average of the selling prices of grain in several years, chosen with due attention to the interests of Government and the cultivators, yet that from a variety of circumstances peculiar to the province province (to which we have adverted in an antecedent paragraph), it was frequently impossible for the Meerassadars to dispose of their produce at the commutation standard, and consequently that those of them who, from a want both of capital and credit, were obliged to get rid of their grain at whatever prices they could obtain, were thus reduced to poverty, and left without the means of discharging their kists at the usual periods.* From these peculiarities the Collector inferred, that "the plan of village rents, on the present extended "scale, was not strictly applicable to all the villages in Tanjore, and that "there would be great, and in most cases insurmountable difficulties started "by the Meerassadars to the renewal of their leases, on terms at all com-"mensurate with the just opinions entertained of the resources of the "district.†"

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 6 June 1814.

35. The positions contained in Mr. Wallace's letter were strenuously controverted in the reply from the Secretary to the Board of Revenue, dated the 31st May 1810; the Board contending that the failure of the triennial lease must have arisen, first, from "the settlement being formed upon specu-"lative calculations of produce and defective calculations of price, instead of "upon what forms the only sure grounds on which to form a settlement, the "actual collections of former years; and secondly, from restrictions, defects, "and arrangements in the local administration, founded on false principles,‡" alluding to the Collector's recent interference in the grain market. We cannot help observing, that the exposition of the principles enforced in Mr. Secretary Wayte's letter would have been more seasonable when the Board were first consulted, on the 22nd February, respecting the measure alluded to, (and which they thought fit to sanction on the 26th March), than it was on the 31st May, when the evils supposed to attend it were irremediable. At the period last-mentioned, the Board seem to have been anxious for the continuance of the established renting system; and in their zeal for this object, they endeavoured to show that the disappointment hitherto experienced in its prosecution originated, not in any radical fault of the plan, but from incidental errors attending its execution. The Collector, on the other hand, contended with much plausibility in his letter dated 12th June 1810, that the failure of the triennial settlement in Tanjore did not proceed either from defects or abuses in the execution, as was supposed by the Board of Revenue, but that it arose in great measure from causes which, he was afraid, would continue to operate as long as a system of fixed money-rents was persevered in. These causes are specified by the Collector, in the letter last referred to, to be, first, "the general wish which the natives of the province feel to have their lands "under aumany, arising from the total absence under that system of all risk "and responsibility on their part, and probably in some cases from a desire for "those illicit advantages which a division of the crops place at their disposal; "and, secondly, the establishment of a fixed commutation rate, and the loss "arising from the depression of the price of grain below that rate which may "not have been counterbalanced by any increase of produce.§"

36. The Collector, in the same letter,‖ further states as matter of fact, that "the Nabob, with all the power and authority of a despotic prince and of a "conqueror, could not establish in Tanjore a fixed invariable village money-rent. "The Rajah's government which was not less arbitrary, could not effect it. "The Commissioners, whose deliberations preceded the final cession of the "country, deemed it difficult. The Committee of 1807, with the whole re-"cords of the country, and with a full view of what had been done in other "provinces before them, thought its establishment doubtful, and provided in "their recommendation for its failure." Instead, therefore, of persisting in an attempt, considered by him as hopeless, the Collector proposed, in the fifty-second and subsequent paragraphs of his letter of the 12th June 1810, that a fixed grain assessment, for three or five years, should be agreed upon with the Meerassadars of all those villages where a renewal of the existing engagements might be found impracticable, and that such assessment, subject to an annual valuation calculated on the selling prices of grain in each year, should constitute the jumma jumma payable by the Meerassadar. This plan of a grain assessment had the recommendation of being consonant to the usages of the native governments, and likewise of relieving the Meerassadars from the losses to which they were exposed under a fixed money-rent, from a fall in the price of grain below the commutation standard.

37. It might undoubtedly have occasioned considerable fluctuations in the amount of the revenue derivable from the province in different years, though the Collector observes, in his letter of the 25th June 1810,* that the revenue would, "upon the whole fluctuate as much in favour of, as against the public "treasury; and the probability was, that on an average of years the revenue "would be as high, if not higher, than possibly it could be under the conti- "nued operation of any plan, involving a fixed rent for a moderate series of "years."

38. Under a plan of this sort, there might also have been some difficulty in adjusting the price at which the government share of the produce would have been annually convertible into money. And supposing that no such difficulty had occurred, a rent consisting in the contribution of a certain quantity of grain, convertible into money according to the selling price in the market, would seem to be less favourable to the tenant than to the landlord, because in years of great scarcity the rent may absorb the whole produce of the soil, whereas, under a fixed money-rent, the tenant being generally indemnified for scanty produce by high prices, is thus enabled to fulfil his engagements in years of scarcity with nearly as much facility as in seasons of plenty.

39. We are far from thinking, therefore, that the mode of settlement proposed by Mr. Wallace was altogether unexceptionable. The only question in considering it is, whether the inconveniences to which it is liable were not, upon the whole, smaller than those which had been experienced under the former system; and this is a question which might, we conceive, have been fairly subjected to the test of an experiment, though we are free to confess that we are not without doubts respecting the result.

40. The Collector's plan was recommended to you for adoption by the Board of Revenue, in their letter of the 2d July 1810; and the Board, without waiting for an official reply from you to their communication, intimated rather irregularly to the Collector, in a letter of the same date, that they had reason to be satisfied you would acquiesce in the measure.

41. When the Collector assembled the Meerassadars for the purposes of forming a settlement with them, either for ready money, on the principle of the triennial lease, or for a fixed grain rent commutable into money, according to the market price of each year, it appears from Mr. Wallace's letter of the 11th September 1810, that the landholders obstinately refused to enter into engagements for the payment of the revenue on either of the plans to which they were invited to accede; their object being to obtain an aumany division of the crops, or division in kind; or failing in this, a grain rent, retaining their present high rate of warum or share, which, in consideration of their being relieved from the risk of a fixed money-rent, the Board of Revenue and the Collector had agreed in thinking it reasonable and expedient to reduce from about fifty to forty-five hundred parts of the produce, or about ten per cent.

42. The Secretary to the Board of Revenue, in a letter addressed to your chief Secretary, under date the 27th September 1810, states that the average rate of the Meerassadar's warum, under the Dubbeer's settlement, was forty-three per cent.; that in fusily 1210 it was only forty per cent., and in the two subsequent years that it was no more than forty-five per cent. On the first introduction of fixed money-rents, it seems to have been increased to fifty-three per cent., though the inhabitants were at the same time relieved from payment of a number of arbitrary taxes, as an inducement to Meerassadars to accede to that mode of settlement. It might be equitable, therefore, that under a different arrangement, by which the Meerassadars were to be exempted from the risk attendant on engagements of that nature, they should relinquish part, at least, of the advantages granted to enable them to meet that risk.

* Paragraph 29.

43. We have great doubts, however, of the expediency of requiring this concession from the Meerassadars; and after their refusal to agree to it, we can see no good reason for your having granted an abatement of ten per cent. on the jumma of those lands, the holders of which agreed to pay a fixed money-rent for a term of five years. The plan of establishing a fixed moree, or grain assessment, was proposed by the Collector for the express purpose of preventing the loss of revenue, which he conceived to be inseparable from a fixed money-rent; and it was calculated, in that officer's letter of the 25th June 1810,* that the grain assessment on the nunja lands of the province would yield, on an average of years, making every allowance for fluctuations in produce and price, Star Pagodas 9,14,765 per annum, exceeding the average revenue derived from the same lands in the preceding ten years, in the sum of Star Pagodas 30,719. It is to be observed, too, that this calculation was made upon the supposition that the Meerassadar's share of the produce should not be reduced below fifty per cent. The reduction of their share to forty-five per cent. had an obvious tendency to defeat the plan altogether, particularly when coupled with an abatement of ten per cent. on the jumma of those landholders who choose to engage for a fixed money-rent.

44. The sacrifice that has been made since fusily 1210, in order to insure the payment of a fixed money-rent, has been no less than thirty-three and a half per cent. of the gross revenue, as will appear from the following statement:

		Sacrifice.
Meerassadar's share of the produce under the Dubbeer's settlement........	43 per cent.	$23\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.
Augmented on the first introduction of fixed money rents to....................	53 per cent.
Add: Abatement in the jumma at the introduction of the quinquennial lease..		10 per cent.
	Sacrifice......	$33\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

45. But this does not include the total amount of the actual sacrifice; for we observe, in the letter from your Secretary to the Board of Revenue, dated 6th November 1810, that as a farther encouragement to the Meerassadars to enter into engagements for a fixed money-rent, you have ordered the collection of duties on grain, the produce of Tanjore, to be suspended during the period of the lease, and the money-rents of the Cavelgars and the Brahmins' sotunterams to be omitted in the jumma, leaving their dues to be paid in kind, at the rate of two and one-third per cent. on the actual produce From the suspension of the duty on grain, the revenue will sustain a loss of seven or eight thousand pagodas annually; and though the other indulgence may not affect the public receipts, the fund from which the cavelly establishment and the pensions to Brahmins are defrayed, will be impaired in the same proportion that the Meerassadars are benefited.

46. Even this is not all. The Collector states, in the tenth paragraph of his letter dated the 30th October 1810, that in forming the settlement for five years, he had consented to the insertion in the pottahs issued to the Meerassadars of a clause providing for a just reduction in the jumma of any year, in which it shall be fully established, to the satisfaction of Government, that from the calamitous effects of drought or inundation, their lands may have been unproductive, the extent of the reduction to be determined at the discretion of Government. The jumma, after having been reduced in its amount and its maximum fixed, is thus left in as precarious a state in regard to its eventual realization, as if it had been assessed according to the former standard. We are not surprised, therefore, to find from the Collector's letter of the 30th October, 1810,† that after all these concessions to the Meerassadars, a great majority of them had acceded to a money-rent, while but few had chosen the alternative of a grain moree, at the reduced rate of coodewarun, or share of the produce. But we have been considerably disappointed at not finding upon your records any statement of the reasons which induced you to abandon the scheme of a variable village rent, formed on the principle of the annual valuation of a fixed grain assessment. It was proposed by the Collector as one that would "most willingly be acceded to by the Meerassadars, and which they would "generally prefer to an assessment, having no reference to annual fluctuations "in the price of grain, although the other provisions of the settlement should "be much less favourable to them in the former than the latter part of the "rent."* It was represented by Mr. Wallace as "suitable to the nature of "the district,† agreeable to ancient usage, and easy of renewal; as ensuring "the collection of the revenue at a moderate expense, superseding the necessity of lowering the jumma, or of renting the lands to strangers and adventurers, and promising, on an average of years, as high, if not a higher "amount of revenue than would be derived under any other plan."‡ Stronger reasons for its adoption could not well have been advanced. It was recommended to your sanction by the Board of Revenue in their letters of the 28th of June and 2d July 1810, and had it not been for the proposed reduction in the Meerassadar's warum, we have no doubt that it might have been carried into effect, whilst the opinions both of the Collector and the Board are certainly calculated to convey the impression, that its operation would have been mutually advantageous to Government and the landholder. Adverting to these circumstances, and particularly to the abatement of ten per cent. on the jumma, which appears to have been granted solely for the purpose of overcoming the reluctance manifested by the Meerassadars to a fixed money-rent, we are much surprised that, in overruling the suggestions of the subordinate functionaries, you did not record the grounds of your decision. We have stated, in an antecedent paragraph, some of the general objections to which the plan of settlement proposed by Mr. Wallace seemed to us to be liable; but, upon the whole, we are disposed to think they would have been overbalanced by the advantage attending it.

47. Regarding the pagoda lands, which are described to be the meerassy property of institutions which it has been the uniform policy of our Government to maintain unimpaired, the Collector proposed, in his letter of the 8th November 1810, that they should be excluded from the quinquennial lease, and that they should be made subject to an annual settlement, either on the estimated or actual produce of each year, of which the Government share should be commuted into money according to the selling prices of the season. This proposal, the object of which was to secure these lands against the risk of alienation in payment of the public demands under a fixed money-rent, was rejected by you, on the ground of its being inexpedient to admit so wide an exception to the mode of settlement already determined on. We admit that it is desirable to preserve uniformity in our system of revenue administration; but, on the other hand, it ought unquestionably to be the care of Government, that the mode of collecting its dues shall be such as is least likely to affect the stability of property: and this consideration having been attended to in the general plan of settlement proposed by Mr. Wallace, formed in our opinion one of its principal recommendations.

48. We embrace this opportunity of expressing our approbation of the zeal, judgment, and ability, displayed by Mr. Wallace, the Collector, in his correspondence on the subject. His letters to the Board of Revenue contain much valuable information respecting the general state of the province; and his suggestions, with the exception of that respecting the establishment of mootahs, which the Board acted properly in rejecting, have appeared to us so judicious, that we must express our regret that they were not more attended to in the formation of the settlement.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 6 June 1814.

79. The terms of the triennial village leases referred to in these paragraphs were:

For fusily 1218	Star Pagodas	6,07,239
.... 1220		6,22,259

80. It appears that, owing to adversity of season, and depopulation arising from the fatal prevalence of epidemical disease, the rent in the first year of the lease fell short of the revenue in fusily 1217 by Star Pagodas 8,032, but that the average rent in the three years exceeded the settlement in fusily 1217 by Star Pagodas 268. We have derived much satisfaction from the account given by Mr. Garrow, of the advantages which have resulted from assimilating the teerwa, or rate of assessment, in the southern, to that established in the northern division of the province, and from the prospect held forth of such an increase of population as will compensate for the temporary reduction of revenue occasioned by the equalization of the assessment. We could, however, have wished that on some points, particularly the description of persons with whom the settlement was concluded, the information furnished by the Collector had been more explicit. In paragraphs 29 to 32 of his letter dated 25th October 1809, the renters are said to be chiefly the Monigars; and in cases where they had declined, the most respectable Gours, or heads of the villages. The former are described to be Government servants, who when they are not themselves the renters, draw a certain proportion of pay from the holders of the lease; whereas, on referring to Mr. Hodgson's report on Coimbatore, dated the 10th September 1807, paragraph 32, we find that, in explaining the mode in which the measurement of the land was conducted, he states it to have been executed "by the Curnums and Nantaumakars, or Gours, commonly called village Monigars," thereby leading us to infer that the two classes, which are represented by Mr. Garrow as distinct, were considered by Mr. Hodgson as one and the same. We are particularly desirous that the native terms and appellations, which appear in the correspondence recorded on your proceedings, may be invariably accompanied with appropriate terms or explanations in English, which are often absolutely requisite to a due understanding of the measures with which they are connected; and we direct you to issue instructions to the different Collectors, enjoining strict attention to our wishes in this respect. It is impossible for us, in the case of the settlement now under review, to judge of its merits without being accurately acquainted with the condition, rights, and general qualifications of the parties with whom it has been concluded; and on all occasions we are disposed to consider information of this sort, as equally important with statements exhibiting the fluctuations of an increasing or decreasing revenue.

81. We earnestly recommend to your attention the subject brought forward by the Collector, towards the conclusion of his letter of the 25th October 1809,* and farther enlarged upon by the Board of Revenue in their address dated 10th January 1810, as intimately connected both with the security of the revenue and the general prosperity of the country. The subject to which we allude is the deficiency said to exist in the circulating medium of Coimbatore, occasioned by a constant drain of specie from the province without an equivalent return, and necessarily producing a fall in the price of grain, together with a stagnation of trade and manufactures. The same topic was discussed in Mr. Hodgson's report,† dated 10th December 1807, and we have no doubt that the adoption of his suggestions may palliate, if it does not entirely remedy the evil complained of. The soil of the province is represented to be generally well adapted to the culture of cotton, and the number of looms in the two divisions is stated to amount to 11,558. With a view, therefore, to encourage the agriculture and manufactures of the country, Mr. Hodgson proposed that a quantity of cotton should be annually provided on the Company's account, and transported by carts or basket-boats down the Cavery to Nagore, from whence it might be sent by sea to Madras, in time for the ships which sail for China in the month of August; and also that Government should allow individuals to pay into the treasury at the presidency sums of not less than five hundred rupees for bills on the Collectors of Coimbatore or Salem, to be applied to the purchase of cloth for the Madras and European markets. By such an accommodation, accommodation, it was argued by Mr. Hodgson, the trade of the country would be facilitated and its revenue improved, a quicker circulation of money would be produced, a proportion of the charges of remitting specie saved, and new articles of export might be found, through the industry of individuals supported by the assistance of the Collectors. We hardly need assure you, that any measures which may be productive of results so advantageous in themselves, and which we have so much at heart, shall receive our hearty concurrence and approbation.

† Paragraphs 116 to 122.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 6 June 1814.

82. We are not without hope, also, that the same measures which shall have the effect of supplying the supposed deficiency in the circulating medium of Coimbatore, or to express it more correctly, of exciting industry and invigorating circulation, will put an end to the embarrassing coincidence between scanty produce and low prices, which is represented to exist in Tanjore and the Cuddapah division of the Ceded Districts, provided their operation be extended to these provinces. A sale of subsistence implies a superfluity in the hands of the seller, and a proper equivalent in the hands of the buyer. This equivalent may consist in money, or in the superfluous produce of some sort of industry not absolutely necessary to subsistence, but by the sale of which the possessor may provide himself with a sufficiency of what is indispensible to his support. The price of subsistence is regulated, therefore, by the number of those who are obliged to buy, or in other words, by the number of those who are employed in occupations other than agriculture; and the proportion so employed will always depend upon the demand for what they produce. If a very large proportion of the inhabitants of a country be employed in the cultivation of the soil, and a very small proportion only be engaged in manufactures, and if the cultivators have not the means of disposing of their superfluous produce in foreign markets, it follows, upon the principles now laid down, that prices must fall first, because they depend not upon the number who consume but upon the number who buy; and that number, in the case supposed, is not only limited, but is of a description of people who cannot afford to pay dear for what they purchase. By increasing the demand for the labour of the manufacturing class, their numbers will be multiplied, the rate of wages enhanced, and the price of agricultural produce will be augmented, in the same proportion with the produce of other kinds of industry.

83. We have only further to observe upon the settlement of Coimbatore, that the practice which has obtained in that and other instances, of making the rent progressively increase in each successive year of the lease, is at variance with the principle on which leases are generally granted, and by which the tenant is secured in the full enjoyment of the fruits of whatever improvement may be effected in the course of the term contracted for, by the application of industry, skill, and capital. We are aware that the reverse is the case in regard to land recovered by embankment or by enclosure from the waste.

84. In the paragraphs to which we are now replying, you have drawn our attention to the settlement of the district of Bellary for fusily 1219, as reported to you by the Board of Revenue on the 29th of October 1810, without noticing the settlement of the district of Cuddapah for the same fusily, as reported on the 22d of that month; but in the few observations we are now about to make we shall keep the reports of both settlements in view.

85. In the Bellary division of the Ceded Districts it appears that 2,551 villages have been rented for three years, viz. fusilies 1219, 1220, and 1221, twelve villages for one year only, and that twenty-six villages have been retained under Amany.* The total land revenue for fusily 1219 was fixed at Star Pagodas 7,68,547, omitting fractions, being Star Pagodas 82,953 less than the land revenue of the year immediately preceding. The revenue under the head of licence amounted in fusily 1219 to Star Pagodas 55,719, being less by Star Pagodas 2,653 than the revenue under the same head in fusily 1218. The customs, which in 1219 were estimated at Star Pagodas 56,147, are stated in the twenty-eighth paragraph of the report of the Board of Revenue to

to have yielded Star Pagodas 57,753, being Star Pagodas 16,704 more than they produced in fusily 1218. The gross revenue of the district of Bellary for fusily 1219 will therefore be as follows: Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 6 June 1814.

Land-rent	Star Pagodas	7,68,547
Kemoul Peshcush		22,916
Licences		35,719
Customs		57,753

which is about Star Pagodas 68,902 less than the gross revenue of the year immediately preceding.

86. In the Cuddapah division, where a lease for three years had been partially introduced in fusily 1218, it is stated that one thousand and ninety-nine villages were rented for three years, namely, fusilies 1218, 1219, 1220; that four villages were rented for fusily 1219 only; that four hundred and fifty-nine villages held on the ryotwar plan in fusily 1219 had been rented for fusily 1220; and that five villages more were held ryotwar in fusily 1219, without any arrangement being made for fusily 1220.

87. The result of these diversified settlements appears to have been, that the aggregate land revenue of the district, according to the jummabundy in 1219, fell short of the jummabundy in fusily 1218 in the sum of Star Pagodas 38,418; that in fusily 1219 there was a comparative decrease under the head of licences, to the amount of Star Pagodas 1,024, and a comparative increase under the head of customs, to the amount of Star Pagodas 11,525; leaving a total difference upon the gross revenue of fusily 1219 of 27,917 less than that of 1218. The amount of revenue for fusily 1219 is stated as follows:

Licences		16,774	31	32
Customs		26,966	41	59
	Total	8,00,816	6	30

If to the total revenue of Cuddapah be added the total revenue of Bellary, the joint revenue of the two divisions of the Ceded Districts in fusily 1219 will be Star Pagodas 17,05,751, which is less than what Colonel Munro estimated that they would yield one year with another, when he gave up the management of those territories, by nearly one lack of Pagodas.

88. Some proportion of the above deficiency may, no doubt, be accounted for from the adversity of the season and the mortality occasioned by a pestilential fever, but the reports of the Collectors furnish abundant evidence of its being greatly attributable to the introduction of the renting system. The diversity of settlement which obtained in these districts was in itself a serious inconvenience, and could hardly fail to be productive of confusion, embarrassment, and inequality, in the distribution of the assessment. In the sixth paragraph of the report of the Board of Revenue upon the settlement of Cuddapah, it is stated, "from the necessity of lowering the settlement of those villages "which it was impracticable to rent, we cannot but admit that the rented "villages under consideration are subject to peculiar hardship. They have "partaken of the disadvantages of season under which others have suffered, "but instead of having obtained indulgence, like the others, they have been "obliged, by the terms of the triennial lease, to pay nearly 13,000 pagodas "more than in the previous year."

89. The engagements entered into by the renters of Bellary, under the fear of losing their enams and hereditary management of their villages, are represented, both by the Collector and the Board of Revenue, to have been in many instances more favourable to the Sircar than they were able to fulfil, in reference to the state of cultivation and the means of the Ryots, whilst a latitude was left to the renters under the lease, of exacting the full survey-rent from their under-tenants. The consequences of such an arrangement were justly contemplated with serious apprehensions by the Board of Revenue, as appears from the following extracts from their report on the settlement of Bellary, dated 29th October 1810. "From the high state of the survey-rent "which has been made the limit of the demand upon the under-tenants, and "from the uncertainty of the condition provided the Ryots have the means of "paying, we apprehend that the exactions of the renters will be restrained by "nothing but their own interest. Where the renter looks to present profit "rather than to future success, emigration has occurred, and will again take "place; and although it is some consolation to think that the Ryot may find "an asylum from oppression in flight, it is yet but a melancholy consolation, "since it involves the banishment of Ryots from their villages, detrimental "to agriculture from this relapse into the habit of wandering, and insecurity "of revenue; which last must result from the almost certain failure of those "imprudent renters by whose exactions substantial Ryots are removed."

90. "The poverty of the renters will, we fear, be a perpetually exciting "cause of exaction; and when the Ryots have been forced by their exactions "to sell their cattle and quit their villages, the same general poverty will pre- "vent other renters, who may be willing, from renewing their stock, and re- "storing their spirit by an advance of tuccavy. These cases will, we fear, "frequently occur; and a failure of rent, if not an emigration to Mysore or the "Nizam's country may be the consequence."

91. That these apprehensions of the Board of Revenue were fully justified by what has actually happened, is but too apparent from the report of the Collector of Bellary. "I have already found," says Mr. Chaplin, "emigration "to take place in some villages since the establishment of the lease, but more "particularly amongst the most substantial Ryots, who have gone off to a "neighbouring village, where in a few instances terms have been held out to "them by substantial renters, more favourable than the limited means of the "renters of their own villages could possibly afford to grant them, &c."* In a subsequent paragraph† of the same letter the Collector states, "there is a "decrease of four thousand three hundred and thirteen inhabitants, arising "partly from deaths, but chiefly from emigration to the Mysore and other dis- "tricts. This head of decrease from year to year, ever since fusily 1216, from "the above cause, has been extremely heavy; and I am inclined to think the "full extent of it has hardly yet been ascertained. Among the number of "emigrants are many formerly substantial farmers, who paid very high rents "to Government, &c." Mr. Chaplin adverts, likewise, to the decrease in the number of pottahs, arising chiefly from the introduction of the lease pottahs being now issued only to renters, instead of to each individual Ryot; a circumstance which cannot fail to be highly prejudicial to the subordinate class of landholders, and to which we particularly called your attention in the thirty-third paragraph of our dispatch in this department, dated 16th December 1812. "There is also," says Mr. Chaplin, "a large decrease of two thousand four "hundred and sixty inhabitants paying the house or income tax."

92. In reference to the foregoing alarming sentiments, the Board of Revenue observe, in the twenty-third paragraph of their report dated 29th October 1810, "This general spirit of emigration we consider to be a demonstration of the "error which we have noticed in not reducing the rent in proportion to the "deficiency of produce, and will induce us to receive propositions in favour of "a moderate settlement, or even a remission of revenue, with more indul- "gence, from this than perhaps any other province." Without dissenting from this observation, we are not of opinion that it embraces the whole of the evil, which we believe has been very considerably aggravated by the renting system. We are certainly willing to admit that the sudden and injudicious increase of assessment in fusily 1218 may have impaired the future resources of these districts; a consequence which must always follow from over-assessment, under any plan of administration that may be resorted to. We know, however, from the experience of eight years, that it was practicable under a ryotwar settlement to effect a progressive augmentation of the revenues of those territories, to the extent of above three lacks of pagodas, without retarding their advance in in improvement, or repressing the industry of the population: and we know, also, from experience, that under the renting system, the revenue has been diminished in amount; its collection has been impeded, agriculture has declined, and numbers of the cultivators have been driven to seek refuge from oppression upon a foreign soil. Judging, therefore, from the contrary effects of these two modes of administration, there is, as we have expressed to you in preceding dispatches, very serious cause for regret that the former was abandoned and the latter adopted. It would be easy to show their respective tendencies to produce these opposite results; but as the comparative merits of the ryotwar and village settlements have been treated of at a considerable length in our dispatch of 16th December 1812, we shall rest satisfied at present with acquainting you, that a careful perusal of the documents connected with the triennial settlements of Coimbatore, and the two divisions of the Ceded Districts, has strengthened our conviction of the soundness of the opinions, and the policy of the instructions contained in that letter, of which we again enjoin a scrupulous observance in the future revenue administration of the territories subject to your Government. We deem it an act of justice to add, that however much we lament the abandonment of the ryotwar system, we are perfectly satisfied with the judgment and assiduity evinced by Mr. W. Garrow, Mr. Chaplin, and Mr. Ross, in their endeavours to carry into execution your orders for the introduction of village settlements on a triennial lease.

Letter from, dated 29th February 1812.

(Par. 267 to 269) Report of the settlement of Trichinopoly for fusily 1218 not yet submitted. A triennial lease for the three following years understood to be in progress. Report on the triennial settlement of Nellore for fusilies 1219, 1220, and 1221, just received. Precluded from entering into a particular consideration of it, but the result is favourable and creditable to the management of Mr. Collector Fraser. Reports upon the revenue of Canara, Malabar, and Seringapatam, and Palnaud, for fusilies 1219 and 1220 not received, but understood to be in progress of preparation.

93. In paragraphs 40 to 45 of our dispatch in this department, dated 16th December 1812, we have animadverted upon the extraordinary tardiness, either of the Board of Revenue or of the subordinate functionaries, in preparing and submitting the periodical revenue reports. We have further to remark, in paragraph 268, that no reference is made to the date at which the report on the settlement of Nellore was recorded on your Consultations, and that, in your subsequent letter of the 5th March 1813, no notice is taken of the reports stated in paragraphs 267 and 269 of the letter now under reply to have been in progress of preparation. Indeed, we have felt both surprise and dissatisfaction at the deficiency of information in both letters, respecting the general state of our revenues; and we direct that, in future, your communications in this department may be more regular and comprehensive, and at the same time more particular.

(Par. 283 and 284.) Measures adopted for the recovery of arrears due from the Zemindar of Vizianagrum and other estates in Vizagapatam.

109. We are decidedly of opinion, that if it had been found necessary to sell the lands of the zemindarry, it would have been extremely desirable, as the only means of reforming the abuses prevalent within it, and of introducing a just and efficient administration of its affairs, for the Government to have purchased it, and placed it under the immediate charge of the Collector. We earnestly hope that a necessity for selling the zemindarry will not arise; but if it should, we direct that you will pursue the course which we have just described, and that you will also adopt the same course in all other cases in which large zemindarries, or any considerable portions of land, are brought to public auction. In all such portions of territory which may come into the hands of Government, whatever may be the system of management which may be in the first instance resorted to, it is highly important that you should consider it preparatory only to the introduction and establishment of the ryotwar settlement, on the principles on which such settlements were carried into effect by our servants under your Government in the Deccan and in the Carnatic; and that the Collectors in the Northern Circars may the more rightly and more surely proceed in the execution of so beneficial a work, we desire that you will furnish them with the best practical hints and instructions from the official reports of Colonel Munro, Mr. Ravenshaw, and others, as to the measures progressively practised by them.

(328 to 332.) Deficiency of the harvest in fusily 1221 occasioned by the failure of the rains Repeal of the duties on the importation of grain. Epidemic distemper in the southern districts; a Committee of medical gentlemen appointed to investigate its causes. The batta of their ranks and palanqueen allowances granted to the members of the Committee for the time they were employed.

138. We have perused with the deepest concern the various documents referred to in the paragraphs noted in the margin.

139. It appears that, in the course of the year 1810 and the early part of 1811, an epidemic fever prevailed to a very fatal extent in the provinces of Madura, Dindigul, Coimbatore, and Tinnevelly, and that in the course of sixteen months 106,789 persons fell a sacrifice to the disease, being about five and three-sixteenths per cent. of the whole population.* The Committee of medical gentlemen, whom you very properly appointed to investigate the nature and causes of the malady, and to suggest the most effectual means of arresting its progress, seem to have been of opinion, that the primary cause of the disease was an unnatural state of the atmosphere, produced by the unusual humidity and sultriness of three successive seasons; and that in certain situations, particularly in the fort of Madura, its extraordinary fatality was to be ascribed to stagnant water, vegetable putrefaction, and the filth both of the streets and dwellings. The Committee likewise represented that its ravages had been most destructive among the lower orders of the people, who, from poverty of diet, deficiency of clothing, and want of cleanliness, were most liable to catch the infection and least able to resist its attacks; and this representation was strongly pressed upon your attention by the Medical Board, apparently for the purpose of inducing you to adopt some system for improving the general condition of the inhabitants.

140. Although it is the duty of every Government to consult the happiness and prosperity of its subjects, it is obviously beyond the competence of the ruling power, either to provide necessaries for a large population, or to effect any sudden change in their mode of living: you judged wisely, therefore, in confining your attention to such of the suggestions of the Medical Board as were practicable, and not inconsistent with the usages of the natives; and we were truly gratified to learn, that the disorder had abated upon the return of clear and dry weather. This gratification, however, has been considerably diminished by the accounts contained in a letter from the Collector of Madura, dated 17th February 1812, in which he states that the fever had again made its appearance in that district with all its former malignity.

141. We approve of your having granted the batta of their ranks and palanqueen allowances to the gentlemen composing the Medical Committee, for the time they were employed: and we have much pleasure in acknowledging the laudable zeal displayed by them for the attainment of the benevolent objects of their mission.

142. We are concerned to find that the calamitous visitation of an epidemic fever was succeeded, in fusily 1221, by a failure of the usual rains; and that the drought had been so severe in several of the provinces subject to your Government, as to occasion considerable alarm respecting a scarcity of grain, and some apprehensions of a loss of revenue, particularly in the Carnatic and southern districts. Considering the adversity of the season, we fully concur in the propriety of suspending the duties on the importation and transportation of grain, and of obtaining an exemption from duty in favor of all grain exported from the Mysore and Travancore countries to the territories under your Government. We also approve of the directions which were given to the Commissary-General, for the supply of the troops with grain at those stations where a scarcity was apprehended.

143. In reference to some of the measures which appear to have been recommended by individual officers in the Military, Judicial, and Revenue branches of the service, with a view to alleviate the effects of the scarcity, we cannot cannot help lamenting the prevalence of notions which, though not universally exploded, have long since been pronounced by the best authorities to be erroneous and mischievous.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 6 June 1814.

144. Adverting to the application made by the commanding officer at Pondicherry for a supply of rice at that station, noticed in paragraph 260 of your public letter of the 10th January 1812, we perfectly agree with you, that the most effectual means of supplying the market was to leave it entirely free to those whose business it was usually to supply it, and who were more interested in supplying it during a scarcity than at any other time. In such cases, the interposition of Government, besides being contrary to all sound principles, seldom fails to aggravate the evil which it is intended to mitigate. In the letter addressed to the Collector of Nellore by the Secretary to the Board of Revenue, under date the 30th December 1811, the pernicious consequences of any special interference on the part of Government or its officers, under apprehensions of a scarcity, farther than by a remission of duties, are exposed with no less justness than precision: we highly approve, therefore, of your having rejected the propositions which were submitted by Mr. Fraser, recommending the collection of the Government rents in kind in lieu of money, and the adoption of measures to compel the corn-dealers to bring their grain to market. We no less approve of your having ordered the injudicious proclamation, issued without authority by the acting Magistrate of Madura, prohibiting the exportation of grain from thence to other districts, to be annulled by a counter-proclamation, declaring that the merchants and grain-dealers were permitted to carry grain to whatever place they chose, and that the Magistrates were expressly forbidden to interfere in fixing the price, or forcing them to part with their grain, unless they wished to do so.

145. Without meaning to assert that circumstances may not occur of such extreme urgency, as both to justify and to require the interposition of Government, in order to relieve the wants of the people, it certainly never ought to be resorted to except in cases of the most obvious and imperative necessity.

146. We are sensible that, owing to the adversity of the season 1811, and the recent severe mortality in the provinces of Dindigul, Madura, and Tinnevelly, forbearance would be requisite in assessing and collecting the revenue in those districts. We trust, however, that every attention has been paid to the realization of the dues of Government, which was deemed compatible with a liberal consideration for the distresses of the population, and a prudent regard to the future prosperity of the country. Though the season was, upon the whole, unfavourable, it appears from the reports of the different Collectors not to have been universally so, and that in Canara and Tanjore, the provinces immediately adjacent to Tinnevelly and Madura, there was the prospect of an abundant harvest. The failure of the crop, therefore, having been only partial, and there having been a considerable portion of the produce of fusily 1220 still on hand, the Board of Revenue conclude, we hope not too hastily, that the deficiency of the harvest in 1811 would not occasion any serious distress to the inhabitants, whilst the enhanced price of grain would enable the cultivator to perform his engagements with more ease than in seasons of greater plenty and cheapness.

147. It is stated in Mr. Collector Hepburn's letter to the Board of Revenue, dated the 29th August 1811, that there was in Tinnevelly an outstanding balance of Star Pagodas 1,20,029, due on account of the revenue of fusily 1220, of which the Collector proposed that Star Pagodas 15,000 should be remitted, in consideration of the mortality which had taken place; and that the payment of Star Pagodas 63,949 should be suspended, with a view to its being recovered in one or two years, as the future means of the inhabitants might permit. You are directed to acquaint us of the progress that has been made towards the liquidation of the abovementioned balance.

148. You are also directed to report, for our information, the amount of the defalcation in the revenue of Dindigul and Madura in fusilies 1220 and 1221, which from the alarming mortality, adversity of season, and emigration in that quarter, we are afraid has been considerable.

149. Adverting to the distressing account of these districts, contained in the the Collector's letter of the 26th September 1812, we cannot help expressing our disapprobation of Mr. Peter's conduct, in not giving earlier intimation of the sufferings of the inhabitants, and we earnestly hope that the measure recommended by the Board of Revenue may have contributed to prevent the further extension of calamity, and to alleviate the dreadful effects of disease and scarcity.

The 24th March 1812.

READ the following letter from the Secretary to the Board of Revenue.

To the Chief Secretary to Government.

Sir:

Letter from the Secretary to the Board of Revenue, 3 March 1812.

I am directed to submit, for the consideration of the Honourable the Governor in Council, the accompanying extract from the proceedings of the Board of Revenue, under date the 2d instant, with reference to your letter of the 31st of December last, and to the proceedings of the Honourable the Governor in Council of the same date, regarding the proposed settlement of the land revenues on perpetual lease.

Fort St. George, 3d March 1812.

(Signed) W. OLIVER, Secretary.

Extract from the Proceedings of the Board of Revenue, under date 2nd March 1812.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 2 March 1812.

Read again letter from the Chief Secretary to Government, under date the 31st December last, together with extract from the proceedings of the Honourable the Governor in Council of the same date, regarding the proposed settlement of the land revenue on a perpetual lease.

As the above-mentioned papers contain a review of the minutes and correspondence which have been laid before Government, with the observations and orders of the Honourable the Governor in Council upon the chief points connected with the important subject to which they relate, the Board consider it to be advisable, that copies thereof, which have been prepared for the purpose, be circulated, as well to the Collectors who are at present engaged, as to those who will be hereafter engaged, in carrying the intended measure into effect.

The sentiments of the Honourable the Governor in Council, it appears, are decidedly in favour of an immediate settlement in perpetuity. It is the opinion of the Governor in Council, that more advantageous terms might, in general, be obtained under a permanent, than under a temporary settlement, and that the the conversion of a temporary into a permanent lease might expose the Government to a loss, which might be avoided by making a permanent settlement at once. Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 2 March 1812.

'Under this impression, the Governor in Council has directed, that in every village where satisfactory terms can be obtained, a decennial settlement shall be concluded, with a clause in the cowle, declaring it to be permanent, if it shall be approved by the Governor in Council, and ultimately by the Court of Directors. In other words, it is the intention of the Governor in Council that the decennial settlement shall be the permanent settlement, so far as depends on this Government; and that it shall at least be binding on the Government for the period of ten years, even in the event of its not receiving the sanction of the Honourable the Court of Directors as a perpetual settlement.

These orders accord entirely in principle with the course of proceeding intended by the Board, in their first minute of the 9th May. It was therein provided, that the settlement should be made permanent at once (subject always to the approbation of Government and of the Court of Directors), whenever satisfactory terms could be agreed upon. It was, however, subsequently deemed advisable to modify, in some respect, the original orders, by authorizing the commencement generally with a settlement for a term of years in the first instance, convertible into a perpetual lease by degrees; that is to say, as fast as the substitution could be effected upon satisfactory terms.

The considerations which led to the departure from the course of proceeding, originally intended by the Board, were explained in the report to Government under date the 1st August last, as also in the proceedings of the Board of the 12th August, which were submitted to Government under date the 31st August.

Though the objections which had been advanced by the Collectors in the Ceded Districts, against the plan of settlement proposed, produced no impression whatever upon the minds of the Board unfavourable to the measure; on the contrary, though it was expressly stated, that the Board could not think of relinquishing a system which they were satisfied was best calculated to promote the permanent improvement and prosperity of the country, yet the objections adverted to could not fail to have some influence, in so far as they tended to shew that the Collectors with whom they originated were not fully prepared to second the views of the Board. It became also doubtful, in the opinion of the Board, whether so comprehensive an arrangement could satisfactorily be carried into effect in the course of one season; and when its great importance was considered, the Board were desirous of guarding against a precipitate execution of it.

These were, in substance, the considerations which influenced the departure from the course of proceeding at first intended. The Board, however, did not consider this deviation as tending, in any material degree, to interrupt or interfere with the early and satisfactory accomplishment of the great object in view of a permanent settlement of the land revenue. They had no doubt that the transition would be very easy from the decennial to the perpetual lease; and while they authorized the commencement generally with a decennial settlement, under the considerations which have been adverted to, they nevertheless expressed their desire, that the amount of the shist, or ultimate fixed assessment, should be determined at once, whenever terms clearly unobjectionable could be agreed upon. The object, in short, was principally to allow sufficient time for the due examination and discussion of the accounts and resources of each village, which it was thought the Collectors might not perhaps be able wholly to accomplish, in a satisfactory manner, in the course of one season. If it could be accomplished, there was nothing in the modified orders of the Board against it, farther than an opinion that it would be best not to attempt it, unless it could be done in a manner entirely satisfactory to the judgment of the Collectors.

It appears that, under these instructions, the Collector in the northern division of Arcot has formed a decennial settlement for the whole of that district; but it is understood that the rent which has been agreed upon has in no case been declared to be the shist, or standard rent, in perpetuity, subject to the confirmation confirmation of Government, and ultimately of the Court of Directors; nor, indeed, that any mention has been made to the renters respecting permanency.

There is no question that the decennial settlement, thus formed by Mr. Grœme, might be made at once the conditional permanent settlement proposed, without any difficulty; in other words, that the renters would severally most willingly agree to consider the amount of the decennial rent as the amount of the shist, or standard rent, upon their respective villages. But whether such a general substitution at once, without revision, was intended by the Collector, or (what is of greater importance) whether it would be advisable to admit of it, are points which remain to be determined.

It may be, as remarked by Government, that more advantageous terms might have been obtained, if the settlement had been formed at once as a declared permanent settlement, subject only to the condition of its confirmation; but it is not so much to be considered whether more advantageous terms might have been obtained, as whether the amount of the settlement which has been formed be as much as ought to be assessed as the fixed standard rent of the district, consistently with due attention to moderation; or whether a greater amount would have been, or could reasonably have been assessed, had permanency been held forth at the time of forming the settlement. The question in short is, whether the settlement which has been formed, avowedly for ten years only, be as well in the aggregate as in the details, what the Collector would have made it, or what it ought to have been, had he formed it as a permanent settlement at once.

When the report of the Collector, and the statements and accounts connected with the settlement, shall have been submitted, the Board will be enabled to judge of this point: and if it shall be found that the rent undertaken avowedly for ten years be satisfactory in every respect, as the fixed standard rent of the district, it may be adopted as such, subject always to the confirmation already noticed; if otherwise, it must be revised and corrected, a work which, as the Board apprehend, may be effected without any difficulty in the course of the ensuing fusily, though they are not aware of any objection to a somewhat longer period being allowed for the purpose, if it should be necessary.

It has been laid down as one of the principles of the proposed settlement, that it shall be formed exclusively of all personal and professional taxes, licenses, house and shop taxes, and of every species of revenue, independent of the immediate produce of the soil, as well as exclusion of enams, &c.

The Board have reason to believe, that the Collector of the northern division of Arcot has not attended to this principle, or rather that he has attended to it only very partially; for from his pottahs (with a copy of one of which the Board has been furnished) it appears, that with the exception of enams and alienated lands, the only item of which the exclusion is specified is the revenue from arrack and toddy.

It was no more necessary to specify the exclusion of arrack and toddy, than to specify the exclusion of the revenue from salt, customs, or any other distinct branch of the revenue. Arrack and toddy is farmed separately, is classed in the revenue accounts under the general head of district taxes or licenses, is collected separately from, and has no connexion with the land revenue. What the Board chiefly referred to, as proper to be excluded from the permanent rent, were those items, or some at least of those items, usually classed in the revenue accounts under the head of "village taxes," and hitherto in general collected along with the land revenue.

Whether the taxes to which the Board particularly allude be called house-tax, house-rent, shop-tax, loom-tax, ready-money collections, or by other equivalent native terms, moturpha swarnadayum, or veesabuddy, they are evidently personal or professional, and appear in a great degree to partake of the nature of an income tax upon merchants, traders, manufacturers, craftsmen, and generally all (some privileged classes excepted) who do not, like cultivators of the soil, contribute in some other shape to the support of the state.

The

The Regulations and the sunnud-i-milkeut istemrar expressly declare, that the permanent settlement is exclusive of taxes personal and professional, as well as those from "markets, fairs, and bazars;" these are precisely the taxes of the description above referred to, and there can be no doubt of the propriety of excluding them from any permanent settlement of the land revenue. Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 2 March 1812.

The subjoined extract from a paper of remarks furnished by the Collector in the Ceded Districts, when in the year 1805 the subject of an eventual permanent settlement was in contemplation, contains observations in elucidation of the grounds of the expediency of excluding the taxes in question.

"The rent of houses and shops is usually so much higher than the "ground rent of those buildings, and it is so liable to suffer a considerable "increase or decrease from emigration, that it would perhaps be better for "the security of the revenue to keep the house apart from the land rent, like "the duties on commodities. In many estates of a thousand pagodas, the "house and shop tax would amount to from one to two hundred. If one-"third or one-fourth of the shopkeepers were to remove, as they often do, "to another village, the proprietor or landholder would be disabled from pay-"ing his rent. If the proprietor of a neighbouring estate, on which there was "no shopkeepers, were to promise to remit half their rent if they came and "settled on it, they would certainly accept his offer. Proprietors of estates, "on which there were shopkeepers, would be deterred from making such "offers by the fear of their own tenants being drawn away in the same man-"ner; but proprietors on whose estates there were none might with safety "hold out cheap terms, to all shopkeepers, because the rent, however low, "which they might draw from them would be clear gain. If the shop rent "were nothing more than the mere ground rent, no inconvenience would "arise from making it a part of the estate; but while it continues, as it now "is, a kind of tax on income, frequent removals from one estate to another "may be expected. They might be prevented, or at least checked, by de-"ducting the amount of the tax from the rent of the estate from which the "shopkeepers removed, and adding it to that part of the estate on which they "settled; but some difficulty would be found in carrying this measure into "effect. The most effectual remedy would be, to separate the house and shop "tax from the land rent, and settle it annually. An annual settlement would "only be required where some considerable change had happened: where no "fluctuation had occurred the same settlement might answer for several years. "The house-tax, though separated from the land rent, should* still be col-"lected by the owner of the estate."

Although the taxes classed in the revenue accounts under the general head of "village taxes," are the same in their nature in all the provinces, they have been regulated and extended, and placed on a better and more productive footing in the Ceded Districts than elsewhere. Subjoined is an extract from a report from Colonel Munro, dated the 15th August 1807, to which, under the proposed separation of the village taxes from the land rent, it may be useful to call the attention of the Collectors generally.

"The plan which I have proposed for forming a permanent ryotwarry set-"tlement is so plain, that it can require no farther elucidation; except with "regard to house rent, which undoubtedly ought to remain under the imme-"diate direction of the Collector, as a source of increasing revenue. The tax "which is generally denominated house-rent is more properly a tax upon in-"come. In the case of labourers and other poorer orders of the inhabitants, "where it does not exceed one or two rupees, it may be called house-rent: "but even here it is rather a tax upon income, equal to the produce of a certain "number of days labour; for the house or hut itself is probably not worth more "than five or ten rupees. In the case of weavers and other tradesmen, it is "usually termed a professional tax; but as the weaver is rated according to "the estimated produce of his loom, and the number that he employs, the "tax is evidently upon his income; and in the case of merchants, who often "pay a tax of fifty pagodas for a house which would not sell for so much, the "tax is clearly an income one, and is so considered by themselves. There is "no

* "Might" would have been a preferable term in the opinion of the Board.

" no difficulty in fixing the amount of the tax with regard to labourers and " tradesmen; but it is not so easy to ascertain it with respect to merchants, who, " though they are supposed to be assessed in some places at fifteen or twenty " per cent. of their income, in others pay little or nothing. Under the native " Governments there were many reasons for this indulgence. The merchants " usually supplied with payment the demands of the revenue servants for " clothes and other articles; they were also obliged to furnish at a low rate " whatever articles were required for the public service, and to take the Sircar " share of the crops, damaged stores, &c., at ten per cent. above the market " price, and also in times of exigency to pay occasional contributions. These " demands having ceased under the Company's Government, there can be no " reason for the merchants being more favoured in one place than another, or " for their not being every where assessed in the same proportion as the other " classes of the inhabitants. It would be vexatious to attempt to discover the " income of individuals, but a tolerable estimate of the aggregate income of " the merchants of a district may be made from accounts of the imports and " exports, the population, the produce and consumption, and the usual profits " of trades; and fifteen per cent. upon the sum resulting from these calcula- " tions might be imposed upon the merchants, leaving them to distribute it in " detail, according to the income of the several individuals. In the district of " Roydroog, where the house-tax is higher than in other parts of the Ceded " Provinces, and where it is supposed to be about fifteen per cent. upon income, " a new distribution was made last year by the merchants and shopkeepers " themselves. The total sum was not increased, because it was already suffi- " ciently high; but the shares of many individuals were reduced one-half, and " those of others doubled and quadrupled. A few of the principal merchants " from all the chief trading towns of the Ceded Provinces were at the same " time assembled; they were informed that the house or income tax would be " raised, and were directed to state, not what their income was, but what the " rate of the tax upon it was in their respective districts, compared to Roy- " droog. They debated among themselves for several weeks, and at last " produced a statement to which they all agreed, as containing the fair rates " of their districts. The Roydroog merchants, who were present, took care " to see that the neighbouring districts were rated as high as their own, in " order to prevent any additional assessment from falling upon themselves. " The tax might, by the same process, be extended to every place where it is " not yet established, and make a considerable addition to the public revenue. " An idea of this increase may be formed, from comparing the house-rent of " the Ceded Provinces with that of the richer provinces below the ghauts.

" House-rent of the lower classes of the people, trades- " men, &c. .... Star Pagodas	63,946
" Ditto of merchants and shopkeepers	33,124
" House-rent to be laid on in fusilies 1217 to 1220, to raise " the other districts to the level of Roydroog	21,000
Star Pagodas	1,18,070

" Where the merchants are exempted from this income-tax, they contribute " little more to revenue than common labourers; they pay no direct taxes, and " those which they pay indirectly on betel, tobacco, cloth, &c., are very tri- " fling. It is contrary to every just principle of taxation, that the richer " should be more lightly assessed than the poorer classes of the people; and " as no additional demand can be made upon them, if the house-tax is per- " manently included in the land-rent, it ought certainly to be kept separate, " in order that it may yield an increasing revenue as the circumstances of " the country improve."

It has been already remarked, that a tax of the description above stated is common to all the provinces, and that it has been usually blended and collected along with the land rent. Veesabuddy is the general term applied to it in the Ceded Districts, where, as before observed, greater attention appears to have been paid than elsewhere to its proper distribution.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 2 March 1812.

In the former proceedings of the Board, as well as in the minutes of the Honourable the Governor in Council thereon, reference is made to a proposed regulation for this branch of the revenue; not that a particular regulation is absolutely necessary to enable the collection of any customary tax, but because it is desirable that the tax in question should be regulated upon uniform principles, under its proposed separation from the land-rent with which it has been usually collected. The Board are therefore extremely desirous of receiving the draft of the Regulation which the Collectors in the Ceded Districts have been required to prepare, and which the Board expect will serve as the foundation of a general Regulation for all the provinces.

Until the Regulation adverted to shall have been passed, it may be advisable that the revenue derived from this source should continue to be collected, as heretofore, along with the land-rent; nay, it may perhaps be desirable that it should continue, hereafter, to be collected by the permanent leaseholders; but in forming the settlement, it is absolutely necessary that the amount of the land-rent proper should be distinguished from the amount of the tax in question, because the former only will belong to the leaseholder, while the latter, though it may be expedient that it should be collected by him, will not be collected for his own benefit, but entirely on account of Government, and will be liable to fluctuation.

It is expected that, in reporting on the settlement now in progress, the Collectors will furnish distinct accounts of the tax thus proposed to be separated from the land-rent, and that they will enter into such explanations, and offer such suggestions, as may be calculated to promote the object of the early adjustment of the tax, upon satisfactory and uniform principles.

The Board are here led to remark, that in the provinces which were formerly settled in perpetuity, moturpha, swarnadoyem, &c. were not in all cases excluded from the assets upon which the jumma was calculated. Where this is the case, the Zemindars and proprietors of estates have a plea, not only to collect, but also to regulate the tax, which must be liable to fluctuation, as the trade fluctuates, and as the individuals change by whom it is paid.

There can be no doubt that the exercise of this privilege by Zemindars must be detrimental to the country, and injurious to the revenue, in as much as it would enable them to extend the tax upon the profits of the industry of the towns and villages, and to draw a revenue which it was never meant that they should appropriate, and which ought to be reserved as a source of increasing revenue to the state, in proportion as the country advances in opulence.

While, however, the Regulations of Government and the sunnud-i-milkeut istemrar expressly prohibit Zemindars from collecting any personal or professional taxes, and confine them to the rent arising from the land, recourse has been had to asophistry in the cases where these items have not been excluded from the assets, and that has been collected in the name of quit-rent, which was not only in reality a professional tax, but commonly acknowledged to be such.

So soon as the general Regulation which the Board have in view shall have been enacted, the collections which may have been hitherto made by Zemindars, under this head, must be effectually prevented, and the error which has taken place must be rectified by a revision of the settlement, with a view to a due abatement of the jumma, wherever it is manifest that the taxes in question absolutely and directly formed part of the assets of the zemindarry or estate upon which the jumma was originally calculated.

Reverting to the subject of the settlement about to be effected, the Board concur entirely in the sentiments of the Honourable the Governor in Council, as to the expediency of framing, as soon as practicable, into a Regulation, the general rules relating to the settlement. This Regulation will be prepared by the Board: but it is expected from the Collectors, severally, that they will submit the draft of whatever provisions they may consider proper for insertion in the Regulation, in order that the Regulation may embrace every necessary point, and be rendered as complete as possible.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 2 March 1812.

The Board are therefore of opinion, that the cowle, or pottah, to be granted to the leaseholders of the several districts, should be of uniform tenour; such particular provisions excepted, where there may be any, as have only a local application. There are several provisions in the established form of the sun-nud-i-milkeut istemrar, which it appears to the Board may very properly constitute the basis of the intended general cowle; and the Board propose, therefore, to circulate a copy of that instrument to each Collector, with orders to submit the draft of a cowle founded thereupon.

Until the settlement formed by the Collectors shall have received the confirmation of the Honourable the Governor in Council, it will be sufficient for the Collectors to issue their now written pottahs or cowles to the leaseholders; but after the settlement shall have been confirmed by Government, it is desirable that cowles of uniform tenour should be substituted, containing a permanency of the settlement, in the event of its confirmation by the Honourable Court of Directors. On the delivery of these cowles, the leaseholders should be severally informed, that on receipt of the confirmation of the Honourable Court, another instrument will be issued to them, in which the article of conditional permanency will be omitted.

No further observations occur to the Board to be at present necessary on the subject of the intended settlement. With respect to the proposed measure of re-instituting licenses for the sale of betel and tobacco, to which the attention of the Board is recalled in the minutes of the Honourable the Governor in Council above noticed, the Board observe, that the sketch of a Regulation for this purpose has been prepared, but that previously to the completion of the draft, it is proposed to consult the sentiments of some few of the Collectors, with respect to any alterations or additions which may be thought necessary.

Resolved, That a copy of these proceedings be submitted for the information of the Honourable the Governor in Council.

Ordered also, That copies be prepared for transmission to the Collectors, along with the minutes of the Honourable the Governor in Council, above-mentioned.

The following draft of a reply is read and approved.

To the President and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

Letter to the Board of Revenue, 24 March 1812.

1. I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your Secretary's letter dated the 3d instant, with a copy of your further proceedings relative to the permanent settlement of the land revenue.

2. Under the explanations afforded in these proceedings, the Honourable the Governor in Council is of opinion, that in the cases which you have described, it was advisable to authorize, in the first instance, a lease for a definite period of years, to be reversed and converted into a permanent settlement, as soon as the substitution could be effected on satisfactory terms, it being understood that the revision is to be proceeded on as soon as may be practicable. The Governor in Council accordingly approves of copies of your proceedings of the 2d instant, and of the sunnud-i-milkeut istemrar being circulated for the information and guidance of the Collectors.

3. The Governor in Council thinks it necessary, that your attention should be particularly directed to the coin in which the settlement is concluded. However unavoidable it may hitherto have been to conclude temporary leases in the local coins of the different districts, it is manifest that a permanent settlement ought to be concluded in those coins only which are issued from the Government Mint. This inconvenience, which in particular districts might be experienced from the want of a sufficient supply of coins issued from the Government Mint, may be obviated by framing a table of rates of other coins according cording to their intrinsic values, as they are ascertained by assay, and allowing them for a time to be received at those rates in payment of the public revenue.

Letter to the Board of Revenue, 24 March 1812.

4. The Governor in Council is aware, that the necessity of farming the settlement in Arcot rupees or Star pagodas may add to the difficulty of the measure; but the public revenue would otherwise be exposed to continual uncertainty. On this point, however, the Governor in Council will expect you to furnish a full report.

I have, &c.

Par. 1. Our last General letter from this department was dated the 29th February 1812, since which period we have had the honour to receive a letter from your Honourable Court, dated the 18th of December last, to which we shall take an early opportunity of replying.

(Par 169 to 185.) Take a full view of the impolicy of the permanent settlement concluded in Dindigul. Are of opinion that the purchase-money paid by the Zemindars and Poligars for their estates should be restored to them. Consider a village settlement the best expedient which can be resorted to.

53. We entirely concur in the judicious and liberal observations contained in these paragraphs, with respect to the impolicy of the settlement in Dindigul, and the propriety of restoring to the former owners of the distrained estates the amount of the original purchase-money. We have directed, therefore, that copies of these paragraphs be transmitted to the Board of Revenue, for their opinion and report, as to the best mode of affording relief to those unfortunate persons, if there should exist any objection to the repayment of the whole of the purchase-money.

(Par 216 to 220) Respecting the best mode of settlement of the land. Deprecate the hasty introduction of a permanent settlement None to be concluded without their sanction.

60. We have directed, that copies of these paragraphs be transmitted to the Board of Revenue for their information and guidance. Your Honourable Court will have observed, that the settlement now in progress in those districts where the three years' lease has expired is made subject to your final confirmation, but that the experience of the ill-consequences of the short duration of the three years' lease, and the well-founded apprehensions of a serious injury to the resources of the country from a continuance of temporary arrangements, have induced us to give the settlement, now in progress, as great a degree of permanency as was consistent with the former orders of your Honourable Court.

123. The sentiments of this Government and of the Board of Revenue, with respect to the state of the land revenue under this Presidency, and the necessity of limiting the direct demand upon the land in the unsettled districts, have been frequently recorded, and particularly in those papers which relate to the measures now in progress for the settlement of the land revenue of those districts, on a decennial, and eventually a perpetual lease; but having received the extracts from the letters from your Honourable Court to the Governor-General in Council, dated the 1st February 1811, and the 15th January 1812, containing your observations on the permanent settlement of the land revenue, we directed the Board of Revenue to state their opinion respecting the condition of the landholders and cultivators of land in the territories under this Presidency, the state of the land revenue, and the probable effects of the plan of settlement brought forward for discussion in those extracts.

124. The Report of the Board of Revenue is recorded in our proceedings* noted in the margin; * and we beg leave to observe, that we entirely concur in the view which the Board of Revenue has taken of the state of the land revenue under this Presidency, and of the conclusion which they have drawn, as to the necessity of no longer deferring the permanent settlement of it.

125. The subject has been so fully discussed in the papers above referred to, and in our letter from this department dated the 29th February 1812,† that we shall only now submit to your Honourable Court a few observations on the leading points which it embraces.

126. There would be reason for postponing a permanent settlement of the land revenue of these territories, if more full information regarding their resources, than that which we now possess, could be obtained; but the length of time during which they have been managed by the Company's Government, and the nature of the revenue management under this Presidency, have already made us intimately acquainted with the extent of their resources. The ryotwarry system, according to which the public dues have for a course of years been collected from each individual Ryot or cultivator, by officers appointed by the Government, has put those officers in possession of information respecting the resources of every district, as complete, and in as much detail as that which a landlord possesses regarding the resources of his own estate. To wait for further information would appear to be altogether unnecessary.

127. There would also be reason for delay, if the country were in a course of improvement, and if, by fixing its demands upon landed property, the Government were to forego its participation in the additional value which that property might be expected to acquire. But the real case is directly the reverse of this supposition. Our late dispatches will have explained to your Honourable Court, that so far from improving, the agriculture of the unsettled districts is in a state of decline; that the land revenue in those districts has of late years been collected with great difficulty; that apprehensions are entertained, that it may prove impossible to keep up that revenue to its present amount; that in unfavourable seasons it is necessary to grant large remissions of land revenue; and that, from the want of rain in fusily 1221, the Government sustained a loss of land revenue, amounting to nearly six lacs of pagodas. The hope of participating in the increasing resources of the country presents, therefore, no inducement to delay resorting to that system, under which those resources may be most effectually preserved and improved.

128. On both the grounds above stated, we conceive it to be certain, that an early settlement of the land revenue in perpetuity is an object of urgent and essential importance to the prosperity of the country.

129. The revenue system which has hitherto prevailed in the greater part of these territories, is well calculated to ascertain the extent of the resources of the country, and to draw the whole of them into the public treasury; and, accordingly, the revenue information possessed by the officers of this Government is more minute, and more complete, than that which has been obtained in any other part of India, and the revenue is larger in proportion to the wealth of the country. But the system is unfavourable to the increase of that wealth, and should therefore, in our judgment, be discontinued, now that the object, for the attainment of which it was more immediately calculated, has been so fully accomplished.

130. Your Honourable Court have expressed a doubt, as to the policy of binding the Government, under no circumstances and at no period, to increase its demand upon landed property. The whole merits of this question have undergone ample discussion, and the opinions already on record regarding it, and the grounds on which they were entertained, will doubtless be referred to and allowed to have their due weight.

* Consultations, 23d February 1813. † Paragraphs 199 to 232.

131. It may, therefore, be sufficient for us to observe generally, that agriculture was regarded as the basis of national wealth and prosperity; that it was considered essential to the improvement and extension of agriculture, to restrict the demands of Government upon landed property; that it was not supposed that Government could lose by this restriction, since without it agriculture would never be improved and extended, nor the resources of the country increased; and finally, that it was expected that, if the resources of the country should be increased through the restriction of the demand of Government upon landed property, there could be but little difficulty in devising means whereby Government might participate in the increase.

132. This reasoning was founded upon general experience, and in every respect is confirmed by the experience since obtained in these territories. The permanent settlement of the land revenue, if it did no more, would do much, by rendering land, in process of time, a valuable property, and a security for the realization of the present revenue, since great difficulty has already been experienced in realizing that revenue, and no security for realizing it at present exists; and doubts are entertained whether, under the present system, it can long continue to be realized. Thus the Government has nothing to lose by limiting its demands upon landed property, but hazards a great deal by postponing that limitation. It has a great deal, too, to gain by adopting any measure, whereby the resources of the country may be increased. Already the revenue of this Government, derived from other sources than land, exceed twenty-five lacks of pagodas per annum; and these amount to about a fifth part of the whole revenues. That they would increase if the wealth of the country increased, cannot admit of a doubt. The object which is difficult of attainment, and which requires the first attention, is the augmentation of the general wealth of the country. It will always, we conceive, be easy to devise means of drawing a due proportion of that wealth, as it increases, into the public treasury.

133. The argument may be thus briefly stated. If we are in possession of full information respecting the resources of the unsettled districts; if the country cannot be improved, without allowing those who improve it to reap the benefit of the exertions made by them for that purpose; and if the Government will always have the means of participating in any increase of the resources of the country, by whatever mode it may have been effected (positions which it appears to us cannot be controverted), the Government risks nothing by binding itself never to increase its demands upon landed property; but by giving to that property a value in transfer, obtains security for the realization of its present demands, and may confidently expect that, when that period of improvement arrives to which only the present objection against a permanent settlement of the land revenue applies, it will be able to devise the means of increasing its resources, in proportion to the increased resources of the country.

134. The greater part of the foregoing reasoning will be found applicable to the objection against a permanent settlement, founded upon an apprehended depreciation of gold and silver. The revenue once realized by assessment on the lands would, after the depreciation, be easily realized by some other means. The resources of the country would not be impaired by the depreciation, and while these remain entire the public revenue is safe. It seems, therefore, to be expedient to guard against the effects of an uncertain, and perhaps unlikely event, such as the depreciation of gold and silver, by any measure which might shake the confidence of the people in the stability of that settlement of the public demands upon landed property, with which the improvement of the country, and the security and increase of the revenues of the state, are so essentially connected.

135. In offering the foregoing remarks, we have considered the permanent settlement strictly as a question of fiscal property. But it does not need to be shewn that it is of vital importance also, as being calculated to give to the mass of the people, who are engaged in agriculture, a deep and permanent interest in the stability of our Government. At present, any feeling of this nature which may exist among that class of our subjects can be but partial and imperfect; and if, according to the plan which has occurred to your Honourable Court, the Government were to frame a settlement, by which it reserved to itself itself the power of appropriating to the public use a proportion of the increased produce of the lands (should all improvement not be arrested by such a reservation), the landholders might, under certain circumstances, contemplate the overthrow of the Government with indifference, or even be led to entertain an expectation of deriving benefit from the change.

136. Regarding the gradual and cautious mode in which the decennial, and eventually perpetual settlement, now in progress, is to be framed, your Honourable Court are already possessed of full information. It is to be framed, as a temporary measure, upon the full knowledge of the resources of the country which has been acquired; is then to be carefully revised; and not till the local officers, the Board of Revenue, and the Government are satisfied with the terms of it, is it to be recommended to your Honourable Court for confirmation as a perpetual settlement. After such precautions have been duly taken, we confidently hope that this confirmation will not be withheld by your Honourable Court.

The 23d February 1813.

READ the following letter from the Board of Revenue.

To the Honourable Sir George H. Barlow, Bart. K. B. Governor in Council.

Report of Board of Revenue, 28 Jan. 1813.

Par. 1. We have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the Chief Secretary's letter under date the 11th September last, transmitting to us copy of a letter, dated the 1st August, from the Secretary to the Government at Fort William, with extracts from letters from the Honourable Court of Directors, containing the observations of the Honourable Court upon the permanent settlement of the land revenue, and desiring that we would state our opinion, with reference to the circumstances of the people and the state of the land revenue under the presidency, as to the probable effects of the plan for the settlement of the land revenue brought forward for discussion in those extracts, and particularly as to the expectation of any increase of the land revenue which might be entertained under a system upon the principles suggested by the Honourable Court.

2. We were further desired, generally, to state such other observations and information as might seem necessary, with reference to the remarks of the Honourable Court.

3. The papers referred to us, we observe, were transmitted by the Supreme Government to the subordinate presidencies, in compliance with orders to that effect from the Honourable Court,* who direct also that they may be accompanied with positive instructions not to proceed in farther extending the principles of the permanent settlement to the territories subject to those presidencies, without express orders from themselves for that purpose.

4. It does not appear, notwithstanding this inhibition, that the sentiments of the Honourable Court are adverse to the principle of a fixed assessment upon the lands. The Court seem to be aware of the expediency of ultimately resorting to some system of permanency; to some system which, by establishing a known limit to the public demands, shall be calculated to promote, instead of discouraging, improvement.

5. The Honourable Court have particularly remarked on the strong objections to the native system of revenue administration.† The evils, however, which they enumerate, belong not peculiarly to native administrations. Intricacy of accounts, expensive establishments, acts of fraudulent concealment, exactions and collusions, irksome and pernicious restraints on cultivation, are evils which must attach, in a greater or less degree, to any administration, where the system pursued has not some feature of stability or permanency, where where the public demand is liable to fluctuate with the produce of the land, or with the extent of land brought into occupation.

Report of Board of Revenue, 25 Jan. 1818.

6. The wisdom of the measure of the permanent settlement, under the circumstances of its establishment in the province of Bengal, is, however, acknowledged by the Honourable Court. The salutary objects which it had in view, and for the attainment of which it is admitted to have been calculated, are not overlooked, nor apparently undervalued; * and while the Court point at a particular inconvenience incident to the arrangement, and foreseen at the time it was framed, namely, the prospect, or rather the certainty, of the assessment becoming, in course of time, unequal, they scruple not to avow that it was wisely deemed "preferable to encounter the inconvenience of ultimate inequality, rather than, by arresting improvement, to keep the whole class of the landholders in a state of lasting poverty and depression."

7. But after having admitted thus much in favour of the permanent settlement as established in Bengal, the Honourable Court turn their view to the disadvantages which they consider to be connected with it. † They express a doubt whether the interests of Government were equally consulted in the measure with those of the subject: not (they explain) that these interests, when properly understood, can ever be at variance, "but the want of just perceptions upon their true nature and affinities, sometimes makes it necessary to treat them as if they were governed by separate and distinct rules. And in all circumstances (they remark), political institutions, it must be admitted, ought to have a reference to the peculiar habits and prejudices of the people for whom they are intended, as well as to the generally acknowledged laws of utility."

8. After cursorily alluding to the depreciation, which, it is assumed, has taken place in the value of money in the course of the last twenty-five years (an inconvenience which, they remark, is not peculiar to India), the Honourable Court proceed to that point to which, we apprehend, the tendency of the observation last quoted was principally directed: the circumstances in the state of India which tend to obstruct the improvement of the public revenue "by means of taxation on objects different from the land."

9. The Honourable Court remark, ‡ that at the period of the establishment of the permanent settlement in Bengal, it had been imagined that in proportion as the effects naturally to be expected from an enlarged and liberal policy were developed, in proportion as the land was improved, activity given to commerce, and as the people were enriched, our Government would be able, by means of taxation on the necessaries of life, not only to indemnify itself for the sacrifices it had made, and for any contingent loss which it might sustain from the depreciation of money, but that our revenues might be made to advance in equal proportions with the prosperity of the country, and that both would go on flourishing in rapid progression.

10. The Honourable Court proceed to observe, § that they are afraid this calculation was rather too sanguine; that it was formed without sufficient attention to those local peculiarities by which the hopes founded upon it might be disappointed. In England, they allow, such a system of taxation as that which has been described has been successfully adopted; but it does not therefore follow, they say, that its introduction in India will be attended with equal advantage. The experiment which has been made, they remark, is, as far as it has gone, opposed to such a conclusion; and for the reasons of it, they observe, it is only necessary to consider the difference in the state of the two countries, and the peculiar habits, customs, and prejudices of the natives of India, with reference to the established principles of political economy.

11. The Honourable Court profess not to disclaim or to renounce altogether the benefit of a system of taxation, which they admit, may, as regards India, be to a certain degree productive: but they lay it down as an undeniable position, that the territorial revenue constitutes the principal stay of their Government; that being the mode of contribution to which the natives have been most accustomed, it has fewer prejudices to encounter than any other which could could be resorted to; and that, in assessing its amount, the reflection ought always to be present, that we are imposing bounds to the demands of the state, ignorant of the extent of its future exigencies.

* Paragraphs 27, 28, and 29. † Paragraph 30. ‡ Paragraph 32. § Paragraph 35.

Report of Board of Revenue, 28 Jan. 1813.

12. This disquisition, in so far as it is comprehended in the first of the letters referred to us, closes in the following words.* "Whether the consideration "to which we have been adverting ought to have any other effect upon our "financial administration than merely to inculcate a prudent and cautious ap-"plication to our newly acquired territories of the principles of the permanent "settlement, as established in the Bengal provinces, is an important and dif-"ficult question, nor do we feel ourselves competent to offer any suggestions "on this subject which appear free from objection."

13. The extract with which we have been furnished from the subsequent dispatch of the Honourable Court commences with observations relative to the proposed permanent settlement of the district of Agra,† from which the Court, for reasons therein assigned, are pleased to withhold their acquiescence. Thence the Honourable Court proceed to enter again upon the subject treated in their former dispatch, and to propose for "discussion ‡" a measure which, it would appear, had intermediately suggested itself to them, as calculated to meet the inconveniences which are considered by the Court to be incidental to the principle of the permanent settlement heretofore established.

14. The substance, or more properly, the outline of the measure which they propose, is that in the future settlements of the land, instead of granting an irrevocable pledge that the public demand shall, under no circumstances, be increased upon this fund of revenue, provision be made not only against the loss which the Government may sustain from a depreciation of the medium in which the revenue is paid, but also for a moderate participation, at distant intervals, in the growing improvement of the country.

15. It is apparent, however, that the Honourable Court are not merely averse to the measure of an unalterable assessment upon the lands, from the general apprehension of fixing a bound to their resources, but that they also entertain a strong disinclination against proceeding immediately to the adoption of any permanent arrangement for the land revenue; a disinclination founded principally upon the supposition, that the resources of the more recently acquired districts have not yet been adequately developed, but in some degree also, it would appear, upon a desire to wait the progress of farther improvement.

16. Two propositions, therefore, are presented for consideration, in their nature separate and distinct: the first, whether any advantages would be gained by longer deferring the introduction of some permanent or fixed settlement of the land revenue; the second, whether (assuming the first proposition to be decided in favour of the early establishment of a permanent system) it would be expedient, or otherwise, that its permanency should be qualified with a provision, to the effect of that which has been prescribed for discussion by the Honourable Court.

17. The consideration of the first proposition may lead, perhaps, to a clearer view, and more satisfactory solution of the second.

18. Though a regard to financial advantage is doubtless the principal motive which influences the desire of the Honourable Court to postpone a final settlement of the lands, another consideration is incidentally advanced, to which (though meant not probably to be much insisted on) it seems proper we should advert, lest omission to notice the argument might be considered to imply acquiescence in its validity.

19. Referring to the objections to the native system of administration, and applying them to the temporary systems adopted under our own Government, "we would not," observe the Honourable Court,§ "embody the plan to "which they adhere into the permanent economy of our Government; but "we doubt not of your being fully sensible that, in India, sudden innovations "are to be avoided, and that all changes, however benignant they may be in "principle

* Paragraph 37. † Letter dated 15th January 1812, paragraph 59 to 70.

" principle or salutary in operation, must be cautiously and gradually insi- " nuated among a people, with whom established usage holds the place of al- " most every recommendation to respect."

Report of Board of Revenue, 25 Jan. 1818.

20. We might, perhaps, be permitted to doubt, whether a measure of an obviously beneficial tendency would, though it were in reality an innovation, be received with disgust, if proceeding from a Government in which the people to whom it was offered had been accustomed to place some degree of confidence; but independently of the circumstance of a considerable portion of the territory subject to the dominion of the Company having been already permanently assessed, the Honourable the Governor in Council is aware, that the nature of a fixed assessment upon land is sufficiently familiar to the inhabitants of this country. The measure of rating villages to a " shist," or fixed annual payment, was not unknown under the native Government. In every part of India there are lands held, to the present day, subject to a fixed payment, more or less favourable. Finally, it must be observed, that the measure of determining the amount of the public demand upon the lands involves no invasion of " individual rights," which, on the contrary, it is one of the radical principles of the settlement, at least of the constitution connected with it, effectually to guard. In whatever degree, therefore, the disinclination of the Honourable Court to proceed to a final settlement may rest upon the ground referred to in the passage above quoted, we think we may venture to assure them, to offer it, at least, respectfully, as our own decided opinion, that their apprehensions are without foundation.

21. But, as we have before remarked, a view to financial advantage, an expectation of our being enabled to form a more beneficial settlement at a future period, appears to be the leading motive of the Honourable Court in recommending, or rather should we say, prescribing farther delay. " It may so " happen," they observe,* that " a fiscal system, which it would be impolitic " permanently to adopt, will lend itself for a time, with advantage, both to our " present wants and future objects."

22. From this observation we infer, that the impression entertained by the Honourable Court is, that by now proceeding to a final settlement of the lands, we should forego a present positive advantage as well as a future contingent advantage; that we should relinquish, in part, what we already possess, as well as what there is a reasonable expectation we may hereafter acquire. If such be the impression of the Honourable Court, we are persuaded that it will be found to be, in each respect, erroneous.

23. We venture, with deference, to suggest that it may not have been present to the recollection of the Honourable Court, that the assessment under consideration is not, like the land-tax in England, an assessment " propor- " tioned to the rent,"† but an assessment proportioned to the produce of the land. The assessment which constitutes the land-tax in England was rated according to a valuation of the rents derivable by the landlords or owners of estates: the land-tax was a certain portion of the landlord's rent according to such valuation. The assessment which constitutes the proposed permanent settlement here is rated according to a valuation of the produce: instead of being a portion of the landlord's rent, it is a portion of the produce equivalent to the whole, or nearly the whole, of what might be deemed the landlord's rent.

24. The sovereign's share of the produce in India may, with great propriety, be regarded in the same light as the landlord's share of the produce in England and other European countries. There are, it is true, landholders in India possessing a right and property in the land, and a property which, in some cases and situations, leaves them a clear profit or surplus, after defraying expenses and discharging the sovereign's, or as we will here call it, the landlord's rent. In these cases, the property in question is of course saleable: it is worth something, more or less, in proportion to the amount of the surplus or clear profit derivable from it. What, however, we mean to observe is, that under under the rules and rates of assessment generally prevalent in India at the present day, the sovereign may be regarded as the general landlord; that the sovereign alone derives from the land that which can be compared to the landlord's rent in other countries. The lands which are held on free or favourable tenures, and those of which the rent is received by chieftains of whatever denomination, do not constitute exceptions to the principle above-stated. In the former case, the sovereign's share of the produce has been alienated, wholly or in part, in favour of particular persons or for particular purposes: in the latter case, the persons who receive the sovereign's rent or share of the produce, stand in that respect in the place of the sovereign.

* Paragraph 24.

† See Smith's Wealth of Nations, book v. chap. ii, where the distinction is thus expressed.

25. Under any system, the confirmation or resumption of alienated lands would be governed by such rules as might be deemed just and expedient to enact with respect to them.

26. Regarding those who, as well here as in Bengal, were found in possession of the privilege or the power of collecting the sovereign's (or Sirkar's) share of the produce, the permanent settlement which has been made with them has been made on terms which, in many cases, were governed by political considerations. In all cases, a certain portion of the sovereign's rent or share of the produce has been left to them; seldom less than one-third, frequently much more: and so far as the permanent settlement, both here and in Bengal, has been concluded with persons of this description, on the principle above stated, it may certainly be said to be an assessment proportioned to the rent of the land.

27. But where there are no persons claiming or exercising the privilege of collecting the sovereign's share of the produce, which happens to be the case in regard to the greater part of the territory to which a permanent settlement has not as yet been extended, the permanent settlement to be hereafter established will comprehend not a portion, but the whole of the sovereign's, or as we have before called it, the landlord's rent or share.

28. Now this rent or share is supposed to amount generally to the value of little less than one-half, and in some situations to even more than one-half of the gross produce.

29. If this be an accurate statement, it is scarcely necessary to remark that an assessment so burthensome must be inconsistent with the accumulation of agricultural stock, and consequently inconsistent with any reasonable expectation of improvement.

30. Upon this subject the sentiments of the Board of Revenue and of the Government have been frequently recorded;* more particularly in those papers which relate to a measure now in progress, the settlement of the land revenue on a decennial, and eventually perpetual lease.

31. It has been stated, that prior to the establishment of the courts of judicature, when the Collector was the local depositary of all civil authority, the revenue system was a system of restriction;† that his authority was exercised in inducing the Ryots to occupy and pay rent for more land than it was consistent with their interest or inclination to occupy; and that, under this system, the land revenue was not only upheld, but raised to an amount exceeding the just proportion which it ought to bear to the actual resources of the respective districts; that it was too high, in proportion to the population and stock whence it was derived.

32. It has been farther stated, that the revenue so raised has for some years pressed hard upon the country; that in few or none of the provinces is it in a state of progressive advancement, but that, from the restrictive system having been been necessarily abandoned, combined with other causes, a diminution of the revenue is rather to be apprehended.

33. It has been considered, that under these circumstances to conclude a permanent settlement (that is, to fix the ultimate demand of Government upon the lands) is the system most likely to be attended with the least loss; that by thus insuring to the landholders exemption from tax on improvement, their interest, and with it their industry, may be so excited, as to enable them, in progress of time, to pay with ease that which is now collected from them with considerable and increasing difficulty.

34. Whatever may, in former times, have been the condition of the landholders in India, whatever right in the soil they may have possessed or may be still considered to possess, it is evident that a tax so heavy as to absorb one-half of the gross produce must be incompatible with the existence of any valuable property in the land.* In fact, whatever may have been their former situation, the actual condition of the landholders generally is not that of landlords but of tenantry, deriving a subsistence from the occupation of agriculture: in favourable circumstances, perhaps something more than a subsistence; but divested, for the most part, of that interest, and of those motives to exertion, which the possession of a real property is alone calculated to bestow.

35. It is the desire of the Government, that the landholders should be possessed of a property of this nature. To effect this, it is supposed to be necessary that where the rent payable to the Government now amounts to one-half, it should amount to only one-third of the gross produce of the land. But the public exigencies will not admit of so large an immediate sacrifice, nor indeed of any sacrifice of considerable extent: it has been resolved, therefore, to commence with fixing the public demand at what may be considered, on a fair average, its present amount, leaving the landholders to acquire, in progress of time, by their industry, that which the Government does not find itself in a situation to confer as a boon.

36. Such is the principle of the permanent settlement which it had been determined to establish, and in which considerable progress has already been made; such also, as we have described it, is the existing state of the land revenue, which is to constitute the basis of that settlement. How far it is compatible with any reasonable view of advantage to result from longer deferring the introduction of a final settlement, is a point upon which we profess that we cannot see room for any difference of opinion.

37. We shall proceed, therefore, to the consideration of the second proposition, as to the expediency or otherwise, of adopting the provision suggested by the Honourable Court against the loss which the Government may sustain from a depreciation of the medium in which its revenues are paid, and for a moderate participation, at distant intervals, in the growing improvement of the country.

38. We have already suggested,† that this proposition (we alluded particularly to the second branch of it) might possibly have had its origin in a somewhat erroneous conception of the nature of the assessment which constitutes the permanent settlement in India, particularly where the settlement may have been, and may hereafter be, concluded with the actual landholders; that it appears to us to be a plan applicable rather to an assessment proportioned to the rent, than to an assessment proportioned to the produce of the land.

39. Certain it is, that Dr. Adam Smith, from whose Treatise on the Wealth of Nations the plan seems to have been taken, whose suffrage, at least, and opinions, are quoted in support of it, applies it exclusively to the tax of governments

* It has been stated above (paragraph 24), that a property of some value does still exist, with respect to lands in some situations, exclusive of the lands of Malabar and Canara, in which the landholders have a property generally. The nunjah, or wet lands, are in many of the provinces a saleable property, owing to the great fertility of these lands in particular situations, which renders the general rate of assessment less oppressive, if not comparatively light.

Report of Board of Revenue, 28 Jan. 1813.

ments upon the clear rent of landlords.* He seems to be of opinion, that this tax, instead of being assessed (like the land-tax of Great Britain) according to a certain invariable canon, might, under proper rules, some of which he suggests, be levied with advantage so as to vary with the variation of the rent. He suggests, amongst other rules, that the landlord and tenant might be obliged jointly to record their lease in a public register, under proper penalties against concealing or misrepresenting any of the conditions. This, he tells us, is the practice in the Venetian territory, where the government levy the land-tax at a tenth of the rent thus recorded.

40. We have before admitted, that where a permanent settlement is made, not with the actual landholders, but with Rajahs, Poligars, or Zemindars,† upon the principle of relinquishing to them a portion of the Government rent or Sirkar share, and taking only the remainder, the assessment may be considered something similar in its nature to that to which the plan of Dr. Smith refers, a tax proportioned to rent; but even in this case, the analogy is by no means complete, for instead of one-fifth of the landlord's rent, which is the nominal rate of the land-tax in Great Britain, or less than a tenth, which is supposed to be the actual rate, the settlement with persons of the description abovementioned has been usually concluded, as we have before explained, upon the principle of taking two-thirds of the rent, and leaving one-third to the Zemindar; with the exception of cases where the settlement may have been influenced, in a more than ordinary degree, by political considerations.

41. We mean not, however, to state, that a provision, to the effect of that which has been suggested by the Honourable Court, might not be introduced into the future permanent cowles, even where (as will generally be hereafter the case) the settlement may be concluded with the actual landholders. The plan is certainly not impracticable: that is to say, there exists not here any of those impediments which might oppose its establishment in other countries. It would not here, as in Great Britain, invade any of the existing laws of property: but as the settlement to be made will embrace the whole government rent, as this rent, as we have stated, absorbs in general one-half of the gross produce, and as the object is, by forbearing to tax improvement to enable the landholders to become landlords, in the full signification of the term, we cannot but consider the plan, under such circumstances, to be altogether inapplicable, inexpedient, and calculated to perpetuate the present poverty of the landholders.

42. It is certain that the improvement must be great, and it is probable that the lapse of years will be considerable, before the assessment, which now bears the proportion of one-half, shall bear the proportion of one-third only of the gross produce: and it is not until then, we apprehend, that it could be either desired or intended, that the provision which has been discussed should be brought into operation.

43. In the meantime, is it not probable, nay, is it not rather certain, that the knowledge of the assessment being liable to be raised, even at an interest so remote as thirty years, must influence, in some degree, the value of the property, and consequently the interest of the proprietor, in all the previous time, and more and more as the period of the term approaches?‡

44. Is it not also to be apprehended, that towards the close of the period, agriculture may be neglected, and every possible means used for eluding an increase of the rent?

45. It is consistent with our own experience, that it has not been an unfrequent policy with landholders to keep in check the improvement of their villages, with a view to ensure a more moderate settlement of them in perpetuity, considering

* He treats in a separate section of taxes proportioned to the produce of lands, and speaks of the system as one applied in different countries of Asia to the support of the state, but in Europe to the support of the church only.

† We use this term here in the sense in which it is frequently, though perhaps improperly, used; that of a dependent chieftain, paying a certain tribute to Government.

considering it to be for their interest to sacrifice some present advantage, rather than, by extending the cultivation and placing their villages in a flourishing condition, to entail upon themselves a proportionally high assessment in all time to come.

Report of Board of Revenue, 28 Jan. 1813.

46. With respect to that part of the proposition which relates to the proposed provision against the loss which may arise from a depreciation in the value of money, we shall beg leave to offer a few observations.

47. It is assumed by the Honourable Court,* that a great depreciation has taken place in the value of money in the course of the last twenty-five years, and they say that it is an inconvenience not peculiar to India; from which we infer, that they consider the fact as established, as well with regard to this country as to Europe.

48. That the same quantity of money will not now purchase, in many parts of Europe, particularly in Great Britain, the same quantity of other commodities which it would have purchased twenty-five years ago, is most certain: but we submit, that it does not thence follow that "a depreciation has taken "place in the value of money.† The change may be owing either to a rise in the value of other commodities, or to a fall in the value of money, or to both these causes united.

49. We submit that, as regards Great Britain, the change is owing, in a principal degree, to a rise in the value of other commodities; to the artificial rise occasioned by the heavy taxes which have been imposed. How far it may be owing, also, in part, to a fall in the real value of money, and how far this fall, supposing it to have taken place, may have been occasioned by the great increase of paper-money,‡ are points which, we apprehend, are much more questionable.

50. Within the period adverted to by the Honourable Court, taxation has been carried in Great Britain to a great height: but though the value of the articles of life has much increased, we are not aware that there exist any grounds for the belief that the value of money is depreciated. If this were in reality the case, it might be presumed that the effect would be felt in all parts of the world. It is unknown to us that such is the case; and so far as that portion of the globe is concerned with which we are immediately connected, we are rather of opinion that the reverse is the case, that money is rising instead of falling in value.

51. There are, no doubt, some commodities which have risen in price in India, from the same cause that almost every commodity has risen in price in Great Britain, namely, taxation. The price of tobacco, for example, is much higher in Malabar and Canara than in any other of our provinces, in consequence of the existence of a local monopoly: it is also, of course, much higher than it was there before the monopoly was established. The price of salt is likewise considerably higher than it was before it was generally taxed, as it now is, through the medium of a general monopoly.

52. But though a few, or more, or even all the commodities of life should have risen in value in any particular country, by the necessary consequence of taxation, it would be wrong, we apprehend, to infer, that the value of money is depreciated. Dr. Smith is of opinion,§ that "we can judge better of the "real value of silver by comparing it with corn, than by comparing it with any "other

* Letter dated 1st February 1811, paragraph 31.

‡ Dr. Smith pronounces that the value of money in general is not affected by the use of paper-money, and that if paper money be improperly used, the only effect will be, its own depreciation. See book II. chap. II, where the subject is treated at considerable length.

§ Wealth of Nations, book I, chap. XI., "In every state of society, in every stage of im-"provement, corn is the production of human industry. But the average produce of every sort "of industry is always suited, more or less, exactly to the average consumption, the average de-"mand. In every different stage of improvement, besides, the raising of equal quantities of corn, "in the same soil and climate will, at an average, require nearly equal quantities of labour, or, "what comes to the same thing, the price of nearly equal quantities, the continual increase in the "productive powers of labour, in an improved state of cultivation, being more or less counter-"balanced by the continual increasing price of cattle, the principal instruments of agriculture, "Upon all these accounts, therefore, we may rest assured, that equal quantities of corn will, "in "other commodity or set of commodities;" and so far as this criterion serves, we are justified in the conclusion, that the value of money has, of late years, been rising in this part of the world.

53. The price of grain is, perhaps, more liable to the influence of seasons in this country than in the countries of Europe; and in neither could any argument be founded on the price, in particular years of scarcity or abundance. Owing to a succession of two dry seasons, the price of grain is at present, and has been for some time past, higher than usual; but for several years before, with the exception of one intervening year of scarcity, the price of grain was below what might be considered, an average rate. In the three years immediately preceding the last, although the seasons were certainly not more than moderately good, the price of grain was low throughout the country: it was a subject of general complaint on the part of the landholders and renters. In many provinces, the price was still proportionally lower than in the Ceded Districts, where, though the season in two of the three years was unfavourable, the price of grain, on an average of the three years, was nearly fifty per cent. below the average price of the ten years preceding.*

54. It would be extremely difficult to account for this circumstance, without imputing it, in some degree, if not wholly, to a diminution of the quantity, and consequent rise in the value of money; a cause which derives the greater probability, from our knowledge of the large sums which have been of late withdrawn from the currency of the territories under this presidency, towards meeting public demands, as well in other parts of Asia as in Europe, while, on the other hand, the supplies of money, which had been customarily derived by means of importation, have not, we believe, been continued of late to any considerable extent.

55, Money, we believe, is regarded by political economists merely as a commodity, the value of which, like the value of other commodities, depends on its comparative scarcity or abundance. It is well known, that the discovery of the mines of America diminished the value of gold and silver universally, particularly in Europe. This diminution, Dr. Smith informs us, it was commonly supposed was still going on gradually, and was likely to do so for a long time. He alleges, however,† many facts and arguments which induced him to believe, at least to conjecture, that during the course of the century in which he wrote, the value of silver had begun to rise somewhat in the European market.

56. Whether the real value of money has since fallen or not, we presume not to determine. Upon so subtile and difficult a subject we are sensible of our inability to form even a satisfactory opinion, with the limited means and leisure which we possess. We have ventured merely to suggest, that if the fall has been so great within the last twenty-five years, as the Honourable Court appear to take for granted it has been, the effect, we should apprehend, would not be confined to Great Britain, or any other country in particular, but would extend to the world in general, which we have said we are not aware is the case.

57. But if, as must be, and has been admitted, the same quantity of money will not, in the present times, purchase the same quantity of other commodities which it would have purchased twenty-five years ago,‡ it might perhaps be said, that to ascertain whether the change be owing to a rise in the value of those commodities, or to a fall in the value of money, is only to establish a vain and useless distinction, which can be of no sort of service to the man who has only a certain quantity of money to go to market with, or to the state which has a certain fixed revenue.

58. That

" in every state of society, in every stage of improvement, more nearly represent, or be equiva" lent to equal quantities of labour, than equal quantities of any other part of the rude produce " of land. Corn accordingly, it has been observed, is in all the different stages of wealth and " improvement, a more accurate measure of value than any other commodity or set of commodi" ties. In all these different stages, therefore, we can judge better of the real value of silver by " comparing it with corn, than by comparing it with any other commodity or set of commodities."

* The price of labour, we believe, has not risen in this part of India during the last twenty-five years.

Report of Board of Revenue, 28 January 1813.

58. That the knowledge of this dictinction will not enable the parties to buy cheaper is clear; but it would not appear to be therefore useless. The question, whether what is called by the Honourable Court "a depreciation in the value of money," be not in fact a rise in the value of other commodities, occasioned principally, if not wholly, by taxation, is a question which seems to be of the most material importance to the forming of a just opinion upon the point under consideration. If it be the latter, as we suppose it, and not the former, it would seem to follow, that, whatever may happen in future ages, there exists not at present any ground for apprehending loss from depreciation in the value of money; and with respect to providing against the disadvantage of a rise in the price of provisions or other commodities, occasioned by taxation, we submit that, even if practicable, it would be unnecessary, since that which causes the disadvantage brings with it its own remedy.

59. It cannot be denied, however, that the real value or price of the precious metals is liable to experience a reduction from the same cause which produced that effect, between two and three centuries ago. To use the words of Dr. Smith: "The discovery of new mines, as the old was come to be gradually "exhausted, is a matter of the greatest uncertainty, and such as no human "skill or industry can insure. All indications, it is acknowledged, are doubt-"ful, and the actual discovery and successful working of a new mine can alone "ascertain the reality of its value, or even of its existence. In this search "there seems to be no certain limits, either to the possible success or to the "possible disappointment of human industry. In the course of a century or "two, it is possible that new mines may be discovered, more fertile than any "that have ever yet been known; and it is just equally possible, that the most "fertile mine then known may be more barren than any that was wrought be-"fore the discovery of the mines of America. Whether the one or the other "of these two events may happen to take place, is of very little importance to "the real wealth and prosperity of the world, to the real value of the annual "produce of the land and labour of mankind. Its nominal value, the quan-"tity of gold and silver by which this annual produce could be expressed or "represented, would, no doubt, be very different; but its real value, the real "quantity of labour which it could purchase or command, would be precisely "the same. A shilling might, in one case, represent no more labour than a "penny does at present, and a penny, in the other, might represent as much "as a shilling does now. But, in the one case, he who had a shilling in his "pocket would be no richer than he who has a penny at present; and, in the "other, he who had a penny would be just as rich as he who has a shilling "now."

60. But though the occurrence of either of the cases here supposed might not affect the real wealth and prosperity of the world, it is evident that it would most materially affect the value of a money rent fixed at the present time, even though it should be stipulated to be paid not in such a quantity of coined money of such a denomination, but in so many ounces, either of pure silver or of silver of a certain standard. We profess that we are not prepared to offer any practical proposition which might be calculated to meet the remote and uncertain (though possible) contingency above stated, which is, perhaps, as likely to operate in favour of, as against the Government. The reservation of the rents in corn would, indeed, be a remedy for the particular inconvenience resulting from the contingency adverted to, but it would be liable to many other inconveniences. The great annual variation to which a corn rent is liable, would, if there were no other, be a sufficient objection, we apprehend, to the adoption of such an arrangement.*

61. As the Honourable Court of Directors expressed a desire to receive "a "full and reasoned communication of the sentiments of their governments "upon the different questions involved in the discussion," † we have humbly endeavoured to assist the Honourable the Governor in Council in fulfilling that object. We know not in what degree we may be considered to have succeeded, nor how far our reasoning, with the conclusions founded upon it, may be acquiesced

* "Though the real value of a corn rent, it is to be observed, however, varies much less from "century to century than that of a money rent, it varies much more from year to year."

Report of Board of Revenue, 28 Jan. 1813.

acquiesced in by the Honourable Court; but whatever be the fate of our endeavours to satisfy the Honourable Court, we are not aware of its being necessary that the proceedings now in progress towards a final settlement of the land revenue should be obstructed. These proceedings have for their object the establishment, in the first instance, of a decennial lease, to be rendered perpetual, as far as depends on this Government, so soon as it shall have been examined, revised, and confirmed; but although, after it shall have been confirmed, this settlement will necessarily be binding on the Government, in any event, for a period of ten years, it will be in the power of the Honourable Court either to refuse their sanction to it altogether as a perpetual settlement, or to propose such other terms or stipulations as, on deliberate consideration, they may deem proper, it being of course understood that it must be optional with the leaseholders to accept or reject the new conditions, should any be proposed, without detriment to their tenure as Decennial Leaseholders.

62. The Honourable the Governor in Council is aware that the intervention of unfavourable seasons has tended, in some degree, to impede the execution of the settlement on the principles resolved upon; but we have the satisfaction to state, that considerable progress has been made. We have received reports on the subject from the Collectors in Coimbatore, the northern and southern divisions of Arcot, and the Cuddapah division of the Ceded Districts. These are now under our consideration, and we beg leave to assure the Honourable the Governor in Council that we shall regard it as the principal of our duties, and that it will be a constant object of our solicitude, to bring the arduous and important undertaking to a satisfactory termination.

63. Although we have now submitted our sentiments with regard to the specific propositions prescribed for discussion by the Honourable Court, we are desirous of offering a few supplementary remarks, with reference to some of the topics incidentally noticed in their letters.

64. Reverting, in their second dispatch, to the subject of the comparatively limited sources of revenue which India affords, the Honourable Court observe, " that the hopes which were entertained, at the period of the introduction of " the permanent settlement into Bengal, of Government being able to com- " pensate itself for the sacrifice which it made in fixing in perpetuity the maxi- " mum of its claims upon the land, by taxation on other objects, have not " been realized, will be manifest on comparing the amount of the public reve- " nue at that time and the present, together with the sources from which, at " the two epochs, that revenue was and is derived."

65. With the former state of the revenues of Bengal, as well as with their present state, we have only a general, and consequently an imperfect acquaintance. We believe, however, that during the period which preceded the establishment of the permanent settlement in Bengal, no considerable improvement of the land revenue had taken place under the administration of the officers of the Company. If we mistake not, a rather opposite effect was experienced. We believe, also, that during the period which has elapsed since the permanent settlement was established in Bengal, a greater net revenue has been derived from the land than was derived previously to its establishment.

66. If we are justified in the grounds of this belief, we submit that the measure of establishing the permanent settlement in Bengal cannot justly be said to have involved any "sacrifice;" unless, by this expression, it be meant to assume that an increase of revenue has been forgone, which might and would have been obtained, had the permanent settlement not been established.

67. The experience of the effect of temporary systems, both here and in Bengal, must, we think, be sufficient to refute any supposition of this kind, if such be entertained. It must, we think, sufficiently evince, that, admitting no decrease were to have been apprehended, at least no considerable increase of revenue could have been reasonably expected, from a perseverance in any system of temporary settlements. With respect to the improvement, whatever be its extent, which may have taken place in the agricultural resources of the country since the permanent settlement was established, we submit that any increase of revenue which such improvement might enable the country now to afford, cannot, on any ground, be considered as sacrificed. Certainly not sacrificed for the permanent settlement, since that cannot be said to be sacrificed to the establishment of a measure, which, without its establishment, would not have had existence. Report of Board of Revenue, 28 Jan. 1818.

68. But perhaps, by the sacrifice to which the Honourable Court advert, may be meant the relinquishment of that advantage from "growing improve-"ment" which they are of opinion might have been, and (so far as concerns the future) might still be secured, by a system different either from that which has been established, or from any of the temporary systems which preceded it: by some system, for instance, of qualified permanency, such as that which the Honourable Court have proposed for discussion.

69. That it could have been the intention of the Honourable Court to pronounce so decisively of the effect of a plan now for the first time presented for "discussion," it is difficult to suppose; yet we know not how otherwise to account for the observation respecting the sacrifice which has been made. Our own opinion of the plan, and its probable effects, has been already stated.

70. The Honourable Court acknowledge their conviction, that the establishment of the permanent settlement in Bengal was a measure favourable to the interests of the subject. We are disposed fully to concur in this opinion. We profess not, indeed, to be acquainted with the degree of improvement which may have actually taken place in Bengal since the settlement was established, but this information is not material to our argument. Either the improvement which has taken place is considerable, or it is not. If it be not, it is evident that the reservation of a power to raise the assessment would have been of no avail; if it be considerable, we hold not only that it is more so than it would have been if the settlement had been liable to augmentation, but also, that the means exist of enabling the Government to participate in the improvement, without having recourse to such a measure.

71. Limited as the objects of taxation are supposed to be, and really are, in this country, they are limited, we apprehend, from no other cause than the limited means of the people. If those means increased, if the wealth of the country advanced, we cannot doubt that the Government would be enabled to participate in the improvement, should their necessities require it; and if the wealth of the country did not advance, it would be of little moment whether the permanency of the settlement of the land revenue were qualified or not, since the country would not be in a condition to bear the imposition of any new burthens.

72. So far as our own experience extends, it is certainly favourable to the measure of a fixed assessment upon the lands. The mode of effecting it is, perhaps, of inferior consequence, provided the terms are moderate. We have found that where a permanent settlement has been established, a higher net revenue has, in general, been derived from the land than was derived on any given average of the same number of years before the settlement was established. We have found, also, that the revenue from other sources has increased in quicker progression. This latter effect may be, and no doubt is to be, ascribed in a great degree to the enactment of better rules for the management of those branches of revenue, to melioration, in short, of the general system of Government, and increase of knowledge and experience on the part of those who superintend the conduct of its details. Neither a permanent settlement, nor any other measure, however beneficial, can be expected to produce great immediate effects. Perhaps one of the principal disadvantages under which the measure of a permanent settlement labours is, that too much has been expected from it, without sufficiently considering that the progress of all improvement is gradual, and that its effects are developed by slow, and often scarcely perceptible degrees.

73. The substance of these observations may be thus more briefly expressed: that, in our opinion, the tendency of a fixed assessment upon the lands is beneficial, not only as it regards the people, but as it regards also the pecuniary interests of the Government; that it is not calculated to occasion the effect of which the Honourable Court appear to be chiefly apprehensive, the effect of fixing a limit to their resources, but that, on the contrary, the available resources of the state are likely to be, in reality, the more limited, so long as its its demand upon the land may continue nominally without limit; that so far as the means of the people at large may enable them to bear additional taxation, the power of imposing it will not be wanting; that these means may be more or less circumscribed, but that, whatever may be their extent, they are more likely to be improved to the advantage of the state where the assessment on the land is fixed, than where it is liable to be augmented.*

74. In illustration and support of this opinion we will adduce, as an example, the provinces of Malabar and Canara, where, though no "permanent settle-"ment" has been formally declared by the British Government, the "maxi-"mum of the claims" of the sovereign upon the lands has long been considered as established.

75. It is doubtless known to the Honourable the Governor in Council, that the insurrection in Malabar, in the year 1803, is supposed to have had its origin chiefly in the measures which were pursued by a new authority for advancing the direct assessment upon the lands. The advance took place to a considerable extent, but was afterwards, for the most part, relinquished; yet, since that period, a sum much exceeding in amount any increase which could have been made, or which there was any intention to make in the rents of the landholders, has been added to the annual resources of the province, through a more indirect medium of taxation. By similar means, correspondent effects have been produced in Canara; and in both provinces the revenue is realized as peaceably as in any other part of our territories, and certainly with greater regularity and ease.

76. While treating of the subject of the sources of revenue, or objects of taxation distinct from the land, we are led briefly to advert to certain taxes which, we believe, are common to most parts of India, and which, as formerly explained, partake in a great degree of the nature of an income tax upon the various tribes of merchants, manufacturers, and craftsmen.

77. These taxes, it has been explained, have been usually classed in the revenue accounts under the head of "village taxes," and collected along with the land revenue.† It is intended that they should be hereafter separated from the land rent, and reserved as a source of (it is hoped) increasing revenue.

78. For the further information of the Honourable Court upon this point, we would beg to refer to our Proceedings.‡ We shall only here observe, that we have very recently received the drafts of a Regulation which we had required to be submitted to us for the purpose above stated, and that it is our intention to take them into immediate consideration.

79. Amongst the several matters which, in the dispatches of the Honourable Court now before us, call for remark, are the observations contained in the ninety-seventh paragraph of the letter dated the 15th January. "Under the "permanent settlement," observe the Honourable Court, "we have fixed in "perpetuity our demand upon the land, without renouncing the obligation of "what, in Bengal, is called the poolbundy, and in the southern parts of India "the tanks and watercourses. The consequence of this arrangement is either "that the whole advantage of these mounds, reservoirs, and canals, is ceded "to the Zemindars, while all the trouble and expense of keeping them in repair "is defrayed by the Government, or that Government is exposed to the tempta-"tion of relaxing in its zeal, and moderating its disbursements on account of "works of great public utility, but in the preservation and extension of which "it has no direct nor immediate interest."

80. We know not whence the information contained in the passage here recited may have been derived; but it is not necessary to inform the Honourable

* Supposing it should ever happen that the lands should come to be very greatly underassessed, and that the landholders should be notoriously able to pay a much higher rent, what is there, we would ask (by way of example merely) that should hinder the Government, upon an emergency, from levying a duty of ten or twelve per cent. on the general produce?

† A tax upon the trade of towns, or upon the profit of revenue arising from stock, was imposed by the land-tax bill, and forms part of what is called the land-tax in Great Britain able the Governor in Council, that it is quite erroneous, in so far as it may have been intended to apply to the settlements in perpetuity which have been hitherto concluded within the territories subject to this Government. In no one instance, nor under any circumstances, is the Government liable for, or has it hitherto defrayed, the expense of upholding and keeping in repair "the "mounds, reservoirs, and canals," appertaining to lands held by Zemindars on permanent tenure. The care of some few particular tanks has, indeed, been specially reserved by the Government, for special reasons, such as their more than ordinary magnitude and importance, or their being the common source whence the lands of more than one Zemindarry derive their supply of water: but, in such cases, the marah, or portion of the gross produce assigned for the support of these tanks, has been reserved also. Instead of being collected by the Zemindar, and retained at his own disposal, as in other cases, it is collected and paid by him to the Government, along with his jummah, in which, in effect, it has been included.

81. It may be proper to observe, that under the settlement now in progress with the actual landholders, it is not contemplated that the aid of Government in the execution of repairs can be wholly withdrawn; but, on the other hand, whatever disbursements may be made, having for their object the extension of agriculture, will be made under engagements which shall secure to the Government either full re-imbursement of the expense or participation in the improvement, by a reasonable proportionate advance in the assessment. *

82. It will be one of the principal duties of the Collectors, after the settlement shall have been concluded, to make themselves acquainted with the state of the tanks, in order to prevent the deterioration of the revenue from a neglect of those necessary works, but more particularly with the occasions which may offer for the secure disbursement of money in useful undertakings, whereby a mutual advantage may result to the industrious deserving landholder and to the Government.

83. We might be led into unnecessary detail, if we were to notice every inconsiderable point susceptible of observation in the dispatches of the Honourable Court. We cannot, however, close this report without adverting to the sixty seventh paragraph of the letter dated the 15th January, wherein the Honourable Court, arguing against the supposed too early settlement of the district of Agra, observe: "Upon the coast, experience has already shown the "ill effects which, we apprehend, might result from precipitating such an ar- "rangement. The permanent settlement which was introduced into the pro- "vince of Dindigul totally failed, and after sustaining a considerable loss of re- "venue, the Madras Government has been obliged to resort to the establish- "ment of a system of village leases."

84. The failure of the settlement in Dindigul, we submit to the Honourable Court, was undeniably shown to have been attributable to the entire want of moderation in the principle on which the jumma had been calculated. The jumma was formed, not with reference to any average of actual collections, but with reference to the "ultimate survey rent:" a rent of a purely speculative nature, framed on a scale of progressive increase; a rent which had not, at the time of its commencement, nor subsequently, been realized; a rent, in short, fifty-two per cent. higher than the actual collections during the first five years of management under the Company's Government, † and thirty-eight per cent. higher than the average collections during the whole period of management preceding that at which the settlement was concluded.

85. It appears that the amount of the "permanent settlement" was determined at about seventeen per cent. below the amount of this survey valuation, which, in fact, was determining it at sixteen per cent. above the amount of the average collections of the several years preceding. We submit that, in this case,

* The terms of the settlement will not admit of the landholder undertaking the preservation and repair of the more considerable tanks and large water-channels. The care of these must still be left with the Collectors more particularly in Tanjore. The tank marah, or portion of the gross produce assigned for the repairs of tanks, will be added, where it exists, to the revenue, and be received by the Collectors and be disbursed by them.

case, the cause of failure was not precipitation, so much as it was a too minute and rigid scrutiny into the "productive powers" of the country, without duly considering the various circumstances which might exist, to prevent those powers from being called into action. We submit, also, that whatever inconvenience, or whatever individual distress to the purchasers of the estates, may have ensued, the defalcation which took place cannot with propriety be denominated a "loss of revenue."

86. It must be acknowledged, that the error which has been noticed ought not to have occurred; but if on this, or any other occasion, the public interests may have suffered, we conscientiously believe that they have suffered less in the aggregate from having been neglected, than from having been too zealously pursued; or perhaps it were more correct to say, less from any actual want of zeal and attention on the part of public men, than from an apprehension, on their part, of being thought to be deficient in those qualities, a feeling which the tenor and tone of some of the dispatches from the Honourable Court, we may be permitted (without disrespect) to observe, have not been calculated to allay.

87. We have not thought it requisite to advert particularly to the remarks contained in the last of the Honourable Court's letters,* respecting the expediency of some attempts being made to improve the Indian system of agriculture, because the consideration of this subject does not appear to us to be very materially connected with that of the principal points in discussion. Without intending, however, to call in question the proposition, that the rural economy of the Hindoo is susceptible of improvement, we venture to express a doubt whether any speculative attempts to improve it would be attended with much practical good effect. We are of opinion, that, apparently rude as may be the implements and the processes of the Indian peasant, they are not ill adapted to the soil and climate, while the former, it must be acknowledged, are better calculated than more expensive implements would be to the general state of his circumstances. We are convinced, at least, that the first, and most effectual step towards the improvement of agriculture, (whether considered generally or as a system,) is to improve the condition of those who pursue it.

We have the honour to be, &c.

REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE, Dated the 25th August 1813.

To the Honourable the Court of Directors for the Affairs of the Honourable the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies.

Honourable Sirs,

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 25 Aug. 1813.

Par. 1. On the 19th of May we had the honour of receiving the letter from your Honourable Court, dated the 16th of December, and it must be superfluous to express the deep concern which its contents have produced in our minds. That any part of the conduct of this Government should have been disapproved by your Honourable Court is sufficient matter of regret; but this painful feeling is aggravated by the importance of the measures to which your observations apply, (their importance as concerns equally the interests of the Company and the welfare of a large proportion of their subjects); by the difficulty which, notwithstanding much anxious deliberation, we experience in concurring in the whole of the sentiments communicated to us by your Honourable Court; and finally, by the embarrassing situation in which we

we are placed, with regard to the revenue arrangements to be immediately introduced into some of the districts under our authority. To offer an assurance of our earnest desire to adopt such measures as, when possessed of the information which we have already obtained, or may still find it necessary to require, your Honourable Court will be inclined to approve and confirm, is only to profess ourselves ready to be governed by that sense of our most manifest duty with which we are strongly impressed; but while we cannot, on this point, feel any hesitation, we must at the same time acknowledge, that serious difficulties appear to be opposed to every course of proceeding which it is open to us to pursue, and that up to the present moment we have not found ourselves prepared to adopt any complete and final determination on the subject. Neither are we yet prepared to enter into a full review of the measures of this Government, upon which your Honourable Court have been pleased to animadvert, or to submit to your Honourable Court a sufficiently deliberate and comprehensive judgment upon the several points, involving so many and such weighty considerations, which are discussed in your letter of the 16th of December. Our present purpose is to confine ourselves to an explanation of what has been done, in obedience to the instructions conveyed to us in that letter, and of the state in which the revenue arrangements affected by it at present stand. The general subject is constantly present to our minds, and no time shall be lost in preparing a full report upon it for your information.

2. Our first step, after the receipt of your Honourable Court's letter dated the 16th of December, was to desire the Board of Revenue immediately to report the progress which had been made in the several districts in forming the decennial village lease settlement, to enable us to give such directions for carrying into effect the orders of your Honourable Court as existing circumstances might require.

3. From the reply of the Revenue Board it appeared, that as the Collectors in Cuddapah, Bellary, and the northern and southern divisions of Arcot, had reported the completion of the decennial village lease settlement in their respective districts, the orders of your Honourable Court for recurring to the principles of the ryotwarry system could not be carried into immediate and full effect in those districts; but we desired the Revenue Board, without delay, to instruct the Collectors to declare the leases terminable at the expiration of ten years, or of any shorter period for which they might have been granted, and to insert in the cowles an express stipulation, requiring the renters to issue pottahs to the Ryots, on pain of forfeiting their leases, in conformity to the orders contained in the thirty-third paragraph of the letter from your Honourable Court.

4. As it did not appear, from the information furnished by the Revenue Board, how far the authority of the Government had been committed in Tanjore, with respect to the duration of the lease, we desired further information on that point; but at the same time observed, that as the principles of the settlement ordered by this Government to be formed in Tanjore, and the other provinces where the landed tenures are similar to those existing in Tanjore, appeared (as will be seen by a letter to the Revenue Board dated the 15th of May 1812) to be in conformity to the intentions of your Honourable Court, it would not be necessary to depart from those principles in forming the settlement.

5. We desired that the Revenue Board would immediately report the means by which it might be practicable, without incurring loss or producing other injurious consequences, immediately to form a ryotwarry settlement in those villages in Trichinopoly, Nellore, Palnaud, Coimbatore, Tinnevelly, Madura, and Dindigul, the villages of the Ceded Districts, and the northern and southern divisions of Arcot, in which the decennial village lease had not been concluded; the small talooks in Balaghaut, and the estates which had reverted to Government, where there were no Meerassadars with whom a settlement could be formed upon the principles prescribed in the letter to the Revenue Board dated the 15th May 1812, and where the authority of the Government might not be committed to conclude a decennial village lease settlement.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 25 Aug. 1813.

6. We also desired, that the Board of Revenue would state their opinion, as to the period for which it might be proper, with reference to the arrangements of the Collectors, the situation of the inhabitants, and the orders of your Honourable Court, to conclude the settlement with the Meerassadars of the villages in Tanjore and the other provinces where the tenures are similar, in cases where the Government might not be pledged to form a decennial settlement.

7. With reference to the orders of your Honourable Court regarding the waste lands, we directed that, in all cases where it might be practicable to do so without shaking the confidence of the people in the Government or producing injurious effects in other respects, the waste lands might be reserved, and that orders to this effect might be immediately transmitted to the Collectors.

8. We transmit, as numbers in the present packet, copies of our first letter to the Board of Revenue, of their reply, and of the instructions to them founded on that reply, together with a copy of the letter to the Revenue Board, dated the 15th of May 1812, to which we have referred.

9. We at the same time furnished the Sudder Adawlut with extracts of so much of your Honourable Court's letter as related to the Judicial system; and desired that, although the information contained in their proceedings, dated the 19th of February last, would no doubt satisfy your Honourable Court of the expedition with which civil suits are at present decided in the courts under this presidency, and of the beneficial effects of the Judicial system, the Sudder Court would nevertheless submit any further remarks or explanations, which the observations of your Honourable Court might render necessary, and would take into consideration, whether any further Regulations could at present be established to simplify and improve the judicial system.

10. We have also desired the Sudder Adawlut to state whether they have reason to believe that the inconveniences pointed out in the letter from Colonel Munro, dated the 15th of August 1807, as resulting from the Judicial system, continue to be felt in the Ceded Districts.

11. In no district has the decennial lease yet received our final confirmation; and wherever the authority of the Government has been so far committed, and the preparatory measures have so far advanced, as to render it inconsistent with good faith and good policy to depart from the intention of introducing that mode of settlement, we shall scrupulously adhere to the same principles, and adopt the same precautions which were kept in view, when it was hoped that the proceedings connected with it would have been approved by your Honourable Court, and have formed the ground-work of a settlement in perpetuity.

12. Our attention will accordingly be directed primarily to the persons with whom the settlement is concluded; and unless they are those who, by hereditary right or established usage, or upon some other just grounds, ought to be placed in the relation in which they will stand to the Government on one hand, and to the Ryots on the other, the settlement will not receive our confirmation. We shall, in this respect, act at once in conformity to the former intentions of this Government, and also in a great measure to the impressions by which the present orders of your Honourable Court have been dictated.

13. In the second place, we shall attend to the amount of the assessment, which must neither be so low as to prove inadequate to the necessities of the Government, nor so high as to interfere essentially with the prosperity of the country.

14. We shall next take care, that the rights of the under-tenants are left unimpaired. The renters will be authorized to exact from them no more than is warranted by the usage of the particular villages.

15. Lastly, the propriety of excluding from the leases any considerable portions of waste land, which may not be required for pasture, and may not add at present to the value of the adjacent land under cultivation, will be duly considered.

16. Your

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 26 Aug. 1813.

16. Your Honourable Court will find that the points above stated form the basis of the instructions already issued by this Government.

17. It has been thought advisable that none of the decennial settlements, even though they may not apparently be objectionable, should be confirmed by Government till the Collectors have had an opportunity of revising their work, and correcting such inaccuracies as may have crept into it; and we propose, accordingly, to express merely our general concurrence or dissent, with regard to the mode in which the settlement may appear to have been concluded.

18. Respecting the villages held by the tenures particularly adverted to in the letter to the Revenue Board dated the 15th May 1812, we trust that the instructions issued by this Government will be found to have anticipated the wishes of your Honourable Court.

19. The embarrassment which we feel, and have expressed in a preceding part of this letter, relates to those districts and villages into which the ryotwarry system prescribed by your Honourable Court may still be introduced. It is essential, not merely to the success but even to the practicability of that system, that proprietary right, either temporary or permanent, should (as is urged in your Honourable Court's dispatch to which we have now the honour of replying) be conferred upon the Ryot, and that the feeling of that right should be excited in his mind; and it is essential to the existence of that right and of that feeling, that a great reduction should be made in the assessment upon the lands, that assessment swallowing up, as it at present does, in all the districts except Malabar and Canara, the whole, or almost the whole of the landlord's rent, which alone constitutes the value, and in truth the essence, of proprietary right in the soil. The Ryots were formerly compelled to rent more land than they could cultivate, and by such means the revenues were kept up, although the country could not improve, but, on the contrary, was in a course of decline. The courts of justice have now relieved the Ryots from that grievous and unjustifiable oppression, and in that respect are, as they have been stated to your Honourable Court to be, unquestionably incompatible with a ryotwar system, on the only terms on which that system has ever hitherto been put in practice. The substitute for compulsion is inducement. By lowering the rate of assessment, the Ryots may be induced to cultivate the lands to the same extent to which they were formerly compelled to rent them. Whether the ryotwar system be or be not preferable to the other systems, on the grounds of justice and expediency, and whether, indeed, that system be or be not adopted, the measure of reducing the rate of assessment cannot fail to promote the happiness of the people, the prosperity of the country, and ultimately the interests of the Government. Other systems may be adopted without this measure, although every system must derive most material aid from it; but it is essential to the ryotwar system, which without it is absolutely impracticable. The measure is opposed only by a consideration of the loss of revenue with which it must, in the first instance, be attended. This consideration carries great weight with it, and combined with the positive instructions of your Honourable Court (framed, perhaps, without reference to such a consideration) to revert to the ryotwar system, wherever the authority of the Government may not be contrariwise committed, creates the embarrassment which we feel regarding the course of proceeding most proper to be pursued.

20. At present, we can only add, that our determination shall be formed in the spirit of your instructions, and with a view both to the immediate interests of the Company and to the object pointed out by your Honourable Court, of leaving matters as much as possible open to such a final decision regarding them, as your Honourable Court may see fit to adopt. We should not, in the mean time, have deemed it proper to withhold the hasty explanation which we have now afforded; but we shall be anxious to transmit to your Honourable Court, at an early period, the report which we are in expectation of receiving from the Board of Revenue upon the whole merits of the case, together with the further remarks with which we shall feel it our duty to accompany it.

21. It is with much satisfaction that we state to your Honourable Court, that in all the districts except three (Tinnevelly, Canara, and Ganjam), the season has this year opened most favourably, and, as far as it has yet advanced, affords grounds for expecting an abundant harvest.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 25 Aug. 1813.

22. It appears, from the comparative statement of the collections up to the 30th of June, in the fusily which expired last month, and that which preceded it, that there has been an increase of collections in the last fusily to the amount of Pagodas 5,60,094 1 34.

We have the honour to be, with great respect, Honourable Sirs,
Your faithful humble servants,

Postcript. Since this letter was written, we have received from the Board of Revenue a letter enclosing a Minute with regard to your Honourable Court's letter of the 16th of December last, and an Appendix to which the Minute refers. It is impossible for us, at present, to enter into a consideration of the contents of those papers, the dispatch of the Rose being so close at hand; but, in the belief that it would not be satisfactory to your Honourable Court, if any information of which we are possessed on the important subject to which they relate were withheld, we transmit copies of them as a number in the packet. Their contents will, of course, engage our immediate attention.

We also transmit a copy of the proceedings of the Sudder Adawlut, founded on the instructions referred to in the foregoing letter, which that court have just communicated to us, and which we shall proceed to take into consideration without delay.

LETTER from the BOARD of REVENUE,
Dated the 16*th of August* 1813.

To his Excellency Lieutenant-General the Honourable John Abercromby, Governor in Council.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 16 Aug. 1813.

1. We have the honour to submit, for your Excellency's consideration, a minute which we have thought it necessary to record, with reference to the letter from the Honourable Court of Directors, dated the 16th December 1812, and of which a copy was transmitted to us in a letter from the Chief Secretary to Government, under date the 8th June last.

2. We have attempted, in this paper, to explain and justify the former conduct of the Board of Revenue on the various points which have drawn forth the expression of the Honourable Court's disapprobation; and we should be much gratified, if the explanations which we have afforded should appear to your Excellency in Council to be satisfactory.

3. In regard to the measure of reverting to the ryotwarry system, to which we have had occasion to allude, we propose to wait the final orders of your Excellency in Council; in the mean time we have issued instructions to the Collectors concerned, to suspend the conclusion of any engagements for the rent of the villages on lease.

We have the honour to be, Honourable Sir,
Your most obedient humble servants,

MINUTE of the BOARD OF REVENUE,
Dated the 5th August 1813.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 August 1813.

THE letter from the Honourable Court of Directors, dated the 16th December 1812, having been referred by Government generally for the consideration of the Board of Revenue, and as many of the points which are noticed in that letter demand explanation, the Board have agreed to record, in the form of a Minute, the observations which have appeared to them to be necessary.

The subjects of the Honourable Court's letter may be reduced to the following heads.

1st. The conduct of the Board of Revenue in the preliminary steps which they took for the establishment of the decennial, and eventually perpetual lease.

2dly. The conduct of the Board in having proposed, and of Government in having acceded to such a settlement, in opposition to express orders from the Honourable Court.

3dly. The merits of the system, or plan of settlement proposed.

4thly. The question of the incompatibility of the Judicial system with the ryotwar mode of collection, and general remarks respecting the judicial establishment.

5thly. Official omissions.

The Conduct of the Board of Revenue in the preliminary Steps which they took for the Establishment of the Decennial and eventually Perpetual Lease.

The Honourable Court, after expressing their surprise that the Government should have determined to adopt an arrangement of this kind (the settlement by village leases for ten years and eventually in perpetuity), without having first informed them of the success which had attended the experiment already made of leases upon this principle for three years, proceed to observe,* that if any thing could add to their surprise, it would be the very extraordinary and unwarrantable discretion assumed by the Board of Revenue, in having of their own accord issued instructions to the Collectors of several districts to form village leases for the term prescribed, to become, at the expiration of such term, perpetual; and this, subject to no reservation whatever, rendering the permanency of such leases conditional, with reference to the eventual approbation of the Government at home.

The Honourable Court observe, that two reasons are assigned by the Board, in their general report of the 30th January 1812, for having acted in the manner they did. The first of these reasons is professedly given in the Board's own words, as follows: " It might possibly be considered, that discussions in" volving so important a measure as that which was in contemplation, should " have been laid officially before the Honourable the Governor in Council, and " his orders obtained previously to our issuing any instructions upon the subject " to the Collectors. We remarked, if the early establishment of a system of " permanency, upon the principles recommended, should receive the approba" tion of the Honourable the Governor in Council, of which, possessed as we " were of his sentiments in favour of the measure, we entertained little doubt,
" it was obviously of importance that the Collectors should be in possession of " instructions as soon as possible."

" We consider this statement," observe the Honourable Court, " to be most " unsatisfactory;" but it is submitted to the Honourable Court, that this statement does not contain the substance of the explanation which was given by the Board in their report to Government, under date the 1st August 1811, and again recited in their general report of the 30th January 1812, in the words hereunder-stated.

" Par. 944. We remarked, that it might possibly be considered that discus" sions, involving so important a measure as that which was in contemplation,
" should have been laid officially before the Honourable the Governor in " Council

* Paragraph 4.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 August 1813.

" Council, and his orders obtained previously to our issuing any instructions " on the subject to the Collectors."

" 945. We begged leave, in explanation, to state, that much advantage " might, and no possible disadvantage could result from the course which we " had adopted. We observed, that the same preparatory steps must be taken " by the Collectors, whatever might be the term of the renewed lease, whether " temporary or perpetual; and that, if it should so happen that the reasons " which had been advanced in support of the latter should fail to meet with " concurrence, there was yet time to make known the same to the Collectors, " before any final engagements should have taken place.

" 946. On the other hand, we remarked, if the early establishment of a sys- " tem of permanency should receive the approbation of the Honourable the " Governor in Council, of which, possessed as we were of his sentiments in fa- " vour of the measure, we entertained little doubt, it was obviously of impor- " tance that the Collectors should be in possession of instructions as soon as " possible."

It will be seen, that the substance of the explanation which was furnished by the Board has been omitted in the extract inserted in the Honourable Court's letter. The explanation of the Board, as it was given by themselves, might have appeared, and may still, perhaps, appear to be unsatisfactory, but its force is evidently weakened by the omission.

" We consider this statement," observe the Honourable Court, " to be most " unsatisfactory; for, in the first place, we cannot conceive any good reason " why an earlier communication could not have been made to you by the Board, " so as to have received an answer in due time from you on the subject of the " arrangements to be made on the conclusion of the triennial leases; and, in " the next place, it is highly objectionable for the Board of Revenue, a subor- " dinate authority, to have proceeded to the adoption of decisive measures, in " a matter of so grave and serious a nature, on unofficial intimations made by " the members of Government. Such a line of proceeding is necessarily de- " structive of all responsibility, and cannot be too strongly disapproved and dis- " countenanced."

In regard to the first of the observations, which implies an improper delay in communicating with the Government, it is submitted, that the discussions respecting the renewal of the lease were commenced some months before its expiration in any of the districts. In some of the districts, the lease having commenced in fusily 1219 did not expire till the end of fusily 1221; but in others, where it commenced with fusily 1218, it expired at the end of fusily 1220, or July 1811. The first minute of the Board is recorded under date the 9th May 1811.

This minute did not, however, go to the length of conveying orders for carrying the proposed measure into effect: it was the commencement of the discussion of the subject. A copy of this minute was transmitted to different Collectors,* for the purpose of receiving the benefit of their judgment and experience, and of their sentiments, generally, on the plan of settlement proposed. The sentiments delivered by the Collector of Bellary † gave rise to the second minute of the Board, dated the 1st July 1811; and soon after replies were received from the Collectors of Cuddapah and the southern division of Arcot.‡ These minutes, with the whole of the correspondence, so far as it had then reached, were laid before Government, with a report under date the 1st August 1811.

It did not appear to the Board to be necessary to address Government in the first instance, or until the discussion had reached a certain point; but if, in the mean time, the matter of the pending discussion became the subject of unofficial communications with the members of the Government, the Board were not aware aware that they were deviating, in any material degree, from the usual mode of conducting public business. It was natural to converse upon so important an arrangement, and to become acquainted with opinions regarding it;* and, in so doing, the Board were certainly far from wishing to avoid responsibility. Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 August 1813.

It is admitted, that a few days prior to the dispatch of the report to Government of the 1st August, the last minute and correspondence were transmitted to certain of the Collectors,† with instructions to proceed to carry the proposed measure into execution. But in that part of the explanation of the Board which has been omitted, it is shewn that this was done to save time, and in the belief that some advantage might, while no possible disadvantage could result from it; for that whatever might be the term of the renewed lease, the same preparatory measures must be taken, and that if the sentiments of Government should not coincide with those of the Board on every point, it was of no consequence, as there was ample time to make known any orders, in disapproval or qualification of those instructions, before any final engagements should have taken place.

It is moreover to be observed, that this anticipation of authority applies to those districts only where the triennial lease had then recently expired. In the majority of the districts the lease had not expired; nor were any orders issued until after the discussions had terminated, and the resolutions of Government had been passed: and where orders were issued for the purpose of saving time, it has been shewn that they were issued only a few days before the discussions were laid before Government.

The Board trust, that the explanation thus afforded will exonerate them from the blame which has been imputed to them for having taken too much on themselves, or for having improperly delayed to report to Government the measures pursued.

The Honourable Court proceed to observe,‡ that "the other reason adduced by the Board for having taken upon themselves to authorize the decennial leases to be considered as permanent on the expiration of them, without any reference to the final approbation of the Government at home," is that the orders from us "tending," as they express it, "to prohibit the further extension of a permanent settlement without their authority, related to the zemindarry settlement, the extension of which was not contemplated."

The Board remarked, in their report to Government of the 1st August 1811, as recited in their subsequent general report of the 30th January 1812, § that the permanent settlement, to which the prohibitory orders of the Honourable Court referred, was the zemindarry settlement, the extension of which was not contemplated; but this remark was merely a prelude to other observations, explanatory of the preference of the plan of settlement proposed over a zemindarry settlement. It was not intended to adduce this incidental observation as a reason for having taken upon themselves to authorize the decennial lease. The extent to which the Board did actually take upon themselves to issue orders has been stated, and their reasons have been detailed, as originally given by themselves.||

* The Chief Secretary, it should be observed, was at this time officiating as a member of the Board of Revenue.

† The orders to Mr. Ross were dispatched under date the 18th July; to Mr Grœme and Mr. Ravenshaw, under date the 25th July; and to Mr Garrow, under date the 29th July.

‡ Paragraph 5.

§ General Report, 30th January 1812, paragraph 947. "We observe that it was not unknown "to us, that orders existed from the Honourable Court of Directors, tending to prohibit the further "extension of a permanent settlement without authority. The permanent settlement, however, to "which these orders had reference, we remarked, was the zemindarry settlement, the extension "of which was not contemplated."

|| General Report, 30th January, paragraph 948. "The settlement which we proposed did not, "we explained, like the zemindarry settlement, involve a large remission or abatement of revenue, "for the purpose of giving a value or property to the tenure. We proposed merely to fix the "public demand, in the confident hope of thereby giving such an impulse to industry, as should "enable them, with whom the settlement was concluded, to acquire a property in the soil."——

The remark, that the permanent settlement to which the Honourable Court's orders had reference was the zemindarry settlement, is so far borne out, as that no other kind of permanent settlement had ever been in agitation up to the time at which those orders were written; and as the mode of settlement proposed did not, like the zemindarry settlement, involve any direct remission or abatement, and was moreover supposed to be free from many of the objections to which that kind of settlement had been held to be liable, it was thought that the orders of the Honourable Court could not be applicable, in the same degree, to the one as to the other; and this was all that the Board meant to convey in the remark alluded to by the Honourable Court.

Before entering upon a reply to the strictures of the Honourable Court upon the second head, viz. " the conduct of the Board in having proposed, and of " Government in having acceded to such a settlement, in opposition to express " orders from the Honourable Court," a few words are necessary, with reference to the preliminary observation of the Court already quoted,* expressive of their surprise that the Government should have determined to adopt an arrangement of this kind, without having first informed them of the success that had attended the experiment already made of leases upon this principle for three years, and thereby have enabled the Court to have conveyed to the Government their final orders.

The Board beg leave to submit, that as the lease was for three years only, its success could not be known till the third, or at least till the second year of the lease. The reports from many districts were not received till after the commencement of the second year. As their reports were received they were discussed and reported on. Under the most favourable combination of circumstances, it would appear nearly impossible to receive the instructions of the Honourable Court before the expiration of the lease: on the expiration of the lease, it became necessary, therefore, to provide for the security of the revenue on some plan or other. The plan adopted may be liable to objection; but the Board trust they have shewn that it was necessary to adopt some plan, without waiting for the orders of the Honourable Court, because it has been deemed inexpedient to revert to the ryotwar system, and because the evils of a short lease had been recently experienced.

The Conduct of the Board of Revenue in having proposed, and of Government in having acceded to such a Settlement, in opposition to express Orders from the Honourable Court.

The reasons and motives that influenced the conduct of the Board of Revenue in regard to the preliminary steps which were taken for the establishment of the decennial, and eventually perpetual lease, have been already explained; and it has been shewn, that it was not practicable to wait for the receipt of the Honourable Court's instructions previously to the having recourse to some new measure for the security of the revenue. What that measure ought to have been, is a question which admits of considerable latitude of opinion; but if it can be shewn, that the proceedings which have taken place were such as preceding measures and actual circumstances naturally dictated, that they are to be justified on grounds of expediency, and that in the manner of their execution the spirit of former orders from the Honourable Court was neither openly violated nor improperly neglected, the Board trust that their conduct will appear to the Honourable Court to be less reprehensible, if not altogether free from blame.

In the consideration of these points it is necessary to remark, that seven years have now elapsed since the system denominated the ryotwar began to be abandoned. The Committee which assembled in Tanjore in the year 1806, pointed

949. " Under the zemindarry settlement moreover we observed, the abatement granted to the " Zemindar did not reach the landholder or actual cultivator. The settlement which we proposed, " on the contrary, immediately affected the principal cultivators with whom it was to be concluded, " and the advantages resulting from it were not diverted from the land, but would go to the aug- " mentation of agricultural stock."

pointed out its inapplicability to wet lands,* of which the cultivation of that province almost exclusively consists. A ryotwar settlement had, in fact, never been strictly established in Tanjore: a fixed money rent had been substituted for a division of the produce, but the settlement, whether payable in kind or in money, partook of the nature of a village settlement, and the amount was annually determined with reference to the state of the season. In consequence of the recommendation of the Committee, the term of the settlement, from being annual, was extended by Government to three years.†

To this change succeeded an elaborate inquiry into the merits and demerits of the ryotwar mode of settlement as a general system. The subject was first brought forward, and was very fully treated, by one of the gentlemen who composed the Tanjore Committee (Mr. Hodgson), in the reports which he submitted upon the districts which he visited after quitting Tanjore. These reports were transmitted by Government to the Board of Revenue towards the close of the year 1807,‡ with directions to report on the expediency of relinquishing the ryotwar system, and of substituting for it some plan of settlement approximating more nearly to that of estates permanently assessed.

The Report of the Board of Revenue, dated the 25th April 1808, was followed by the general abandonment of the "ryotwar," and the establishment of the system of village rents on lease for three years, and the measure was declaredly intended to be preparatory to the introduction of a permanent settlement.§

The Honourable Court of Directors, in their letter under date the 30th August 1809,‖ adverting to the triennial village lease settlement of Tanjore, approve of the measure, but express their opinion that five years would have been the preferable period for the lease. In the same letter, with reference to Mr. Hodgson's report on the Coimbatore district, the Honourable Court seem inclined to coincide in Mr. Hodgson's opinions respecting the expediency of discontinuing the kulwar or ryotwar settlement, and conclude with recommending a settlement on lease for five years. The opinions of the Honourable Court upon the inexpediency of continuing the ryotwar system are more decisively expressed in another part of the same letter,†† wherein, after noticing the explanations furnished by Colonel Munro relative to the mode by which that kind of settlement was conducted by him in the Ceded Districts, they observe that, "on the whole, although we continue in the opinion expressed in our "Revenue letter of the 6th November 1805, that the kulwar system, intelli- "gently followed up, is well calculated to discover the resources of a "country, yet we also think that, after it has answered that end, it is not to "be preferred for constant practice; and the doubt which Lieutenant Colonel "Munro has properly stated, whether it be equally well fitted for the improve- "ment of a country as the discovery of its actual resources, we are strongly "inclined to believe is to be resolved in the negative."

In their letter, under date the 24th April 1811, the Honourable Court refer incidentally to the measure of establishing village rents on lease in lieu of the ryotwar;

* It should be borne in mind, that the Ceded Districts of 1792 settled ryotwar by Colonel Read, and the Ceded Districts of 1800 settled ryotwar by Colonel Munro, have a very small proportion of wet lands.

† The Committee recommended five years: three years was the term adopted by Government.

§ Extract from the Report to Government, dated 25th April 1808. Par. 44. "We hesitated whe- "ther to recommend a period of three or five years. A farm of five years would encourage improve- "ment, but a farm of three years will not depress the spirit of agriculture, while it will admit "easily of a transition to a permanent settlement, or to an extended term of lease."——Extract from the Reply of Government, dated 25th May 1808 Par 9. "The Governor in Council en- "tirely concurs in the reasons which you have stated in favour of the measure of concluding a "village rent in the Ceded Districts, as also in the other districts not permanently settled, for "the period of three years This mode of settlement appears to accord with the long established "usage of the country; to be compatible with its progressive improvement; to be adapted to the "established system of internal judicature, and to have the advantage of facilitating the future "introduction of the permanent settlement."

ryotwar; and the only point to which they appear to have had any objection is the shortness of the lease. "A settlement for so short a period as three years," they observe, "though it may be acquiesced in as an experiment, or as an "allowable step in the progress of gradual transition from one system to "another, cannot be commended on any principle of large and permanent "policy."*

In another part of the same letter, the Honourable Court, with reference to a proposition contained in Mr. Hodgson's report upon Tinnevelly, for the establishment in that province of rents by mootahs, or districts consisting of several villages, declare their objections to that mode of settlement, "at least in the "first instance,"† and their preference to the system of village rents, which they desire may accordingly be established as in Tanjore, "with this difference, "that leases shall be granted for five instead of three years."‡

It was not, however, until more recently, that the Honourable Court replied directly to the communication which was made to them in 1808, respecting the general introduction of village rents on lease. Their observations on the subject are contained in the extract annexed.§ This letter, dated the 18th December 1811, reached the Board of Revenue in July 1812.||

In this letter the Honourable Court promise a fuller communication of their sentiments at a future period. In the mean time, they express their approval generally of the village leases, and (though somewhat in opposition to the opinion given in some of their preceding letters) they express their approval also of the short term of the lease, "as admitting of an earlier correction of "errors."

Regarding permanency, "We observe," say the Court, "that these leases "are intended as preparatory to the conclusion of permanent settlements: we "desire it, however, to be understood by you, that we are by no means "anxious for the early adoption of that system in any part of our territories to "which it has not been hitherto extended." The Court proceed to observe, that they have always entertained and expressed a full persuasion, that before any settlements are formed, intended for permanency, it is highly necessary that the most correct knowledge which it is practicable to obtain should be acquired, respecting the actual state and resources of the lands, their capacities of improvement, and of the tenures and rights of individuals. Their opinion on this point, they remark, has derived no small confirmation from the experience which, they are sorry to say, has been recently afforded of the frequent failure of assessments formed on the principle of permanency; and they close their observations with restricting the Government from concluding any settlement of a district in perpetuity, without having previously received their specific sanction for that purpose, which, they say, they shall not grant, until they are put in possession of every information necessary to direct their judgment in a matter of such essential concern.

The orders here last recited were received at a time when considerable progress had been already made in the renewal of the village settlements on lease for ten years, to become eventually permanent. How far these orders ought to have affected the proceedings then in progress, may admit of discussion. The question now under consideration relates, however, to the actual proceedings of the Board of Revenue and of the Government, prior to the receipt of these orders.

It

‡ It may be remarked, in illustration of the difficulty of prescribing successfully in England the detail of proceedings in India, that nearly three years before these orders were written, a village lease settlement had been established in Tinnevelly, and that at the time of their being written, the lease was on the point of expiring.

 It is to be noted, that these failures arose chiefly from over assessment, which can have no reference to the system. A ryotwar rent, or village rent, must experience failure from the same cause.

It will, no doubt, be admitted, that it became the duty of the Board to look to the security of the revenue of those provinces in which the triennial lease was about to expire. It was obviously necessary to provide (and that soon) for the settlement, in some way or other, of the land revenue of those provinces. The Board found themselves called upon to act, to recommend some plan of settlement, and a sense of duty led them to recommend that plan which appeared to them to be most likely to succeed, or to be attended with the least disadvantage and loss.

The system of annual ryotwarry settlements, it has been seen, had been relinquished after full and mature deliberation, and with the acknowledged view of preparing the way for a permanent assessment: it has been also seen, that the sentiments of the Honourable Court of Directors as expressed in their letters were favourable to the change, though accompanied with restrictions in regard to not fixing the assessment until all the previous information should be submitted to them. The Board of Revenue might therefore be pardoned, if the measure of recurring to the ryotwarry system scarcely entered into their contemplation, even though they had not been, as they in reality were, confirmed in their conviction of the justness of the grounds upon which it had been abandoned. The renewal of the leases appeared, in fact, to the Board, to be not only expedient in itself, but to be an almost necessary consequence of the measures which had preceded, and which had received the sanction of the Honourable Court.

It is not necessary here to repeat what has been already so fully urged in favour of the early establishment of a system of permanency. The minutes of the Board of the 9th May and 1st July, their report to Government of the 1st August, and the proceedings of the Governor in Council of the 31st December 1811, were before the Honourable Court at the time their present dispatch was written. The Board conclude, therefore, that they failed to convince the Honourable Court of the expediency of declaring the lease permanent. There may, it is true, be room for doubting the policy of fixing for ever the public demand upon the lands, and there may be still greater room for doubting that the time and manner of proceeding were, the former the most convenient, and the latter the best which could be adopted. These are points which, from their nature, must always admit of a difference of opinion. But the Board submit, that the renewal of the leases was, under all the circumstances stated, a necessary measure, and not repugnant to the orders of the Honourable Court; and farther, that their renewal for a long term was preferable to their renewal for a short one: that it was expedient, on every ground, that the Government should bind itself not to raise its demand (universally allowed to be sufficiently heavy) for a considerable period to come, and that the people should be convinced that the Government would adhere to its resolution. In so far, therefore, as the proceedings of the Board and of Government did not extend beyond the renewal of the lease for a period of ten years, it is hoped that these proceedings will not be considered liable to objection.

It remains to consider, whether the Board of Revenue are justly liable, and in what degree, to the censure passed on their conduct for acting in opposition to the orders of the Honourable Court, in respect to rendering the settlement eventually permanent. The merits of the plan proposed by the Board do not enter into the consideration of this question. The plan may or may not be a good one; it may or may not be the best which could have been suggested. This forms a subject of consideration altogether distinct: the point here at issue turns simply on the imputed act of disobedience of orders.

It is not easy to anticipate any motive which should have induced the Board of Revenue wilfully to disobey the positive instructions of the Honourable Court of Directors. Interest could not furnish the motive; that, as well as their duty, would point to a different direction. It will be admitted, however, that orders are liable to be misunderstood; and, in the present instance, the then Board may perhaps be justly charged with misconstruction of orders: possibly also it may appear, that the misconstruction was such as ought not to have taken place, that it must have proceeded from the want of due attention to the orders, rather than from any inaccuracy or defect in their expression. But the Board may be permitted to disclaim intentional disobedience of orders.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Aug 1813.

The impression which the orders in question conveyed to the minds of the Board was, not that it was the desire of the Court that no steps should be taken towards forming a permanent settlement without their previous sanction, but that no permanent settlement should be actually concluded without such sanction.

With respect to the orders of the 11th February 1801, which are quoted amongst others as evincing "a disposition more and more adverse to any early "proceedings for extending the measure" of a permanent settlement, they will be found to have given the sanction of the Honourable Court to the permanent settlement then in agitation, but accompanied with a desire that great caution should be used in carrying the measure into effect. A copy of this letter, which is not long, is subjoined.*

The only orders of which the Board were aware, as bearing upon the subject, are those from which extracts are inserted in the present letter from the Honourable Court: the first dated the 21st July 1802, directed that a permanent settlement of Malabar, Canara, and the Ceded Districts should not be concluded, "until all the previous measures leading thereto shall have been specially "reported to us, accompanied by every possible information" that can be procured upon the subject.

In the second letter, dated the 10th April 1804, it is observed, "we have "already directed that a permanent settlement of the lands of those districts "be not carried into execution without our previous sanction, which direction "we now repeat," adding, "we much fear that the state of those countries, "and the defective information which we at present possess of their real re- "sources, or what they would produce under proper management, will not "admit of the introduction of a fair and adequate settlement for some time to "come."

The revenue in these provinces, owing to the comparative moderation of the assessment, having been hitherto collected without those difficulties experienced in other districts, no new measure was necessary with respect to them, but with respect to the Ceded Districts, it was considered that a necessity did exist, on the expiration of the triennial lease, for adopting a more settled and permanent mode of collection. The information obtained by Colonel Munro's survey of these districts, and from subsequent experience, was considered sufficient to enable the Government to determine an adequate settlement; and it was thought that there was little room to hope, that much better information with respect to the value of the country would ever be acquired.

There existed, in the opinion of the Board, every reason to be satisfied that the actual resources of the Ceded Districts, as well as of the districts generally, had been sufficiently developed. The land revenue, so far from being below, considerably exceeded the just proportion which it ought to bear to the actual resources. These sentiments have been often repeated in substance, as well by the Collectors as by the Board. It has been further stated, that the revenue so raised has for some years pressed hard upon the country, that no increase was expected, but that a diminution was rather to be apprehended; and it was considered, under these circumstances, that to fix the ultimate demand upon the lands was the measure by which not only the general interests, but the immediate pecuniary interests of the Government would be best consulted.

In the last letter to which the Honourable Court refer, dated the 30th August 1809, they direct that the orders conveyed in their two preceding letters may be considered to be still in force, "prohibiting," as is there stated, "the conclusion of a permanent settlement in these districts (Malabar, Canara, "and the Ceded Districts) without their previous sanction."

If this letter had reached the Board (which in fact it did not) before the arrangements had been made, and orders issued for renewing the lease and rendering it conditionally and eventually perpetual, still, under the impression which was entertained respecting the intention of the original orders, to which these merely referred, joined to the necessity which was considered to exist for some

some decisive course of proceeding, the Board would not, it is probable, have thought that they would act improperly in pursuing the course which has been actually adopted.

The orders subsequent to those dated the 21st July 1802, in each case expressly referred to those orders, which directed that the permanent settlement of certain specified districts should not be concluded until all the previous measures leading thereto should have been specially reported to the Court, accompanied by every possible information that could be procured on the subject.

The course pursued has been as follows. A decennial settlement has been formed, which after having been examined, revised, and confirmed, it was intended should be rendered perpetual, only so far as depended on this Government, leaving it to the Honourable Court of Directors either to refuse their sanction to it altogether, as a perpetual settlement, or to propose such other terms or stipulations as on deliberate consideration might appear to them to be proper.

In regard to the revision of the settlement, and its confirmation by Government, it was and is intended that every possible care should be used to guard against error. It has been proposed, that the confirmation should not for some time be formally communicated: and, among other stipulations for guarding against error, it is proposed that engagements which may hereafter prove to have been collusive, or founded upon fraudulent grounds, shall be liable to be cancelled.*

It was intended, that each individual settlement thus formed, should be "especially reported to the Court, accompanied by every possible information "that could be procured on the subject." It was further intended, as already stated, that each individual settlement should be subject to the Honourable Court's approval or rejection: a course of proceeding which, though it may possibly appear to overstep the letter, was thought to be consistent with the spirit of their orders.

The Honourable Court have deemed it expedient to refuse their assent to this proceeding in limine, without waiting to examine the result of particular settlements. No material inconvenience, however, of which the Board are aware, is likely to result from this refusal. The settlements which have been formed, or are yet in progress, will now no longer be regarded as eventually perpetual, but merely as decennial. The Board trust, that by this it will not be found the public interests have been compromised: on the contrary, they are convinced that no settlement short of decennial settlement would prove equally advantageous to all parties concerned.

It may be said, that what has been done prevents the execution of the desire of the Honourable Court for the immediate re-establishment of the Ryotwar system; but as that system had been abandoned with the concurrence of Government and the approbation of the Honourable Court, the Board submit that they could not anticipate the intention to recur to that system.

The Merits of the System or Plan of Settlement proposed.

The Honourable Court having delivered their sentiments regarding the plan of settlement proposed, after having, it is presumed, weighed all the reasons stated in its favour, it is not the intention of the Board to repeat what has been already so amply recorded, further than may be necessary in explanation, or in answer to the remarks of the Honourable Court.

The Honourable Court commence with observing,† that the doubts which they entertained upon "this very interesting subject," (the permanent settlement) have been strengthened by a recent communication from the Supreme Government, in which it is stated that errors of considerable magnitude had been committed in forming the permanent settlement of the lands under the Bengal presidency, and that their attention has been arrested, in a still greater degree, degree, by the judgment passed by this Government against the Mootahdarry system. But while the Honourable Court express their concurrence in that judgment, they observe that they cannot distinguish any substantial difference between the Mootahdarry system and the system of village rents proposed by the Board; that under the Mootahdarry system the Potail of a particular village became by creation, or was at least eligible to become a Mootahdar or Zemindar, with power and authority over the other Potails and all the landholders of the villages within his mootah; that in the plan of village leases, the situation of Potail is changed from that of being the headman and hereditary officer of the village, in which there may be and generally are other proprietors, into a tenant in capite of all the village, the other proprietors becoming accountable to him, and therefore falling into the situation of under-tenants; that the difference, therefore, between the two systems appears to be in degree, not in principle, both having a tendency to affect the feelings and rights of the small landed proprietors.

The Honourable Court's letter next contains observations regarding the importance of providing for the protection of the Ryots, by compelling Zemindars to grant pottahs, and comments upon the impropriety of one of the rules prescribed for the formation of the quinquennial lease of Tanjore, which admitted of the setting aside such Meerassadars as might refuse to accede to the settlement, and granting the rent to others. In paragraph 12, the Honourable Court recite former orders respecting Malabar and Canara,* "to "shew that as soon as they were apprized that individual proprietary rights "existed in any portion of the territories under this Government, they were "most anxiously desirous that they should be respected and maintained."

"As far as we can collect from your correspondence," observe the Honourable Court,† "you seem to have been principally induced to propose the settle- "ment upon village leases on account of the supposed incompatibility of the "judicial system (which had been recently established in the unsettled dis- "tricts) with the ryotwar mode of collection." The Honourable Court then proceed to discuss the judicial system at considerable length,‡ noticing its great expense, and the principal of its supposed defects: after which they revert to the subject of the ryotwar system,§ and quote the suffrages of Colonel Munro, Mr. Thackeray, and Mr. Place,|| in its favour.

"The example of Canara, "observe the Honourable Court,¶ "may be ad- "duced in corroboration of what we have advanced from other authorities. "This province appears, from the reports of the Collectors, to have arrived "at a high state of improvement, and its inhabitants to be in possession of "the substantial benefits which invariably accompany the independent feelings "of proprietary right and personal security. The beneficial influence of the "ryotwar system may be considered to have been brought to a most satisfac- "tory demonstration in Canara, and we are strongly encouraged, by the ex- "amination we have made into the official communications of your Collec- "tors, to hope that the adoption of that system in the unsettled districts "would, at no great distance of time, produce a spirit of industry, an ex- "tension of agricultural undertakings, and with it an augmentation of the "public revenue, similar to what has taken place in Canara."

An extract is next given from a minute recorded by Lord William Bentinck in 1806, illustrative of his sentiments in favour of a ryotwarry permanent settlement, with reference to the actual state of landed property in Canara. Mr. Thackeray's report is also referred to, and great stress appears to be laid on the success of Colonel Munro's administration in the Ceded Districts, under the operation of the ryotwar mode of management, under which "a mass of "revenue, amounting to Star Pagodas 119,90,419 had been collected, with a "remission on the whole of only Star Pagodas 3,415.

"In addition to the practical illustrations here exhibited of the wisdom "and efficiency of this system of revenue," the Honourable Court proceed to notice notice two other considerations which influence their minds in its favour: the first, that it secures what they conceive can, under no other system, be effectually secured, the eventual advantage of an adequate revenue from the waste lands, from which they deem it not unreasonable to expect, from past experience, " a considerable and annually increasing augmentation to the public resources;" the other, that the ryotwar system consorts better with the Hindoo law of inheritance, which admits of an equal division of property among the male children, a rule which, it is observed, must, even though opposed by artificial restraints, in direct variance with the established law of Indian inheritance, tend to render the arrangements of permanent village rents only temporary; for that, in a few generations, the proprietary rights in the hereditary farm would become so divided, as to bring things to a state similar to that in which they would be from the beginning under the ryotwar system, with the additional inconvenience, that there would be two descriptions of property dividing and subdividing, viz. the property of the hereditary farmer of the revenue, whom we shall create, and the territorial property of the Meerassadars and other cultivators.

This, it is believed, is a correct outline of the remarks contained in the Honourable Court's letter, relative to the plan of settlement proposed by the Board, and on which is founded their directions to the Government, " that in " all the provinces that may be unsettled when this dispatch shall reach them, " the principle of the ryotwar settlement, as it is termed, shall be acted upon; " that where the village rents upon any other principle shall have been esta- " blished, the leases shall be declared terminable at the expiration of the " period for which they may have been granted; and that (if such a mea- " sure be not already adopted) an express stipulation be made, requiring the " issue of pottahs by the renters to the Ryots, on pain of forfeiting their " leases."*

Adopting the sentiments recorded by Lord William Bentinck in the year 1806, it appears that the Honourable Court have taken Canara as the great " landmark by which" they hope " to trace out those principles and regula- " tions which might be applicable to the unsettled districts where the perma- " nent tenures are to be introduced." So far as Canara is concerned, as well as the adjoining province of Malabar, nothing has been done in contravention of these views. In these provinces, where the land-tax is happily so moderate that private property in the soil is still preserved, it might perhaps be found practicable to form a ryotwarry permanent settlement without any great sacrifice of revenue. Accordingly, these provinces were excepted from the operation of the general arrangement by which the triennial lease, and subsequently the decennial lease, has been elsewhere established: the system of management has remained unchanged, because no change was immediately required.

In Malabar and Canara, the landlords, after paying the land-tax, enjoy in many cases a clear rent, amounting to forty or fifty per cent. of the net produce or rent of their estates. The land is saleable property, and the landlords, so far from ever wishing to relinquish their estates, will on no account part with them, unless obliged by the most urgent necessity.

In the Ceded Districts, as well as in many districts below the Ghauts, the case is widely different. The Ryots are in general indigent farmers, who under the ryotwarry settlement paid the whole, or nearly the whole of the landlord's rent, or net produce, to Government. The rent was so high, that only the better sort of farmers could pay the full amount in ordinary seasons. The jummabundy, or annual adjustment of the rent, was not made until the season was so far advanced that a good estimate could be formed of the produce of the harvest; and it was necessary and usual to make deductions from the rent at the time of settling the jummabundy, or to grant remissions afterwards, wherever there was a bad crop, or other misfortune occurred.

Under this system, the skill and judgment of the Collectors in forming the annual settlement was principally exerted in ascertaining and allowing the deductions from the full rent which the circumstances of each village and Ryot actually required, and his vigilance employed in not allowing the Ryots, in collusion collusion with the revenue servants, to impose upon him, and obtain deductions where they were not absolutely necessary. The application of the field assessment to the extent of land actually brought into cultivation was the professed rule by which the amount of a ryotwar settlement was regulated: but the supposed means of the Ryots were also considered, and according to the opinion which was formed of those means the payment of the rent was enforced, sometimes on the land actually cultivated only, and sometimes on the land agreed to be occupied at the commencement of the season, whether it was afterwards cultivated or not. It is obvious how much the success of such a system must depend on the personal qualifications of the persons intrusted with its superintendence, and how uncertain, therefore, must be its correct application. Rigour might exact more than ought to be taken, while incapacity or negligence might be the cause of almost indefinite loss.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Aug. 1818.

It may here be observed, by the way, that the manner of settling the jummabundy above described, accounts sufficiently for the apparent phenomenon which has so particularly attracted the attention of the Honourable Court, of a mass of revenue, amounting to Pagodas 1,19,90,419, having been collected, with a balance of Pagodas 3,415 only.

The ryotwarry system, as administered in the Ceded Districts and some other provinces, was, in fact, incompatible with the existence of balances. Nothing was entered in the jummabundy but what it had been ascertained could be collected, and what indeed had, for the most part, been realized before the jummabundy accounts were closed. The demand was not, as under a permanent or a lease settlement, a definite sum, for the collection of which the Collector is in a certain degree answerable, and of which the portion uncollected must appear as a balance, but the demand being annually determined by the Collector himself, was regulated by the means of payment. It was to no purpose to enter as a demand what it was pretty certain could not be collected, and no discreet Collector ever did it. The jummabundy accounts in the Ceded Districts were always dispatched towards the end of May, and reached the Board in the beginning of June; and though the last kist still remained to be realized, yet, as the nature of the season and means of the people had been ascertained, and as the Ryots of the whole village were moreover held jointly as well as severally responsible, as each individual was exposed to a second assessment, on account of his neighbour's failure, it was next to impossible that any balances should accrue. The few trifling sums that did actually appear as balances arose from particular circumstances; such as the unforeseen death or desertion of an occasional Ryot, for which it might not, in certain cases, have been thought just to tax the village.

The practice which has universally prevailed, excepting in the provinces of Malabar and Canara,* of making advances to the farmers under the denomination of tuccavy, to enable them to carry on their cultivation and to pay the rent of their lands, is of itself a sufficient proof of their general poverty. Colonel Munro indeed maintains, though there are grounds for differing in opinion with him in that respect, that "private landed property in the soil "has never existed in India, excepting on the Malabar coast."†

In another part of the same report in which this position is advanced, he observes:‡ "In the Ceded Districts, and throughout the Deccan, the Ryot has "little or no property in land: he does not even claim it. He is so far from "asserting either a proprietary or possessory right, that he is always ready to "relinquish his land, and take some other which he supposes is lighter "assessed. All land is supposed to revert to Government at the end of every "year, to be distributed as it may think proper; and land is accordingly some- "times taken from one and given to another who is willing to pay a higher "rent. If the power is exercised with caution, it is not from the fear of vio- "lating any possessory right but of losing revenue, for the assessment is gene- "rally

* In Canara advances are granted to some of the poorer Ryots, but to a small amount: in Malabar the practice is unknown.

"rally so high that if the Ryot is dispossessed the same rent can seldom be "got from a new one."

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Aug. 1818.

Under the ryotwarry mode of settlement, and before the new system of laws had begun to be understood, it had been usual to compel the Ryots to cultivate the land, or at least to pay rent for a certain extent of land whether cultivated or not. In his report, dated the 25th August 1805,* Colonel Munro estimates the proportion of extra land which the Ryots were obliged to occupy, but could not cultivate properly for want of stock, to be not less than ten or twelve per cent. of the whole of the land in cultivation; and he states, that if every restraint upon their inclination were removed, they would probably thow up one-fourth of the land in cultivation. In another part of the said report he observes, "The same causes which make land unsaleable, and seve- "ral others, concur to render it impracticable to establish a lease for a term "of years, and far less a permanent settlement, with the Ryots individually. "Many of them are so poor, that it is always doubtful whether they will next "year be in the rank of cultivators or labourers, and few of them are so rich "as not to be liable to be forced, by one or two bad seasons, to throw up a "considerable part of their farms. The loss of a bullock, or of a member of "the family who worked in the field, or confinement by a fit of sickness, fre- "quently disable them from paying their usual rent the ensuing year."

Under circumstances like these, it was, and must obviously continue to be, impracticable to introduce the ryotwarry system, as it prevails in Malabar and Canara, without granting a large remission of rent: such a remission as shall be calculated to put the poor farmer in other provinces upon nearly the same footing as the landlords in Malabar and Canara. Indeed, in all the plans ever contemplated for a permanent ryotwar settlement, a considerable remission of the land-rent was considered to be the necessary and fundamental principle of such a system, without which it could not be expected to succeed.

The fundamental principle of the plan recommended by Colonel Munro, in the year 1807,† was a reduction of Pagodas 3,84,980 on the collections of fusily 1215; a plan which, in their report to Government, under date the 25th April 1808, the Board of Revenue observed "was not less applicable to "all the districts as yet unsettled than to the Ceded Districts; and that if "the exigencies of the Government allowed of so great a sacrifice as a remis- "sion on the present standard rents to the extent of twenty-five per cent., or "even of fifteen per cent., they should consider the measure highly advisable, "and calculated to produce great ulterior advantages."

If this plan had been adopted by the Government, more especially at that period of financial difficulty, there is every probability that it would have drawn upon them the severe reprehension of the Honourable Court. The Government thought it imprudent to venture on so large a sacrifice, however satisfied they might have been that it would be only temporary; and they resolved on the adoption of the village lease system, as a measure preparatory to a permanent settlement, and which (the article of permanency excepted), it has been seen, subsequently received the approval of the Honourable Court.

The operation of the new system of laws had already begun to be understood, and during the period of the first or triennial lease was more extensively felt. The Ryots refused to cultivate more land or pay more rent than their interest or inclination dictated. The competition among the renters, during the triennial lease, had further tended to produce this effect, by opening a free market for the stock and labour of the Ryots; so that many of the renters had suffered, and some had been ruined, by the favourable terms which the Ryots had exacted, or by the desertion of the Ryots in case of refusal; and on the expiration of the lease it was apprehended, in consequence of the emancipation of the Ryots, that whether the leases were renewed, or an attempt made to recur to the ryotwar settlement, a considerable loss of revenue would ensue.

It was considered to be contrary to the spirit of the laws which had been enacted for the Government of India, and contrary to the intentions of the Honourable Court and the Legislature at home, as well as contrary to the general general principles of justice and policy, to attempt to revive, for the sake of keeping up the revenue, the restraints upon the freedom of the Ryots, which had been just removed, and that it only remained, therefore, either to relinquish a large portion of the land revenue, or to endeavour to substitute some other principle for compulsion.

* Paragraph 24. † Report dated 15th August 1807.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Aug. 1813.

The Board of Revenue pointed out these difficulties to the Government. The arbitrary power with which the Collectors had been heretofore invested, and the various local investigations which had taken place during the existence of that power, it was believed, had in general sufficiently developed the resources of the country, and that no increase of revenue, nor much useful information, was to be expected from a continuance of those investigations. The object, in short, was to devise a plan for securing the revenue from defalcation. Independently of other considerations, which had originally led to the abolition of the ryotwarry system, it was thought that it would not be practicable to recur to that system without a considerable immediate reduction of revenue.* To have renewed the lease for another term of three years would have been acting in opposition to experience. The short period of the triennial lease had been productive of much mischief:† indeed, there were sufficient reasons to be satisfied, that few of the landholders would have consented to a renewal of the lease for a similar term without reductions. It was considered that a septennial would be preferable to a triennial, and a decennial to a septennial settlement; but it was believed that, at the end of any temporary settlement, no augmentation of revenue could be reasonably expected. The Board of Revenue, under these circumstances, recommended the plan which has been disapproved by the Honourable Court, the decennial settlement to become eventually permanent; in the hope and belief, that, by limiting the demands of the Government upon the whole lands of the villages, the prospect of enjoying the produce of their improvements would so stimulate the industry of the Ryots, as not only to secure the due payment of the present revenue, but also, in the course of time, to create a landholder's rent, similar to that which already exists in Malabar and Canara.

And here it may be observed, that the fixing of the assessment upon the villages was not considered to be wholly incompatible with a future increase of revenue; for it was contemplated that occasions would offer for the secure disbursement of public money in useful undertakings, having for their object the extension of agriculture, in which case the Government would participate in the improvement, by a reasonably proportionate increase or advance in the amount of the assessment.

With respect to the observation contained in the Honourable Court's letter,‡ relative to the exclusion from the settlement of such of the Meerassadars of Tanjore as might refuse to accede to the terms offered, it is to be remarked, in the first place, that the passage quoted by the Honourable Court did not relate to the measure of the decennial, and eventually perpetual lease, but to the measure of a quinquennial lease which regarded Tanjore only, and which had been determined upon, at the recommendation of the Collector, before the discussions respecting the other measure had commenced.

The Collector has since, indeed, received orders for the conversion of the quinquennial lease into the decennial, and eventually perpetual settlement; and he will have seen, from the papers which have been transmitted to him, that the Government and the Board are particularly anxious, that as many of the Meerassadars should be included in the settlement as may be practicable. The progress made by the Collector in this work has not yet been reported; but whatever may be the result, the Board beg leave to explain that the rights of the Meerassadars who may refuse to join in the settlement, or may for other reasons be excluded, will not, in their opinion, be absorbed in the larger right intended to be created: because the renters, supposing all the Meerassadars not

* The teerwa, or rates of assessment established under the ryotwarry, had been found to be almost universally too high. the renters had been compelled almost universally to reduce them.

† The high terms of the triennial lease, joined to bad seasons, contributed to aggravate the evils which were experienced.

not to become renters, are vested with no other rights than those which belong to the Sircar, which rights do not extend to any infringement of merassy property. Whether a Meerassadar becomes a renter or not, his merassy rights remain the same: the only difference is, that he pays his tax through a renter, instead of paying it in the capacity of a renter. No renter, whether a Meerassadar or not, will be vested with power to injure or absorb the rights of other Meerassadars.

On the observation of the Honourable Court, that they cannot distinguish any substantial difference between the mootahdarry system and the system of village rents proposed by the Board, it may be remarked, amongst other differences which might be enumerated, that the one generally involved a direct abatement of revenue which the other does not, and that the zemindarry or mootahdarry settlement was generally, if not in all cases, concluded with persons who were not farmers of land, but only farmers of revenue themselves, unconnected with the pursuit of agriculture. Under the plan of village settlements proposed by the Board, it was intended that all the principal landholders should become the joint renters; and it was contemplated that after the settlement should be concluded, they would begin to make arrangements amongst themselves for the permanent distribution of the lands, and thereby create, in course of time, separate private estates in each village, paying their land-tax directly to the Government. In this plan the Board did not contemplate the creation of any two-fold description of property. Each Meerassadar's portion of the rent would be in proportion to his merassy property in the land, and as the merassy property diminished or increased, so would the proportion of the rent. The rent is the tax on the land, the property is in the occupation of the land. Both must divide and subdivide in the same proportion; and as village rents have been customary from time immemorial, the law, that is the custom, must be easily ascertainable.

Respecting the issue of pottahs, to which the Honourable Court attach great importance, it may be observed, that it is, and always was intended, that the renters should issue pottahs to the sub-tenants, and that a clause to that effect should be inserted in their cowles. It was at the same time expected, that the freedom of person and property which has been established under the operation of the laws, would tend more effectually to secure the inferior Ryots from exaction than any enactments with respect to pottahs, which as the Honourable Court have observed, there is too much reason to suppose might be disregarded, unless the Ryots were placed in such an independent situation as to make it for the interest of the renters to encourage them to cultivate, by granting them good terms and fulfilling their engagements towards them.*

A great deal has been written for and against almost every system of revenue, and perhaps there is scarcely any which might not be shewn to possess some advantages as well as disadvantages. A system perfect in theory, if indeed such a system could be devised, might, and in all probability would be found to be liable to the radical objection of not being reducible to practice. Upon one point, however, all opinions must agree, that a fixed moderate land-tax must prove a great blessing to any country, and perhaps the manner of effecting it is of inferior importance.

The Board of Revenue it should be recollected, did not profess to offer a plan free from all objection; neither did they presume to pronounce, whatever might have been their opinion, that the plan which they suggested was the best which could be adopted. If, as it was at the time observed, the exigencies of the state had admitted of it, an attempt might have been made to form a permanent settlement, upon a plan of the nature of that suggested by Colonel Munro in 1807; but it was thought imprudent to sacrifice a large amount of revenue for the establishment of a plan, which it was possible might not, after all, be attended with the expected advantages, while it was also thought that the same ends might be gradually attained, without any immediate sacrifice of revenue.

 But

* In the zemindarries permanently settled, the non-issue of pottahs, it is understood, is as frequently owing to the disinclination of the Ryots to receive, as to the disinclination of the Zemindars to grant them. The Ryots are often desirous to avoid being bound by specific engagements.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Aug. 1813.

But though in the Ceded Districts, where it has been asserted no traces remain of private property in the soil, the ryotwarry system, or any other system, might have been perpetuated, it does not follow that the same system could have been established elsewhere without injustice: nor does it follow, that even in the Ceded Districts it was the system best calculated for the improvement of the country and for the happiness of the people.

Upon the present occasion, it is not the intention of the Board to enter upon a disquisition of the many objections which might be urged against the principles of the ryotwarry system. Much has been already written upon the subject without producing the conviction. It may not, however, be known generally, as it is to the Board, that those who were the first to attempt its establishment, those who may be considered to be the authors of the system, were the first to acknowledge its intrinsic defects.

In a letter addressed to his Assistants, under date the 10th April 1797, Colonel (then Captain) Read delivers his sentiments in the following words. " After having laid the whole* before them (the Board of Revenue), I shall " confess that the affairs of such an extensive country cannot be managed in " such detail for any length of time. I shall expose the impolicy and folly of " Government condescending to supplant, by a parsimonious system, the " farmer and the merchant; and shall, I hope, be able to devise one more " suitable to its dignity and interest, and better calculated for the comfort of " the inhabitants."

In the subsequent year we find him again addressing his Assistants to the same effect.† He seems, in fact, to be more and more convinced of the faultiness and impracticability of the system which he was pursuing, and to be anxious for the adoption of a system of a more just and liberal policy.

Independently, however, of the objections which have been stated and acknowledged to be inherent in the system, and independently also of the farther, and that not a trifling objection, of the great appearance of inconsistency and want of stability in the proceedings of the Government, which the recurrence to a system so recently abandoned must occasion, it might be stated, that the system, such as it is, was never, there is reason to believe, established generally upon uniform principles.

In their report to Government, under date the 8th September 1808, the Board of Revenue stated, that the rates of assessment in Nellore appeared to have been fixed on the principle of valuing the soil on an estimate of its produce, and had not been regulated, as in the Ceded Districts, with sufficient attention to the actual payments of the Ryots during former periods. It was observed, that " though the Collector had taken much pains to obtain the best " information in his power of the different descriptions of soil, and had valued " the produce at a low price, it was evident that this mode of valuation was " liable to much error, to be either too high or too low;" defects, the consequences of which had been manifested by the fluctuation in the jumma and the difficulties attending its realization.

The local enquiries and observations of Mr. Thackeray, who was deputed to Nellore towards the end of 1808, brought these defects and their consequences more distinctly to view than could be gathered from the communications of the executive authority. The circumstance of the Ryots of a village having been held only separately, instead of jointly responsible, was another defect pointed out by Mr. Thackeray: whence occasion arose " to send Anchanadars or esti- " mators to value the crop; to prohibit the cutting of it until a kata chitti, or " permission to cut it, be given; to keep Mahsooldars to watch it, lest the " Ryots should make away with the grain after it is cut; to watch it or keep " it under sequestration when stored until it is sold, lest the Sirkar should lose " the only security it has for the realization of the revenue."

It appeared further, that in the mode of disposing of the produce, recourse had been had to various expedients for the realization of the revenue, which was

* The voluminous detail of theoretical accounts prepared by him.

† See Appendix, No. VIII.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Aug. 1813.

was ascribed by Mr. Thackeray to the " want of a proper system of fixed " rents," such as there was reason to believe had been established in the Ceded Districts and a few other countries. But the difficulty of a general application of the principles of the ryotwarry settlement in a successful manner, where so much necessarily depended on the ability, experience, and zeal of the local authority, was in fact one of the motives which led to its being abandoned.

There is reason, moreover, to believe, that in some, if not in many of the districts, the principles of the ryotwarry system, though nominally established, were not practically acted upon; that is, by the inhabitants at large. The fields of the villages were, no doubt, rated to a money assessment in the Collector's accounts; but there is reason to believe that the assessments were not always attended to, but that the inhabitants made such a settlement among themselves as was best suited to the true value of the lands of the villages, of which they themselves were the best judges.

The Question of the Incompatibility of the Judicial System with the Ryotwar Mode of Collection, and general Remarks respecting the Judicial Establishment.

Upon the merits or demerits of the system of judicature which has been established, it is not within the province of the Board of Revenue to offer their sentiments: they leave the discussion of this question to the proper authorities, and will confine themselves to an explanation of what they meant, when speaking of the incompatibility of the judicial system with the ryotwar mode of collection.

" The incongruity," observe the Honourable Court, " which you represent " to exist between the judicial system and the mode which formerly obtained " of collecting the land revenue from each Ryot, through the officers of " Government, we must confess appears to us to be a species of objection to " that mode of collection, which may also be brought against a zemindarry or " a village system of revenue management; the only difference being this, that " under a ryotwar settlement the obstructions which are occasionedby the " nature of the judicial process to the realization of the land revenue are expe- " rienced by the European Collector, whereas, under the other kind of settle- " ment, the inconvenience is transferred to the Zemindars and renters, who are " left to seek the recovery of balances and the payment of revenue in disputed " cases, by the same method and according to the same course. It is, there- " fore, as we conceive, the formalities of proceeding in the courts of judica- " ture, and not the manner in which the Government administers its terri- " torial revenue, that we must consider to be the causes of these impediments " and difficulties, to which you have alluded in your Revenue dispatch of the " 28th October 1808, and in the one now before us, as having rendered it, in " your judgment, necessary no longer to continue the principle of ryotwar an- " nual settlement."

The Board deem it necessary to explain, that they meant to state that it was not the formalities of proceeding in the courts of justice, so much as it was the manner in which the Government administered its territorial revenues, that constituted the causes of the impediments and difficulties adverted to. The restraint, or compulsion, or coercion (by whatever name it may be called), by which Ryots were induced to occupy one-fourth more land than it was consistent with their interest to occupy, could not be maintained under any system of judicature, however perfect, or however simple in its operation. It was inconsistent with natural justice, and it was the object therefore of the change, as already explained, to substitute the principle of interest for that of compulsion. But admitting that the obstructions occasioned by the formalities of proceeding in the courts of judicature may have had some share in the change, and admitting also the position laid down by the Honourable Court, that by the change the inconvenience is merely transferred from the European Collector to the Zemindars and renters, " who are left to seek the recovery of balances and the " payments of revenue in disputed cases by the same methods and according " to the same course," it will not be denied, that this great detail, when divided amongst many, is likely to be better and more easily performed than when confined to one person: each man will look after his own rights within his own small small sphere, while it was necessary for the Collector to look after the rights of the Sirkar throughout an extensive province.

It should be remembered, also, that the existing laws were framed with a view to measures of a permanent nature, to a declared intention of fixing the land revenue, and of making the collections over in perpetuity to Zemindars or Mootahdars. The laws did not provide for the Collector being a party in every petty suit which might arise under a ryotwarry system of management. It could not be expected that he should appear, either in person or by Vakeel, before the native Commissioners who are stationed in different parts of the district; nor would it, in the opinion of the Board, have been wise to leave the interests of Government to be defended by such persons.

Official Omissions.

That part of the letter of the Honourable Court which implies an improper delay, on the part of the Board, in addressing Government respecting the arrangements to be made on the conclusion of the triennial leases, has been already answered. Towards the close of their letter, the Honourable Court observe, with apparent surprise, that the non-transmission of the reports on Canara, Malabar, Seringapatam, and Palnaud, is noticed by Government in their general Dispatch, but without animadversion.

It is impossible that the Board should be insensible to the censure of the Honourable Court; but they would feel it the more, were they conscious of meriting it. In an affair of multifarious duty, it may be sometimes necessary that matters of inferior importance should give place to those of superior importance. In regard to the reports alluded to (the report on the small district of Palnaud excepted), no variation of management, nor any change of any kind had taken place: the reports, therefore, related to little more than the amount of the Collections, of which the Government were kept apprised by the monthly accounts comparative, which it has been customary within the last few years to lay before them.

The Honourable Court proceed to observe * " In paragraph 275 you give " a comparative statement of the revenues of Madras for fusilies 1218 and " 1219; and though fusily 1220 had expired eight months prior to the date of " your letter, you acknowledge (paragraph 277) that no account had been re- " ceived of the revenue of that year. Of the causes to which this extraordi- " nary tardiness is owing, on the part of the Board of Revenue, or subordinate " functionaries in preparing and submitting the periodical reports, you have " not informed us. We should be wanting to the trust reposed in us, did we " permit such instances of remissness to pass without censure."

It will probably be sufficient to state, in reply to these observations, that the general revenue statement for fusily 1220, here alluded to, was received from the Accountant-General at the usual period, that is some months after the expiration of the fusily;† that it was submitted to Government under date the 30th January, and is referred to in the general report of the Board of Revenue of that date.

Formerly these annual statements were considered merely as accompaniments to the general reports of the Board of Revenne; but, of late years, they have been forwarded to Government with a separate report.

Measures to be pursued.

It remains for the Board to record a few observations with respect to the measures proper to be pursued, in consequence of the instructions of the Honourable Court for reverting to the ryotwarry system.

The Honourable Court must have been satisfied, from the evidence already before them, that the inhabitants of Canara and Malabar enjoy no benefits, which are not enjoyed in common by the inhabitants of other parts of their territory; the very substantial one excepted, that the Company take less as land-land-tax from them, under a more equal climate, than they do from their other subjects: and as the Honourable Court dwell with approbation on the evidence and opinions contained in the reports of Colonel Munro and Mr. Thackeray on this subject, it must be inferred that the Honourable Court are prepared to accede to this sacrifice of revenue (temporary perhaps), without which it would be impossible to extend the same advantages to the inhabitants of the other territories subject to this presidency.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Aug 1813.

The districts in which the Government are still at liberty to introduce the ryotwar system of collection are,

Trichinopoly,
Madura and Dindigul,
Tinnevelly,
Coimbatore,
Palnaud,
Balaghaut,

In the Trichinopoly district, the high rate of the teerwas on the wet lands is represented as having produced the ruinous effect of impoverishing all the Meerassadars of these lands; in this district, therefore, an immediate reduction of the teerwas* is absolutely necessary.

In Dindigul the teerwa has often been represented as too high, and the Collector has recently applied for permission to re-survey and value the lands of that province, being satisfied that the survey and assessment executed by Mr. Hurdis was erroneous, and that the rates of teerwa are oppressive. In Madura, too, it is supposed that reductions will be necessary.

In Tinnevelly all the lands were surveyed, but teerwas were never applied to the wet lands:† they have always been rented to all the Meerassadars on a joint responsibility. The teerwas on the dry grain lands were reduced in fuslies 1207 or 1208, and are now supposed to be moderate, with reference to the rates of assessment on dry grain lands in other districts; but they must be reduced considerably, if it be wished that the same benefits should be extended to the occupants of these lands as are enjoyed by the cultivators in Canara. In the wet-land villages of Tinnevelly the Board propose to conclude a decennial village lease with all the Meerassadars, but to revert in the dry grain villages to the ryotwar system.

In Coimbatore, the northern division was surveyed and teerwas fixed on each field by Major Macleod, and in the southern division by Mr. Hurdis. In 1807 it became necessary to reduce the rates of the southern division to a level with those of the northern, and the benefits which would result from reducing the rates still lower in both divisions were pointed out.‡ If it be desired to extend to the cultivators of Coimbatore the benefits enjoyed by the cultivators in Canara, the teerwas throughout Coimbatore must be further reduced.

In Palnaud the villages have been rented on lease for three years to the head inhabitants, and orders have been given for extending the lease to ten years. If these orders should not have been carried into execution, it will be practicable to revert in Palnaud, on the expiration of the triennial lease, to the ryotwar rent. The Collector in this district recently pointed out the irregularities in the teerwas, and supposed frauds committed in fixing them, and applied for permission to re-survey and re-assess this district; but, for the reasons referred to in a former part of these proceedings, the Board preferred adopting a village lease system. It will be practicable, as already mentioned, to revert to the ryotwar rent on the expiration of the triennial lease, and in the mean time the teerwas may be revised.

In the Balaghaut, if, as the Board believe, no progress has been yet made in forming the decennial lease, it will be practicable to revert immediately to the ryotwar system.

 The

* Teerwa means the assessment in each field, or the land-tax as regulated by the survey.

† It has been stated by Mr. Hodgson, in his several reports, that the act of fixing a teerwa on wet lands is a decided innovation on ancient custom The dues of Government, before the ryotwar system was introduced, have always been rendered in kind by the cultivator of wet lands.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Aug. 1813.

The measure of reducing the teerwas in the districts ordered to be settled ryotwar will, if adopted, produce great satisfaction to the Ryots generally; and although the Governor in Council must be sensible that the measure will be followed by at least a temporary reduction of the revenue, it is probable that the cultivators, on receiving a permanent remission on the present teerwas, will readily undertake to increase their cultivation in future years, should the seasons admit of it, to the extent necessary to cover, by the teerwa levied on the new cultivation, the remission to be granted on the old. It was by this means that the reduction of the teerwa in South Coimbatore was effected, with scarcely any temporary sacrifice of revenue; and the Board entertain hopes, that a similar result may be looked for in most of the districts in which the ryotwar system may be re-established. Should the measure, however, be followed by a reduction of revenue in the first instance, little doubt can exist, that the increased excitement which will be given to industry will, at no very distant period, amply replace this deficiency: at any rate, the desirable object of creating "the independent feelings of proprietary right" cannot be accomplished, or the ryotwar system be recurred to, with any prospect of success, unless the teerwas are reduced.

As the districts in which it is now practicable to re-establish the ryotwar system are not numerous, the proposed remission in the teerwas will not, in the opinion of the Board, create any financial embarrassment. The remission may be limited, if deemed necessary, to ascertain per-centage in the first instance, it being left to the Collector to equalize this remission as much as possible; that is to say, to reduce the teerwas on the over-assessed lands in a greater amount than those comparatively more moderately assessed, taking care that the remission does not, in the aggregate, exceed the per-centage allowed.

The Governor in Council has been pleased to direct, that the ryotwar system should be adopted in all the villages which, owing to the failure of the Zemindars or Mootahdars, have reverted to the direct management of the Collectors; as also in all the villages of the districts not permanently settled, which may not, to the present time, have been rented for ten years.

It is necessary to state here, that the villages which have reverted to the management of the Collectors, in zillah Chingleput, in zillah Ganjam, and in zillah Rajahmundry, were never under the ryotwar system; that is, that no teerwa was ever fixed by survey in each field. The dues of Government, before the transfer of the villages in question on a fixed land revenue to Zemindars, were always either received in kind, or rented to the inhabitants jointly and severally; so that, in these villages, the system has never been ryotwar, as the term is generally understood.* In the zillah of Chingleput, known formerly as the Company's jaghire, a village lease for three years, and four annual village rents, preceded the permanent settlement of the jaghire lands. The same system prevailed in zillah Ganjam and Rajahmundry. Previously to introducing the ryotwar system into the villages now under the Collector's immediate management in these zillahs, it would therefore be necessary to fix the teerwas by survey, a measure which the Board are not prepared to recommend: neither can the Board recommend that the ryotwarry system be re-established in the villages remaining unsettled in the districts in which the decennial lease has been concluded, as the Board are convinced that many inconveniencies would result from the prevalence of two modes of management in one and the same district.

It will be thought sufficient, the Board apprehend, for the present, to confine the execution of the Honourable Court's orders to the districts to which the decennial lease has not yet been extended, and in which ryotwar rents have been already heretofore established; and if the benefits of the system should prove such as are anticipated, it may then, on the expiration of the decennial lease, be extended to all the districts under the immediate authority of the Company, that is, to all the districts of which the land revenue is not settled in perpetuity.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Aug. 1813.

A ryotwar rent having existed in zillah Salem before the land revenue of the zillah was permanently settled, the villages now under the immediate authority of the Collector in this zillah might, if it should be so determined, be settled ryotwar on a reduced teerwa. It may not perhaps be known to the Honourable Court, that to the high teerwas fixed by survey on one division of zillah Salem* is to be attributed the failures of the Mootahdars, and the reversion of the lands to Government.† The Mootahdars were compelled to reduce the teerwas thus fixed, while the remission granted by Government, which was very trifling, did not make any allowance for this over-assessment.

Under the explanations contained in this minute, it will remain with his Excellency the Honourable the Governor in Council to determine, how far it may be expedient to carry into execution the orders of the Honourable Court for reverting to the ryotwarry system, and to what extent the Board of Revenue may be permitted to exercise their discretion in the revision and reduction of the teerwas, with a view to the desired object of extending, by means of a moderate land-tax, to the inhabitants of other districts, the benefits now enjoyed by the inhabitants of Canara.

107. Although we have thus declared ourselves in favour of a ryotwarry assessment as an experiment, we confirm the arrangement you have made for concluding a village settlement, on a lease of three years instead of five, as recommended by the Committee. We are, however, of opinion, that the longer period would have been preferable, because in a country like Tanjore, where, as we have before observed, the inequalities of its annual proceeds have been so great, a better opportunity would have been gained to ascertain the productive powers of the country under an uniform system of management during such period, which under different systems we find to have fluctuated from eleven lacks and upwards to somewhat below five lacks, during the six years of the Company's undivided control.

Par. 166. Among the important points discussed in Mr. Hodgson's report, is a plan of future management, and an inquiry whether the present be the time for substituting a more fixed mode of collection, in the place of that system of annual detailed settlement which under the authority of Government has hitherto been practised. The determination of this point must materially depend on the solution of another question; whether the resources of the country have been ascertained, and the respective rights of the cultivator and Government clearly defined? If this question can be resolved in the affirmative, we should suppose that it would be no longer necessary to continue the practice of the kulwar system. Upon this subject, however, the stock of information obtained of late years, and now very considerable, must necessarily be useful in aiding your judgment; but as it has been chiefly derived through the channel of native agents, who are not greatly to be relied on for accuracy or fidelity, the materials they furnish are, of course, to be examined and used with great caution.

167. The northern division of Coimbatore, according to the documents before us, appears most fit to receive a more refined and fixed plan of administration, and we find that the principal Collector, Mr W Garrow, has, in his letter to the Board of Revenue of the 30th November 1806, recommended an arrangement of this nature, but, for the reasons above stated we do not think proper to sanction a settlement in perpetuity of this division We are, nevertheless, inclined to recommend a settlement of lands on a lease of five years, on the terms and conditions of Mr Garrow's proposition Mr Hodgson's reasoning on this point also appears to favour the adoption of an arrangement of the same nature, in the way of an experiment, on the success of which the introduction of a perpetual settlement, or the grant of a further lease for a definite period, might depend

APPENDIX, No 3.

Extract from a Letter from the Honourable Court of Directors, dated 30th August 1809

Letter from Court of Directors, 30 Aug 1809

Par 135 The report of Lieutenant Colonel Munro, referred to in this paragraph,* has clearly explained to us that of which we were not distinctly informed before, the means by which he, as Collector, was enabled to make a separate annual settlement for the land rent with each individual of the very numerous class of people cultivating the soil in his district We find that almost the whole of a minute and extensive process of investigation and superintendence from the individual to the village, and from one village to all the villages in towns of a collectorate, is performed by the medium of native agents, the headmen, accountants arbitrating inhabitants and peons of those villages, with the Tehsildars or inspectors, and Sub Collectors of larger divisions, all whose proceedings for ascertaining the agricultural stock of each Ryot, the allotment of land to be made to each his management of his cultivation, the crop realized, and the comparative excess or deficiency in the produce of the season, are in succession submitted to the observation of the Collector, who, as the immediate representative of Government, settles, after the quality of the first crop is seen, the rate of rent, and, according to the final result of the season, the amount to be ultimately paid

136 This system has every appearance of being derived from remote antiquity, and it seems congenial to the character and habits of the people, but to be more suited to an early and simple state of society than to the condition of India in modern times, and its true interest under a fostering and enlightened Government

137 The very great number of native agents who must be employed in the execution of this system, and the common interests which the Ryots or cultivators of the soil of all descriptions have to deceive the Government, as well as the temptations to unfaithfulness to which Tehsildars and Curnums must ever be exposed, together with the difficulty of adjusting the rents to all the varieties of seasons and public events, favourable or adverse, constitute strong objections to the use of the system as an established mode for collecting the revenues of the country, and the principle of assessing the defalcations of individual Ryots upon the lands of the rest of the inhabitants of a village must be liable to great abuse, and was made in the Bengal provinces an instrument of such severe oppression, as to become one of the early objects of reform under our administration of that country

138 On the whole, although we continue in the opinion expressed in our revenue letter of the 6th November 1805, that the kulwar system, intelligently followed up, is well calculated to discover the resources of a country, yet we also think that, after it has answered that end, it is not to be preferred for constant practice, and the doubt which Lieutenant Colonel Munro has properly stated, whether it be equally well fitted for the improvement of a country as the discovery of its actual resources, we are strongly inclined to believe is to be resolved in the negative

Par. 137. We have no doubt also, that claims for remissions will be less frequent, when the beneficial effects of a settlement of the lands, either on lease or to perpetuity, come to be felt. And this is not the least important consideration to be kept in mind in fixing the term of a settlement; one of the main advantages of which in prospective is, that it will prevent those fluctuations to which the revenue is exposed from the vicissitudes of season and other accidents.

138. A claim on the part of the cultivator, for a remission of rent, is presumed to be founded upon inability to pay. This inability implies a want of capital. Capital can only be acquired by industry, and industry presupposes motives of exertion. Of all motives to industry, the strongest is in the enjoyment of its fruits; and of all discouragements to industry, the strongest is the uncertainty whether another may not enjoy those fruits.

139. Upon this ground a settlement for so short a period as three years, though it may be acquiesced in as an experiment, or as an allowable step in the progress of gradual transition from one system to another, cannot be commended upon any principle of large and permanent policy.

140. Still, however, though the period for which the settlement was made is considerably shorter than the common interests, both of Government and the landholder, seem to prescribe, it is agreeable to learn, from your letter dated the 24th October 1808, that it has been attended with a considerable increase of revenue.

APPENDIX, No. 5.

Extract from a Letter from the Honourable Court of Directors, dated 24th April 1811.

Letter from Court of Directors, 24 April 1811.

Par. 161. Mr. Hodgson's observations on the subject of the future mode of management to be adopted in the province of Tinnevelly, and the arguments which he has advanced in favour of renting it in mootahs, or districts consisting of several villages, for a term of years, though they have failed in convincing us of the propriety of the measure, at least in the first instance, are well deserving of attention. We are, upon the whole, more favourable to a system of village rents, similar to that which has been established in Tanjore, for the following reasons.

1st. Because though a survey has been made of the country, it is hardly possible that, under the past system of management, which discouraged cultivation and offered the strongest temptations to concealment, collusion, and fraud, its resources could be accurately estimated.

2dly. It is stated by Mr. Hodgson, that a ryotwarry money assessment, a system under which it has been found practicable to ascertain pretty correctly the capabilities of a country, must, in the present case, be not only productive of a loss of revenue to Government, but be destructive of the rights of the meerassadars, and of the distinction of ranks at present existing in the Carnatic.

3dly. As it appears to be inexpedient to introduce a ryotwarry settlement, a system of village rents, which is the nearest approximated to it in character, seems preferable to a system of mootah rents, both because the transition will be more gradual, and because we are likely to arrive at a better acquaintance with the country and the people, under the one system than the other.

4thly. A system of mootah rents, for so short a period as three, or even five years, we consider as very objectionable on general principles: the Mootahdar, in such circumstances, being less a cultivator than a speculator in rents, and more a farmer of the revenue than a proprietor of the soil.

162. You

Letter from Court of Directors, 24 April 1811.

162. You will, therefore, proceed to introduce a system of village rents in the province of Tinnevelly, similar to that established in Tanjore; with this difference, that leases shall be granted for five, instead of three years: the rents are not to be collected in kind, but in money, and the sums to be paid are to be fixed in the leases.

APPENDIX, No. 6.

Extract from a General Letter from the Honourable Court of Directors, dated the 18th December 1811.

Letter from Court of Directors, 18 Dec. 1811

Par. 216. In communicating to us these paragraphs,* the measures you have adopted for introducing, at the commencement of fusily 1218, triennial village leases into the unsettled districts under your presidency, as a plan of settlement more nearly approximating to that of estates permanently assessed, you have, as being necessarily connected with this general change of system in those districts, brought under our view the merits of the different modes of revenue administration of which experiment has been made, and which you deem more or less applicable to the situation and circumstances of our territories in the Peninsula.

217. We are thoroughly sensible that there are questions connected with a decision on this subject, which are of essential moment to the prosperity and happiness of the people, as well as to the interests of the state; and we entertain a confident hope, that the numerous enquiries which you have of late years instituted, and the valuable information which has been furnished you by some of your ablest servants, will ultimately lead to the establishment of a system, liberal in its principles, equitable and beneficial in its operation, and desirable from the soundness of its constitution.

218. It was our intention to have communicated to you our sentiments on the general subject to which these paragraphs relate, by the present dispatch; but the conviction which we entertain of its great importance in all the practical bearings and relations which belong to it, has induced us, for the present, to postpone the execution of this intention, in order that we may bestow upon it that full and deliberate consideration, to which it is undoubtedly entitled, and which we propose to give to it at no distant period.

219. We shall, therefore, at this time content ourselves with stating, that as far as we have yet been able to form a judgment on the subject, we are disposed generally to approve of the village leases which you have granted, and of your having limited them to a period of three years, as admitting of an earlier correction of errors.

220. We observe that these leases are intended as preparatory to the conclusion of permanent settlements. We desire it, however, to be understood by you, that we are by no means anxious for the early adoption of that system in any part of our territories to which it has not been hitherto extended. We have always entertained a full persuasion, and have uniformly pressed it upon your minds, that before any settlements be formed that are intended for permanency, it is highly necessary that the most correct knowledge, which it is practicable to obtain, should be acquired, respecting the actual state and resources of the lands, their capacities of improvement, and of the tenures and rights of individuals. Strong and decisive as our opinion has invariably been on this point, it has received no small confirmation from the experience which, we are sorry to say, has been recently afforded us of the frequent failure of assessments formed on the principle to which we allude, in our possessions subject to your immediate authority; and we hereby think it proper to restrict you from concluding any settlement of a district in perpetuity, without having previously received our specific sanction for that purpose: nor shall we grant that that sanction, unless we are put in possession of every information necessary to direct our judgment in a matter of such essential concern.

APPENDIX, No. 7.

Copy of a General Letter from the Honourable Court of Directors, dated 11*th February* 1801.

Letter from Court of Directors 11 Feb. 1801.

Par. 1. We have received your Revenue dispatch of the 22d January 1800, referring us to minutes and proceedings preparatory to the introduction of a permanent system of Revenue and of Judicature into the Company's territories under your presidency, and we have perused with great attention the report of the Revenue Board upon this important subject, with their subsequent instructions to the Collectors; and we have to express our approbation of the industry and abilities which the Revenue Board has displayed, in the investigation and elucidation of this extensive and complicated subject. We observe with peculiar satisfaction, that they have fully availed themselves of the luminous information to be derived from the minutes and proceedings so ably conducted by Marquis Cornwallis and Lord Teignmouth, at the time when a similar institution was under the consideration of the Supreme Board at Calcutta.

2. An early attention to this subject has been necessarily pressed upon our consideration, by our reference to a letter from Bengal, in the Judicial department, dated the 5th March 1800, addressed to your presidency. By that letter you are directed to proceed to the permanent settlement in question, without any clause suspending its final effect, till it should receive our ultimate sanction. As this injunction was so different from what occurred at Bengal, when the measure was executed by the able Government which at that time presided over our councils in India, we were naturally led to pause, before we could thus agree to give out of our own hands the final decision upon a subject of such deep importance to our interests in India: but upon mature reflection, after a revision of what took place at Bengal, and after an accurate perusal of the proceedings already held at Fort St. George, we have come to a decided opinion, to concur in the instructions you have received from the Government general. Particular cases may occur, in which we may regret that the final correction of error did not remain with us; but this inconvenience, if it should prove one, is so much more than counterbalanced by the danger which might accrue to the whole system, if a doubt of its permanency was, in the early stage of its execution, created in the minds of the natives of India, with whom these transactions are to be carried on, that our doubts have subsided; and we rest confident in the conviction, that our interests will be best secured, by giving to our Governments on the spot the confidence which their abilities and integrity so justly merit.

3. In addition to this general confidence, two considerations have naturally operated upon our decision. In the first place, the subject is not a new one. The leading principles of the measure have already received our sanction, in our letter to the Bengal Government of the 19th September 1792, when the business, with the luminous information which attended it, was fully before us and maturely considered by us. The general principles, therefore, being recognized, it is only the detail and execution of those principles which we leave in your hands; and there can be no doubt that such detail can, with infinitely more advantage, be conducted on the spot, than by the ablest investigation we can give to the subject at home.

4. But although we have thus vested you with full power to proceed in the final execution of this permanent arrangement, there are a few general precautions which we deem it proper to recommend to your attention.

5. The first which naturally presents itself is, that although we shall sincerely rejoice to see this measure finally completed, we do not expect that you are to proceed in it with a precipitancy inconsistent with full and accurate investigation. You will always bear in mind, that you are concluding a settlement, which good faith and the honour of our Government require should be held for ever sacred and inviolable. It is a measure on which is to rest for ever the extent of our

our interest in the extensive landed property entrusted to the care of your Government: in proportion therefore as the decision you are to pass is permanent and irrevocable, in the same proportion ought your previous enquiry to be accurate, and your information to be complete.

6. In the next place, it behoves you to attend, in a particular manner, to the different situations of landed property, not only of different provinces and districts, but of different estates in the same province and district. You will certainly err, if it is supposed to be necessary that whole provinces and districts should be settled with at the same time. The information respecting one estate in a district may be so complete, while that of a neighbouring estate was so imperfect as to create great inequality if, to save further trouble of investigation, it should be thought material to arrange with both of them at the same time. From the nature of the business, the execution of it must be gradual and progressive; and not doubting that you will give to the subject your unremitting attention, we can only in general say, that we shall be muchmore satisfied if you can report to us that it is well done, than that it is quickly done. It is impossible to have perused the report of the Revenue Board, without being satisfied that the detail of this business is of a most extensive and complicated nature; and impressed with that reflection, it is equally impossible for us to indulge any impatience, under the lengthened period to which the necessary investigation may extend.

7. The mention we have just made of the Board of Revenue naturally leads us to advert to another observation arising from what is stated in various parts of that report. There is a material difference betwixt the state of several of the provinces in the Carnatic and those of Bengal, where the measure of a permanent settlement was first taken into consideration. The Bengal provinces were infinitely farther advanced in the habits of order and subordination to Government than most places in the Carnatic, and certainly much more so than in the generality of the Poligar provinces or the Northern Circars. They are not so ripe for the reception of those benefits and blessings intended for them, as if they were more accustomed to the habits and feelings of civilized society. This is a material circumstance to be attended to in the conduct of this important measure. Any attempt to introduce a regular system of order, or just sentiments respecting the value of permanent rights, would be idle and nugatory, till once their minds were to a certain extent prepared to feel the importance of the benefits they were about to receive: the first object therefore is, to establish the authority of Government itself in the different zemindarries, before you attempt to invite them to participate in the advantages you are authorized to confer upon them. This never can effectually be done, till you have suppressed that spirit of rebellion and insubordination, which is so conspicuous in many parts of the Northern Circars; and it is of the first importance to the attainment of that object, that all subordinate military establishments should be annihilated, within the limits now subject to our dominion. The countries to which this observation applies must be brought to such a state of subjection, as to acknowledge and submit to this principle. As they must be indebted to our beneficence and wisdom for all the advantages they are to receive, so in like manner they must feel indebted solely to our protection for the continuance and enjoyment of them. We hold these truths to be so incontrovertible, as to preclude all expectation of any benefit to be expected from an attempt to introduce either a permanent system of land revenue, or the exercise of a regular judicial authority till once this essential preliminary is secured.

8. Having laid before you these observations to which your attention is specially directed, we think it further necessary to observe, that although we have thought it proper, for the reasons which have been stated, to vest you with the power of finally concluding with Zemindars and other land proprietors for a permanent settlement of their respective rights and properties, it is not meant thereby to divest ourselves of our controuling authority, in the other various collateral points connected with this business: and therefore, so far as concerns the regulations for the exercise of judicial authority, and in so far as concerns the nature of the establishments to be formed, and the expenses attending them, we expect to be accurately informed, and to exercise our judgment as usual, usual, on the suggestions you may have occasion to submit to us; and we must reserve to ourselves the final consideration of the excess or inadequacy of the pecuniary charges, which the execution of those measures may bring on our finances. Letter from

9. We do not mean, however, by this precaution to doubt your attention to a due economy, so essentially necessary in the present state of our finances; neither do we desire to have it supposed, that it is our wish that, while so great and confidential trusts are to be committed to our servants, you should hold out rewards and compensations to them, other than what are liberal and corresponding to the trust reposed in them. Our sentiments have often been expressed on that topic, and they are particularly applicable to the nature of those trusts which must arise out of the measures now in contemplation. In those trusts it is essentially requisite, that all emoluments should be open and avowed. They cannot be so unless they are adequate and liberal. Although, therefore, we recommend economy, it is that rational economy which is applicable to the subject; but by no means a narrow system incompatible with the important objects in view.

10. It is only further necessary at present to add, that from the nature of the business to be executed, it is obvious that the successful execution of it must ultimately rest on the accuracy and integrity of the inquiries to be conducted by our Collectors, and other officers subordinate to our Board of Revenue. If any of our servants now in those situations are, from a defect of talents or any other circumstances, unequal to the execution of the duties they are called upon to perform, they must be removed, and others, capable of doing the duty, substituted in their room. It is to you we look for the accurate and successful execution of this great work, and with you, therefore, must rest the responsibility which belongs to you, in the selection of the instruments by which it is to be accomplished.

APPENDIX, No. 8.

Col. Read to his Assistants 12 April 1798

Par. 8. The process is no doubt curious, and a proof of what may be done by the extraordinary means in the power of India Collectors; but the difficulty of performing it likewise proves the machine employed in conducting the business of revenue to be too complicated and unwieldy for the purpose. It always has been so in the country, and of consequence it has always been getting out of order, unless when directed by uncommon vigilance and attention. We have thought we could mend it, and in some respects succeeded; but in having refined upon the old system, we have added more wheels, rendered it more complicated, and of course more unfit for carrying on the various branches of revenue economy.

9. The radical defect in it appears to be our over-rated assessment, which augments the public, and reduces the private property in the soil to such a degree, as to involve the necessity of ousting all between Government and the cultivators, and make their concerns the objects of its attention. That is the principal source of objection to the lease; it impedes agriculture and obstructs the ordinary course of justice.

10. As your sentiments upon this subject do not entirely correspond with mine, I have taken this opportunity of explaining, according to my conception, the nature of our assessment, which appears to require the adapting it to different descriptions of the inhabitants, to particular kinds of culture, and to certain times of the year. The qualifying it generally, as I propose, may appear to be easy, but it is obvious on reflection that the doing it properly would often require our presence where we cannot be, and a knowledge of facts we can never attain. Potails and other farmers can determine the actual value of the land with tolerable exactness, but they never will do that for us, or report the occupancy of it: all that is now left to be done with fidelity. Our next dependance is on our Muttariddies; but self-interested, they will generally either favour the Ryots and cheat the Sirkar, or pretending for zeal for the service impose on both.

11. The demand of the first rates requires the least detail: by confining assessements to the occupancy of the land, but precluding all classes except the Shuders, it impedes cultivation. The demand of less than the first rates according to the occupant, or more according to the state or produce of the land, requires much the same detail; but the former is favourable, and the latter unfavourable to improvement.

12. It may be that the business of revenue cannot be carried on in any country so greatly understocked, and having so little trade as this, without much detail; but it is certainly by having gone so far into the detail, that we have increased the public revenue, and that cannot be kept at its present standard, without continuing the same mode of management. I am, indeed, of opinion, that if attempted, the revenue will fall, for reasons assigned, to its former level whenever we quit our situation.

13. I have brought these matters forward again to your consideration, in case you should have any thing new to offer, as the means of a permanent settlement, and more liberal policy than the present; also that I may be favoured with your sentiments in regard to the practicability of continuing the lease under the present rental, without additional assessments to discharge outstanding balances; for the lease cannot be considered as holding, unless where the inhabitants are bound, and able to pay up their individual rents. Several other matters are discussed in the following sheets, on all of which I am desirous of receiving every additional information.

Proceedings of the Sudder Adawlut, 20 Aug. 1813.

Read again letter, dated the 8th penultimo, from the Chief Secretary to the Government, enclosing extract of a letter, dated the 16th December last, from the Honourable the Court of Directors, and signifying the desire of his Excellency the Governor in Council to receive such explanations regarding the judicial department of this Presidency, as the observations of the Honourable Court may render necessary, and that the Court would take into consideration whether any further regulations might not at present be established to simplify and improve the system.

(Here enter No. 422)

Read also again the Chief Secretary's letter of 22d penultimo, enclosing extract of a letter, dated 15th August 1807, from the late principal Collector in the Ceded Districts, and stating that his Excellency the Governor in Council desires desires to be informed whether the Court have reason to believe that the inconveniences pointed out by Colonel Munro have continued to be felt in the Ceded Districts.

(Here enter No. 489.)

The Court had the honour, under date the 19th of February last, to submit to the Governor in Council, for the purpose of being forwarded to the Honourable Court of Directors, a view of the progress and effects of the established system of judicature, commencing with the era of its introduction into the territories subordinate to this presidency, and extending down to the end of the last year. The whole of the judicial abstracts for the subsequent period not having yet been received, the Court are not at present in possession of the materials necessary to enable them to trace the later operations of the courts, and to lay before the Honourable Court such information as would afford them the means of forming a decisive opinion respecting the advancement of the system, and of ascertaining whether the measures, to which recourse had been had to preserve a just equiponderancy between the labours of the courts and the litigious disposition of the community, have continued to be attended with the same success as was apparent at the close of the past year.

Upon occasion, however, of the approaching dispatch to Europe, the Court have considered it to be their duty to report, for the information of the Governor in Council and the Honourable the Court of Directors, their proceedings consequent to the receipt of the Chief Secretary's references of the 8th and 22d penultimo.

And in deliberating upon the practicability of still further amending and simplifying the administration of the laws, it occurred to the Court that the system might admit of immediate improvement in its subordinate branch, and that the course of justice would be facilitated and expedited, by an extension of the powers, and an augmentation of the members of the native Commissioners of law-suits. The advantages which the measure seemed to offer were the still further removal of the impediments which distance may still, in some degree, oppose to the complainant in seeking redress in small suits; and the increased probability of keeping the files of the zillah courts within moderate limits, and at a manageable amount, by diminishing a possible, though not at present an operative source of incumbrance and accumulation Whilst, whatever room there might be to question the incorruptibility of a dispensation of justice so constituted, and to apprehend that the exercise of this authority might be too frequently perverted to unjustifiable purposes, the Court were persuaded that an efficient supervision on the part of the zillah judge would check the proneness of the native character to be seduced into failings by motives of self-interest; and that the ready access presented by an appeal in all cases to the tribunal of that officer, would ensure regularity of proceeding, and obviate the evil consequences of unjust or erroneous decisions in these inferior courts of judicature, and at the same time afford the judges the constant means of detecting and punishing any misapplication of the delegated trust.

But although the Court, after the fullest consideration of the subject, were strongly impressed with the belief, that the measure would have a direct and powerful tendency to promote the general and speedy administration of civil justice, they were yet desirous of learning how far the experience of the zillah judges, under whose immediate superintendance and control the duties of the native Commissioners have been discharged, justified the expectations which they were led to form: And accordingly, under date the 24th penultimo, the Court called upon those officers to report whether, and to what extent, they might consider it expedient to extend the jurisdiction of the native commissioners appointed under Regulation XVI. of 1802, and VII. of 1809, in respect of the amount of the causes cognizable by them, and how far, with reference to the circumstances and means of their respective zillahs, it might be desirable and practicable to add to the number of persons at present holding the prescribed commissions.

The returns to the interrogations circulated by order of the Court are not yet complete: but the Court have it in their power to add, that the sentiments expressed in the replies which have been received, with two or three exceptions only, which refer to objections either strictly local or arising out of a partial exami-examination of the question, entirely accord with the view which they had taken of the subject. The Court therefore expect, at an early period, to be prepared to submit to the consideration of the Legislature, the draft of a Regulation for giving effect to the proposed extension of this part of the system; and the immediate adoption of the measure will be aided by the maturity to which, in most of the zillahs, this part of the existing provisions for the settlement of petty claims has already attained.

The Court proceed to the Chief Secretary's letter of the 22d penultimo, referring extract from Colonel Munro's letter, dated 15th August 1807. They observed that the opinions there enunciated, regarding the effects of the judicial system, which had at its date been only recently introduced into the Ceded Districts, were entirely speculative, since no experience could have been had of its subordinate branch, not any native Commissioners having been at that time appointed in either of the zillahs into which those districts have been divided.

In order, however, that the Court might be enabled to submit to his Excellency the Governor in Council the required information, they ordered copies of its enclosure to be transmitted to the Judges of those zillahs; and directed them to report whether the inconveniences therein contemplated have, at any time since the institution of their courts, existed in any of the districts subject to their jurisdiction, and if at any time felt, whether and in what degree those inconveniences and defects have since been remedied and removed.

The court will at a future opportunity, have the honour to report the answers of the Judges of Bellary and Cuddapah, which have not yet reached them.

But although the Court have not, at present, the means of adding to the information which has already been forwarded to England, concerning the progress and effects of the new constitution, they respectfully beg leave to solicit the attention of the Honourable the Court of Directors to the report, which in obedience to the commands conveyed by their general letter of the 26th March 1811, the Court had the honour to submit in their proceedings of the 19th February last, in the hope that the Honourable Court will feel the force of one of the objections to the system, contained in the extract from their last general letter,* to be diminished; and that it will be a source of gratification to the Honourable Court to perceive, that the administration of justice in the courts under this presidency combines, with the impartiality and integrity which belong to the institution, that due degree of speed and dispatch, in respect of which it appears to have been considered deficient.

The other grounds upon which the system is held by the Honourable Court to be liable to objection, are its alleged incompatibility with the ryotwarry system of revenue management, and the large amount of the judicial charges.

With respect to the former of these objections, the Court feel that it would be foreign from the line of their duty to offer an opinion, further than this, that they are not aware of any power which is vested in the courts to question the policy of any plan which may be adopted by the Government of adjusting and collecting the land revenue, or to interfere in any stage of its execution. Their power and their business obviously extend no further, than to maintain all parties in the possession of their rights under the existing plan of settlement, whether those rights be derived from specific engagement or local usage.

And the Court feel scarcely more competent to offer an opinion on the remaining question, which concerns the expense of the judicial establishments. But without dwelling upon the diminution of the amount of that expense, by means derivable from sources purely judicial, the Court would beg leave to submit, that if an improved revenue were cheerfully paid and realized without the application in any instance of military force, and if the people were inspired with a sense of confidence and security in the ordinary conduct of personal transactions, and in the undisturbed exercise of private rights, the sovereign would acknowledge that the maintenance of uninterrupted tranquillity, and the cultivation and improvement of those sources of public wealth which are to be found in the prosperity and happiness of a contented people, were a grateful grateful return for the expenditure to which he had been subjected, in the discharge of that most sacred of the obligations of the state towards its subjects, which demand that just laws should be enacted and established for the general protection of the persons, rights, and property of individuals, and that judicial establishments should be provided adequate to secure the prompt and impartial administration of the established laws.

Proceedings of the Sudder Adawlut, 20 Aug. 1813.

The Court direct, that extract of these proceedings be sent to the Secretary to the Government in the Judicial department, for the purpose of being laid before his Excellency the Governor in Council, with their request that it may be forwarded for the information of the Honourable the Court of Directors.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE,
Dated 4th February 1814.

Revenue Letter, from Fort St. George, 4 Feb. 1814.

Par. 1. WITH our letter in this department, dated the 25th August last, we had the honour of transmitting to your Honourable Court a copy of a letter from the Board of Revenue, with a copy of a minute of that Board, regarding your Honourable Court's letter of the 16th December 1812, and copy of an appendix therein referred to. We subsequently received from the Board of Revenue a letter dated the 30th August, explaining the progress which, in several districts, had been made in the decennial village lease settlement, previously to the receipt of your orders for putting a stop to it; and we conceive that it will be satisfactory to your Honourable Court to be furnished with a copy of the instructions which we addressed to the Board of Revenue, in answer to those communications, as also with a copy of the last of them, which has not yet been brought to your Honourable Court's notice. They are accordingly transmitted as numbers in the present packet.

2. We also transmit a copy of a letter from the Board of Revenue, dated the 16th September, recommending, in consequence of the information they had obtained regarding the degree in which the faith of the Government was pledged to that measure, that the decennial village lease settlement should be prosecuted to a conclusion in the district of Coimbatore, and we have the honour to acquaint your Honourable Court, that we deemed it incumbent upon us to grant the authority which was therein solicited.

LETTER from the BOARD of REVENUE,
Dated the 30th August, 1813.

To the Chief Secretary to Government.

SIR:

Letter from the Board of Revenue, 30 Aug. 1813.

1. In the minute of the Board of Revenue which was submitted to his Excellency the Governor in Council, under date the 16th instant, it was stated, that the districts in which the Government was still at liberty to introduce the ryotwar system were Trichinopoly, Madura and Dindigul, Tinnevelly, Coimbatore, Palnaud, and Balaghaut. It was recommended, at the same time, that the ryotwar system should not be established where it had not formerly existed; and with respect to Palnaud, which was one of the districts in which the system had formerly prevailed, it was explained, that it would not be practicable to revert to it, before the expiration of the triennial lease recently concluded.

2. In the letter which accompanied the abovementioned minute, the Board stated, that they had issued instructions to the collectors of the districts in question, to suspend the conclusion of any engagements for the rent of the villages on lease. To these instructions were added an order, that in case any villages should have been rented before the receipt of the instructions, the number number of villages so rented might be immediately reported. A copy of the communication here adverted to is enclosed.

3. From the reply of the Collector of Tinnevelly, herewith submitted, his Excellency in Council will observe, that progress has been made in renting the wet lands of this district. The engagements, it is true, are not final; but as the Board, in their minute, had already recommended that the decennial village lease should be carried into effect, as applying to these lands, they can have no hesitation in submitting it as their opinion, that the measure should be prosecuted to a conclusion.

4. Along with the reply of the Collector of Dindigul and Madura, is submitted a previous correspondence with that gentleman.

5. Mr. Peter, it will be seen, had made arrangements for establishing the decennial lease in Dindigul, and the inhabitants in general had consented to the measure; and though no actual engagements have taken place, Mr. Peter "strongly recommends" that he may be permitted to proceed with the work.

6. In Madura no arrangements had been made towards establishing the decennial lease in that district, therefore the Government is free to revert to the ryotwar system, if it should be deemed proper.

7. The Collectors of Trichinopoly and Balaghaut briefly state, that no progress has been made in renting those districts.

8. The reply of the Collector in Coimbatore to the circular letter of the 2d August has not been received; but the Board do not anticipate any difficulty in reverting to the ryotwar system in that district.

9. The circular letter was not sent to the Collector of Palnaud, the lease existing there rendering it inapplicable.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Fort St. George, 30th August 1813.

Your most obedient servant,

Deputy Secretary.

LETTER to the BOARD of REVENUE,
Dated the 16*th September* 1813.

To the President and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Letter to Board of Revenue, 16 Sept. 1813.

GENTLEMEN:

Par. 1. His Excellency the Governor in Council has had under his particular consideration your letters dated the 16th and 30th ultimo, with their respective accompaniments, and the dispatch from the Honourable the Court of Directors, dated the 16th of December last, out of which they have arisen.

2. There are many points embraced in the Honourable Court's dispatch, and some in your observations on its contents, of which the Governor in Council conceives it, on the present occasion, to be unnecessary for him to take notice. Of this nature are the questions, Whether urgent reason really does or does not exist, for concluding some permanent settlement of the land revenues? Whether Government is now possessed of sufficient information with respect to the resources of the country, and the relative rights of the landholders, the cultivators, and the Sirkars, to enable it to conclude such a settlement? What description of settlement it is most advisable to render permanent? In what respects the settlement of the land revenues needs to be regulated by the existing system of judicature? Whether that system of judicature is worthy of being maintained; and how far the Government and the Board of Revenue were, under the circumstances of the case and the previous orders of the Court of Directors, justified in adopting the measures on which the Honourable Court have been pleased to animadvert? In their proper place all these points will be brought forward; and with respect to some of them, the Governor in Council may hereafter have occasion to call upon you for further information than he is is at present possessed of, but they seem to be irrelevant to the instructions with which it is requisite that you should now be furnished.

Letter to Board of Revenue, 16 Sept. 1813.

3. There are other points, such as the issue of pottahs, the situation of curnums, and the necessity of punctuality and dispatch in obeying orders, and in carrying on public correspondence, regarding which the instructions of the Honourable Court are sufficiently explicit, and will, the Governor in Council is confident, meet from you the attention to which they are entitled.

4. In the present dispatch, therefore, the Governor in Council proposes to take up so much only of the general subject, and to furnish you only with such instructions, as may enable you to form arrangements for the immediate realization of the public revenues. To provide for this limited object (whatever may be the result of his deliberations upon the other important points discussed in the Honourable Court's dispatch) is the whole length which his Excellency in Council conceives himself warranted in going, till the sanction of the Honourable Court to any ulterior and more comprehensive proceedings shall have been previously obtained.

5. In preparing himself to determine upon the measures proper to be adopted for the immediate realization of the public revenues, the Governor in Council has endeavoured to apprehend the leading principles of the Honourable Court's orders, and to make these his guides. His Excellency in Council is accordingly satisfied, that in order to meet the expectations of the Honourable Court, it is necessary that the temporary system under which the land revenues are to be administered should embrace the following objects. 1st. It must have no tendency to affect injudiciously "the interests, feelings, and rights of the small "landed proprietors;"* it must not degrade landed proprietors into under-tenants,† and it must be calculated to confirm the independent feelings of proprietary right.‡ 2dly. It must, as far as practicable, exclude from the settlement any considerable portions of waste land, which may not add at present to the value of the adjacent land under cultivation.§ 3dly. It must preserve to the Government the means of judging of the resources of the country.‖ 4thly. It must leave matters, as much as possible, open to such a final decision regarding them, as the Court of Directors may see fit to adopt.¶

6. The name by which a system, attaining the ends above-stated, may most accurately be defined, is altogether immaterial to the substantive merits it possesses. It is sufficient that these are the merits which will recommend any system to the approbation of the Court of Directors.

7. Regarding the districts into which the decennial village lease settlement had been introduced, before the Honourable Court's orders for acting upon the ryotwar system were received, the qualification with which these orders are given, no less than the fact of the faith of Government being pledged in favour of the village settlement, has prevented that settlement from being cancelled. The Governor in Council moreover yields to the representation submitted in your minute dated the 5th ultimo, that it would be impolitic to introduce the ryotwar system into such detached villages in those districts as decennial leases may happen not yet to have been concluded in, and that it is desirable to extend an uniform system of revenue management throughout each district.

8. All therefore that requires to be done, with respect to the district in question, is to adhere scrupulously to the same principles, and adopt the same precautions which were kept in view when it was hoped the proceedings connected with the decennial lease would have been approved by the Court of Directors, and have formed the ground-work of a settlement in perpetuity.

9. Your attention will accordingly be directed to the persons with whom the settlements are concluded; for unless they are those who, by hereditary right or established usage, or upon some other just grounds, ought to be placed in the relation in which they will stand to the Government on one hand and to the Ryots on the other, the settlement will not receive the confirmation of the Governor in Council.

10. In

* Paragraph 9 of the Honourable Court's Letter. † Par. 37 ditto. ‡ Par. 26 ditto.
§ Par. 30 ditto. ‖ Par. 5 ditto. ¶ Par. 40 ditto.

Letter to Board of Revenue, 16 Sept. 1813.

10. In the second place, you will attend to the amount of the assessment, which must neither be so low as to prove inadequate to the necessities of the Government, nor so high as to interfere essentially with the prosperity of the country.

11. You will next take care that the rights of the under-tenants are left unimpaired. The renters must not be authorized to exact from them more than is warranted by the usage of the particular villages.

12. Lastly, the propriety of excluding from the leases any considerable portions of waste land, which may not add at present to the value of the adjacent land under cultivation, must be duly considered.

13. The Governor in Council is inclined to hope, that an adherence to the principles above-stated will bring the decennial village lease settlement very near in substance to the system which is in the contemplation of the Court of Directors. In this hope, which rests mainly on the general spirit of the Honourable Court's present orders, the Governor in Council is confirmed, by adverting to the particular terms in which the Honourable Court express themselves, when they direct that village rents, upon any other principle than that of the system which they denominate ryotwar, shall be declared terminable, (leaving it plainly to be inferred, as the understanding of the Honourable Court, that village rents admit of being formed upon the same principle as that of the ryotwar system); and again, when they intimate their approbation of the principle of a certain modification of the village lease, embraced in the principles above prescribed for your guidance, with respect to the manner of completing the formation of that lease.

14. For the same reasons which have induced the Governor in Council to authorize you to extend the village settlement throughout the districts into which that settlement has already been generally introduced, and also for the additional reason, that teerwas have never been established in the villages of different Zemindarries which have reverted to Government, his Excellency in Council grants you similar authority with regard to those villages.

15. The authority is, of course, to be exercised under the rules above prescribed.

16. It only remains to furnish you with instructions regarding the settlement to be introduced into those districts in which the authority of Government is not yet positively committed in favour of any particular settlement. Those districts are Trichinopoly, Madura and Dindigul, Tinnevelly, Coimbatore, Palnaud, and Balaghaut.

17. In the wet lands of Tinnevelly, it appears to be impracticable to act upon the ryotwar system, as teerwas were never fixed on them. Moreover, the notorious existence of valuable property in the merassy rights of those lands, renders it just that the settlement should, as you propose, be concluded with the Meerassadars, and that they should not be passed over, for the purpose of concluding a settlement with their servants, the Ryots. The intention of the Court of Directors is not to destroy, but to confirm proprietary right; and that intention would be as completely perverted and violated, if landholders were shoved out by their inferiors, who never possessed such a right, as if they were trodden down by other landholders, who possessed it to a greater extent than themselves. In either case, they would be ousted from what is their own. The intention of the Honourable Court is to revert to a system calculated to preserve private rights, which they conceive to have been injudiciously abandoned; not by any means to establish a new system, calculated to overthrow the private rights which have hitherto existed.

18. The Governor in Council feels no hesitation, therefore, in authorizing you to conclude a village settlement, as you propose, with all the Meerassadars for the wet lands in Tinnevelly. It will be indispensible that it be concluded on the principles above-prescribed, and very desirable that it should not bind the Government for any definite period; or if that is impracticable, that the period should be as short as possible, so as that the Court of Directors may not be embarrassed in their final decision.

Letter to Board of Revenue, 16 Sept. 1813.

19. The foregoing reasoning applies also to the wet lands of Trichinopoly, with the exception that teerwas have been fixed upon those lands; and the teerwas are so high, that the force of this exception is greatly diminished. The Governor in Council, therefore, authorizes you to conclude a village lease settlement with all the Meerassadars for the wet lands in the Trichinopoly district, upon the same principles and with the same limitation regarding its period as are prescribed for the village lease settlement for the wet lands in Tinnevelly.

20. In the dry grain villages, both in Tinnevelly and Trichinopoly, you will revert to the ryotwar settlement.

21. The Governor in Council is thoroughly persuaded of the necessity of reducing the teerwas, wherever it is resolved to revert to the ryotwar system. To keep up the teerwas would not keep up the revenue, but would depress the people, impoverish the country, and destroy the means of improving its condition. Fortunately, the spirit of the orders of the Court of Directors breathes nothing of a narrow-minded policy: no mistaken views of present advantage appear to have blinded them to the rich prospects of future prosperity. They profess no backwardness to make a willing sacrifice of that which cannot long be retained, though it may be laid out to infinite advantage. Their primary object is, that no public arrangement should interfere with the relative rights of individuals; and while they fix a provident eye upon the means of a future augmentation of the resources of the state, they entertain the persuasion that those means must consist in the increasing wealth and spirit and happiness, which a just and liberal system of revenue administration is to dispense over the land. Even, therefore, if it were not a case of unavoidable necessity, the Governor in Council would consider himself warranted, under the spirit of the Honourable Court's orders, and under his own conviction of the soundness of their view of what is equally the duty and interest of the ruling authority, to sanction a reduction of such of the rates of assessment as experience has shewn to be too high. The necessity of the measure, however, leaves unfortunately no room for deliberating as to the expediency of adopting it.

22. It will be for you to judge regarding the extent to which the teerwas in the different districts ought to be reduced, and to submit your recommendations on the subject to be decided upon by the Governor in Council. You will, of course, avoid a greater reduction than may be deemed adequate to the object in view, and the Governor in Council participates in your hope, that the direct loss of revenue arising from this measure may be speedily, and in the end amply compensated by an increase of cultivation.

23. You will give directions for immediately introducing the ryotwar system of revenue into Madura, Coimbatore, and Balaghaut, and into Palnaud after the expiration of the lease now in force in that district. The Governor in Council would wish that the same system should be introduced into Dindigul, and is prevented from giving orders to that effect only by the representation submitted in the Collector's letter of the 23d ultimo. You will, therefore, be pleased to exercise your discretion, whether the ryotwar system should be introduced, or the measures already in progress for introducing a village lease settlement should be prosecuted to a conclusion.

24. There is manifestly the same reason for upholding merassy rights where the ryotwar system prevails, as for protecting the Ryots from oppression when the settlement is concluded with the Meerassadars. Wherever the Meerassadar and the Ryot are one and the same person, this object is sufficiently provided for; but the Governor in Council is desirous of being distinctly informed, in what manner the existence of a merassy right is practically recognized, and by what arrangement any consideration is paid on account of it, when a settlement is concluded with a Ryot who is not a Meerassadar, for any land in which the merassy right exists.

25. The Governor in Council will, at an early period, take into consideration the village lease settlement which has been concluded for the southern division of Arcot; but, on the grounds suggested by you, will in any event withhold his final confirmation of it for the present, and express merely his general concurrence or dissent, with regard to the mode in which it may appear to have been concluded.

LETTER from the BOARD of REVENUE,
Dated 16*th September*, 1813.

To the Chief Secretary to Government.

SIR:

Letter from Board of Revenue, 16 Sept. 1813.

Par. 1. In the letter addressed to you, under date the 30th ultimo, it was stated, that the reply of the Collector of Coimbatore to the circular communication of the 2d August had not been received, but that the Board of Revenue did not anticipate any difficulty in reverting to the ryotwar system in that district: accordingly, on receipt of Mr. Hill's letter of the 3d instant, the instructions considered to be necessary were issued to Mr. Garrow, in common with the Collectors of the other districts into which it had been decided by the Honourable the Governor in Council that the measure of recurring to the ryotwar system should be carried into effect.

2. In stating that they did not anticipate any difficulty in reverting to the ryotwar system in Coimbatore, the Board referred to the circumstance of its being almost entirely a dry grain district, of its having been regularly surveyed and assessed, and of the revenue having been collected ryotwarry till fusily 1218, when the triennial lease was introduced. Of the progress which might have been made in forming the decennial lease settlement the Board were not aware, not having received Mr. Garrow's reply to the circular communication of the 2d August. They thought it probable, however, that no great progress might have been made.

3. From the reply of the Collector since received, and which I am directed to submit herewith for the consideration of the Honourable the Governor in Council, his Excellency in Council will perceive, that a very considerable portion of the district has been settled on lease, in pursuance of the sentiments and instructions of the Board, contained in their proceedings under date the 11th March, of which an extract was submitted to Government under date the 29th April last.

4. Under these circumstances, the Board beg leave to submit, as their opinion, that any attempt to annul the engagements which have been actually concluded, or to stay the farther prosecution of the settlement, already so far advanced, to a conclusion, would be impolitic. The Board are moreover willing to hope, that this is one of those cases in which the Government would be considered by the Honourable Court of Directors to be fully justified in not proceeding to carry into effect the plan of settlement prescribed by the late orders of the Honourable Court.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,

THE proceedings of the Board of Revenue upon the village lease settlement concluded in the southern division of Arcot, together with all the papers relating thereto, will be found in the records of that Board, forwarded to your Honourable Court by the ships now under dispatch; and to these we beg beg leave to refer, in transmitting, as a number in the present packet, a copy of our observations upon the settlement in question. These observations, your Honourable Court will perceive, are only preliminary, and are designed to have the effect of adapting both the settlement immediately under review, and the others which are in progress, to the principles prescribed in the recent dispatches of your Honourable Court, relating to the system according to which the land revenue should be collected. We trust that your Honourable Court will consider us to have rightly apprehended and applied those principles, and that the only deviations from them which we feel disposed to sanction are such as the facts represented to us, and the reasoning which we have employed, will seem to your Honourable Court, to render just and expedient where they are not indispensably necessary.

4. We shall be better prepared to afford satisfactory explanations to your Honourable Court upon the different topics discussed in your letter of the 16th of December 1812, after having had before us some of the village lease settlements concluded under the instructions which had been issued before the receipt of that letter; and we therefore hope, that the delay which has taken place may appear not without use. We shall have the honour of stating our sentiments fully, at the earliest period at which we may feel ourselves qualified to do justice to the important subjec t under consideration.

5. In the mean time, we are sanguine in our hope, that the course of proceeding which we have pursued may appear such as, under all the circumstances claiming attention, your Honourable Court will find cause to approve.

6. For particular information regarding the occurrences in this department, we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to the accompanying report of the Revenue Board. The observations which we have to offer regarding some of those occurrences will hereafter be submitted to your Honourable Court.

EXTRACT FORT ST. GEORGE REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,

The 4th February 1814.

READ the following letter from the Board of Revenue.

To the Honourable Sir G. H. Barlow, K. B., Governor in Council.

Honourable Sir:

Letter from Board of Revenue, 29 April 1813.

1. We have the honour to submit, for the consideration of the Honourable the Governor in Council, the enclosed extract from our proceedings, under date the 29th ultimo, relative to the final settlement of the land revenue of the southern division of Arcot, accompanied with the letters on the subject from the late Collector, referred to in these proceedings.

2. The Honourable the Governor in Council will observe, that the progress made in the final settlement of this district, up to the 31st December last, embraces a portion of nearly three-fourths of the amount of the land revenue; and it is expected that, with the exception perhaps of some few particular villages, the settlement will be prosecuted to a conclusion before the current fusily shall have expired.

3. Upon these proceedings, as well as upon those relative to the several other settlements which we shall have the honour hereafter to bring under the consideration of the Honourable the Governor in Council, it would be satisfactory to us to receive the sentiments of the Governor in Council, together with such orders as they may be deemed to require; but we submit, that it might be expedient in each case, even though the settlement might be generally approved, that his formal confirmation of it should not be immediately declared. The caution which we recommend, in this respect, would be the means of securing to us the benefit of additional experience; while the engagements interchanged between the Collectors and landholders must be sufficient, we think, to secure all parties concerned from any present inconvenience.

4. We

Letter from Board of Revenue, 29 April 1813.

4. We beg leave to add, that our proceedings relative to the final settlement of the northern division of Arcot, and the Cuddapah division of the Ceded Districts, will be submitted in the course of a few days. The reports on the settlement of these two districts, together with the report now submitted on that of the southern division of Arcot, constitute all that we have as yet received.

5. We take this occasion to submit, for the information and orders of the Honourable the Governor in Council, the enclosed extracts from our proceedings, under date the 8th and 11th ultimo, upon certain reports from the Collectors in Tinnevelly and Coimbatore, preliminary to the final settlement of the land revenue of those districts respectively.

Extract from the Proceedings of the Board of Revenue, under date the 29th March 1813.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 March 1813.

Read again the report, with enclosures, from the late Collector in the southern division of Arcot, dated the 4th, received the 23d, and entered on Consultation the 26th October 1812; also the letter, with enclosures, from Mr. Ravenshaw, dated the 9th, and entered on Consultation the 11th ultimo.

The report above-mentioned contains the account of the proceedings of the late Collector, in carrying into effect the orders of the Honourable the Governor in Council for the final settlement of the land revenue, and communicates the result of those proceedings on the progress made in the settlement in the southern division of Arcot up to the 31st July last.

The letter dated the 9th ultimo gives cover to a statement, shewing the further progress made in the settlement up to the 31st December last, at which period Mr. Ravenshaw quitted the district, after having delivered over charge to the head assistant.

Previously to Fusily 1218, the district denominated the southern division of Arcot comprehended certain talooks south of the river Palar, which in that year were transferred to the northern division, while to the southern division were at the same time added the districts of Cuddalore and Pondicherry, which had previously constituted a separate charge.

The southern division of Arcot is composed, therefore, at present, of a part of Arcot proper, formed, according to the existing subdivision, into ten talooks; of the district or talook of Munnargoody, which was separated from Trichinopoly and annexed to this division in Fusily 1214, and of the districts of Cuddalore and Pondicherry.

The district of Cuddalore was formed into mootahs, or estates, in fusily 1217, and these estates have been held in permanency, with the exception of the Cusbah estate, comprising fourteen villages, each of which has now been separately assessed and disposed of.

The following statement shews in abstract the collections from the ten talooks of Arcot proper, from the talook of Munnargoody, from the fourteen unsettled villages in Cuddalore, and from the district of Pondicherry, respectively, on the average of the seven years preceding the triennial lease, or from fusily 1211 to fusily 1217 inclusive; also the collections on the average of the triennial lease, or from fusily 1218 to fusily 1220 inclusive; the collections on the average of these two periods together, or of the ten years from fusily 1211 to fusily 1220 inclusive; and lastly, the actual collections in fusily 1220, the last year of the triennial lease.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 March 1813.

The sums inserted in the foregoing statement are inclusive of the revenue from devastanum and cavelly lands, but exclusive of the revenue derived from taxes personal and professional, house and shop taxes, &c. known by the general term of sournadyem in the southern division of Arcot, and until the present time collected along with the land rent. The Board observe, however, that none of the statements in the report under consideration, either distinguish the amount included under the head of devastanum and cavelly lands, or shew the amount excluded under the head of sournadyem. The statements are also defective in not shewing the amount of the settlement of each year, as well as the amount of the collections.

Ordered, therefore, that the present Collector be required to furnish, at his earliest convenience, a statement shewing, 1st. The amount of the settlement of the land revenue of each year, from fusily 1211 to 1220 inclusive, comprehending, besides the land rent proper, the revenue from devastanum and cavelly lands, and sournadyem. 2d The amount of the balances in each year on the aggregate settlement contained in column 1. 3d. The residue or amount of actual collections, after deducting the amount of column 2. 4th. The amount or proportion of the actual collections derived from land rent proper. 5th. The amount or proportion derived from devastanum lands. 6th. The amount or proportion derived from cavelly lands. 7th. The amount or proportion derived from sournadyem; and, 8th. Total of the four last preceding columns corresponding with column 3.

The various taxes under the head of sournadyem, which have been excluded, the late Collector observes, would form the subject of a future report. These taxes, he remarks, bear at present very unequally on the rich and poor, and many, particularly of the former, are altogether exempt from them. He adds, that they are a source of revenue highly unfavourable.

What temporary arrangement the late Collector may have made for the collection of the sournadyem, now separated from the land rent, is not stated in the report. Resolved, to require information upon this point, and to express the desire of the Board, that the particular report on this subject, adverted to by the late Collector, may be prepared and submitted with the least possible delay.

In their general instructions to the Collector, for carrying into execution the final settlement now in progress, the Board necessarily abstained from prescribing the precise basis for the settlement of each district. The various papers which were recorded sufficiently explained the intentions and views of the Government and the Board. With respect to the amount of the settlement, it was stated to be the intention that it should be determined upon a calculation

calculation of the average collections of former years, with reference to the capabilities and resources of the respective villages. As it was evident that no average which might be determined could, in its detailed application, be suitable to the circumstances of every village, so it was considered that no average could be determined from any particular year, or particular number of years, which should be suitable to the circumstances of every district These were points for subsequent discussion with the Collectors severally.

The average which has been adopted as the general basis for the settlement in the southern division of Arcot is the average of the collection of ten years, from fusly 1211 to fusly 1220 inclusive. From the statement which has been inserted above, it will be seen that the amount of this average for the whole district, exclusive of Cuddalore and Pondicherry, is Star Pagodas 5,53,309 32 48¼, including the revenue from devastanum and cavelly lands, but not including sournadyem, as already stated.

Mr. Ravenshaw has compared the amount of this average with the amount of the settlement for fusly 1220, the last year of the triennial lease, than which it is less in the amount of Star Pagodas 33,025 28 54½, but compared with the actual collections of fusly 1220, the difference or decrease is Star Pagodas 17,204 9 43¾ only. Compared with the average of the collections of all the three years of the lease, the difference or decrease is Star Pagodas 18,290 41 9¼.

On the other hand, the amount of the ten years' average exceeds the amount of the average of the seven years preceding the lease (as inserted in the statement above) in the sum of Star Pagodas 8,649 10 33½ it exceeds also the amount of the average collections of the last seven of the ten years, or from fusly 1214 to 1220 inclusive, in the sum of Star Pagodas 25,422 16 13¾.

The average of the period of seven years, from fusly 1214 to 1220, is rendered so low, by its including two very unfavourable years, fuslies 1214 and 1216, particularly the latter, in which the collections amounted to no more than Star Pagodas 3,81,485 38 25, or to speak generally, a lack and a half of pagodas less than the amount ordinarily collected both before and since, in other words, less than the amount of the general average of ten years to the extent above stated.

The amount of the average of the three years preceding fusly 1214 is Star Pagodas 5,82,553 1 63¼. The average of this period is rendered so high by its including fusly 1212, in which the collections amounted to Star Pagodas 6,87,053 3 14, or a lack and a half of pagodas more than the ordinary or general average amount of the collections.

It is sufficiently known at present, though it may nevertheless be proper to record on the proceedings, that the low revenue of fusly 1216 was derived in a season of dearth, approximating, if not absolutely amounting, to a famine; and that the high revenue of fusly 1212 was derived from over assessment, under a local management, which whatever circumstances may be allowed to justify or extenuate, it is represented to have proved, in its consequences, extremely injurious to the prosperity of the district.

It appears that these two years balance each other, and that if both were omitted, the average of the eight years from fusly 1211 to fusly 1220, would be nearly the same. The Board are therefore of opinion, that the average of the ten years forms as correct and satisfactory a criterion of the resources of the district, as is required to serve the purpose of a general basis for the settlement.

The average collections for the seven years preceding the triennial lease, the Board remark, is less than the average collections during the triennial lease, in the sum of Star Pagodas 26,946 6 42. The difference between the amount of the average collections during the triennial lease, and the actual collections in the last year of the lease, or fusly 1220, is not material. The seven years average is less than the settlement of fusly 1220, in the sum of Star Pagodas 41,634 28 8.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 March 1813.

The Board observe, that with the exception of the two years before-mentioned, fusilies 1212 and 1216, and perhaps fusily 1214, the annual revenue does not discover any very great variation, either above or below the average of the ten years which has been adopted as the basis of the settlement.

The averages shewn in the abstract statement inserted in a former part of these proceedings, and which have been thus briefly discussed, are taken from the general statement (marked A), enclosed in the late Collector's report, and to these averages the report itself has frequent reference. It would appear, however, that two of the averages are not in consonance with the statement numbered 4, which professes to shew the actual collections in each year, from fusily 1211 to fusily 1220 inclusive.

In the last mentioned statement, it is true, no averages are drawn, excepting the average of the first three years terminating with fusily 1213, and the average of the last seven years terminating with fusily 1220; but on adding together the collections, as inserted in that statement, and drawing the particular averages desired, it appears that instead of Star Pagodas 5,24,660 22 14¾, as inserted in the general statement A, and adopted in the report, the average collections of the seven years preceding the lease amounts to Star Pagodas 5,21,031 15 24 only, and in like manner, that the average of the ten years, from fusily 1211 to 1220, amounts, instead of Star Pagodas 5,33,309 32 48¼, to Star Pagodas 5,30,287 3 3½ only.

As concerning the purpose for which the averages are taken, and the manner in which they are applied, a difference of a few thousand pagodas is of little or no importance; but it is of importance that the Board should be enabled to depend on the accuracy of the accounts presented to them: Ordered, therefore, that the Collector be required to examine the accounts, and to report whence arises the apparent discordance which has been stated.

In consequence of the changes which have taken place in the extent or boundary of this district since its acquisition, and in consequence, also, of the variation with respect to the items included and excluded in the amounts submitted at different periods, it would not be easy, if indeed it would be practicable, to examine the accounts contained in the present report, in comparison with the annual accounts on the records of the Board. But as it is necessary that the Board should be fully satisfied of the correctness of accounts which are furnished as the basis of a final settlement, it is resolved, that the Collector be directed to prepare and submit a statement of adjustment, shewing the amount of the settlement of each year, from fusily 1211 to fusily 1220, precisely as contained in the jummabundy statements submitted for each year to the Board, together with the collections of those settlements, as shewn in the statements of demand, collection, and balance, and explaining the difference between the several amounts which those accounts exhibit in comparison with the accounts contained in the present report, by a detail of columns, in which are to be noted the items composing the amount of the difference or variation.

The object of this statement of adjustment is, that the results of the several accounts of former years may be shewn to correspond with the results contained in the accounts now furnished, or that the errors, if there be any, should be explained and rectified. The Board expect that the statement will be prepared with due diligence and care.

The Board conclude, that the sums inserted as the collections in statement No. 4 are not the sums collected of arrear and current within each fusily, or from the 11th July to the 11th July, but that they are, as they ought to be, the collections properly belonging to, and made on account of each settlement, at whatever period realized.

It has been stated, that whatever average may be determined on for the general basis of the settlement of any district, it cannot be applied implicitly to each village. The rules by which Mr. Ravenshaw has been guided in deviating from the average adopted as the general basis of the settlement of the southern division of Arcot are contained in an enclosure marked B. They appear to the Board to be judicious.

Where the amount of the average collections of ten years, and the amount of the collections of fusily 1220, the last year of the triennial lease, nearly correspond, correspond, the general basis is adhered to; but where the amount of the average collections from a village exceeds the collections in fusily 1220, a portion of the difference or deficiency is given up, in abatement of the average. On the other hand, where the amount of the collections in fusily 1220 or fusily 1221 exceeds the amount of the ten years average collections, a portion of the difference or excess is added to the amount of the average.

Villages having little or no waste land, and therefore susceptible of little further improvement than that which may arise from improved husbandry, receive a remission, varying in amount, according to circumstances, from one-sixteenth to one-eighth of the amount collections of the last year.

Certain villages which were held in aumany during the period of the triennial lease, yielded in general a reduced revenue; in consequence, it is admitted in some instances, of the emigration of Ryots and other misfortunes, but generally, it is alleged, in consequence of the neglect and misconduct of the Pottah Monigars, arising from a desire to diminish the revenue of their villages, in the hope of obtaining them eventually at a lower permanent rent.

As the loss incurred in the villages, during the period of the triennial lease, tended of course to reduce the ten years average collections, while the villages themselves, it is stated, possessed every capability with respect to inhabitants, stock, and lands, it would have been improper to have followed the general basis in the assessment of these villages. Instead thereof, the average of the seven years preceding the lease was taken, unless when the ten years average happened to be higher, and the assessment determined at a small amount, more or less, than the datum assumed. When the permanent rent according to either of these data, (that is, the seven years average or ten years average, which ever might be the highest) should still appear too low, it was determined to abstain, for the present, from granting such villages on permanent rent.

The average of the seven years preceding the lease was also taken, in the cases in which that average exceeded the average of ten years, in consequence of the occurrence of balances on the rent under the triennial lease.

Where villages might be much impoverished, from temporary causes or particular circumstances, it was determined to regulate the assessment for the first year according to their present actual resources, the amount to increase annually during two, or three, or four or five years, as might be judged proper, (the russud in no case extending beyond five years), until it should reach the amount determined upon as a just assessment in perpetuity, with reference to former payments and permanent resources.

These are the chief rules which have been observed in regulating the final settlement of the southern division of Arcot. In their application, the object had been to fix an adequate assessment upon the best and most improvable villages (whose evidently increasing resources left no doubt of the justice or policy of the measure), even beyond the amount of the general basis, thereby providing means to meet or cover the abatement below that amount, which might be found necessary in regard to others. The only cases for which these rules were considered by the late Collector as not sufficiently providing, were the cases of particular villages, in which a greater permanent remission than that which the rules are calculated to allow might be found necessary, not in consequence of deterioration from temporary causes, but from over-assessment.

The Board have, on different occasions, recorded their opinion, that the collections from a province or a village for a series of years must, in general, afford the surest grounds for a permanent assessment; that, in short, what a province or a village has yielded for a series of years under a settlement fluctuating with the seasons, or with the extent of land brought into cultivation, it will, à fortiori, be enabled to yield under a settlement in perpetuity.

Equality of assessment, whether under a temporary or permanent settlement, is scarcely attainable, since the condition of villages must be liable to vary according to the different degrees of industry, prudence, and means of the persons who possess them. It is nevertheless desirable, upon an occasion like the present, that the amount of the settlement should be proportioned, as nearly as practicable, to the relative actual value of the several villages; and such (which was the intention of the Board) is also the object of the rules by which the assessment has been regulated.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 March 1813.

Without meaning, therefore, in the least to object to the principle of apportioning the assessment, by raising it in some cases above, and reducing it in others below the average adopted as the general basis of the settlement, the Board intended only to remark, that great caution should be exercised in those cases, in which it may be considered necessary to reduce the assessment, in a more than ordinary degree, below the general basis, upon a ground so difficult to be ascertained as that of the lands " being over-assessed."

That there were several villages so circumstanced in each of the talooks, the late Collector states himself to have been well aware; but it is evident, from what ensued, that the late Collector's information upon this point must have been general, and not much to be depended upon, since it was, in the article of lowering the permanent rent of the villages supposed to require it, that the deception practised upon the late Collector, and the gross corruption of his servants, was principally exercised.

It appears that the permanent remission or abatement, which it had been proposed to grant to the villages most requiring it, was granted in the talooks of Tindivanum, Bhovangherry, Chitput, and Trinomally only, where the settlements were first commenced. The late Collector explains, that it had been his intention to have reserved such villages as were supposed to stand in need of particular abatement, until all the villages of every talook, which could be disposed of according to the established rules, should be so disposed of; but that it having been urged by the public servants, that the inhabitants were in attendance, and having himself no reason to suspect the justness of the selection which had been made, of villages standing in need of the abatement, corroborated as it was by the accounts of the Curnums, and by the local experience of the public servants, he was induced to conclude a final settlement for the villages in question.

The pottahs for these villages were subsequently cancelled, when the system of corruption which had been planned and was acting upon was discovered, and many of them, upon revision, were settled at full rent, according to the rules which had been established.

An abstract of the assessment of these, including the several other villages in dispute or settled, but not finally revised on the 31st July, is contained in the columns from 49 to 53 of statement A, and in the separate statement marked No. 2. They amount in number to three hundred and twelve belonging to Arcot proper, and twenty-nine belonging to Mannargoody.

Of the three hundred and twelve villages belonging to Arcot Proper, it appears that the chittum, or full assessment, according to the rules established for the settlement, amounted to Star Pagodas 53,279 7 64, but that, in consideration of the injury which they were supposed to have sustained from the high revenue realized during the triennial lease, as testified, it was thought, by the comparatively low revenue realized on the actual produce of fusily 1221, the Collector had been induced to grant to some of them time to recover, and to others a permanent remission. They were accordingly settled at a final assessment of Star Pagodas 49,160 14 6 from fusily 1227, rising thereto by annual gradations from Star Pagodas 43,375 15 10, the amount of the settlement of fusily 1222.

The amount of the ultimate settlement above stated, though less in the sum of Star Pagodas 4,118 38 58 than the amount of the chittum, or assessment, deduced from the rules established for the settlement, is less than the amount of the average collections of ten years in the sum of Star Pagodas 2,570 0 12½ only. The late Collector proceeds to remark, that if he had continued to consider the remission necessary, as he was at first led to suppose, he would, without hesitation have recommended it; but that as it was in the selection of these and other villages, since finally revised and settled at full rent, that the public servants proved themselves to be corrupt, he deemed it right to revise the accounts of the whole of them, and it appears that, between the 31st July and date of the report, a portion of them, to the number of eighty-four, had been revised and settled at full rent, either immediately or in two or three years. The Collector adds, that some permanent remission will be necessary, but that he has little doubt that the whole may be finally settled at a sum equal in the aggregate to the ten years' average collections.

The subjoined statement, as taken from the late Collector's report, shews the number and actual assessment of the villages settled up to the 31st July, the number and estimated assessment of the villages of which the settlement then remained to be revised, and the number and estimated assessment of the villages then in aumany or remaining to be settled.

The sum of Star Pagodas 2,71,431 2 17, the amount of the assessment of the 1,835 villages belonging to Arcot Proper, which were finally settled up to the 31st July, is stated in the Report to be less than the average actual collections during the triennial lease, in the sum of about 1,300 Pagodas, but more than the ten years average collections in the sum of Star Pagodas 10,686 29 38, occasioned by the operation of that rule of assessment, which prescribed that, in cases where the actual collections of fusily 1220 or fusily 1221 were found to exceed the ten years average, a portion of the excess should be added to that average.

In the margin* the seven, three, and ten years' average are inserted, as also the Collections in fusily 1220.

Of these 1,835 villages, five hundred and ninety-eight were settled at full rent, from fusily 1221 inclusive, the rest from fusily 1222 inclusive; the difference between the amount of the settlement in fusily 1252, Star Pagodas 2,71,394 17 18, and the final settlement in fusily 1225, Star Pagodas 2,71,431 2 17, being occasioned merely by the including of six small villages, yielding at present only a few pagodas, but which have been taken on a gradual assessment rising from Star Pagodas 66 17 10 in fusily 1222 to Star Pagodas 118 2 9 in fusily 1225.

The Board confess, that they have some doubts of the expediency of including in any final settlement, villages at present so poor or desolate as to yield on an average little more than ten pagodas each in the first instance, and less than twenty pagodas each in perpetuity. If they possess available waste to any extent, they will inevitably, upon so low an assessment, be cultivated at the expense of others. Agreed, therefore, to require from the present Collector an account of the extent of the lands, available and waste, belonging to these villages, together with his opinion as to the expediency, or otherwise, of confirming the settlement which has been concluded.

The sum of Star Pagodas 14,542 39 12½, the amount at which one hundred and twenty-seven villages of the Mannargoody talook, settled up to the 31st July, have been assessed, exceeds in a small degree either of the averages of the seven, three, or ten years, as well as the collections of fusily 1220. The sum at which the fourteen villages of the Cusbah estate of Cuddalore have been assessed, amounting to Star Pagodas 3,911 1 54, falls somewhat short of the several averages, but exceeds in a trifling degree the actual collections in fusily 1220. The nine villages comprised in the Pondicherry district have, for an obvious reason, been rented for ten years only, and the amount of the rent, Star Pagodas 6,036 32 2, exceeds in a small degree the seven and ten years averages, while it falls below, in a similar small degree, the three years average and the collections in fusily 1220. Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 March 1813.

The total number of villages assessed up to the 31st July (including the nine villages of Pondicherry rented on a lease of ten years) was 1,985, and the total amount of the assessment Star Pagodas 2,95,921 30 5½.

Of the three hundred and twelve villages belonging to Arcot proper, the settlement of which remained for revision on the 31st July, mention has already been made. It has been stated, that eighty-four had been subsequently settled, previously to the closing of the late Collector's report, and that it was expected the whole would be settled at a sum not less in the aggregate than the ten years average collections, or Star Pagodas 51,730 14 18, which is the amount at which the assessment of these villages is estimated in the statement inserted above.

With respect to the twenty-nine villages of the Mannargoody talook, of which the assessment remained for revision on the 31st July, it is explained in the report, that they had been actually settled from fusily 1222 for the sum of Star Pagodas 6,644 4 3; but that though it was expected the rent of some of them would be raised on revision, it was thought that the rent would not, nor should be raised in the aggregate, beyond the ten years average collections, Star Pagodas 6,870 14 54, which accordingly is the amount entered for them in the statement above referred to.

The villages in the settlement, of which no progress had been made at the date of the last Collector's report, amounted in number to six hundred and ninety, whereof five hundred and twenty-seven were villages belonging to south Arcot proper, and one hundred and sixty-three to the talook of Mannargoody.

On reference to the general statement A, it appears that the collections from these five hundred and twenty-seven villages belonging to Arcot proper amounted, on the average of the seven years preceding the triennial lease, to the sum of Star Pagodas 1,58,802 32 49; on the average of the triennial lease, to the sum of Star Pagodas 1,71,192 17 7; and on the average of the ten years to the sum of Star Pagodas 1,62,608 2 35. It further appears, that the actual collections in fusily 1220 amounted to the sum of Star Pagodas 1,70,592 39 16; and that the chettum, or rent, which has been proclaimed as the permanent assessment, is Star Pagodas 6,68,801 22 33.

But it is explained in the report, that these are the villages in which a reduction must be granted, for the purpose of meeting which the excess obtained from others beyond the amount of the ten years average may be considered to be applicable. It would appear that many of them are villages, which having been highly cultivated, were in proportion highly assessed, and which though in a flourishing were not in an improvable state.

The late Collector explains, that those villages which improved under the triennial lease, were in general villages which were impoverished at its commencement, and vice versâ, that those which declined were such as had previously been in an advanced state of improvement. These different results are such as might have been expected, and the Board have only to observe, that in his application of the rules of assessment to the villages so severally circumstanced, the late Collector has acted consistently with the intention of their orders.

At the time of declaring the permanent assessment of the villages under consideration at the several sums amounting in the aggregate to Star Pagodas 1,68,801 22 32,

1,68,801 22 32, the late Collector explains that he was well aware it was too high; but that not being satisfied as to what particular villages, or in what degree, the over-assessment applied, he published the full rent of the whole of them, concluding that those which could bear it would be engaged for, and resolving to grant reductions only on conviction of their necessity, derived from the farther and most satisfactory information to be obtained.

That the amount of the rent thus published was too high, the Board are entirely disposed to believe; not however on a primâ facie view of the amount in comparison with former averages (since the rent of those villages which have been settled exceeds those averages), but because it is stated that the villages remaining to be settled are the villages which having been best cultivated, and therefore the most highly assessed, are susceptible of the less improvement.

Another reason for considering the declared rent of the unsettled villages too high, is afforded by the circumstance of no offers having been made to take them at that rent, either by the old renters or by new competitors. The low amount of the revenue derived from the actual produce of these villages in fusily 1221, is advanced by the late Collector as an additional argument of their being over assessed; and certainly the argument is entitled to some weight. At the same time, the Board think it right to remark, that it is possible that a settled purpose on the part of the landholders, to sacrifice every present interest to the object of reducing their final assessment, may have increased this apparent deterioration.

That the villages in question are entitled to some abatement the Board are however satisfied. Those amongst them of the smallest value, the late Collector expected to be enabled to settle at an early period on a small remission. What the ultimate reduction would be upon the whole, the late Collector could not state with any precision; but he was inclined to believe, that they might be settled, in the aggregate, at something less than the average of seven years preceding the lease, or say at an even sum of Pagodas 1,50,000 at the very lowest.

Assuming the correctness of this estimate, and of the estimate already noticed with respect to the three hundred and twelve villages, the settlement of which remained to be revised, the total amount of the final settlement of the 2,674 villages comprised in south Arcot proper would be Star Pagodas 4,73,161 16 35, which the late Collector observes is Pagodas 20,350 less than he should consider to be a fair permanent settlement under more favourable circumstances; yet that it is more than the average collections of the seven years preceding the lease in the sum of Star Pagodas 8,191, and only Pagodas 1,926 less than the ten years average collections.

With respect to the villages, in number one hundred and sixty-three, which remained to be settled in the Mannargoody district, the late Collector explains that the balance of the lease settlement being very great in this talook, in consequence, in a considerable degree, of the bursting of the large tank which waters the greatest part of the lands, the ten years average collection, which would have included the three years of the lease, would not have answered in this talook generally as the basis of the settlement, since it would have reduced the rent of the villages which have large balances outstanding against them much below their value. The amount of the lease settlement has, therefore, been taken as the guide in this talook, from which such deductions are made in settling each village as its particular situation appears to render necessary.

The late Collector observed, that some of the villages might be settled at full rent immediately, but that most of them would require a reduction, and an allowance of time, from three to five years, to enable them to pay the reduced rent. Mr. Ravenshaw adds, that if the whole could be settled, as he thinks they might, at the ten years average (or Pagodas 37,607), he should consider it, under all circumstances, to be a rent favourable to Government.

The total permanent rent of the Mannargoody talook would, in this case, amount to Star Pagodas 59,020 36 29½, which added to the amount of the probable settlement of Arcot proper, as stated above, and to the amount of the settlement of the fourteen villages of Cuddalore and of the district of Pondicherry, cherry, makes a grand total of Star Pagodas 5,42,129 41 30½ from 3,016 villages, as shewn in the statement inserted in a former part of these proceedings.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 March 1813.

A considerable portion, however, of this result, it will have been observed, is founded on estimate; but an estimate considered by the late Collector to be low, as respects the villages remaining to be settled belonging to Arcot proper, and moderate as respects the remainder.

From the statement accompanying the subsequent letter from the late Collector, dated the 9th ultimo, and referred to at the commencement of these proceedings, it appears that considerable progress was made in the settlement between the date of the report and the 31st December. From this period, at which the proceedings and accounts of the late Collector close, further progress in the settlement has been necessarily suspended, and will continue to be suspended until the present Collector shall have joined his station. It will be the first and most important duty of Mr. Hyde, on his arrival, which may be expected in a few days, to resume the business of the settlement and prosecute it to a conclusion.

According to the statement last referred to, it appears that the total number of villages finally settled, up to the 31st December, including those of Mannargoody, Talook Cuddalore, and Pondicherry, amounts to Star Pagodas 2,527, and the total permanent Beriz to Star Pagodas 4,15,893 4 55.

This amount exceeds the amount of the average collections during the triennial lease in the small sum of Star Pagodas 1,776 22 27¼, and the amount of the average of ten years collections in the sum of Star Pagodas 18,094 13 43½.

Of the four hundred and eighty-nine villages yet remaining to be settled, the chellum beriz, or full rent, according to the general rules for the settlement, is entered in the statement at the sum of Star Pagodas 1,55,5,11 44 72½: but it is on these villages that the loss, that is the remission, will chiefly fall. In a paper of remarks accompanying the statement, the late Collector supposes, on a rough calculation, that a portion of the above-mentioned sum, to the amount of 1,00,000 pagodas, may require a remission of fifteen per cent, or 15,000 pagodas, and the remaining sum of Pagodas 55,511 a remission of twenty per cent, or Pagodas 11,100, making the total estimated remission Pagodas 26,100. This leaves a sum of Pagodas 1,29,4,11, as the probable amount of the settlement of the remaining four hundred and eighty nine villages, which added to the amount of the assessment upon the villages already settled, Pagodas 4,15,893, makes a total of Pagodas 5,45,304, which is somewhat more than the amount of the average of the ten years Collections.

The paper in which this calculation is contained was drawn up by Mr. Ravenshaw at the presidency, away from all the means of reference to accounts, and is therefore, of course, entitled to only general attention. As it may be proper that the present Collector should have an opportunity of observing the remarks which it contains, and as the document is probably not on the records of the cutcherry, it is ordered that a copy be prepared and transmitted to Mr. Hyde for his information.

In prosecuting the settlement to a conclusion, the present Collector will not, of course, confine his attention entirely to the villages which remain to be settled. He will revise the assessment of those which have been settled, in all cases in which he may have reason for so doing, and will especially attend to the investigation of allegations or information of corrupt practices, either as regards the amount of the assessment, or the parties with whom the settlement may have been concluded.

The Regulation which is in preparation respecting the settlement, will contain a clause, providing that engagements proved to have been collusive, or founded upon fraudulent grounds, shall be liable to be cancelled. This power will, however, be exercised cautiously and under proper limitations. The same degree of circumspection will not be necessary in the revisal of settlements before they shall have received the formal confirmation of the Honourable the Governor in Council, but it will nevertheless be prudent for the Collector to abstain from a too general or indiscriminate interference with arrangements once carried into effect. When the Collector may have good grounds for revising and altering the assessments determined by his predecessor, he will not scruple to report the necessity of doing so, otherwise considerable errors might escape correction; but it will be incumbent upon him to act, in this respect, with great fairness and deliberation.

So soon as the settlement shall have been completed, or as much sooner as may be convenient, the Collector will commence the preparation of a book or register, in which will be noted consecutively the name of each village in the different talooks, the names of the parties with whom the settlement has been concluded, the revenue derived from each, on the average of the three, seven, and ten years respectively, the amount of the permanent assessment, the extent of lands, arable and waste, &c. previously to commencing the preparation of this register, a form must be submitted for the approval of the Board.

The proceedings of the Board of Revenue, and the orders of the Honourable the Governor in Council on the plan for introducing the fixed settlement now in progress, contemplated a remission in seasons of extraordinary calamity only, considering that an assessment formed on an average of seven or ten years collections would not require remission in ordinary seasons, or under ordinary circumstances. In those proceedings it is, however, provided, that all villages watered by large tanks shall be rented under particular conditions, to depend on the supply of water, because " it was thought impossible, at present, to " conclude either an unconditional lease or a permanent settlement in such " villages, without either making a great reduction, which, if no damage oc- " curred would be a positive loss of revenue, and in the event of a great ex- " pense being necessary might not secure the object, as when the emergency " occurred the renters might be found to have spent the money."

It appears from the report of Mr. Ravenshaw, that he has settled all the villages in his district watered from tanks unconditionally; that he has interpreted the instructions respecting remission in a more enlarged sense, and has deemed it essential to the success of the settlement that remissions should be made when necessary.

" I have not deemed it necessary," says Mr. Ravenshaw, " to specify that " the rent of tank villages is to depend on the supply of water. I consi- " der," he says, " the general pledge given, that remission of rent shall be " granted in proportion to the badness of the season, so long as Government " shall consider it necessary to include that condition. On the liberal fulfil- " ment of the pledge I conceive to have been given to that effect, as well as " for granting the aid of Tuccavy and repairing of tanks, depends the success " or failure of the system now introducing; the prosperity or ruin, I may say, " of the country. That it will be most faithfully adhered to by your Board " and Government, I have no doubt; and if the subordinate authorities view " the importance of it in the light I do, they will, by making it the chief " object of their attention, ensure the most happy result."

Mr. Ross, the Collector of Cuddapah, in strict obedience to the general instructions, has settled conditionally in his district the villages watered by tanks; while in the southern division of Arcot, although remission is considered by the Collector to have been pledged in such cases, and in all others requiring remission, no express provision has been entered into with respect to it.

The amount of the settlement of the southern division of Arcot, compared with the revenue derived from it at former periods, may be considered moderate or otherwise, according as remissions may be intended to be granted. Mr. Ravenshaw declared, when called before the Board, that had he not considered Government pledged to grant remissions, he would not have made the settlement so high. Whether this declaration be construed to apply to tank villages only, or to the whole district, it is evident that cases may arise, where dry grain villages may stand as much in need of remission as tank villages, although not to the same extent, nor so often; and that the necessity of the remission must depend on the proportion that the permanent jumma, settled on an average of collections, bears to the resources which the renters can now command.

Under

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 March 1818.

Under the approval already expressed of the rules by which the Collector has formed his permanent rent, and adhering to their opinion, that an average of the past collections is the best datum from which to determine this rent, but taking into consideration that no part of the permanent settlement of South Arcot is conditional, the Board are induced to enter into this explanation, in order that the Governor in Council may be prepared to receive and to admit authenticated claims to remission in the first years of the settlement, rather than allow the future sources of prosperity, inherent in the plan of a permanent assessment, to be injured by a too rigid exaction of terms, which may possibly fall heavy on the landholders, under the great change which is to take place in the mode of creating the revenue and in the situation of the inferior Ryots.

In no case has any claim to remission been acknowledged in the pottahs or cowles which have been issued agreeably to the orders of Government: "the "persons with whom the permanent settlement may be formed have been "bound by their engagements to pay the amount of that settlement, in all "seasons, and under all circumstances." It is intended, that "it shall rest "exclusively with Government to determine on the equity and expediency of "granting any occasional remission or indulgence in the payment of the per-"manent revenue, in consequence of any extraordinary calamities of season, "or other circumstances;" but should experience demonstrate, that during the first years of the lease the rent bears hard on the renters and exceeds their means, owing either to the necessity of lowering the teerwa, from the effect of competition or other cause, or to the contraction of cultivation by the under-tenants in consequence of their emancipation, to a great fall in the price of grain or too much or too little rain, the Board are of opinion, that it would be politic to forbear too rigidly to exact the full rent, where just cause may exist for a remission. It is confidently expected, that the time is not far distant when remissions will cease to be necessary, except in cases of extraordinary calamity; but the arrival of that period may, in the opinion of the Board, be accelerated, by a discriminate but liberal indulgence of remission during the first years of the rent, in all cases of established necessity, as it must inevitably be retarded by an opposite principle of conduct. Should any loss occur to Government, owing to the difficulty of ascertaining the justness of the claims or the amount of the remissions to be granted, it would, in the opinion of the Board, be the less evil of the two that Government should remit too much, rather than they should collect too much.

As there is little doubt that the plan of the permanent rent will produce an immediate improvement in the condition of the under-tenants and inferior Ryots, by permitting them to occupy such extent only of land as they have the means of cultivating, and to bestow as much attention on that quantity as they think fit, the Board are confident that the improvement of the condition of the inferior Ryots, although in the first instance made at the expense of the renters, must ultimately redound to the benefit of the latter. But it would not accord with the benevolent object Government have in view, to allow the condition of one class of its subjects to be improved, while that of another class (namely, the renters) is depressed.

Where the renters are the only cultivators this reasoning will not apply; but it holds good in all villages where there are Meerassadars, Oolcoody and Pyacoody Ryots, or other classes of cultivators not included in the settlement.

Should the apprehensions prove ill-founded, that the assessment formed on an average of collections may, in some cases, during the first years of the settlement be too high, no remission will be required; but if these apprehensions should prove to be well founded, the liberal consideration of Government will, it is hoped, prevent the high assessment, where it may unintentionally occur, from operating injuriously.

It appears, that the triennial lease of the southern division of Arcot was formed on the basis of the seven years' collections; but for the reasons Mr. Ravenshaw gave, and from expectations of improvement from the immense wastes, it exceeded the average collections of seven years, in the sum of Star Pagodas 50,206 11 39, or nine and one-sixteenth per cent.: that various causes causes (which have been reported to Government) combined to make this rent bear hard on many of the renters, the badness of the seasons, the low price of grain, and the short period of the lease being the principal: that the remissions contemplated to be granted in cases of necessity were not granted, owing to the difficulty of discriminating who were able to pay, and who not. The effect is stated by Mr. Ravenshaw to be, that the personal property of the "renters "and Ryots sold during the late lease for payment of rent, amounted to Star "Pagodas 1,03,353 21 53; of which Star Pagodas 14,870 3 65 worth was "sold the first year of the lease, Star Pagodas 33,826 36 2 the second year, "and Star Pagodas 54,656 26 66 the third year. That although this "account," the Collector admits, "is not entitled to implicit confidence, "yet," he adds, "I am of opinion, it does not by any means shew the full "amount of property sold."

Of the amount of personal property thus described as having been sold for the payment of the rent during the triennial lease, the sum of Star Pagodas 12,759 44 55 only was sold by the Commissioners: the balance of Star Pagodas 90,593 21 78 is represented as having been sold by the owners. The Board are aware, to what abuses the preparation of such a document is liable; they refer to it, therefore, to point out the evils that may result from too high a rent too rigidly exacted, not as an authenticated statement of the actual extent of the evils of over-collection in South Arcot during the triennial lease.

Mr. Ravenshaw has expressed his hope, "that his successor will recollect, "that the class of people we are now putting in possession of estates are not "men of property, from which they are able to make up any losses they may "meet with, and who can afford to wait for better seasons to remunerate them; "but that, however fit in other respects for the situation they are placed in, "they have, generally speaking, no property except their cattle, and that if "they are made answerable for any thing more than trivial losses, they must "be ruined, and their estates must shortly revert to Government, in a much "worse state even than they are in at present."

Under the expression of these sentiments, the Board need not dwell on the impolicy of withholding remission, where a claim can be established founded on actual loss from misfortune or other causes; and it occurs to the Board to remark, that it might be imprudent to endeavour to trace any alleged loss to neglect, wilful or otherwise, because, under the present plan, there is a manifest excitement to industry, and no object, now the assessment is fixed, to be obtained by neglect.

It appears that, in his communications with the landholders, Mr. Ravenshaw made no mention of the lease being "under certain circumstances, only "decennial, but formed it at once as a perpetual lease."

The only reason for calling or considering the settlement decennial, and eventually perpetual, was to meet the possible event of its disapproval by the Honourable Court of Directors. The settlement, when confirmed, will be every where perpetual, as far as concerns the Government, and decennial only no farther than as it depends on the decisions of the Honourable Court.

In the case of the settlement under consideration, where no mention has been made of any other than a perpetual lease, it will be proper, so soon as it shall have received the confirmation of the Honourable the Governor in Council, that the landholders should be informed that the lease has been confirmed as a perpetual lease by the Government, but that it requires also the confirmation of the Honourable Court of Directors; that such confirmation will, in all probability, be obtained, but that, in either event, nothing can disturb the validity of the existing engagements for a period of ten years.

It would be advisable perhaps, that a proclamation on this subject should be issued, in the name of Government, upon the occasion of promulgating its confirmation of the settlement.

In the settlement of the southern division of Arcot, the Board observe that the devastanum and cavelly lands have been included, but that the proportions of rent payable on account of these respective lands have been distinctly determined, mined, with the view to render easy their separation hereafter, should it be so decided.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 March 1813.

This was a very proper and judicious arrangement; for though the Board are disposed to think that, in preference to the restoration of these lands, it will be advisable that they should continue to be included in the settlement, and the proceeds appropriated to the purposes for which the lands were held, as has been done in other districts, where a permanent settlement has been established, the Board have not formed a final judgment upon the subject.

According to the instructions of the Board, it was proposed that the allowance of the Bara Bulloti, or village officers, should continue, as usual, to be settled between them and the landholders; but Mr. Ravenshaw has proposed a qualification of this arrangement with respect to the Curnums and Taliars. The mauniams of these officers, as well as those of the Potail, or Pottah Monigar, and shroff having in the southern division of Arcot been resumed, and an allowance in money granted in lieu thereof, Mr. Ravenshaw, consistently with the spirit of the Board's instructions, has granted an abatement in the settlement equivalent to these money allowances; but as he thinks that the offices of Curnum and Taliar ought not to be rendered dependent on the landholders, he has bound the latter to make a separate payment to Government, equal to the pay of these public servants, who under this arrangement will receive it through the Collector.

In the few cases in which the mauniam lands of these officers have been resumed, the Board certainly think that the pecuniary allowances granted in lieu of them ought to be paid through the officers of Government, rather than through the landholders; but the Board are of opinion, that it might be preferable to restore the mauniams themselves. The Board conclude, that as an abatement has been already made in the jumma, to the extent of the allowances granted in lieu of these mauniams, the measure of restoring the mauniams might be effected without any further abatement.

Resolved, to require the Collector to submit a statement of the amount of the money allowances heretofore enjoyed by the village servants, compared with the amount of the abatement now granted in lieu of these allowances, and with the supposed value of the lands, and to desire the Collector will state his sentiments explicitly, as to the expediency, or otherwise, of restoring the latter.

Resolved, also, to address on the same subject the Collectors of the other districts, where the resumption of the mauniams of the village servants has, either wholly or in part, taken place.

On the subject of enams, the final instructions of the Board will be communicated to the Collector at an early period in a separate letter.

Towards the conclusion of his report on the important subject of the final settlement, in which it will be seen that great progress has been made in this district, Mr. Ravenshaw has submitted his sentiments on the expediency of vesting in Collectors a power to hear and decide such disputes, relative to the cultivation, to the occupancy and irrigation of lands, as may arise between landholders and inferior Ryots, or between the holders of different villages.

A suggestion of a somewhat similar nature has been submitted by the Collector in Tinnevelly; and the Board are of opinion, that if the power were vested in Collectors of adjusting disputes, in the first instance, upon the matters above referred to, it would be of advantage, and satisfactory to all parties. Mr. Ravenshaw observes, very justly, that under a permanent settlement, the Collectors and Tehsildars can have no greater personal interest in their decisions than a Judge and his Moonsiffs. That their decisions would be more prompt, and accompanied with less vexation the Board think can scarcely be doubted.

It is the wish of the Board to introduce certain provisions on this subject in the Regulation respecting the settlement, the draft of which is now preparing; but unless the principle be recognized as unobjectionable, the introduction of the proposed provisions into the draft could lead only to useless discussion.

Resolved, therefore, to solicit the sentiments of the Honourable the Governor in Council upon the subject.

 Resolved,

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 March 1813.

Resolved, that these proceedings be submitted generally for the consideration of the Honourable the Governor in Council, and for such orders thereon as they may be deemed to require.

Resolved, at the same time, to state to the Honourable the Governor in Council, that the Board would not recommend that his confirmation of the settlement, to the extent to which it has been established, should for the present be formally communicated. The Board are of opinion, that it might be advisable to defer this measure, until further proceedings shall have been submitted on the reports which have been received, and are expected from other districts; until, in short, a little further experience has been obtained. In the mean time the Board remark, that the agreements which have been exchanged between the Collector and the landholders will secure the parties in possession, and guard against any present inconvenience.

EXTRACT from the MINUTES of CONSULTATION in the REVENUE DEPARTMENT,

Dated the 4th February 1814.

Minutes of Consultation, 4 Feb. 1814.

THE Governor in Council having maturely considered the proceedings of the Board of Revenue, bearing date the 29th of March last, and the various papers to which reference is therein made, respecting the settlement of the land revenue in the southern division of Arcot, deems it proper to record such observations on the subject, as seem to be required for the guidance of that Board and for the information of the Honourable the Court of Directors. It was recommended by the Board of Revenue, in their letter of the 29th of April last, which accompanied the proceedings in question, that the confirmation of Government should be withheld from the settlement, till many of the points on which its merits depend should be more fully investigated, and the whole work should undergo a scrupulous revision; and that the Government should, for the present, confine itself to the expression of its sentiments generally, regarding the mode in which it has been concluded. What was recommended by the Board of Revenue, with a view only to proper caution in a matter of such weighty importance, has become indispensably necessary, in deference to the orders of the Court of Directors on the subject, conveyed in their letter of the 16th of December 1812; and the sole object of the observations, about to be recorded, is to point out in what respects the settlement of the land revenue concluded for the southern division of Arcot is, or is not, conformable to the views of the Honourable Court, to the principles prescribed to the Collector for his guidance, and (on points not embraced by those views as far as they have been stated, nor provided for in those principles) to the policy which the Governor in Council would be disposed to approve in a perpetual settlement.

The first consideration to be attended to, regards the persons with whom the settlement has been concluded Although it does not appear to be noticed in the proceedings of the Board of Revenue, it may be allowed to precede all others, on account both of its intrinsic importance and of the attention which it will receive from the Court of Directors.

On this point the Collector refers to his letter to the Board of Revenue, dated the 7th of February 1812, for an explanation of the principles by which he has been guided. From that letter, and his subsequent letter dated the 9th of July 1812, it appears that, in the southern division of Arcot, net rent is hardly ever derived from land; that, when there is any, it goes to the heads of the villages or renters for the time being; that those persons do not inherit the capacity in which they stand, but are constantly liable to be changed; that there are few villages in which they have not been changed every two, three, or four years; that, in short, the little private property in the soil which exists has always been entirely at the disposal of the Government. From this state of things the Collector justly infers, that although it may be otherwise where meerass meerass is a property yielding a rent to its owner, and possessing a value in transfer, yet in his district the Government commits no injustice, by making, as it always has made, such a selection of renters as may afford the best security for the public revenue, and conferring upon them a property in the soil, which no one has enjoyed before, and of which therefore no one has been dispossessed.

When the revenue absorbs the whole rent, the Government must be regarded as the sole proprietor of the soil, and the right of occupancy (at best of very uncertain tenure) is all which can belong to its subjects; but when that right too, as must also unavoidably be the case, has been at the disposal of Government, no room is left for a complaint of injustice towards individuals, in any settlement of the land revenue which Government may see fit to conclude. The question, in concluding such a settlement, is then narrowed to a consideration of expediency; and that settlement is the best, by which the interests of Government, involving, as they must do, the interests of the people at large, may most effectually be promoted. The case here put is, for the illustration of the argument, somewhat more extreme than that represented as actually existing in the southern division of Arcot; but the difference between the reality and the supposition is not considerable, and ample allowance seems to have been made for it by the Collector, in his application of similar reasoning to the duty in which he was engaged.

The Collector accordingly states, that the triennial renters, who may be considered as approaching more nearly than others to the possession of some sort of property in the soil, were allowed the preference in renting the villages anew; that they were permitted to include partners in the engagement; that when they disagreed among themselves, the rent was concluded with as many of them as could agree; that when they declined or neglected to rent their villages, the other head inhabitants were next permitted to rent them; and that the engagements which have been entered into with strangers, are not numerous, and were had recourse to only after all other means of renting the villages had failed.

It serves still further to justify the Collector's proceedings in this respect, that he has represented the evils which would have followed from leaving any of the villages unsettled, in a district over which a settlement is generally extended, as the Pottah Monigars are interested and enabled to reduce the stock and cultivators belonging to such villages, by withdrawing them to the rented villages, and as this apprehension has been confirmed by the experience of the triennial lease. He has, moreover, recommended that all ousted renters who may have lost their villages, through corruption on the part of the Collector's servants, should be allowed to recover them, on indemnifying the strangers by whom they have been rented for any expense incurred in improving them.

The Governor in Council desires, that the proposed option may be offered to the ousted renters; and under the foregoing explanation of the facts of the case, and of the rules according to which the Collector has proceeded, is of opinion, that in the selection of renters, the settlement will then have been concluded with all possible regard for the interests, feelings, and rights of those who bear the nearest semblance to landed proprietors. It is most satisfactory to observe, in confirmation of this opinion, that out of 1985 villages which had been settled at the end of fusily 1221, nine hundred and fifty-nine were rented by the former renters, and five hundred and twenty-five by former renters and their chosen associates; and that of the remaining five hundred and one villages rented to strangers, a great proportion had been voluntarily resigned by the former renters under regular instruments, either lodged with the Collector, or possessed by their friends who have succeeded them.

The Governor in Council does not find any direct information, either in the proceedings of the Board of Revenue or in the Collector's report or its enclosures, with regard to the number of persons with whom the settlement of the villages has been concluded. The point is important, as concerning justice towards individuals wherever a right to be admitted into the number is recognized, and as concerning the security of the public revenue and the improvement of the country wherever better security and better means of improvement ment would have been provided by increasing the number. On the first of those grounds it would seem, from the information incidentally afforded in the Collector's letters, dated the 7th February and 9th July 1812, above referred to, that the number of renters is sufficiently comprehensive; but it will be necessary that the Collector's attention should be directed to this point, with reference to the other ground on which its importance rests.

The attention of the Revenue Board has been chiefly turned to the amount of rent for which the district has been settled, and on that head their explanations are entirely satisfactory. The average of ten years' collections, forming the basis on which the amount was calculated, appears to be equally just towards the Government and the renters. The extremes to which the revenue rose and sunk in the two fusilies 1212 and 1216 neutralize each other, and the period including no other extraordinary variation of revenue, may be considered as exhibiting a fair view of the resources of the district. The average collections of the ten years fell short, indeed, of those of the triennial lease, to the extent of nearly three and a half per cent.; but there is melancholy evidence that the operation of that lease has proved most injurious to the southern division of Arcot, as well as to almost every other district into which it was introduced, and there can be no doubt of the necessity of abating the assessment, if the collections are expected to keep pace with it, and the prosperity of the district is not meant to be sacrificed still further for a temporary increase of revenue. The Governor in Council, therefore, expresses his perfect satisfaction with the amount of the present settlement.

The rules according to which the Collector has applied to each particular village the general basis whereon the amount of the settlement was to be calculated, and has corrected the severe pressure with which it would have borne on some villages, and the needless reduction of revenue which it would have caused in others, are extremely judicious. The chief rules are these. When the collections for fusily 1220 exceed the average of ten years, a portion of the excess is added; when they fall short, a portion of the deficiency is abated. Villages having little or no waste land are allowed a remission of from one-sixteenth to one-eighth: aumany villages mismanaged during the triennial lease are assessed with the average of the seven years preceding the triennial lease, or the ten years' average, whichever of the two is highest, though the collections in 1220 fell short of the average. The seven years' average is taken instead of the ten years, when the former exceeds the latter, by reason of balances during the triennial lease. When temporary causes have impoverished any village, the assessment is made progressive for five years, or some shorter period, till it attain its full measure. These rules seem to provide for almost every exception which could be required in applying the general basis.

The Governor in Council concurs in the sentiments which the Board of Revenue have expressed, with regard to the case of former over-assessment, for which the Collector stated that his rules did not provide an adequate remedy; and has nothing to add to their observations on that head, further than by expressing his satisfaction, that the impositions practised upon the Collector by his servants, for the purpose of obtaining an abatement of the amount with which certain villages ought to have been assessed, were detected; that the pottahs fraudulently procured were cancelled, and that many of the villages have since been settled at full rent.

The Governor in Council agrees with the Board of Revenue, that it would seem inexpedient to conclude any perpetual settlement for villages yielding no higher an annual rent than ten pagodas at first, and twenty pagodas ultimately; and thinks it questionable, whether even a decennial settlement ought to be concluded for such villages, unless they are very numerous.

The only provision which the Collector seems to have made for securing the under-tenants and Ryots in possession of their privileges, whatever these may be, is to be found in the pottah granted by him to the renters, which bears that they are to keep the inhabitants in peace, and conduct themselves according to the Regulations; but the Governor in Council considers this provision, for an object of such importance, to be much too indefinite, and highly approves of the specific obligations on this head, to which the renters renters are required to bind themselves by the seventeenth article of the moochulka prepared by Mr. Ross, the Collector of Cuddapah, relating to the duty of "making the Ryots contented and happy." The Regulation regarding the settlement will no doubt impose the duty upon the renters; but the pottah furnished to them ought to define and explain its nature and extent, as that prepared by Mr. Ross does.

In the settlement of the southern division of Arcot, the Collector has made no reservation of waste land: and he has stated his opinion, that no waste land ought to be reserved. In support of that opinion, he has observed that no settlement whatever could be formed, if all the waste land were excluded from it; that it would be difficult to select any waste land which it would be more proper to exclude than the rest; and that it is needless to exclude any, as it ought to be the main object of Government to secure its present land revenue and promote the future prosperity of the country, rejoicing, as it will have cause to do, if, by means of its revenue arrangements, the cultivation is extended; and resting satisfied, that the least of all the evils which it has to apprehend, is a difficulty in participating fairly in the increasing wealth of its people.

On the other hand, however, it appears to be the Collector's opinion, that the migration of the Ryots (by the apprehension of which the Collector of Cuddapah has chiefly been induced to include the waste land in his settlement) would not be affected one way or other by the reservation of the waste land, but that it may be prevented or properly regulated by a judicious distribution of tuccavy: it appears also, from the smallness of the abatement (varying from one-eighth to one-sixteenth) which is allowed on account of villages having little or no waste land, that the value attaching to waste land is not reckoned by the Collector to be very considerable.

The Collector's conclusion on this point does not appear to be made out by the reasoning which he has himself employed. The Governor in Council has often had occasion to express his conviction, that the object which requires the first attention, is the augmentation of the general wealth of the country, and that it will always be easy to devise means for drawing a due proportion of that wealth into the public treasury. If, therefore, the Collector had shewn that, with a reservation of the waste land, it was not to be hoped that the general wealth of the country should be augmented, the Governor in Council would have been disposed to concur in his opinion, that the waste land ought to be included in the settlement. But his reasoning tends as much to prove that the prosperity of the country would be injured as that it would be promoted by that measure.

Unless it answers some important purpose to relinquish the claim to a direct participation in the future produce of waste land, unless it is necessary as enabling the renters to hold out encouragement to their Ryots, unless the adjacent land could not otherwise be cultivated, or, unless, for some other reason, the settlement of the waste land must be simultaneous with the settlement of the land under cultivation, and is essential to the success of that other settlement, this gratuitous and unlimited surrender of that which, possessing no present value, could not be regarded as any favour by those who receive it, though the loss of it might hereafter be severely felt by Government, would bear no mark of the liberal and considerate policy, from which alone such an act ought to proceed, and would be stigmatised by the Court of Directors, whose sentiments on the subject are known to the Government, as a useless and improvident sacrifice.

The Collector has stated, that no settlement could be formed if all the waste land were to be reserved, and that it would be difficult to make a proper selection; but the rule, according to which the selection ought to be made, seems to be sufficiently manifest. Wherever the lands in cultivation could not be settled if the waste lands were reserved, they must of necessity be included in the settlement. In such a case, they are not gratuitously surrendered, but contribute to the value of the cultivated lands, and are taken into account by those to whom the cultivated lands are rented. To exclude them would be to check the extension of cultivation, and to destroy all prospect of that augmented wealth and increasing prosperity, in which the exclusion was intended to enable the Government to participate. But wherever the cultivated lands can be settled as well, though the waste lands are reserved, or wherever the abatement of rent on account of the reservation is more than counterbalanced by the object on account of which it is allowed (a case which, from the rate of abatement allowed by the Collector to villages having little or no waste land, may be supposed likely to be of frequent occurrence) the force of the reasons against including the waste land in the settlement seems to be irresistible.

It will, in all cases, be the duty of the Collector to take care, that the reasons against reserving the waste land are not inconsiderately or unnecessarily admitted, and still more, that they are not suffered to be alleged as a mere pretext for including it in the settlement.

The Governor in Council does not consider it to be of any importance, that the Collector has settled the tank villages in the southern division of Arcot unconditionally as well as the rest. In the letter of Government to the Board of Revenue, dated the 31st of December 1811, it was stated, that while the rent of tank villages was to be dependent upon the supply of water, the discretion of granting or withholding a remission of revenue in other cases rested exclusively with the Government; and the Collector has, naturally enough, given a latitude to these instructions, and without binding the Government, even in the case of tank villages, to any specific remission of revenue, has conceived it to be virtually pledged to allow such remissions, as the nature of the seasons and other circumstances affecting the condition of the renters may be found to require. The Governor in Council entirely concurs in the sentiments expressed, both by the Revenue Board and by the Collector, regarding the necessity of being liberal in this respect at the beginning. That the time will come when a remission of revenue will no longer be required, must be the persuasion of every one who believes that Government is intent upon promoting the prosperity of the country, and the measures now in train are well adapted to that end; but the arrival of such a time cannot be insured or accelerated, unless the present demands of Government are considerately accommodated to the present circumstances of the country.

If any confirmation of the foregoing views be wanting, it is unhappily to be found in the effects set forth in the Collector's present report, as having resulted from a rigid enforcement of the terms of the triennial lease in certain talooks of his district.

The attention of the Revenue Board was particularly called, in the letters addressed to them on the 31st of December 1811, and 24th March 1812, to the necessity of making the rent under the new settlement payable, at the option of Government only, in such coins as are issued from the Company's mint; but it does not appear, from the papers now before Government, that any provision to that effect has been made in the settlement of the southern division of Arcot. The omission requires to be supplied.

The deduction from the assessment made on account of the allowance to Curnums and Taliars is just and proper; and there can be no doubt as to the propriety of rendering the payment of their allowance independent of the good pleasure of the renters. But the Governor in Council will take into consideration the expediency of restoring to them the mauniums which they formerly enjoyed, when the subject is brought to his notice by the Board of Revenue.

The Collector has judged wisely in keeping the accounts of the cavelly and devastanum lands distinct from the rest, though included in the settlement, as an opening is thereby left for any new arrangement regarding them which may be deemed proper.

It is satisfactory to learn, on the authority of the Collector, that the other sources of revenue, exclusive of the land-tax, which pass in the southern division of Arcot by the general name of sournadyem, are highly improvable. It is principally from those sources that all future augmentation of the revenue must be looked for, and therefore they cannot be investigated and improved with with too great care. The Governor in Council will expect to receive the report on the subject which has been promised by the Revenue Board.

Minute of Consultation, 4 Feb. 1814.

A report will also be expected on the subject of the enam lands in the district, regarding which the Revenue Board appear not to have furnished instructions to the Collector.

The register of the settlement proposed to be kept by the Collector will be a valuable document, containing information on many points, particularly the number of renters, and the amount of the rent of their respective villages, to which the Governor in Council may hereafter have occasion to refer.

The settlement has, ere now, been probably introduced throughout the district; but the Governor in Council anticipates great advantage from the revision which it is to undergo from the new Collector. With all the zeal, ability, and experience of the late Collector, Mr. Ravenshaw, it was impossible for him to accomplish so great and complicated an undertaking without many errors and oversights. Of this he was himself fully sensible, and he accordingly deemed it necessary to revise his own work. He had the satisfaction of detecting the impositions which his servants had practised upon him, before the charge of the district passed into other hands, and he corrected much of what had been done amiss; but there must still remain great room for correction, and the Governor in Council approves of the manner in which the Board of Revenue have called the attention of the present Collector to this important part of his duty.

Besides the instructions of the Board of Revenue, conveyed in their proceedings of the 29th of March, it will be necessary that the Collector attend to the sentiments expressed in the present proceedings of the Governor in Council, and that, wherever practicable, the settlement be rendered conformable to those sentiments, in the respects in which any discrepancy has been pointed out, and where the points called in question only require to be explained, a satisfactory explanation be afforded.

The observations of the Governor in Council have been framed, with a particular view to the recent instructions of the Court of Directors, on the subject of the mode in which the land revenue ought to be collected; and it is confidently hoped that they will meet with the Honourable Court's approbation, and that any settlement concluded in strict conformity to them would be confirmed in perpetuity. The observations themselves will shew that much remains to be done, before such a conformity is obtained, and that the measure of confirming even this first settlement in perpetuity is still far from being recommended by Government to the Court of Directors. A great deal, however, has already been accomplished, and the remainder, the Governor in Council doubts not, will be undertaken with similar zeal, and prosecuted to an equally successful conclusion.

At the suggestion of the Collector of the southern division of Arcot, the Board of Revenue have recommended that, after the introduction of the proposed settlement of the land revenue, the Collectors should be authorized, in the first instance, to hear and determine all disputes relative to occupying, cultivating, and irrigating land, which may arise between the renters and their Ryots, or between different renters; and observe, in support of that proposition, that when the amount and appropriation of the demands of Government upon the land are permanently fixed, the Collector may be regarded as an arbiter in such disputes not less impartial than the Judge, and that from the means of information possessed by him, and the promptness of his decisions, the authority proposed to be delegated to him is likely to be of great utility, and to give entire satisfaction to the inhabitants. As an appeal to the zillah court is in all causes to be allowed, the Governor in Council is disposed to agree with the Revenue Board, that much advantage might result from the interlocutory judgments of the Collectors on the points in question, and that they would not be attended with any of the evil consequences which led to the separation of the judicial authority from that with which Collectors are at present vested. The Revenue Board will therefore make provision for the object in view, in the Regulation which they have stated themselves to be preparing; paring; and a final decision with regard to its expediency will be given, when the Regulation is about to be enacted.

EXTRACTS REVENUE LETTER to FORT ST. GEORGE,
Dated the 12th April, 1815.

Letter from, 5th March 1813.
(Par. 123 to 136.) Remarks on extracts from the Court's dispatches to the Bengal Government, dated 1st February 1811 and 15th January 1812, respecting the permanent settlement of the land revenue.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

Par. 57. We have perused with attention the observations recorded in these paragraphs, and the still more elaborate statements and reasonings contained in the report of your Board of Revenue of the 28th January 1813, on the important question of immediately and permanently fixing the amount of the land-revenue in the unsettled districts subject to your Government. We not only dissent from the conclusion drawn by the Revenue Board, and concurred in by our late Governor in Council, as to the necessity of no longer deferring the permanent settlement of the land revenue, but we see no reason, after the most deliberate and mature consideration of all the facts, arguments, and allegations which have been advanced, to retract the instructions conveyed in our Revenue dispatch of the 16th December 1812, and on which we perceive, from your more recent dispatches, that you have already proceeded to act. Being desirous, however, of placing upon record, fully and explicitly, the grounds on which our opinion rests, we shall shortly advert to a few of the principal arguments with which it has been (in our judgment unsuccessfully) impugned.

58. " There would be reason," you observe, " for postponing a permanent " settlement of the land revenue of these territories, if more full information " regarding their resources, than that which we now possess, could be obtain- " ed; but the length of time during which they have been managed by the " Company's Government, and the nature of the revenue-management under " this presidency, have already made us intimately acquainted with the extent " of their resources. To wait for further information, therefore, would ap- " pear to be altogether unnecessary." A want of acquaintance with the resources of the country was, while it existed, unquestionably a substantial reason for not proceeding rashly to fix the extent of our demands upon it; but it by no means follows, that the converse of the proposition is true, viz. that after having ascertained with tolerable accuracy the extent of its resources, there can be no good reason for postponing a perpetual settlement of the revenue to be drawn from it. On the contrary, if, as we know to be the case, there exists a great disproportion between its actual and prospective resources, that surely seems an improvident arrangement which would exclude the Government from deriving any advantage from the progressive development of those resources. When we know, for example, that of 9,253,000 acres of sirkar land in the districts of Bellary and Cuddapah, only 3,253,000 are in a state of cultivation and pay rent to Government, would it be prudent to renounce, by a solemn act, all claim to revenue from the six millions of acres now uncultivated, but which, in process of time, may be rendered productive?

59. You admit that " there would be reason for delay, if the country were " in a course of improvement; and if, by fixing its demands upon the landed " property, the Government were to forego its participation in the additional " value which that property might be expected to acquire. But you contend, " that the real case is directly the reverse of this supposition; that the agri- " culture in the unsettled districts is in a state of decline; that revenue is " collected with difficulty; and that the hope of participating in the increasing " resources of the country, presents, therefore, no inducement to delay resort- " ing to that system, under which its resources may be most effectually pre- " served and improved." If the foregoing be a correct description of the present state of our territories, we apprehend that the evils complained of must be be derived from one or other of the following causes; adversity of season, such as that which occurred in fusily 1221; the triennial leases, and their tendency injuriously to affect the interests, rights, and feelings of the small landed proprietors; or lastly, from over-assessment. Whether the unfavorable symptoms which you have enumerated proceed from any of the causes separately, or from all of them combined, it is difficult to perceive how they could be either removed or mitigated by a permanent settlement of the land revenue at its present standard. To perpetuate an over-assessment of the land, or a vexatious mode of realizing it, would produce consequences directly the reverse of improving the agriculture and the revenue of our territorial possessions; and in a country subject, like the peninsula of India, to great vicissitudes of seasons, there must always be a considerable difficulty in regularly and punctually collecting the land revenue, even though its standard amount were finally determined.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

60. Were it clearly and satisfactorily demonstrated, that the assessment in any of the provinces subject to your Government is heavier than the land can bear, we should not be adverse to a suitable abatement of the jumma of the over-assessed district; for to persist in rack-renting the husbandman, and after compelling him to part with the stock of his farm, in order to satisfy an exorbitant demand, to tell him, by way of comfort, that the rent which he has impoverished himself in paying is about to be unalterably fixed, and that his circumstances will greatly improve under this perpetual settlement, is adding mockery to oppression.

61. The Board of Revenue observe in their report, that "the Government "rent or share of the produce is supposed to amount generally to the value of "little less than one-half, and in some situations to even more than one-half "of the gross produce." "If this," they add, "be an accurate statement, it "is scarcely necessary to remark, that an assessment so burthensome must be "inconsistent with the accumulation of agricultural stock, and consequently "inconsistent with any reasonable expectation of improvement." The Board go on to state, that "under these circumstances, to conclude a permanent set- "tlement, that is, to fix the ultimate demand of Government upon the lands, "is the system most likely to be attended with the least loss: that by thus "ensuring to the landholders exemption from tax on improvement, their inte- "rest, and with it their industry, may be so excited, as to enable them, in "progress of time, to pay with ease, that which is now collected from them "with considerable and increasing difficulty." Now it is hardly requisite for us to point out the incongruity of these two statements. The Board set out with affirming the actual assessment to be inconsistent with the accumulation of agricultural stock, and consequently inconsistent with any reasonable expectation of improvement; and the conclusion at which they arrive is, that it is expedient not to reduce, but to perpetuate, that assessment which they had declared a little before to be incompatible, not only with improvement, but with the indispensable means of effecting it.

62. The failure of the permanent settlement in Dindigul, to which the Board have adverted in the eighty-fourth paragraph of their report, as well as that in Chingleput, and more recently in the Salem district, where estates were purchased on account of the Government for a premium merely nominal, affords the clearest evidence of the futility of expecting to avert the inevitably ruinous effects of over-assessment, by the means recommended by the Board; whereas the alternative of lowering the assessment in the southern division of Coimbatore, where it was discovered to be excessive, is known to have been successful under temporary settlements, in gradually restoring the revenues of that district from the state of depression into which they had fallen.

63. To evince the promptitude which we have shown, even under the severest pressure of financial difficulties, to accede to any measure which was judged indispensable by our Governments abroad to the prosperity of our territories or the relief of their inhabitants, we need only recall to you the terms in which we sanctioned the reduction of the assessment in the last-mentioned district. "An observation of the opposite effects exhibited in the two divisions "of the same province, where neither the difference of soil nor the climate "could be supposed such as to have any influence in originating them, must

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

" have obviously led to the conclusion, that the rates of assessment in the " southern division were too high: we have therefore no hesitation in approving of your having directed the rates to be brought down to the standard " of those in the northern division," &c.

64. In a late dispatch which we addressed to you from this department, we did, indeed, animadvert on the abatement of ten per cent. on the jumma of Tanjore, which you had sanctioned at the introduction of the quinquennial lease in that province; but we objected to the measure, " because it appeared to have been adopted solely for the purpose of overcoming the reluctance manifested by the Meerassadars to a fixed money-rent, and because " the Collector had pronounced the former rate of assessment to be fair and " equitable, and probably more moderate than in other provinces."

65. If the Board of Revenue were satisfied that the assessment in any part of the territory subject to their immediate superintendence was so high, as either to impair the permanent resources of the country, or to prevent their progressive development, it was their duty to make it the subject of a formal separate representation, instead of introducing it as an incidental circumstance, to help an argument for a favourite theory. Should such a representation ever come before us, supported by well-attested facts, we shall investigate and decide upon it according to the best of our judgment; but we can by no means agree with the Board, that in calculating the proportion which the Government assessment bears to the gross produce of the land, the enaums, or rent-free land, should be excluded from consideration. In the survey report of the Ceded Districts by Colonel Munro, it is stated that the enaum lands in that portion of our territory amount to about 2,599,747 acres, of which the estimated rent is Star Pagodas 12,35,458, being more than two-thirds of the revenue payable to Government. Supposing, therefore, that the Government assessment (say eighteen lacks) absorbs fifty per cent. of the gross produce of the sirkar, or taxable land, when the enaum land is included the revenue will amount to only about thirty per cent. on the gross produce. Whether the enaums be distributed among the great body of landholders, or held by the Potails, Curnums, and other village officers, their total value ought, in the point of view now under consideration, to be taken in deduction of the Government rent or tax. In the former case, the enaums may enable the holders to increase their farming stock, even though they should derive a bare subsistence from their malguzarry land, after defraying the expenses of cultivation and paying their rent to Government; in the latter case, the enaums afford provisions for numerous classes of public functionaries, whose pay and subsistence would otherwise constitute a distinct charge upon the funds of Government, which could only be met by additional imposts on its subjects.

66. " Prior to the establishment of the courts of judicature," the Board of Revenue observe, " when the Collector was the depository of all civil authority, " the Revenue system was a system of restriction: his authority was exercised " in inducing the Ryots to occupy and pay rent for more land than it was consistent with their interest or inclination to occupy, and under this system " the land revenue was not only upheld, but raised to an amount exceeding " the just proportion which it ought to bear to the actual resources of the " respective districts. It was high in proportion to the population and stock " whence it was derived. The revenue so raised has, for some years, pressed " hard upon the country. In few or none of the provinces, is it in a state of " progressive advancement; but from the restrictive system being necessarily " abandoned, combined with other causes, a diminution is rather to be apprehended." We have already said that the question, whether the assessment be partially or generally excessive, ought to be investigated and determined separately, because it has no necessary connection with questions relating to the form or duration of the settlement. The restrictions alluded to by the Board are not inseparable from the ryotwar mode of collection, and ought not, in fairness, to be adduced with the view of disparaging it.

67. It is, at all events, quite satisfactorily established to our minds, by the instructions of your Board of Revenue to the Collector of Bellary, of the 9th November 1809 (and similar instructions were also issued to the Collector of Cuddapah, both sanctioned by your Government), that the sudden abolition of of the new system of judicature, of the restrictions before practised by the Collectors on the freedom of cultivation, and the curtailment of their authority over the Ryots at large, was premature, and that, in order to prevent the affairs of the districts from falling into perfect confusion, and to guard against a serious defalcation in the revenue, the Collectors were authorized to resort to the employment of the same measures, though in a far more objectionable form, as well as to other expedients, which should never have been resorted to.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

68. The Board, after having observed in these instructions, that "of the "increased difficulty" (i.e. of collecting the revenue under the new system of judicature) "there could be no doubt, and that of the means of removing "the obstacles which had so suddenly and greatly increased the local officers "were in general the best judges," proceed as follows. "That the Collector "has been deprived of the chief part of his authority, and that the revenue "must in some cases immediately, although perhaps not ultimately suffer, the "Board are aware; but still the Collector has great authority, name, and "influence. He must make up in address what he has lost in power; he must "devote his whole attention to prevent the loss which these sudden changes "are no doubt calculated to produce; he must make the most of what he has "left in his hands, of what local circumstances can suggest to him and his "servants; he must make the most of all the modes of obliging or crossing "ill-disposed or contumacious farmers, which a Collector still possesses in the "distribution of tuccavy, in the repair of wells, tanks, and channels, in the "refusal of lands and distribution of good fields, in the restoration and re-"sumption of enaums or at least in threatening to do so, in the removal and "appointment of Potails and Curnums, which the Board give you full autho-"rity to do at your own discretion; taking care not to get entangled in the "courts, and in the general vanity of mankind, which is as strong in the cot-"tages of Ryots as in the courts of princes, and disposes them to be well "received at the cutcherry. In all these transactions the able Collector will "find motives of hope and fear, wishes and aversions, to enable him to carry "most points. If after exerting all that ingenuity can suggest and address "effect, the Ryots will not consent to reasonable terms, other means of col-"lecting the revenue must be had recourse to. These insuperable impedi-"ments must be forcibly pointed out to Government, suitable remedies be "considered and thrown into the shape of a Regulation, and the revenue be "collected upon different principles."

69. We have certainly nothing before us to dispose us to believe, that this most objectionable course of proceeding has not yet been resorted to in the settlement of the decennial leases; for though, in the concluding part of the paragraph of the report of the Board of Revenue, dated the 28th January 1813, which we have already quoted, it is stated, that "the restrictive system "being necessarily abandoned, a diminution of revenue was rather to be appre-"hended," they therein must, as we conceive, mean to refer to the actual power possessed by the Collectors antecedent to the establishment of the Zillah courts, and not to the substituted means resorted to, to make up for the loss of it.

70. But admitting what is the fact, that the Collectors have under the Regulations lost that power; and supposing also, for a moment, that the expedients afterwards authorized to be practised by them in Bellary and in Cuddapah are no longer resorted to, it is impossible, we should think, that the Board can seriously believe, that there was any species of interference exercised by the Collectors over the Ryots, which is not practised to a greater extent, or in a harsher form, by the renters. The reports of the Collectors on the effects of the triennial lease were sufficient to extinguish such a belief, if it ever existed. The representations made to your Board of Revenue by Mr. Ravenshaw, the Collector of the southern division of Arcot, on this subject, during the first year of the lease, and which we have particularly noticed in our Revenue dispatch of the 17th December 1813, are not stronger than those contained in his subsequent communication to that Board.

71. Mr. W. Garrow describes the effects of the triennial lease in Coimbatore in the following terms, and similar quotations might easily be made from the reports of other Collectors. "The last year of the lease became, in a great mea"sure,

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

"sure, a scene of scramble on the part of the Mootahdars, in order to make up "for preceding losses. While the fear of a non-renewal impelled them, on "the one hand, to distrain unjustly, and otherwise oppress the Ryots; the "expectation of a renewed lease on lower terms excited, on the other hand, "all their spirit of intrigue to depress the cultivation, where their misconduct "had not previously effected it." It is in vain to say that the Ryots are protected against harassing and vexatious proceedings by the courts of justice; for the loss of time, the expense incident to a legal process, and the delay of decision will, in nine instances out of ten, prevent the Ryot from appealing to the court. If the courts were really effectual for the protection of the Ryots, the oppressions stated by Mr. Ravenshaw and Mr. Garrow to have been practised upon them could not have taken place upon the scale described in their letters. We entertain a decided opinion, founded on the reports of the Collectors respecting the triennial lease, that the apprehended decline of public revenue was attributable, not to the abandonment of measures of restriction which would probably constitute an objectionable part of any system of revenue management, but to the substitution, in room of the ryotwar mode of collection, of the renting system, under which the great body of cultivators were placed, in a considerable degree, at the mercy of a set of farmers of the revenue, who struggled to indemnify themselves, by means of rapacity, for the loss they sustained in consequence of having entered into improvident contracts.

72. The Board of Revenue profess to think that the suggestion we threw out for consideration in our Revenue dispatch to Bengal, dated the 15th January 1812, of reserving to Government, under any settlement of the land-revenue which should be concluded, the right of claiming a moderate participation, at distant intervals, in the growing improvement of the country, must have proceeded from an erroneous conception, on our part, of the nature of the assessment which constitutes the permanent settlement in India; particularly where the settlement may have been, and may hereafter be concluded with the actual landholders. They admit the practicability of the plan in question, endeavour to show that it is applicable rather to an assessment proportioned to the rent than to an assessment proportioned to the produce of the land; and with reference to the amount of the actual assessment in the territories under your charge, they pronounce such a provision to be calculated to perpetuate the present poverty of the landholders.

73. Our suggestion certainly did not originate in any misapprehension of the real state of the case, and the reasoning of the Board has altogether failed in convincing us either of its inapplicability or ill tendency, if adopted. The Board state (correctly, we believe) that "the sovereign's share of the produce "in India may be regarded in the same light as the landholder's share of the "produce in England and other European countries; and that the actual "condition of the landholders is not that of landlords, but of tenantry deriving "a subsistence from the occupation of agriculture, and in favourable circum- "stances so much more than a subsistence, as to make their interest in the "land saleable." And after thus describing the Government as uniting in itself the rights of general landlord with the powers of sovereign, the Board recommend that we should altogether renounce the former, and that we should impose irrevocable restrictions on the exercise of the latter; in short, that we should for ever alienate all future claim on the soil, either in the shape of rent or taxation, beyond the present amount of our land revenue. To so extreme a proposition we are not prepared to accede.

74. Should the alleged propensity of the natives to deteriorate the land towards the close of their lease, with the view of obtaining a renewal of their engagements on the same or still more favourable terms, be considered as an insurmountable objection to periodical settlements, still it does not follow that we should entirely abandon the waste land as a source of revenue. The lands already cultivated might be settled in perpetuity, and the right be reserved to Government of assessing such a proportion of the waste lands as may not have been included in the settlement, also in perpetuity, at a subsequent period. All that is necessary towards this object is a complete survey, previous to the first settlement, and an accurate register of the lands brought into cultivation subsequently to its conclusion.

75. It is not our intention to dispute the policy of introducing the permanent settlement into Bengal; nor is it inconsistent with the high respect we feel for the authors of that measure, to express a doubt whether their expectations respecting it have been fully realized, whether inconveniences may not have resulted from it which they did not foresee, and whether advantages have not been imputed to it, which might, with equal or greater justice, be ascribed to other causes.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12th April 1815.

76. Those who have objected to the reservation of the unquestionable right of the Government to draw a revenue from such waste lands as may hereafter come into cultivation, seem in general to argue as if the extension of agriculture were dependent on the conclusion of a settlement, which shall not only fix the quantum of the jumma upon the lands in actual cultivation, without being liable to increase at any future period, but shall also leave all the prospective advantages that may accrue from the culture of the waste, to the exclusive enjoyment of those with whom the settlement is made, and those who may rent it under them. But this is a view of the subject in which we cannot agree. We, on the contrary, believe that, in a country like India, where the great body of the people are husbandmen, where their wants are simple and few, where marriage is general, where the expenses of rearing children are trifling and where other concurrent circumstances contribute to encourage population, where also waste land abounds, and where a state of internal tranquillity prevails, undisturbed by civil wars or the depredations of foreign invaders, the extension of agriculture will proceed as that population advances.

77. The permanent settlement, " if it did no more," it is argued, " would " do much, by rendering land, in process of time, a valuable property, and a " security for the realization of the present revenue." That this effect has been produced under the permanent settlement in Bengal, Behar, and Benares, is admitted; but it is equally true, that the sales of land for arrears of revenue have occasioned a vast permutation of property in those provinces, that many ancient and opulent families have been thereby reduced to a state of depression and indigence, and that however desirable it may be for Government to have such a security, the exaction of it is felt as a far greater hardship by the landholders, than the personal confinement or coercion to which they were subject under the native Governments, when they failed in discharging any part of the public dues. It should be recollected, also, that this security is not a necessary consequence of the permanent settlement of the land, but that its existence depends entirely upon the lightness of the assessment, and the value of the landlord's interest in the land. In the zillahs of Chingleput, Ganjam, and Rajahmundry, for example, all of which are permanently settled, it appears that no such security exists, as there are estates in each of those zillahs, which, after being attached for arrears of revenue and exposed to sale, have remained in the hands of Government for want of purchasers.

78. Nor is it easy to see how, or at what time, the land would become security for the revenue, under a plan of village settlements, such as have been partially introduced for a limited period, and as you once intended to have rendered general and perpetual. In explanation of this plan, the Board of Revenue state, that " it was intended that all the principal landholders should " become the joint renters, and it was contemplated that, after the settle- " ment should be concluded, they would begin to make arrangements among " themselves for the permanent distribution of the lands, and thereby create, " in course of time, separate private estates in each village, paying their land- " tax directly to Government."

79. Under zemindarry or mootahdarry settlements, the greatest inconvenience and difficulty are experienced in dividing estates, portions of which are exposed to sale, either voluntarily by the proprietors, or compulsorily by the Government for the realization of arrears of revenue. In the former case, the separation of the smallest share is often attended with as much trouble and expense as a new assessment of the whole village; and from the clashing interests of the different parties concerned so many obstacles are interposed, that sometimes a delay of years takes place before a division can be finally accomplished; and in the latter case, it is always a matter of great difficulty to guard against disproportionate allotments of the jumma, and thus sacrificing

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

sacrificing the public interests on the one hand, or doing injustice to the defaulter on the other. But it would seem to us that the inconveniences to which we have just adverted would be felt in a tenfold degree under a village settlement, like that described by the Board. When the proprietors of a village, consisting of a numerous class of sharers, or a certain number of them, become jointly responsible for the revenue assessed upon the whole village, what course of proceeding would be adopted, in the event of their failing to make good their engagements? We know of no means that could be employed effectually to discover with whom the default lay; and nothing surely could well be more harsh or cruel, than to attempt the recovery of the arrear, by proceeding to the seizure and sale of the lands of all the sharers indiscriminately: yet this course was pursued under the village settlements in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, subject to the authority of the Supreme Government, until 1811, when a regulation was passed to relieve the joint sharers from the severity of such a proceeding, and to remedy those acts of injustice and oppression experienced by the smaller and more helpless Putteedars at the hands of their more powerful brethren, involving, as they too often did, the overthrow and destruction of individual rights. That Regulation authorized the Putteedars, whenever they desired it, to have their shares divided off, and formed into independent estates, separately assessed by Government; but the difficulties in apportioning the jumma in an unsurveyed country with justice to all parties and to Government, we conclude to be the reason why that measure has not yet, as far as we can learn, been adopted to any considerable extent.

It is strenuously contended, in the letter under reply, and in the report of the Board of Revenue, that if the resources and general wealth of the country were increased, through the restriction of the demand of Government upon landed property, there could be little difficulty in devising means whereby Government might participate in the increase. This proposition, in the general form in which it is put, appears to warrant an inference which we believe its authors little intended should be drawn from it. If, in the event of a general increase of the wealth of the country, it would be easy, by means of indirect taxation, to draw a due proportion of that wealth into the coffers of Government, the conclusion is hardly to be avoided, that a part of the revenues now levied directly from the land might be realized through the same channel of indirect taxation; and admitting this to be the case, it will be difficult to justify our not having recourse to a fiscal system, agreed to be less injurious to the prosperity of a country, than that of intercepting a large proportion of the produce of its land and labour, before it has circulated through the community in the way of exchange, and performed in some respects the functions of a reproductive capital. The true defence of our system of taxation in India is, not that it is preferable to any other, when judged according to the generally received principles of political economy, nor even that it has been continued because we found it established, but because we consider it to be utterly impracticable to raise the same sum in a less exceptionable way.

80. There is only one other point on which we wish to say a few words before taking leave of the subject. In the 135th paragraph of the letter now under reply, the permanent settlement is represented to be of vital importance, from being calculated to give to the mass of the people, who are engaged in agriculture, a deep and lasting interest in the stability of the Government; and in the event of any modification of the principle of that measure, an apprehension is expressed, that the landholders might, under certain circumstances, contemplate the overthrow of the Government with indifference, or even be led to entertain an expectation of deriving benefit from the change. We do not partake in these apprehensions. There is abundant evidence on your records to shew that the great body of cultivators would prefer an aumany division of the crop to a fixed money-rent, either for one year, a term of years, or in perpetuity. We have already had occasion to advert to the abatement which was made in the assessment of the province of Tanjore, at the conclusion of the quinquennial lease, in order to overcome the reluctance of the Meerassadars to a fixed money-rent. The triennial lease introduced in fusily 1218, was very partially established throughout other provinces, owing to the same cause. Mr. Fraser, the Collector of Nellore, in his letter to the Revenue Board, dated 8th January 1811,

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

1811, pleads for an increase of his allowances, in consideration of "the arduous "duty he had to perform, in reconciling the people of those extensive districts "to a new system of management," alluding to the renting system. Mr. G. F. Travers, in his letter to the Board of Revenue of the 28th June 1812, when applying for authority to issue an unusually large sum as tuccavy, in fusily 1222, in Trichinopoly, uses the following argument to induce the Board to sanction the grant." "The Board are also aware, that with fusily 1222 the "triennial rent will expire, and the introduction of the permanent settlement "is so well known, that it is scarcely necessary to introduce it in this place, to "support my request for a liberal advance; and when the policy of not with- "holding the assistance of Government at this particular period, when the "Ryots ought to be conciliated, is taken into consideration, I trust that the present "demand is not greater than is absolutely required." It deserves also to be remarked, that the Board of Revenue recommended the grant for your sanction in the seventh paragraph of their Secretary's letter of the 20th July 1812, on precisely the same grounds which were stated by the Collector in justification of the advance. It likewise appears, from the letter addressed by the Collector of Cuddapah to the Board of Revenue, on the 22d December 1812, that he had in vain attempted to conclude a permanent settlement in the talook of Chetwel, the renters preferring to contract for their lands under a decennial lease. It would be easy to multiply proofs, that it was not the landholders who desired, but the Government who were bent on the introduction of the permanent settlement, at the period to which we allude; and we cannot believe, until positive evidence of the fact be adduced, that the postponement of the measure will cause either disaffection or discontent. An immoderate assessment, whatever may be the form or duration of the settlement under which it is levied, is likely enough to excite feelings of that description; but a moderate and just assessment, adapting itself to the circumstances of the people, and collected in the way most consonant to their habits, and best calculated to save them from oppression and wrong, will, we doubt not, be cheerfully submitted to, although unaccompanied, in the first instance, with a pledge that it will never be increased.

Letter from, dated 25th August 1813. (Par. 1 to 20) Explaining what has been done in obedience to the instructions conveyed in the Court's Revenue dispatch, dated 16th December 1812.

109. We now propose to review the measures which were adopted by you, in consequence of our instructions of the 16th December 1812.

110. It appears, from the letter before us and the accompanying enclosures, that after calling on the Board of Revenue to report the progress which had been made, previously to the receipt of our orders, in forming the decennial village lease settlement, and the Board having reported accordingly, you directed them to submit their sentiments respecting the means of immediately forming a ryotwar settlement in those villages in Trichinopoly, Nellore, Palnaud, Coimbatore, Tinnevelly, Madura, and Dindigul, the villages of the Ceded Districts, and the northern and southern divisions of Arcot, in which a decennial lease had not been concluded; the small talooks in Balaghaut, and the estates which had reverted to Government, where there are no Meerassadars, and where Government was not already so far committed as to have authorized the conclusion of a decennial village lease settlement. In those districts where a village lease settlement had been already concluded, it was to be declared terminable at the expiration of the period for which it had been granted, and the renters were to be required to issue pottahs to the Ryots, on pain of forfeiting their leases. You further desired the Board to state their opinion respecting the term for which it might be advisable to conclude a settlement with the Meerassadars in Tanjore, or other provinces, where Government had not been already pledged to the conclusion of a decennial settlement. In fine, you gave directions that, in forming the settlements, the waste land should be reserved, wherever it might be practicable to do so without producing injurious effects.

111. The foregoing instructions, so far as they were in conformity with our orders of the 16th December 1812, we of course approve; but we have, at the same same time, to regret that you afterwards were induced, by the representations of the Board of Revenue, to depart from them in several material points.

112. In the long minute of the Board, dated the 5th August 1813, which may be considered as their answer to your Secretary's letter of the 15th June, they evince a stronger anxiety to justify themselves against the censure which we had felt it to be our duty to pass upon their conduct, in taking upon themselves, contrary to our orders and without the authority of their immediate superiors, to introduce a decennial, and eventually permanent settlement of the lands, than to comply with the requisition which you had made to them, of submitting their opinion as to the best mode of carrying into effect the instructions we had conveyed to you, and which you had communicated to them. The Board would have pursued a preferable course, if instead of combating the wisdom and propriety of these instructions, they had displayed becoming alacrity in acting upon them; and in adverting to their minute now, it is not by any means our intention to enter into the various controversial questions therein discussed, choosing to confine our remarks principally to the considerations by which you were induced to deviate, in several instances, from the line prescribed for your observance, and to which you originally professed yourselves resolved to adhere.

113. In the first place we have to observe, that although the district of Nellore was one of those into which the Board of Revenue were instructed by your Secretary's letter of the 15th June 1813, to introduce a ryotwar settlement, and although, in the fifth paragraph of your letter now under reply, you apprise us of this district having been comprehended in your instruction; it is excluded, without any reason being assigned, from the list of districts given in the minute of the Revenue Board, in which Government were at liberty to introduce the ryotwar system of collection. This is a circumstance which requires particular explanation.

114. We are informed, also, in paragraph 2 of your subsequent dispatch, dated 4th February 1814, that the province of Coimbatore, which was included not only in your instruction of the 15th June, but in the list contained in the Board's minute as capable of ryotwar settlement, has been subjected to a decennial village lease settlement, and the reason given for this change of resolution is by no means satisfactory. It appears, from the Collector's letter of the 10th September 1813, that he had made some progress in settling the two divisions of the district on a decennial, and ultimately permanent lease, before receiving the Board's orders of the 2d August to suspend that arrangement. It was stated in the same letter, that the head inhabitants had expended considerable sums in advances for the improvement of the different villages; and, on this ground, you deemed it inexpedient to annul their engagements, and authorized the lease to be prosecuted to a conclusion. This is certainly matter of regret, because Coimbatore is described by the Board of Revenue to be almost entirely a dry grain district, and is, on their own view of the subject, on that account particularly well adapted to a ryotwar form of settlement.

115. There are, besides this, two circumstances connected with the settlement of that district, which we cannot permit to pass without notice. The one is, that the Board of Revenue, although they received an intimation from you, on the 15th June, of your intention to introduce a ryotwar settlement into Coimbatore, delayed making any communication to that effect to the Collector until the 2d August, notwithstanding that they must have been aware of the probability of the Collector being employed, during the interval, in carrying into effect their previous orders of the 11th March, for the introduction into the district of a decennial lease. Another circumstance, no less deserving of notice, is, that the Collector deferred replying to the Board's letter of the 2d August until the 10th September, for no other reason, that we see, than his having been engaged in bringing into a more compact state certain accounts which, in the concluding paragraph of his address, he says it would be unnecessarily occupying the Board's attention then to enter into. We trust that these circumstances admit of a satisfactory explanation, and that they are not attributable to so reprehensible a cause as a disposition, on the part either of the Board or of the Collector, to defeat the wishes and intentions of their superiors.

116. We

116. We observe, also, that at the period when you authorized the decennial village settlement to be prosecuted to a conclusion, it had been introduced into only six hundred and four out of 1,519 villages which compose the two divisions of Coimbatore: nevertheless, upon this ground, the Board of Revenue represented, in their minute of the 5th August 1813, (and you have yielded to their representation), that it would be impolitic to introduce the ryotwar system into detached villages in those districts where decennial leases had been partially concluded, and that it was desirable to extend an uniform system of revenue management throughout each district. We readily admit uniformity to be desirable; but it is not always practicable, without making greater sacrifices than the object is worth. There has, for example, been a deviation from the practice here recommended, in the districts of Trichinopoly and Tinnevelly, where the dry lands have been settled ryotwar, and the wet rented under a village lease. Besides, supposing it to have been expedient to adhere to the principle of uniformity in Coimbatore, this is not decisive respecting the system to which the principle ought to have been applied. That it would have been improper to cancel the engagements entered into with the renters, without their consent, is unquestionable; but what excites our surprise is, that no attempt was made to procure their consent, and that the option was not given to the landholders in Coimbatore which has been granted to those of Dindigul, between a ryotwar settlement and the lease, for which they had either contracted or were invited to engage. Had this been done, we are strongly disposed to think that they would have given a preference to a ryotwar settlement.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

117. The same reasons which induced you to authorize the extension of the village settlement throughout the districts into which that settlement had been partially introduced, and also the additional reason that teerwas had never been established in the villages of different zemindarries which have reverted to Government, led you to grant similar authority with regard to those villages. We must confess that the additional reason here assigned for this deviation from our instructions, and your own original intentions, is not more satisfactory than those to which we adverted in the case of Coimbatore. The Board of Revenue say, that " previously to introducing the ryotwar system into the " villages now under the Collector's management, in zillahs Chingleput, Ganjam, and Rajahmundry, it would be necessary to fix the teerwas by survey, " a measure which they were not prepared to recommend." The grounds on which they withheld this recommendation are not stated; nor can we conceive any ground to exist, other than the wish of the Board, in so far as depended on them, to confine the ryotwar settlement within the narrowest possible bounds. If it arose from a consideration of the inadequacy of the Collector's powers, as circumscribed by the Judicial Regulations, to fix the teerwas by survey, we think the importance of an equal and just assessment on the Ryots, which could alone be effected by that operation, would have amply justified you in enlarging their authority for that particular purpose.

118. In consequence of your facility in yielding to their representations, the operation of the ryotwar system will be limited to the collectorship of Madura, the district of Palnaud, the talooks of Balaghaut, and the dry lands of the provinces of Trichinopoly and Tinnevelly.

119. Wherever meerassy rights exist, as in the wet lands of the two provinces last mentioned, we concur with you as to the propriety of concluding the settlement with the Meerassadars. In your instruction to the Board of Revenue respecting the disposal of the wet lands of Tinnevelly and Trichinopoly, you acquainted them, " that it would be very desirable that the engagements " formed with the Meerassadars should not bind the Government for any " definite period; or if that was impracticable, that the period should be as " short as possible, so as that the Court of Directors might not be embarrassed " in their final decision." But the Board of Revenue, when addressing the Collectors, took upon themselves, in opposition to the wish above expressed, to authorize the conclusion of a decennial lease settlement of those lands. As we approve of the parties with whom this settlement was ordered to be made, there is less room for objection to the term for which it has been concluded. We nevertheless hold it to have been improper in the Revenue Board to have acted acted contrary to your express desire, in a matter of so great importance, without a previous reference to you: for admitting the propriety of concluding a settlement with the Meerassadars, wherever a meerassy property exists, we strongly incline to the opinion, that a teerwa, or assessment on each field by measurement, ought to have taken place, previously to the conclusion of a decennial settlement. Mr. Hodgson has indeed stated, in his reports, that the act of fixing a teerwa on wet lands is a decided innovation on ancient custom; but he also states the reason why, under a native administration, a teerwa was unnecessary. The dues of Government were then paid in kind by the cultivators of wet lands; and as those dues consisted of a certain proportion of the crop, it was, of course of little importance to ascertain by measurement the extent and supposed capabilities of the land. This is far otherwise, however, under a system in which the Government share of the crop is commuted for a money rent upon the land in cultivation, a practice which is just as much an innovation as the teerwa. Under such a system, we do not perceive how, without a previous survey, Government can possess the means of drawing a revenue from the waste nunjah land which may be brought into cultivation; and it certainly is not our intention that this resource should be abandoned.

120. You observe, in the nineteenth paragraph of your letter, that our instructions of the 16th December 1812, desiring you to revert to the ryotwar system, wherever the authority of Government might not be contrariwise committed, had occasioned to you considerable embarrassment regarding the course of proceeding most proper to be pursued; that it is essential, not merely to the success, but even to the practicability of that system, that proprietary rights, either temporary or permanent, should be conferred upon the Ryots; that it is indispensable to the existence of that right, that a great reduction should be made in the assessment upon the lands; and that this reduction may be productive, in a financial view, of a degree of inconvenience which, under other systems, might have been avoided.

121. In like manner, the Board of Revenue observe, with reference to the proposed introduction of the ryotwar plan of settlement, that in the district of Trichinopoly, " an immediate reduction of the teerwas is absolutely neces- " sary; the existing rate of teerwa on the wet lands having produced the ruin- " ous effects of impoverishing all the Meerassadars;" that " in Dindigul the " teerwa is oppressive, and that in Madura, it is supposed, reductions will be " necessary;" that " the teerwa on the dry lands in Tinnevelly, though sup- " posed to be moderate with reference to the rates of assessment on dry grain " lands in other districts, must be reduced considerably, if it be wished that " the same benefits should be extended to the occupants of these lands as are " enjoyed by the cultivators in Canara, &c." They go on to state, that the measures of permanently reducing the teerwas would give great satisfaction to the Ryots; and that though it would be attended with a temporary reduction of revenue, little doubt could exist, that by the increased excitement which would thereby be given to industry, the deficiency would, at no great distance of time, be amply replaced.

122. We mean not to dispute, that in the districts here specified by the Board, as well as in others, the rate of assessment may be higher than is compatible with the prosperity of the Ryots and the improvement of the country; but we cannot concur with you in opinion, that under a ryotwar system a reduction of the assessment can be indispensably necessary, which under other modes of settlement might be avoided. Under a zemindarry or mootahdarry settlement, it has been usual to grant a remission of fifteen per cent. upon the Government assessment, for the purpose of enabling the Zemindar or Mootahdar to defray the expense of collecting the rents from the Ryots, to subsist himself and family, and to indemnify him for the trouble and risk of his speculation. Under such a plan of setttlement, a very small part of the remission, if any at all, goes to the Ryots; whereas, under a ryotwar settlement, the expenses of collection are defrayed directly by Government, and there is no intermediate renter to be supported or reimbursed. When Government, therefore, under the last-mentioned scheme, consents to a reduction of the assessment, the whole benefit of the remission goes immediately to the Ryots, by whom all rent is produced, enabling them to increase their stock, to improve and extend their cultivation, cultivation, and by augmenting the quantity of food produced, to favour the growth of population. Under this mode of settlement, also, a larger amount of revenue can be realized from the cultivator, and with less inconvenience to his circumstances, than under any other, because it relieves him the most effectually from abuses practised at his expense by those who make the collections.

123. In the twenty-sixth paragraph of our dispatch from this department, dated the 16th December 1812, we quoted the example of Canara, as illustrative of the benefits which might be expected from a ryotwar scheme of management, and expressed a hope that the adoption of that plan in the unsettled districts would, at no great distance of time, produce a spirit of industry, an extension of agricultural undertaking, and with it an augmentation of the public revenue, similar to what had taken place in that province; and the Board of Revenue, in allusion to the paragraph now referred to, have repeatedly urged in their minute, that a considerable reduction must take place in the assessment of the districts into which the ryotwar system is introduced, if it be intended that the occupants of these lands shall enjoy equal benefits with the cultivators of Canara. The substantial benefits which we contemplated, as likely to result from independent feelings of proprietary right and personal security, when guaranteed to the inhabitants under a system similar to that established in Canara, were expressly stated to be prospective, not immediate. We did not entertain the notion of making the assessment in Canara a standard measure, by which the assessment of the other provinces should be equalized. The state of our finances would alone have prevented us from consenting to such an immediate reduction of the public revenue as would necessarily have been required, and we are not without surprise that your Board of Revenue should have put that construction upon our sentiments.

124. We shall not, on the other hand, as we have more than once stated in this dispatch, be indisposed to sanction a moderate reduction of the rates of assessment, wherever experience has shewn, or may shew them to be too high, being persuaded with you, that in such cases, "to keep up the teerwas would "not keep up the revenue, but would depress the people, impoverish the "country, and destroy the means of improving its condition." We cannot, however, by any means assent to the proposition, that the temporary sacrifice which it may be necessary to make, in order to ensure the success of a ryotwar plan of management, might have been avoided under other forms of settlement. What we have stated in this dispatch, and more at large in our former dispatches to your Government on this subject, it is not necessary here to repeat. But supposing your view of it to be correct, may we not ask, why all the concessions adverted to in our revenue dispatch of the 6th June 1814, amounting in the aggregate to a large remission, were made to the Meerassadars of Tanjore on the introduction of the quinquennial lease into that province? why, in the Cuddapah division of the Ceded Districts, there was an abatement granted at the conclusion of the decennial lease, of Star Pagodas 55,480, on the survey assessment of the lands in question? why, in the southern division of Arcot, a decennial settlement has been concluded on terms exhibiting a deduction of three and a half per cent from the collections under the triennial lease? and why, in the collectorship of Coimbatore, a similar settlement has been concluded, on terms, for the first five years of the period, considerably below not only the survey assessment and the jumma of the triennial lease, but all the averages of former years' collections, although under all these settlements, we believe, provision has been made, not only for the continuance of tuccavy advances and the repair of the larger tanks by Government, but also for remissions in cases of extraordinary calamity? concessions, which, we cannot suppose from the documents before us, were expected to be granted only in the customary acceptation of those terms. We do not say that these actual statements of the public demand, and the temporary reductions of it provided for in future cases of necessity, were improper or unnecessary, but they certainly do not corroborate your assertion, that a reduction of assessment might have been avoided, had we not instructed you to revert to a ryotwar system of collection.

125. Wherever remissions are granted, we shall expect to be furnished with a satisfactory statement of the grounds on which they may be authorized. We desire, desire, also, to be informed, whether the reduction of the teerwas is to be considered as temporary or perpetual; and also of the proportion which the total amount of the reduction bears to the survey, or computed assessment, of the waste land capable of cultivation in the district where the reduction takes place. This information is necessary, to enable us to form an estimate of our prospective resources; for supposing fifteen per cent. to be deducted from the assessment of the sirkar land in cultivation, supposing, also, the waste land belonging to the sirkar, and capable of cultivation, not to exceed fifteen per cent. of the sirkar land in actual cultivation, and supposing, lastly, the assessment now imposed on the cultivated land to be the maximum of our demand upon it, it is obvious that, in the event of every acre of arable land now waste being brought into cultivation, the revenue accruing to the public would be no higher than it was before the remission was granted. The supposition here made, as to the extent of the remission, is probably beyond the necessity of the case; and as to the extent of the waste land, it is certainly much below the fact: but it serves to illustrate our view in desiring the information above required.

126. In allusion to the measures of restraint and compulsion, which you again, in the papers before us, represent to have been practised upon the Ryots, under the ryotwar system, we have already intimated our opinion, that whatsoever effect they may have had in extending the cultivation, and upholding the revenues of particular districts, their operation, generally taken, may probably have been rather pernicious than salutary. But however this may be, it is by no means our intention, nor do we consider it at all indispensable to the scheme, that the Ryots should be subjected to the arbitrary discretion of our revenue servants, or to any interference which would be inconsistent with the dictates of natural justice, or the principles of a liberal policy.

We have paid great attention to the instructions conveyed in your Secretary's letters to the Board of Revenue, under dates the 15th May 1812 and the 3d of September 1813, respecting the principles by which the Board and the Collectors ought to be guided in forming the settlements of those districts into which a decennial lease was in train of being introduced;* and though we are free to acknowledge, that in the general form in which they are drawn up, they are, perhaps, as unobjectionable as any which could be framed, yet we cannot but fear they will prove inadequate to prevent the various evils which we conceive to be almost inseparable from the renting system.

127. Nothing could be more proper, for example, than your instruction to the Board to pay primary and particular attention to the persons with whom the settlements should be concluded, accompanied with a notification, that unless they were those who by hereditary right or established usage, or on some other just grounds, ought to be placed in the relation in which they would stand to Government on the one hand, and to the Ryots on the other, the settlement should not receive your confirmation. But in tracing the practical application of this principle, we find from the report of your Revenue Board, dated the 1st January 1814, that the renters during the triennial lease, were to have a preference; next to them the Meerassadars, Potails, and Curnums, on resigning their offices; and lastly, any resident inhabitant or Ryot. Thus, from the mere circumstance of a person having been a renter under the triennial lease, although he may have been prior to that arrangement a strange adventurer, without interest in the soil or connection in the place, his title was to supersede the claims of the most respectable inhabitants; and, without reference either to hereditary right or established usage, he was to be interposed between them and the Government.

128. You likewise directed the Board to require, that pottahs should be granted to the Ryots by the renters, on pain of forfeiting their leases; to take care that the right of the under-tenants should be left unimpaired, and that the renters should not be authorized to exact more from them than was warranted by the usage of the particular villages. The latter part of the instruction is cautiously worded; for had you employed the term permitted, instead of autho-rized, rized, it probably would have occurred that you were enjoining what was simply impracticable. It is not always easy exactly to ascertain the village-rates; and the obstacles in the way of a poor Ryot establishing their amount by satisfactory evidence in a court of justice, in a suit for undue exaction against a renter, we consider to be nearly insurmountable. The difficulty of enforcing the grant of pottahs, proceeding sometimes from reluctance on the part of the renters, and occasionally from unwillingness on the part of the Ryots to commit themselves to formal specific engagements, will, in numberless instances, defeat your wishes and intentions in this respect, if they are not seconded by the Curnums, whose exertions (were this class of persons kept, as they ought to be, entirely dependent upon Government) may be most usefully directed in superintending the distribution of pottahs, and whose accounts, in the absence of these engagements, furnish the best means of adjusting the various disputes which arise between renters and their under-tenants.

* Bellary, Cuddapah, Nellore, northern division of Arcot, southern division of Arcot, Coimbatore, Tanjore.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

129. It is, therefore, with the utmost concern we find, that the Curnums, instead of being thus employed, have been admitted to engage as renters for villages, on resigning their offices. And even this is not the whole extent, nor the worst part of the innovation; for we find it stated, in the report of the Board of Revenue, that in a proclamation issued by the Collector of Cuddapah, preparatory to the introduction of the decennial lease, "the former "Meerassadars were informed that, by the establishment of fixed rents, the "office of Reddee or Potail was virtually to become extinct, and that the con- "tinuance of a separate renter and separate Reddee in one village was inad- "missible; that, in case the former Meerassadars accepted the rent, their "enaums would be continued, but that in case the rent was taken by others, "it would rest with the Sirkar to resume the whole enaum, or to give it to the "new renters, or in consideration of the former services of the Meerassadars, "to continue a part of it to them." We know not what resolution you may have come to, when the proceedings connected with the settlement of Cuddapah were submitted to you, but we have no hesitation in expressing our most decided disapprobation of any arrangement which may have been formed on principles so repugnant to our sense both of justice and of policy, as those contained in the foregoing quotation.

130. In our Judicial dispatch of the 29th April 1814, we acquainted you, that "from various respectable and concurring testimonies, we were led to "recognize in the Potail and Curnum the most powerful instrument that any "Government can possess, for conducting the detailed operations of its inter- "nal administration, as well in regard to the distribution of justice as the di- "rection of the police. It appears to be through this agency that the frame "and constitution of the little village communities, of which all India is com- "posed, has been held together for so many centuries. They are, unques- "tionably, what they have been termed, the natural and permanent authorities "of the country, and true policy strongly dictates the expediency of our avail- "ing ourselves of their services; for it is thus only, that the business of Go- "vernment can be adequately conducted in a foreign country like India, in "which the population is so extensive, and the habits and manners of the peo- "ple so different from our own." The sentiments we then communicated to you still operate upon us with undiminished force; and if from inadvertence, or any other cause, you had been led to countenance a settlement formed upon the principles laid down in the proclamation of the Collector of Cuddapah, we trust that, on the receipt of the dispatch above referred to, you would take immediate steps for correcting an error, which, if persevered in, would, in our apprehension, prove highly injurious to the interests both of Government and its subjects. We are the more sanguine in this expectation, because we observe that your final confirmation of the settlements was to be withheld, until they had undergone a full investigation by you, and a scrupulous revision and correction by the different Collectors.

131. A settlement concluded on the principles contained in the extract we have given from the report of the Board of Revenue, would not only completely subvert those village constitutions, which it is our desire and intention to uphold, but it would, according to our conception, be fraught with the most glaring injustice to individuals. The Board observe, that in the proclamation issued by Mr. Ross, the former Meerassadars were informed that by the establishment of fixed rents, the office of Reddee or Potail was virtually become extinct. This proceeding probably originated in the orders which were issued to the Collectors of the Ceded Districts, in the latter end of 1809, during the first year of the triennial lease, and we regret to say under the sanction of your Government.

132. We at all events find, from the papers connected with your later proceedings respecting the decennial lease, that the Board are stated to have actually decided, and under your authority, that neither a Meerassadar, Reddee, or Potail, declining to rent, could have any claim to participate in Potail enaums, because these enaums in the Ceded Districts appear, from your records, to be enjoyed on condition of certain service being performed by the holders. But in order to justify the resumption of the enaums of the Potails, it should surely have been clearly made out, that the service required of the Potails is precisely that described in the condition of their tenures. Were the Potails, for example, to refuse to collect the Government rents from the Ryots, according to the custom of the country, or were they to decline interfering in disputes submitted to them for arbitration, there might be justice, on either of those grounds, in depriving them of their enaums, because they could have no claim to the emoluments of their office, after having ceased to perform its specific and appropriate duties. On the other hand, we disclaim the right of arbitrarily stripping them of their hereditary official possessions and privileges, because they do not choose to make themselves responsible for the payment of a fixed village rent, when perhaps they may have a firm persuasion in their own minds of their inability to make good the proposed engagement.

134. In the course of the correspondence which took place between the Board of Revenue and the Collector of Cuddapah, respecting the decennial settlement of that district, we observe that some discussion arose, respecting the expediency of limiting or extending the number of persons to be admitted as parties to the lease.* The Collector represented, on the ground of former experience, that the fewer renters there were in a village the better, for that where there were many each had his party. The Ryots were divided: an appeal was made to one from the orders of another; one made agreements which the other would not sanction; one directed the Neerhutee* to let the water out, another went and closed the sluice. This led to quarrels and prosecutions, hostile to the interests of all. Mr. Ross adds, that one of the causes of failure in the triennial lease was, the number of persons admitted to shares in the pottah, each person holding a share being responsible for a distinct portion of the rent; that the quarrels, criminal complaints, and lawsuits in these villages were incessant; that the cultivation was stopped, and that, in the end, the rent remained unpaid. The Board, on the other hand, recommended the admission of as many Ryots as possible to the lease, not on a separate, but joint responsibility. In support of this opinion they argued, that it would be difficult to extend the responsibility of the rent beyond those whose names were entered in the pottahs, because the profit and loss, except where agreement to the contrary existed, would be confined to the Putteedars: and this might lead to numerous complaints on the part of those partners of the village where there might be a profit, and complaints on the part of the renters where there might be a loss, as the partners not renters would claim a share in the profit, and the renters would naturally be desirous of subdividing the loss. The Board accordingly acquainted the Collectors, that all who were partners in the meerass, and who were willing and able to take a share in the rent, should be admitted, in order that the profits of the rent might be more generally diffused, or the loss be more equally divided.

135. The establishment of a village settlement having been once determined on, we believe that the Board, in issuing this instruction, chose the least of two inconveniences. But, in expressing this belief, we must at the same time concur in the opinion of the Collector, that the evils described by him, as incident to the course which has been adopted, were of a serious nature. The expedient to which the Collector intended to resort, of appointing two, three, or four of the partners of the meerass to carry on the intercourse with the Sirkar, Sirkar, and to manage the affairs of the village, would be quite ineffectual for the prevention of disputes, as it was to be declared that the intended nomination was not to interfere with any internal arrangements which the parties might agree to adopt among themselves, which arrangements we conceive to have been the source of all the mischiefs to which he had before alluded, and which do not appear to have proceeded from any circumstances peculiar to the district of Cuddapah, but will naturally follow on the renting system, wherever it is introduced.

136. It is, however, very evident to our minds, that in Cuddapah, Bellary, Coimbatore, and the two divisions of Arcot, great numbers have been shut out who ought to have been included in the settlement; and the observation applies to other parts of the country into which the decennial leases were introduced. It appears, from the papers before us, and from others which we have had occasion to examine, that in the provinces we have enumerated, meerassy rights having been nearly extinguished by the exactions of former Governments, the Ryots of that description had been reduced, in a great measure, to the situation of Oolcoodies and Paracoodies holding of the Sirkar.

137. In these districts, the general principle on which the Collectors proceeded, under the instructions they received, was to conclude their settlements with such of the principal cultivators as might be sufficiently respectable to give a value to their responsibility; and on this point you observe, in your Revenue dispatch of the 29th February 1812, that the condition "of the general body "of the Ryots, as represented in the minute and proceedings of the Board of "Revenue, while it leaves them without any plea of right to a direct partici-"pation in the settlement, would render their exclusion in no respect an "injury." A similar view of the subject is taken by Mr. Ravenshaw, the Collector of southern Arcot, in his letters to that Board, dated 7th February and 9th July of the same year.

138. It is rather surprising, that a different, and in some respects an opposite state of things, should have led to the same practical measures. In districts where private property exists, it has been pleaded (and we think on satisfactory grounds) that the settlements ought to be concluded with the Meerassadars (that is, as far as their rights of meerassy legally extend), and not with the Ryots, who in such circumstances may be considered as their tenants; and in districts where private property is known to have but a partial existence, the settlement, instead of being concluded, as one would expect, with the actual cultivators, is confined to a comparatively few individuals, who are either selected indiscriminately from the resident cultivators, or admitted from other quarters, on account of their willingness to accept terms which the former have rejected: and those individuals, whether natives or strangers, are on no good grounds of preference constituted, really or nominally, proprietors of the village: if really, to the prejudice of others with equal pretensions; if nominally, only with the certainty that the great object of the settlement will not be accomplished.

139. We cannot agree with you, in deeming the case to be one from which considerations of justice were entirely excluded, and therefore are not satisfied of the expediency of the course which has been pursued; for what is unjust can never be expedient.

140. From the peculiar constitution of Hindoo society, and the natural tendency of their laws of inheritance, we conceive that landed property in India, wherever it has existed, must have been more subdivided than in any other country. If in consequence of the inordinate exactions of the native Governments, you have found that species of private property, in many districts, either annihilated or nearly so; and if you are actuated, as you profess to be, by a sincere desire to restore it, the parties who should benefit from this intention are surely those, or the descendants of those, who have been reduced from the situation of proprietors to that of occupants of the soil: they are the great body, of Ool coody or resident Ryots, as distinguished from the Pyacarries or migratory cultivators; and where it could be done without injury to the just claims of the former, it would, in our judgment, have been an exercise of sound policy, policy, to have extended similar benefits to the latter, and thereby induce them to settle and concentrate their labours and industry in one spot.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

141. By confining the boon to a few individuals, taken from the first class, you not only circumscribe a relief which, however slender, ought to be general in its operation, but you do positive injustice to those of the same class who are not the objects of it, since by keeping them degraded from the rank of tenants of Government, and making them tenants to a renter, you render their situation worse, instead of better, than you found it.

142. That the grievance just alluded to is by no means an imaginary one, we have the respectable authority of Colonel Munro for believing. " The Ryot," says he, " feels a certain degree of pride in being a Government tenant, he " thinks that it adds to his consequence, and he feels that it renders him more " independent; there can, therefore, be no doubt that the inhabitants them- " selves, under all changes of system, would wish for the preservation of that " right which they have ever enjoyed, of holding their lands directly of Go- " vernment."

143. Upon the whole, we cannot help expressing our deep regret, that a system altogether so objectionable should have been so extensively established in our peninsular territories; and that the practical operation of the orders conveyed in our dispatch of the 16th December 1812, has been so much narrowed by representations which ought not to have been listened to, or by circumstances which might have been prevented.

144. The account given by the Collector of the southern division of Arcot, in his letter of the 4th October 1812, of the ryotwar system and its effects, (a system for which he appears to have been a decided advocate, from a long and extensive experience of its results in Canara and the southern division of Arcot,) presents a striking contrast to the confusion and misery represented by him to have been produced by the system of leases, under which it is stated, that personal property, to the amount of Star Pagodas 1,03,000 was sold in the course of three years for the payment of rent; that the inferior Ryots, in numerous instances, were teazed, worried, and oppressed, until they fled from the district; and that many of the renters, after exhausting upon others all the means of extortion, were themselves thrown into jail. Speaking of the former, he says, " The heads of villages were, in fact, nothing more than collectors of the re- " venue. Each Ryot was bound to pay for this trouble; an annual allowance, " as pay, was made to them. Each inferior Ryot was answerable for his own " rent, which being calculated on the land he actually reaped, its produce was " always good security for it. The head was only answerable, in the same " way, for the rent of his own private cultivation, and for what he actually " collected from the inferior Ryots. Hence there was no responsibility, no " risk incurred, and after a bad season, all hands were, with the usual assistance " of tuccavy, nearly as well able as ever to commence their labours afresh."

145. Mr. Ravenshaw adds, " Although the detail of this system has been " declared, and certainly is incompatible with the system of jurisprudence " established in the territories under this Government, yet it must be, and in- " deed has been allowed to be, extremely well calculated to ascertain and im- " prove the resources and condition of the cultivating classes of a newly " acquired district. I have ever thought much good would result from con- " tinuing it some years longer: but the judicial system having, as I humbly " conceive, been permanently introduced, whatever benefit may have been " derived from a continuance of it must be sacrificed to the supposed advantages " of a general and uniform system of justice."

146. We wish that an explicit statement had been made of the points in which the ryotwar system is supposed to be incompatible with our judicial system. We are not aware why a system, under which the cultivators pay the dues of Government directly to the European Collector, should be more inconsistent, either with the forms or substance of justice, than one under which the same dues are collected through the immediate agency of a farmer of revenue; for it should be recollected, that the ryotwar system is in constant operation either way, the only difference being in the person by whom it is administered.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

147. Indeed, the court of Sudder Adawlut, in answer to your reference to them on this very subject, state, that "they are not aware of any power "which is vested in the courts, to question the policy of any plan which "may be adopted by the Government, of adjusting and collecting the land "revenue, or to interfere in any stage of its execution. Their power and "their business obviously extend no further than to maintain all parties in "possession of their rights, under the existing plan of settlement, whether "those rights be derived from specific engagements or local usage." On the same point it is observed by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, in their subsequent report of the 25th July 1814, which has just reached us, that it "is obviously "only a forced and unnatural exaction of labour, that would meet with ob"struction in the zillah courts, and that any contract voluntarily entered into "for the mutual benefit of both parties, must be enforced as readily when the "Government is one of the parties, as when it may be entered into by indi"viduals."

148 The instructions contained in our dispatch from the judicial department, dated the 29th April 1814, render it unnecessary for us more particularly to notice the references to the Sudder Adawlut, mentioned in the ninth and tenth paragraph of your letter now under reply.

149. In the third paragraph of your subsequent letter, dated the 4th February 1814, you have drawn our attention to the correspondence between the Board of Revenue and the Collector, respecting the village lease-settlement concluded in the Southern division of Arcot, together with your own preliminary observations thereupon; and as this arrangement is intimately connected with the subjects discussed in the preceding paragraphs, we shall take it in immediate succession.

150. The objections we have already stated to the exclusion of the Ryots in general from the settlements, are also applicable to this division. With respect to the settlement of renters, we are unable to judge, from the late Collector's reports, whether, under all the circumstances, it is the best that could have been made; and concerning the number of persons with whom the settlement was concluded, you confess that you have no direct information. At the close of fusily 1221, 1,985 villages, or nearly two-thirds of the whole villages of the district, appear to have been settled; and, of these, nine hundred and fifty-nine are stated to have been rented by the former renters, five hundred and twenty-five by the former renters and their chosen associates, and five hundred and one by strangers. What proportion of the former renters were strangers at the period of the formation of the triennial lease, we know not; but their number, whatever it was, ought to be added to the five hundred and one included in the decennial settlement. We are well persuaded that Mr. Ravenshaw would not have admitted so large a proportion of persons of this description to the lease, if he could have obtained terms equally favourable from the resident occupants: but their admission is nevertheless a great evil.

151. The description given by Mr. Ravenshaw, of the general circumstances of the renters, precludes the hope either of security to the public revenue or of improvement to the country, from their capitals. "The class of people "whom we are now putting in possession of estates," says he, "are not men "of property, from which they are able to make up any losses they may meet "with, and who can afford to wait for better seasons to remunerate them: but "however fit, in other respects, for the situations they are placed in, they "have, generally speaking, no property, except their cattle; and if they are "made answerable for any thing more than trivial losses, they must be ruined, "and their estates shortly revert to Government, in a much worse state than "they are in at present." It is evident from this account, that the settlement presents no further security for public revenue, than what arises out of the assessment; a species of security which, if the assessment were moderate, would have been equally obtained under any other form of settlement, and particularly under a ryotwar system of settlement, unaccompanied with the many evils which appear to be inseparable from the renting system; a system characterized by Colonel Munro as "a sort of gambling which involves many "of the most respectable cultivators in ruin."

152 The assessment under the new settlement has been calculated on the average collections of ten years, from fusily 1211 to 1220, amounting to Star

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

Pagodas 5,33,309 for the whole district, exclusive of Cuddalore and Pondicherry.* This assessment is three and six-sixteenths per cent. less than the average collections under the triennial lease; † but it is one and ten sixteenths per cent. more than the average collections of the seven years immediately preceding the triennial lease,‡ and four and twelve sixteenths per cent. more than the average collections of the seven years ending with fusily 1220.§

153. The rules which have been observed in apportioning the above assessment appear to be judicious; but its amount is rather to be considered as the maximum of our demand upon the land included in the settlement, than the revenue which we may expect to derive from it. In the district of Cuddapah, the Collector has made it a specific condition of the settlement, that allowance shall be made in untoward seasons for a failure of water in the tank villages. Mr. Ravenshaw, however, thought it unnecessary to make this a condition of the settlement of the southern division of Arcot, not because the landholders could there dispense with relief under similar circumstances, but because he "considered it "to be included in the general pledge given, that remission of rent shall be "granted in proportion to the badness of the season, so long as Government "may deem this to be necessary," which we find that he considered would, at all events, be the case for some years. He adds, "on the liberal fulfilment of "the pledge I conceive to have been given to that effect, as well as for grant-"ing the aid of tuccavy and repairing tanks, the success or failure of the "system now introducing, the prosperity or ruin I may say of the country, "depends." Mr. Ravenshaw, when called before the Revenue Board, on his arrival at the presidency, is also stated to have declared, that "had he not "conceived Government to be pledged to grant remissions, he would not have "made the settlement so high."

154. The Board of Revenue, in their proceedings respecting the settlement,‖ while they coincide in sentiment with the Collector on this point, go further, and in our opinion to a very objectionable length. "The Board," they say, "need not dwell on the impolicy of withholding remission, where a "claim can be established, founded on actual loss from misfortune or other "causes; and it occurs to the Board to remark, that it might be imprudent to "endeavour to trace any alleged loss to wilful neglect or otherwise, because, "under the proposed plan, there is a manifest excitement to industry, and no "object, now the assessment is fixed, is to be obtained by neglect." This we deem a very objectionable doctrine; for howmuchsoever a fixed assessment may tend to encourage industry, there will always be found, in a large body of men, a number of individuals whose indolence will be proof against every consideration, addressed even to their most obvious interests, and it is by no means desirable that such persons should be screened from the natural consequences of their want of exertion. An indiscriminate grant of remission, in cases of loss arising from misfortune or other causes, would, besides, confirm the propensity to improvident wastefulness, which constitutes a marked feature in the native character, and which prevents them from making provision out of the surplus of one year for the contingent deficiency of another. We regret to find, therefore, from the minutes of your Revenue Consultations of the 4th February 1814, that you express a general concurrence in the sentiments of the Board on this subject, without the qualifications which the passage above quoted certainly required.

155. We have no doubt, however, that remissions will be necessary, particularly at the beginning; and without knowing the extent to which they may be requisite, it is difficult to form a judgment, how far the amount of assessment ought to be regarded as favourable or otherwise.

156. It is satisfactory to learn, that an opening has been left in the settlement, for any new arrangement which it may be thought proper to adopt respecting the cavelly and devastanum lands; and also, that the Curnums and Taliars have been made dependant on Government for the payment of their allowances. We have some doubts whether, as these officers are paid by Government, their nomination should be left to the renters, subject to the Collector's * Inclusive of Cuddalore and Pondicherry, Star Pagodas 5,43,086. † Star Pagodas 5,51,600. ‡ Star Pagodas 5,24,360. § Star Pagodas 5,07,887. ‖ Dated 29th March 1813.

Collector's sanction. Mr. Ravenshaw says it is fair that it should be so; but, if there are not good reasons to the contrary, we think it desirable that the power of appointing them should be reserved to the Collectors. Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 12 April 1815.

157. In the opinion expressed by the Revenue Board, as to the expediency of restoring to the village officers in the southern division of Arcot, and wherever else they may have been resumed, the maunium or service-lands, we entirely concur; and we direct that measures may forthwith be taken for that purpose.

158. We need hardly say, that we approve of the observations contained in your minute of Consultation, respecting the propriety of excluding the waste land from the settlement wherever it may be practicable; and we trust you will take care that your intentions on this head are duly attended to in Arcot and the other districts. We are at the same time desirous, that liberal encouragement shall be given to the cultivation of waste lands; and, with this view, it may be expedient to allow the renters to hold them, either altogether exempt from, or subject to a very light assessment, for some years after they are reclaimed.

159. In consequence of the Collector having omitted to make provision in the settlement for the payment of the rent, in such coins as are issued from the Company's mint, you have properly required this omission to be supplied.

160. In withholding your confirmation from the settlement, until many of the points on which its merits depend should be more fully investigated, and the whole work should undergo a scrupulous revision, you have acted with becoming deference to our instructions.

161. It appears that, pending the settlement, an extensive and deep-laid conspiracy was discovered among the native servants of the Collector, for the purpose of defrauding Government. Survatum Row, the head Serishtadar, was charged with having, in consideration of bribes, connived with the Tehsildars of Tinnamalla, Chetput and Triculloor, and caused the Curnums of several villages of those districts to write false accounts of their produce and resources, for the purpose of obtaining a remission of rent.

162. The Tehsildars of the above-mentioned districts were charged with being parties to the fraud, and the Aumeen or Meeshreef of the sayer chokey in Trinomalla were accused of suffering goods to pass duty free.

163. No reasonable doubt can be entertained of the delinquency of these persons, as they seem all, with the exception of the Tehsildar of Triculloor, to have confessed their guilt; and, in his case, the evidence is sufficient to substantiate the charge.

164. Much as we respect the motives which induced Mr. Ravenshaw to recommend the case of his Serishtadar to the indulgent consideration of his superiors, we concur in opinion with the Revenue Board, that the general good requires an example to be made of head servants, who instead of setting an example to the rest, seduce them into a conspiracy to betray their trust. Whilst we approve, therefore, of the dismissal of all who were implicated in the fraud, we are far from thinking that the additional steps which the Board proposed should be taken against Survatum Row, of proclaiming him incapable of further employment by Government, and of prosecuting him before the court, were more rigorous than the occasion called for.

165. It is satisfactory to hear, that the fraud was discovered in time to admit of the engagements for those villages where the impositions were practised being cancelled.

166. The register which the Collector has been directed to prepare, in which is to be contained the name of each village in the different talooks, the names of the parties with whom the settlement has been concluded, the revenue derived from each, on the average of three, seven, and ten years respectively, the amount of the decennial settlement, the extent of lands arable and waste, &c. will prove a very useful document, if it be executed with care and accuracy.

167. You will have perceived from our Judicial dispatch of the 29th April 1814, that we were neither unaware of the existence, nor insensible of the magnitude magnitude of the evils and inconveniences described by Mr. Ravenshaw, in his letter of the 4th October 1812, as resulting from the want of the ready means of settling the petty disputes which are constantly occurring among the natives; and the sentiments and instructions contained in that dispatch will have prepared you to expect our approbation of your having, agreeably to that gentleman's suggestion and the recommendation of the Board of Revenue, directed a regulation to be framed, authorizing the Collector, in the first instance, to hear and determine all disputes respecting the occupying, cultivating, and irrigating of land, which may arise between the renters and their Ryots in those districts where the land is fixed, either permanently or for a term of years. You justly observe, in support of this proceeding, "that when the amount and "appropriation of the demands of Government upon the land are permanently "fixed, the Collector may be regarded as an arbiter in such disputes, not less "impartial than the judge; and that, from the means of information possessed "by him, and the promptness of his decision, the authority proposed to be de-"legated to him is likely to be of great utility, and to give entire satisfaction "to the inhabitants."

168. We have read, with the attention to which they are justly entitled, the observations of Mr. Ravenshaw on the existing defects of the judicial system, as it regards the protection of the cultivators; and we entertain an earnest persuasion, that the measures we have generally proposed, in our dispatch already referred to, will go far to remove the evils so forcibly pointed out by him.

169. We observe that his proposition for investing the Collector with the power of civil adjudication went farther than appears to have been sanctioned by the Board of Revenue or by your Government, inasmuch as he recommended that the Collector should be allowed to decide "disputes relative to the revenue "collections."

170. We have had occasion to enter into a consideration of this subject in our judicial dispatch to the Bengal Government, of the 9th November last, with a copy of which we have furnished you, and from which you will perceive that our minds are strongly disposed towards giving to the Superintendants of the Revenue under that presidency the power of determining revenue questions, subject to the limitations therein expressed; and that we have desired to be furnished with the sentiments of that Government, and the subordinate Judicial and Revenue authorities under it, upon that matter.

(3 to 5.) Referring to proceedings respecting the decennial village lease settlement in the southern division of Arcot

174. These proceedings have been already reviewed in an antecedent part of this dispatch.

(6.) Referring to the report of the Revenue Board for particular information respecting occurrences in that department. Observations, concerning some of them, will be hereafter submitted.

175. You will perceive, from the contents of this dispatch, that we have perused the report of the Revenue Board; but we shall postpone any farther comment on the topics therein discussed, until we are furnished with the observations upon them which you have led us to expect.

REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE,
Dated the 12th August 1814.

To the Honourable the Court of Directors for Affairs of the Honourable the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies.

HONOURABLE SIRS:

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 12 Aug. 1814.

Par. 1. Having fully considered the letter from your Honourable Court in this department, dated the 16th of December 1812, we propose, at this time, to enter into an explanation of our sentiments on the several branches of the very important subject to which it relates. We have already acknowledged the receipt of that letter, and stated the measures which it induced us to adopt, and we trust that the consideration which it was necessary for us to give to its contents, and the information connected with them which we have been enabled to acquire, will be allowed by your Honourable Court to account and to compensate for the delay in preparing the present dispatch.

2. In as far as the letter from your Honourable Court is to be regarded as indicating any disposition to postpone the conclusion of a permanent settlement of the land revenue, in the districts in which it has not already been settled, it may be sufficient for us to refer to the representation on that point submitted to your Honourable Court, in the letter from this Government, dated the 5th of March 1813. We entertain no manner of doubt that abundant information has already been procured with regard to the resources of the country, and that those resources are in great danger of being deteriorated by the want of a permanent settlement, and have actually suffered deterioration from that cause The settlement requires to be concluded cautiously and deliberately, and it must therefore be a work of time; but all the reflection which we are capable of bestowing upon the subject, and all the experience which we have gained concerning it, concur in satisfying our minds, that it is a work which ought to be undertaken without further delay.

3. We trust that the doubt thrown out in the dispatches from your Honourable Court, dated the 1st February 1811 and 15th January 1812, as to the policy of binding the Government, under no circumstances and at no period, to increase its demand upon landed property, is now laid aside, since, for the reasons stated in the letter from this Government of the 5th of March 1813, our minds are completely satisfied on that point also. Our fear is, not that the Government will ever be excluded from a fair participation in the augmented resources of the country, whether the land revenue be permanently settled or not, but that the resources of the country must decline, unless they are cherished by a liberal and judicious system of management; and we are persuaded that a permanent settlement of the land revenue is more than any other circumstance essential to such a system.

4. With these explanations as to the preliminary questions whether or not the land revenue ought to be settled in perpetuity at all, and whether or not such a settlement ought to be concluded without further delay, we shall proceed to reply to your Honourable Court's letter, as concerning the ulterior question, what description of permanent settlement it is most desirable to introduce.

5. Your Honourable Court have been pleased to signify to us your directions, that in all the provinces that might be unsettled when those directions might reach us, the principle of the ryotwar system should be acted upon, and to explain the respects in which the village system, that was in progress when your directions did reach us, is considered by your Honourable Court to be contrary to that principle. Deeming it, as we do, to be indispensably necessary that a permanent settlement of the land revenue should take place, we are led by your Honourable Court's dispatch to consider, with reference to the sentiments expressed in it, how far the ryotwar system and the village system are respectively adapted to that purpose, and how far they are at variance with each other. In so doing we believe we shall be able to bring before your Honourable Court most of the observations which it will be necessary for us to offer in reply to your dispatch.

6. Every writing of Colonel Munro's is entitled to attention. His vigorous and comprehensive understanding, the range which his mind takes through the whole science of political economy, the simplicity and clearness with which all his ideas are unfolded, his long and extensive experience and his uniform success, rank him high as an authority in all matters relating to the revenues of India. Independently of the general interest excited by the character of its author, his paper, dated the 15th of August 1807, claims notice, as containing the only project of a ryotwar permanent settlement. To that paper your Honourable Court's dispatch makes a marked reference, and we accordingly feel ourselves at liberty to regard the project which it contains as the permanent settlement which your Honourable Court would wish to introduce. In speaking of the ryotwar system, we therefore beg, for the sake of accuracy, to be understood to mean the system recommended in Colonel Munro's letter of the 15th of August 1807.

7. The first objection to such a system is its impracticability. Colonel Munro does, indeed, propose to grant a remission, generally of twenty-five, and in particular cases of thirty-three per cent. on the survey assessment; but the exigencies of the Government put such a remission entirely out of the question. The success of that, or of any other system, would no doubt be materially promoted by a remission; for it is vain to disguise the truth, that the prosperity of the country is seriously depressed by the public burthens. The assessment is heavier than the country can bear without injury. It has hitherto been exacted by resorting to all the expedients within the reach of the revenue officers: it cannot be permanently secured, unless the proportion which it bears to the produce of the country be diminished; and this is the grand effect which, it is hoped, a permanent settlement may be so contrived as to produce, without any large remission of the amount of revenue at present collected. But, beneficial as its effects would certainly be, the proposed remission is too large to be made; and we have the testimony of Colonel Munro himself, and of every other authority, that without it the proposed system could not be carried into effect. The Ryots will not voluntarily engage to cultivate more land and pay more rent, as they were formerly compelled to do, than suit their convenience and interest. While they are allowed to enjoy the emancipation which the administration of equal laws has conferred upon them, they will enter into no settlement not involving a considerable remission of the present amount of revenue. In expressing this opinion, we would not be understood to say that, where the survey assessment has been introduced it is universally oppressive, but that it is so in the aggregate; and that the whole amount of it, or indeed the same amount even as heretofore, could not be collected by ryotwar management without the same compulsive means as were formerly employed. Colonel Munro, in his report of the 25th of August 1805, states that if the Ryots were freed from every species of restraint, they would probably throw up one-fourth part of the land under cultivation, from inability to cultivate it properly. Since the date of that report, the Ryots have been freed from every species of restraint, so that under a ryotwar system, whether annual or permanent, there would, according to the judgment formed by Colonel Munro, be a reduction of one-fourth part of the revenue.

8. The case was different so long as the Ryots were held in bondage by the Collector, and all the energies of Government were directed to the one object of exacting from the country the largest amount of revenue which it could afford to pay. The Ryots were then compelled, as Colonel Munro's report above referred to shews, to rent land exceeding by one-fourth part the extent of what they were capable of cultivating to their own advantage. But of the two evils, one or other of which is essential to the successful re-establishment of the ryotwar system, it is presumed that it would be accounted the smaller, that a large remission of revenue should be made, rather than that the thraldom from which the Ryots have been emancipated by the courts of justice should again be exercised over them. If that system must be restored, the alternative will be between an immediate, though not a permanent reduction of of revenue, and the use of compulsory means to collect the present revenue without reduction.

9. It was to avoid the necessity of either of these evils, that the Government judged it indispensable to abandon the ryotwar system; and it was believed that the village system, which was substituted for it, independently of its other advantages, had this in its favour, that it might, without any considerable present abatement of revenue, be introduced and acted upon with the free and cordial consent of the people. The joint responsibility of the whole village for the whole rent fixed upon it, would, it seemed, provide sufficiently for the security of the public revenue, while the benefits of the system would be better appretiated and improved by village-renters, than by any other class of people on whom they could be conferred.

10. But even if a ryotwar settlement had been practicable, without a reduction of revenue ill suited to the exigencies of the Government, and without the former system of complete constraint upon the labour and locality of the Ryots, still the inquisitorial interference which it requires the Revenue officers of Government to exercise over the property of the Ryots in the soil, and every thing relating to the management of that property, must have rendered it a perpetual engine of fraud and oppression. It is proposed that the Tehsildar should every year ascertain what quantity of each Ryot's farm is actually occupied; that if the Ryot increase or diminish his cultivation he should require him to throw up or occupy proportionate quantities of good and of bad land, and that the distribution of water, of tuccavy, and of occasional remissions of revenue, and the repair of tanks, wells, &c. should not merely in their general scale, but in the most minute particulars, be regulated under the orders of the Collector, and of course in the first instance by his native servants. If the primary object of a permanent settlement be to give the people the management of their own affairs, from the belief that their affairs will be infinitely better managed by themselves than by public officers, how little would that object be attained under such a system? How entirely would all management still remain in those hands from which it was meant to transfer it! It is singular, that under a system professedly designed to protect the rights and interests of landed proprietors, they are to forfeit all property in any land which, through general or peculiar calamity, or indolence or mismanagement, they may any year fail to cultivate, and their property in it is, on every such occurrence, to escheat to the Government: assuredly, a more violent encroachment on landed property, where it really exists, than ever was attempted under any other system: but, independently of the evil of this giving and taking of the land, the mode of effecting it leaves the landed proprietor (as he is nevertheless esteemed) entirely at the mercy of the very superintendents from whose interference it was proposed to extricate him. He is not secure against a fraudulent measurement or estimation of the land he quits or the land he occupies: nay, if to escape from this mode of oppression, he resolves not to alter his limits, the current business of agriculture, the means of irrigation, the distribution of tuccavy, or of an abatement of rent on account of calamity, all must be regulated by men who have no interest in his prosperity, no sympathy with his feelings. Surely it were better that confidence should be reposed where self-interest affords a security against its being abused, and that the people should be left to improve the country in their own way, without the incumbrance of useless and ill-judged aid from public officers, and without the dread of their oppression and rapacity. At any rate, we own that the ryotwar system proposed by Colonel Munro seems to us, in no respect, to deserve the name of a permanent settlement of the land revenue, but, on the contrary, to leave land revenue and landed property as unsettled as ever, and the people liable to all that prying, meddling interference of public officers, under which no private concerns can prosper.

11. We do not dwell on the fluctuations of the land revenue which the very nature of the system implies, for we admit that Colonel Munro's explanations on that head are satisfactory; and, as we have repeatedly explained to your Honourable Court, we are thoroughly persuaded that, whatever be the nature of the permanent settlement, or whether the land revenue be settled or left uncertain, Government will always possess the means of raising as high rents as the land can bear, and that, if they cannot bear as high rents hereafter as have have been paid hitherto, no system which can be devised will protect the Government from suffering by the impoverishment of the country. What we do insist upon is, that a system under which the extension and limitation of tillage are to be regulated by public officers, is not one calculated to promote the prosperity of the country, is wanting in all the attributes of a permanent system, and particularly in that essential quality of substituting for the control of the servants of Government (awkward, ill-judged, and corrupt as it must generally be), that intelligence, activity, perseverance, and frugality, which never fail to be prompted by a sense of private interest, and finally is less accommodated to the feelings of the people at large (the object to which your Honourable Court justly attaches so great importance), than an arrangement which, even by a compromise of some portion of the rights that a benevolent government might wish to impart to them, should confide their interests to their own care and to the guardianship of private persons, whose welfare is interwoven with theirs. We still indulge the hope that such an arrangement may be effected, even without such a compromise.

12. It is worthy of remark, that although Colonel Munro, in favour of the ryotwar system, has represented it as being the system which has always prevailed in India, and the only one that can be permanent, yet the scheme which he himself has laid down not only has reference to the village system and is dependent upon it, but even in part resolves itself into that system. The seventh article of the proposed settlement provides that the village shall be responsible, to the extent of ten per cent, for the deficiencies of particular Ryots in it; and the 12th article provides that Potails, and other village servants, shall remain under the Collector, thus recognizing the constitution of the village community on which the village settlement is founded, and the authority of village officers over the renters, who professedly are to be rendered independent. This is no oversight of Colonel Munro's; for so long ago as the 9th of November 1800, he observed, in one of his reports on the revenues of Canara, that "all systems of Indian revenue must end in making a direct settlement "with every independent landholder, without the intervention of any superior "lord, and in making every one of them answerable for his own rent, and the "whole of the estates composing a village answerable for the failure of any par- "ticular estate therein by a second assessment." In like manner, Mr. Thackeray, next to Colonel Munro the ablest and most strenuous advocate for the ryotwar system (though his opinions have latterly undergone a change), has stated, in his report upon Malabar, Canara, and the Ceded Districts, drawn up in favour of the ryotwar system, that "we ought to make a permanent settle- "ment with the whole inhabitants for the whole lands of the village."

13. We do not argue, from what we have quoted above, that the ryotwar system and the village system, which it has been our anxious desire to see introduced, are substantially the same; but we hold ourselves entitled to say, that the proposed mode of acting upon the ryotwar system rests upon those circumstances in the municipal constitution of India, which point out a village settlement as being best adapted to the country, and that the supplementary assessment is a manifest departure from the ryotwar system, and a partial substitution, in that respect, of the system of village rents.

14. If it be maintained, that the use which is to be made of Potails and other village officers, in the proposed ryotwar system, is only such as, under every system, must be made of them, we can conceive no ampler admission that the village system is that which is best adapted to the country.

15. In stating that the ryotwar system has always prevailed in India, we can only understand Colonel Munro to mean that it has prevailed, not to the suppression of the village system, but in subordination to it. The rent of each village was settled with the heads of the village, and by them was subdivided, according to usage and to common consent, among the inhabitants at large. The integrity of the village was preserved inviolate throughout all its relations to the Sirkar: its disunion was confined within itself. It is believed, that even the novel measures first adopted by the officers of the British Government, for the purpose of ascertaining with accuracy the resources of every part of the country, even the surveys of the lands, the assessments formed upon them, the substitution of money rents for rents in kind, and the nominal intercourse between each individval Ryot and the public servants, have trenched but little upon the constitution of Indian villages and the revenue system so naturally resulting from it; and it seems certain that every encroachment of the kind is an innovation, and that, whatever be its merits, at least the plea of immemorial usage cannot justly be advanced in its support.

16. Thus much concerning the use to be made of the village institutions in the proposed ryotwar settlement; but, with respect to the intended departure from the principles of that settlement in the supplementary assessment on the village for the deficiencies of particular Ryots, we beg leave to observe, that it would involve an act of injustice, from which the village settlement, even in the very respect in which it has here been copied, is free. According to the village settlement, the village, it is true, is jointly responsible; but it is, at the same time, jointly managed According to the ryotwar system, on the other hand, the Ryots, who have had no part in the mismanagement of their neighbour's farms, are to be subjected, in part, to the penalty attached to it: nay more, they are not to be armed with power to guard against this unmerited misfortune, by taking timely precautions to provide for the cultivation of the farms which threaten to bring it upon them, to save their produce from being fraudulently or prodigally misapplied, or to seek other means of indemnifying themselves; but they are to be held liable to punishment for the remissness or forbearance of the revenue officers of Government, and for the ignorance, carelessness, fraud, and prodigality of their neighbours, as if the fault were in all these cases the same and their own. If this objection to the ryotwar settlement be removed, by cancelling the article on which it is founded, it follows, that one of the securities for the rent which has been thought necessary will be lost.

17. Your Honourable Court have been pleased to observe, that the difference between the Zemindar and the village system appears to you to be in degree, and not in principle, both having a tendency to affect the interests, feelings, and rights of the small landed proprietors; but this Government will have failed entirely in their intention, if the system which they proposed to introduce is not calculated, above every other, to promote the interests of landed proprietors of every degree, to gratify their feelings and to secure their rights. The system is founded upon those municipal institutions which are respected and venerated by the people. Under it, no new men are set up as landlords, no estates are transferred by sale; but where landed property exists it is confirmed to its owners, and where it has been swallowed up in the demands of Government, that possession which may, it is hoped, by a liberal system of revenue administration, grow into property, is continued to those who have hitherto enjoyed it. We do not mean to assert, that these principles of the proposed settlement have been fully acted upon in the progress already made in it, nor that it will in all cases be found practicable to act upon them, but only that these are the principles of the settlement, and that they are such as we still hope may gain the approbation of your Honourable Court.

18. The deviations from the principles of the proposed settlement, which have originated in oversight, misapprehension, or an adherence to views adverse to those according to which the principles were determined upon, may still be corrected, if the progress already made should be admitted by your Honourable Court as the ground-work of a permanent system. There is sufficient time to revise what has been done, and we, as well as the Board of Revenue and the Collectors, are deeply impressed with a sense of the importance of the subject, and of the necessity of considering it with the most mature deliberation.

19. We had the honour of transmitting to your Honourable Court, with our dispatch from this department dated the 4th of February last, copies of all the papers relating to the settlement of the southern division of Arcot. We now transmit copies of those relating to the settlement of the district of Cuddapah. From them your Honourable Court will be enabled to judge how far the intended system is conformable to your views, and how far the progress already made in it is conformable to the principles laid down by the Government.

20. With respect to such deviations from the intended system as may arise from the impracticability of acting, in every case, upon all the principles according to which it is framed, we only beg leave to express our hope and belief, that they will not ultimately be found numerous, and to observe that practical imperfections must be expected to occur even in the most faultless systems. Of one thing, under any event, your Honourable Court may rest assured, that if it be impossible to elevate every Ryot above the condition which he has hitherto occupied, at least he shall be robbed of none of the rights he has hitherto enjoyed. The good which may be done to the country at large, and to the better orders of the inhabitants, shall not be done at the expense of those who may of necessity have the smallest share in it.

21. Reverting to your Honourable Court's observations on the regard due to the feelings, rights, and interests of the small landed proprietors, and fully acknowledging their justice and propriety, we are sure that your Honourable Court will, on the other hand, concur with us in maintaining, that no less regard is due to the more considerable proprietors, and that a levelling system, which should reduce head inhabitants to the condition of their inferiors, would be even more deserving of reprobation, than one which should prevent their inferiors from rising to a higher station than they have hitherto occupied. The argument, in both cases, is indeed the same; and the earnestness with which it has been pressed by your Honourable Court on the side on which you conceive that the danger lies, affords us the best assurance that its force will also be admitted on the other side. All Ryots are not Meerassadars, nor are all Meerassadars on the same scale; and there are other feelings, other rights, and other interests, besides those generated by a visionary or overrated property in the soil, which are deserving of consideration in forming a permanent settlement of the land revenue, whereby the soil is to acquire a new value, and the property in it to become real and substantial. The persons possessing such claims to consideration are themselves the chief landholders: they are not strangers who have no sympathy with the people, and no acquaintance with the country, but all their own habitudes and all the sentiments of others are suitable to the stations which, to a certain degree, they have always filled, and which it is proposed to improve and perpetuate in their favour; and they would not unreasonably feel themselves degraded and aggrieved, if the rank and influence which they have hitherto possessed were to fall a sacrifice to the object of aggrandizing their dependents, by giving a real and considerable value to their insignificant, if not imaginary property in the soil. We may illustrate these observations, by supposing how great would be the injustice of forming a permanent settlement for the estates of any old established Zemindar, not with himself but with his Ryots, who possess precisely the same description of small landed property belonging to the inferior Ryots in most parts of the unsettled districts of this Government.

22. Your Honourable Court have mentioned two considerations, as weighing very strongly in your minds in favour of a ryotwar settlement. The first is, that under no other system can the advantage of an adequate revenue from the waste land be secured. We confess that we are not aware in what the justness of this observation consists. It does not form part of our scheme in prosecuting the present village settlement, that the waste lands shall indiscriminately and unnecessarily be surrendered; neither are we sensible of any incongruity between the principles of the village settlement and the retention of such part of the waste lands as it may be found advisable to retain. But, on the other hand, if the practicability or success of a settlement of the lands under cultivation depends upon the simultaneous settlement of the waste lands; if the one cannot be settled at all, or cannot be settled to advantage without the other, then under the ryotwar system, as well as under the village system, the waste land must be given up. The point, as it seems to us, does not turn upon the system that may be pursued, but entirely upon its own expediency. If it be better to reserve the waste land, it will not be given up under the village system; if it be better to give it up, it would not, even under the ryotwar system, be reserved.

23. But from the opinions of the local officers of this Government, confirmed in some respects by our own consideration of the subject, we own that we incline incline to think it will be found expedient to include at least a great part of the waste land in the settlement of the land under cultivation. The reasons of our thinking so are, first, that a certain portion of waste land is necessary to the convenience of every village for pasture and other purposes, and that the inhabitants would be averse either to enter into a perpetual settlement for villages, from the waste land of which they were liable to be at a future period ejected, or to bestow great pains or expense in improving such villages; secondly, that the inhabitants would feel apprehensive either that the reserved waste lands might be rented hereafter to others, who would thrive at their expense, or that they might be precluded, by the engagements they had entered into for the lands under cultivation, from renting the waste lands on more favourable terms; thirdly, that if the renters are properly selected, it would be desirable to make over to them the waste lands, for the purpose of ultimately alleviating the pressure of the present land rent, and of stimulating their exertions in the meanwhile by the hope of that alleviation.

24. But, after all, we attach much less importance to this point than your Honourable Court has done. The grand difference between the view at present taken in England regarding Indian land revenue, and that taken here, seems to be, that in England the fear is that the public demands upon the resources of India may not keep pace with its prosperity; while here the universal sentiment, we believe without any exception whatever, is, that the prosperity of the country is so much depressed by the public demands, that without the most liberal and judicious management, there is more danger of its resources declining than room to hope for their speedy increase. This is a sentiment which we cannot too strongly convey to your Honourable Court. It is addressed to your wisdom, to your sense of justice, to your humanity: it concerns the successful administration of your Government no less than the welfare and happiness of a numerous population and the prosperity of an extensive country, favoured by nature, protected from internal commotion and foreign assault, and requiring only moderation in the demands of Government upon its resources to render it rich and flourishing. Compared with the attainment of these great ends, of how little value appears every sacrifice which can be made for them? But when it is considered, that it may be found the best means of rendering the waste lands productive to include them in a permanent settlement, that perhaps no other means might be extensively effectual, and that if these means succeed the Government will easily devise methods for participating in their produce, the supposed sacrifice dwindles into nothing, or rather the great ends in view are to be promoted, not only without loss to Government, but by a politic measure which may ultimately create new resources, out of which its wants may be supplied, as well as increase those on which it now relies. The state of things supposed in the apprehension which your Honourable Court appears to entertain, is the reverse of that from which our present difficulties proceed; for we see with concern, that the necessities of Government compel us to exact from the people so large a proportion of the produce of the soil, that a bare subsistence is left for those by whom it is cultivated, and land-rent, where it is known at all, is of so trifling an amount as hardly ever to be disjoined from the hire of the labourers. And can it be imagined, that the difficulty of raising revenue would be increased by an increase of the funds out of which it must be drawn; or, unless the revenue were to be increased in the same proportion, that the difficulty would not be proportionately diminished?

25. Although, for the reasons above stated, we consider the reservation of the waste land to be a less important point than it has seemed to your Honourable Court to be, yet we can venture to refer your Honourable Court to the instructions issued by us on the subject, as evidence of our having no inclination to give up the waste land gratuitously.

26. The second consideration mentioned by your Honourable Court as weighing strongly in favour of a ryotwar settlement is, that all other settlements must, in the end, resolve themselves into a ryotwar settlement, in consequence of the subdivision of property resulting from the early marriages and the laws of inheritance among the Hindoos. But we beg leave to observe, that the community of goods produced by the early marriages and the laws of inheritance among among the Hindoos, would not infringe upon the unity of the obligation entered into by a village renter. The increase of a family would not lead to a partition of the landed property of its original patriarch, but would only entitle all the members of the family to participate in the fruits of the property. Moreover, the principle of the village settlement is that the whole village collectively should be answerable for the whole rent of it, and no partition of property in the village would affect that principle. In both these respects, therefore, the proposed village settlement is without any tendency to resolve itself into a ryotwar settlement.

27. But we confess that we are far from being disposed to admit the argument, that a village settlement is liable to resolve itself, in respect of the number of renters, into a ryotwar settlement (even were it made good), as being by any means conclusive against the formation of such a settlement, provided that its primary object of improving the country were effected. The revenue would be secured, and the controul of public officers, the worst feature of a ryotwar settlement, would be unnecessary. If these two obstacles to a ryotwar settlement were removed by the value imparted to land, the detail of management which it requires would then, in truth, according to the representation of the advocates for the system, only give employment to a few more accountants, and form no objection against it.

28. Your Honourable Court have argued, that the principal inducement to propose the village settlement seems to have been, an imputed incompatibility between the ryotwar settlement and the judicial system; that the incompatibility exists in the formalities of the judicial system, not in the nature of the revenue settlement, and would be experienced as much under a zemindarry or village as under a ryotwarry settlement, with this difference, that its evils would fall upon the Zemindar or village renter instead of the Collector; and that the other objections to the judicial system, consisting in its expense and its irremediable tardiness and insufficiency of operation, suggest the propriety rather of revising its constitution, than of allowing it to stand in the way of revenue arrangements, which, but for it, would be found practicable and expedient. The force of these observations, as they affect the great revenue question at issue, will, we trust, be materially weakened by the exposition of our views, which the preceding part of this letter affords. As they affect the expense and the operation of the judicial system, we shall, at an early period, have the honour of replying to them in the Judicial department. We have already shewn, that independently of all supposed incompatibility between the ryotwar settlement and the judicial system, there is sufficient ground for rejecting that mode of revenue arrangement; and we hope to be able to make it appear to the satisfaction of your Honourable Court, that the objections urged against the judicial system admit of being answered. There are only two observations regarding the imputed incompatibility of the ryotwar settlement with the judicial system, which we feel it to be necessary to submit to your Honourable Court at the present time.

First, We do not concur in the opinion of your Honourable Court, that under a zemindarry or village system, the same difficulty in conforming to the provisions of the Judicial Regulations for the recovery of revenue arrears would be experienced by Zemindars or village renters, as the Collector would experience under the ryotwar system. To secure the just demands of Government upon the Ryots, the Collector must have recourse to legal measures, ignorant as he must be of all those personal considerations by which prudence and humanity would often dictate that the rigour of the law should be softened. It is only in most cases to the general pleas for an abatement of rent, founded on an adverse or unhealthy season, or on the ravages of war, that he can listen. In the same manner, he is unfit to employ those precautions arising from an intimate knowledge of the persons with whom he has to deal, by which the necessity of resorting to law might be prevented. But village renters, in particular, must be supposed to possess such an acquaintance with the character, conduct, and circumstances of every individual among their under-tenants, and to feel so near an interest and so tender a solicitude in his welfare, as to make an arrear of rent, where the rent is moderate, a rare occurrence, and to render them very anxious to refrain from legal proceedings for recovering it: we therefore think, that in whatever may be supposed to consist the incompatibility patibility between the judicial system and a ryotwar settlement, that system would not be found in the same degree incompatible with the proposed village lease settlement.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 12 Aug. 1814.

29. But, in the second place, the incompatibility of the Judicial system with a ryotwar settlement consists infinitely less in the formalities with which it invests the administration of justice, than in the fact that, under it, justice is, for the first time, administered between the Government and the people. The forms of law have rendered it difficult to adhere to the ryotwar mode of management, but it is substantial justice alone that has rendered it impracticable. The Collectors of the Ceded Districts, in particular, the Collector of the northern division of Arcot, and the Board of Revenue, have reiterated their representations, that the Ryots now refuse to cultivate more lands, or to pay more revenue than suit their convenience or interest; that they have been emancipated by the Regulations; that the Regulations have opened a free market for agricultural labour and stock; that it is necessary either to arm the Collectors with their former compulsory powers, or to devise a principle more consistent with the Judicial Regulations than compulsion. Legal forms have nothing to do with the incompatibility pointed out in these representations, and no change in the forms of law would remove that incompatibility, while justice continued to be administered.

30. From the papers transmitted to your Honourable Court, regarding the decennial village lease settlement for the southern division of Arcot and that for the district of Cuddapah, as well as from the other papers on the subject, it will be seen that the under-tenants of the new leases are to be furnished with pottahs by the village renters, and that the Curnums and village renters are to be kept nall cases distinct from each other. The Regulation for the lease, independently of the security afforded by the pottahs, will effectually provide against any transgression by the village renters, beyond their own rights upon those of the under-tenants. The omission to grant pottahs, which proceeds less frequently from the disinclination of the renters to grant them than from that of the under-tenants to enter into the corresponding obligation on their part, will thus, as in the zemindarry settlement, involve the under-tenants in no forfeiture of any advantages they have hitherto enjoyed.

31. We have already apprized your Honourable Court of the measures which were adopted by us on the receipt of your letter dated the 16th December 1812. In most of the unsettled districts, the faith of the Government had been pledged to conclude a village lease settlement; but in these the settlement has been expressly restricted to a period of ten years, instead of being, as before the receipt of your instructions, considered preparatory to a permanent settlement. Wherever the Government was free to form any sort of settlement it might prefer, we have, under your orders, reverted to the ryotwar system. In the present letter we have taken a comparative view of the ryotwar and village systems, with reference to the advantages which have been ascribed to the former and to the objections to which the latter has been deemed liable, and we have endeavoured to bring together all the explanations on the subject which your Honourable Court may be desirous of receiving. We shall await your further orders with an anxiety proportioned to the importance of the point at issue, and to our desire that our conduct and our sentiments in regard to it may receive the approbation of your Honourable Court.

32. As immediately connected with the subject of the present dispatch, we have the honour herewith to forward a copy of a letter addressed, under our instructions, to the Board of Revenue, on the 2d instant.

We have the honour to be,
With great respect, Honourable Sirs,
Your faithful humble Servants,

EXTRACT PROCEEDINGS of the BOARD of REVENUE,
The 9th September 1813.

To the Chief Secretary to Government.

SIR :

Letter from the Board of Revenue, 20 Sept. 1813.

Par. 1. I am directed by the Board of Revenue to submit for the consideration of his Excellency the Governor in Council the enclosed extract from the proceedings of the Board, under date the 9th instant, relative to the decennial lease settlement of the Cuddapah division of the Ceded Districts.

2. The report of the Collector,* under date the 22d December last, with its several enclosures, is likewise submitted.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient Servant,

Fort St. George,
20th September 1813.

(Signed) A. D. CAMPBELL,
Deputy Secretary.

Extract from the Proceedings of the Board of Revenue, dated 9th September 1813.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 9 Sept 1813.

The Board proceed to take into consideration the report of Mr. Ross, dated the 22d December 1812, on the decennial lease settlement of the Cuddapah division of the Ceded Districts.

Mr. Ross has explained that, on receipt of the Board's letter to him of the 26th March, which enclosed a copy of their proceedings under date the 2d March 1812,† it was his wish to have made the attempt to conclude a permanent settlement in the talook of Chetwel, the only talook which remained unsettled on the receipt of those orders, but that the renters declined entering into engagements of a nature different from those concluded in other parts of the district.

The settlement of Cuddapah is, therefore, a decennial lease settlement by villages, whereof

1,733	villages have been rented for ten years.
109	villages for nine years, ending at the same period.
19	villages have been settled since closing the accounts.
32	villages remain undisposed of.
1,893	Total villages.

The decennial rent commences with fusily 1221 (1811-12), and ends with fusily 1230 (1821-22). Those villages which have been settled for nine years were either under aumany in fusily 1221, or were not rented beyond the fusily.

The amount of the decennial rent is Star Pagodas 6,89,368 5 16. This sum includes the land rent only, all extra items of revenue, included in this collectorate under the denominations of veesabuddy, mohturfa, or bazee bab, having, in conformity with the Board's instructions, been excluded from the rent. It includes the jodee, or reduced assessment payable by various descriptions of Enaumdars.

It is known to Government that the Ceded Districts were surveyed by Colonel Munro, and that a money rent was fixed on each field, whether cultivated, arable though not cultivated, or waste.

An abstract of the survey valuation of the Sirkar land in the Cuddapah division is shewn hereunder.

* From Mr. Ross, in Consultations, 28th December 1812.

† In the proceedings of the 2d March, founded on the communication from Government of the 31st December preceding, a desire was expressed that the settlement should, as far as possible, be made permanent at once, subject to the confirmation of Government and of the Honourable the Court of Directors, and to be a decennial settlement only in the event of the disapproval of the latter.

Mr. Ross has also compared the amount of the decennial rent with the Collections on account of each year, as follows.

	Less ..	......	....	......	......	......	45,426	......	21,344	48,914	.... ..	. ...

It will be observed, that the decennial rent exceeds the collections in eight of the years, and falls short of the collections in fusilies 1215, 1217, and 1218 only. Mr. Ross has remarked, that at the time he proposed a septennial lease, he recommended the average of the last seven years including the triennial lease, or something less, should be taken as the standard. The amount of the decennial settlement exceeds that average in about Star Pagodas 7,700, or Star Pagodas 1 6 7½ per cent. The reason is this. In the first place, the Collector did not, at the time he submitted this proposition, expect so great a defalcation as occurred in fusily 1220,* which reduced the average considerably: in the next place, he calculated on settling conditionally to the extent of about Star Pagodas 1,37,000 only, whereas the amount which has been actually settled conditionally is about Star Pagodas 1,67,000.† The excess of rent above what the Collector intended is, he remarks, a set off to the excess in the extent of conditional assessment.

The amount of the conditional rent, which is the maximum rent on villages watered by tanks, causes the decennial rent to appear, in the comparison, higher than it otherwise would do. It is not expected that the whole of the maximum rent will be collected in all years: remissions will be necessary, it is probable, in every year in some of the tank villages.

The instructions of the Board provided that all lands watered by large tanks should be settled conditionally. Mr. Ross has complied with these instructions, or rather has exceeded them, having settled all lands watered by small, as well as those watered by large tanks, on the condition of a remission being allowed on the maximum rent, whenever the supply of water may fall short of a full tank. The total remission provided for under the worst season, it does not appear, is either stated or estimated by the Collector. Mr. Ross proposes to extend this plan of rent to some villages watered from nullahs made by the overflowing of tanks. The Board will, however, have occasion to notice the subject of this conditional remission in a subsequent part of these proceedings.

The first object of the Collector has been to equalize the rents, to proportion the quantum of assessment, as nearly as possible, to the real capability of each village, in order to prevent, so far as practicable, the deterioration of those which are now highly cultivated and highly assessed, by the competition which extensive wastes would enable the poorer and worse cultivated villages to set up for the stock and labour of the Ryots. In order effectually to make this equalization, it was necessary to ascertain minutely the sources of revenue derivable from each village; "the real value"‡ of the waste land in the accounts; the number of residents and that of pyakarry Ryots; the conditions of its tanks, wells, nullahs, &c.; the highness or lowness of the survey rent; the extent of land boná-fide cultivated in every year, and that which appeared only in the cultivation cultivation accounts; lastly; how far the rent was paid by the body of the Ryots generally, or only by one, two, or three families.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 20 Sept. 1813.

The next step was to deduct all the items of mohturfa and bazee bab directed to be excluded; to take the survey value of the land in actual cultivation, and to add to it, under large tanks, the average value of the second crop on the same fields, as also the jodee paid by enaumdars. The rent was then, after a careful examination of the accounts, and a minute inquiry into the circumstances of the villages, finally determined on. When the rent of all the villages of a talook had been thus adjusted, the total was cast up, and a revision took place, after which the amount of the rent was published for the information of the Potails and Meerassadars.

The result of this mode of proceeding has been a deviation from the average collections assumed as the basis of the settlement. The talookwar statement annexed to these proceedings* will shew considerable fluctuation above and below the average; and the gramwar statement, when received, will probably shew a still greater deviation. It has already been explained, that it was not intended that Collectors should implicitly follow the average, where the circumstances of the villages, during former or more recent periods, had undergone any change. It was manifestly proper, that villages permanently deteriorated, and not likely speedily to recover, should be assessed at a lower rate than the average would give, while it was equally expedient that villages formerly in a state of deterioration, but now advanced to a state of comparative prosperity, and likely rather to improve than recede from this state, should be rented on terms which should not have reference to their former state of deterioration.

The Collector having given a detailed explanation of the amount of the assessment of each talook,† the Board have annexed to the talookwar statement, which they have caused to be prepared; an abstract of the most material remarks of the Collector. It would not be of any avail for the Board to go into a minute exposition of the assessment of each talook. The total is, of course, composed of the rent of the villages. Separate considerations must have regulated the rent of each village, and those considerations have been explained by the Collector. The Board have, however, added to the talookwar statement, above referred to, certain columns, shewing the estimated or survey valuation of the land, arable and waste, together with the proportion of the settlement which is conditional and unconditional in each talook.

The waste land, with the exception of land rated in the survey at the value of Star Pagodas 18,179 35 22,‡ has in all cases been given up to the renters. The exception has been made where the Collector was fearful that the competition for the labour and stock of the Ryots, arising from the absolute possession of unlimited waste (to use the Collector's expression) might prove detrimental to the interests of some of the renters of the neighbouring villages.

The considerations which induced Mr. Ross to be of opinion that the waste land generally should be given up, were, first, the great quantity of waste enaum land in the zillah of Kurpah; secondly, the circumstances of the talooks where there is the most waste land being situated near the frontiers of the district. In the first case, it was expected that the Enaumdars would be competitors with the renters for the labour of the Ryots; and, in the second, that the renters or inhabitants of the villages in the adjacent territories would hold out inducements to the Ryots to emigrate, unless the renters should possess the means of offering equal or better terms.

In the seventy-first paragraph of his report, Mr. Ross has stated the amount survey value of arable and of waste land given over to the renters, in addition to the land under cultivation upon which the rent is founded.§ The former, that is the arable land, is seventeen per cent.; the latter, or unreclaimed waste, fifty-nine per cent. on the amount of the jumma determined for the sirkar sirkar lands, Pagodas 6,63,578 4 36. Of this seventeen per cent., the Collector estimates that a portion, equal to seven per cent., will be required to cover what has been heretofore paid on bunzar or waste land, as if it had been cultivated, leaving a present profit "to begin with" of only ten per cent.: of which the Collector thinks that one half, at least, must be ceded to the Ryots, to induce them to keep up their old cultivation, and to take the good and bad land together. This reduces the profit of the renters, in the first instance, to five per cent. What they afterwards get beyond this, the Collector observes, must be derived from the breaking up of waste, of which the Ryots will take care to have their full share.

* Enclosure A. † Enclosure A.

It seems to the Board that the estimated present profit, above-mentioned, is of a rather speculative nature, and not real, since it supposes the rent to be fixed on a given extent of cultivation; or, in other words, it assumes that a given extent of land will be cultivated, be productive, and afford the means of paying the decennial rent, and that a greater extent of cultivation has been carried on than is now necessary or equal to meet the demand for rent. Some allowances must be made for this expectation, unless the cultivation, like the collections, has been taken from an average account, which the Board do not find to be so stated. If the Board take the highest revenue which has ever been collected in any one year, and compare it with the present rent, the difference or reduction in favour of the decennial rent is about seven and one-sixteenth per cent.* This comparison would, without explanation, lead to an opinion, that the decennial rent is not so moderate as is consistent with the intentions of the Board; but a portion of the rent, to the extent of 1,67,000 Star Pagodas, being conditional, as has already been stated, it is not practicable to compare the actual amount of the decennial rent with the collections during any former period. The collections under the decennial rent, from the conditionally assessed land, will not, in all probability, as has already been explained, amount in any year to the full rent, because it would require that all the tank villages should receive the maximum supply of water.

Although the considerations inducing the surrender of the waste lands to the renters may vary, or be thought to vary, in each district, it seems quite unnecessary, under the explanations given by Mr. Ross of the state of cultivation in the Ceded Districts, and the manner in which the accounts of cultivation have been kept, to make any speculative calculation of the period when such or such portions of the waste will be rendered productive. More land appears to have been entered in the accounts as cultivated, and charged with rent in each year, than was actually cultivated; and a greater extent of land, it is admitted, was usually cultivated, than the Ryots, with their limited means, could cultivate properly. These circumstances, combined with the variations in the seasons, and what is a still greater check to an extension of cultivation, the possibility of a diminished demand for the surplus produce, arising from a long continuance of tranquillity and peace in the surrounding countries, may leave the waste land of little comparative value to renters, except to retain their own Ryots, or to invite those of other villages where the effect of competition may be apprehended. If the extent of the operation of competition should not prove so great as has been supposed (and by some of the collectors, Mr. Ravenshaw in particular, this effect has been doubted) then the value of waste for this purpose will be diminished. Upon the whole, the Board think that the reservation which Mr. Ross has made of waste land, in certain cases, to the extent, by the survey value, of Star Pagodas 18,179 35 22,† is an unnecessary precaution; but as the Collector states that these lands will be given up on the easiest terms, it may perhaps be inexpedient, at present, to disturb the arrangement. It will be the duty of the Collector to report, from time to time, the effect of this partial restriction; and if the expected advantage should not be found to result from it, the Board will be prepared to recommend that it be relinquished.

Mr. Ross having deemed it expedient that the intentions of Government regarding the decennial lease should be generally known, that the renters should should be informed before-hand of the terms of the rent, of what portion of the power formerly exercised by the sirkar was to be delegated and what withheld, issued the proclamation referred to in the tenth paragraph of his report. In this proclamation it was declared with whom it was the wish of Government to enter into engagements. The renters, during the triennial lease, were to have the preference; next to them the Meerassadars and Potails. Lastly, in case of refusal, any resident inhabitant or Ryot, where Curnums claimed to rent, or where, from their influence, it was necessary to admit them to a participation in the rent, they were first required to resign the office of Curnums. No person could plead ignorance of the terms of the rent, the amount having been fixed by the Collector, and advertised for general information. It was not ever the intention of the Board that the amount of the rent should be determined by competition; it was therefore proper for Mr. Ross to reject this plan of settling the rent. In a few villages, the hamlets have been settled separately from the principal villages. This measure, the Collector explains, could not be generally adopted, because the best lands of the village would have been rented separately, and the worst have been left on his hands.

Of 1,893 villages,* the total number of the district of Cuddapah, 1,328 have been rented to the old renters or Potails, in number 2,382, and 514 villages have been rented by new persons, in number 624. The Board were happy, however, to learn from Mr. Ross, that these new persons are not strangers from distant countries, but either resident inhabitants of the same village or adjacent villages, or of the district.

It was the wish of the Board that the rent should have embraced directly as many of the inhabitants as were able and willing to engage in it. Mr. Ross was, however, of opinion (an opinion which, he states, was corroborated by experience obtained during the triennial lease), that the fewer renters there are in a village the better; for that where there are many, each has his party. The Ryots are divided: an appeal is made to one from the orders of another; one makes agreements which the others will not sanction; one directs the Neerhutee to let the water out, another goes and closes the sluice: this leads to quarrels and prosecutions, hostile to the interests of all. Mr. Ross made it known, therefore, in his proclamation, that where there were numerous partners in the meeras, it would rest with the Sirkar to appoint two, three, or four of them to carry on the intercourse with the Sirkar: the affairs of the villages to be managed by those selected, who were to be considered answerable for the village. This intention was, however, declared not to interfere with any internal arrangements which the parties might agree to adopt among themselves.

One of the causes of the failure in the triennial lease† is attributed by the Collector to the great number of persons admitted to shares in the pottah, each person holding a share being answerable for a distinct portion of the rent. The quarrels, criminal complaints, and lawsuits which occurred in these villages, were incessant; the cultivation was stopped, and in the end the rent remained unpaid.

In recommending the admission of as many responsible Ryots as possible in the lease, it was never in the contemplation of the Board that each should be separately responsible for his share of the rent, but that the whole should be made jointly and severally responsible for the whole rent. The Board do not dispute the expediency of limiting the number of managing renters, but the expediency of limiting the number of persons responsible for the rent may admit of doubt. It will be difficult, the Board apprehend, to extend the responsibility sponsibility of the rent beyond those whose names are entered in the pottahs. The profit and loss, unless where agreements to the contrary exist, will, the Board apprehend, be confined to the Pottahdars. This may lead to numerous complaints on the part of those partners of the village where there may be a profit, and complaints on the part of the renters, where there may be a loss. The partners, not renters, will claim a share in the profit, and the renters will naturally be desirous of subdividing the loss. Agreed to call upon Mr. Ross to explain with whom he understands the responsibility of the rent to be lodged, and whether precautions have been taken to prevent the consequences pointed out by the Board as likely to occur. The terms of the moochulka are, "That "we four persons bind ourselves, jointly and severally, our heirs and succes- "sors, abiding by the profit and loss, to pay to the Sirkar, &c." and no clause is found giving partners in the meerass any share in the rent. The responsibility would, therefore, appear to be confined to the few* who have been admitted to sign the moochulkas; whereas the instructions of the Board provided that all who were partners in the meerass, and were willing and able to take a share in the rent, should be admitted, in order that the profits of the rent might be more generally diffused, or the loss be more equally divided. The Board are still desirous that this arrangement should be made wherever practicable. Agreed to call Mr. Ross's particular attention to this subject.

It has often been stated on the records of the Board, that the enaums allotted, from ancient times, to the Reddees or Potails in the Ceded Districts, must be considered exclusively service enaums; and on a reference from Mr. Gregory, the Board, under the authority of Government, decided that neither Meerassadar, Reddee, or Potail, declining to rent, could haye any claim to participate in the Potail enaum. By the proclamation before referred to, the former Meerassadars were informed that, by the establishment of fixed rents, the office of Reddee or Potail was virtually become extinct, and that the continuance of a separate renter and separate Reddee in one village was inadmissible; that in case the former Meerassadars accepted the rent, the enaum would be continued, but that in case the rent was taken by others it would rest with the Sirkar to resume the whole enaum, or to give it to the new renter, or in consideration of the former services of the Meerassadars to continue a part of it to them.

The Collector has referred to a circular order, marked E, for the arrangement he adopted respecting these enaums. With the exception of a few villages, in which the enaum has been entirely given up to the decennial renters, the rule has been to give three-quarters of the old-established reddee enaum to the renters, and one-quarter to the former Meerassadars. This share of the enaum has been continued to the former Meerassadars, on the condition of good behaviour, and of their not creating disturbance. The renters are not to profit by the resumption, in the event of the old Meerassadars failing in the condition, because they might, in that case, prefer complaints, merely with a view of getting possession of the enaum. This arrangement appears to be satisfactory, particularly as the cultivation of the enaum is to remain with those who may have hitherto cultivated the land.

The Board remark, that Mr. Ross has avoided making any stipulation respecting remission, either in his proclamation or in the moochulka of rent: with the exception, therefore, of the remission pledged in the villages rented conditionally, which are all tank villages, no claim to remission is acknowledged. It will consequently rest with Government, exclusively, to determine in every case on the expediency of granting remission.

The sentiments of the Board on the necessity which may arise of occasionally granting remission, are to be found in their proceedings on the decennial village settlement of the southern division of Arcot, and will be furnished to Mr. Ross with such observations as may be made thereon by Government.

The principles by which the conditional rent is to be regulated are to be found in the copy of the pottah. It specifies that, if less than the full supply of water come into the tank and the whole cultivation cannot be completed, then the teerwa only of the land from which a crop has been derived will be demanded. The obligation to cultivate as much as the water will permit is then stated, as also also the forfeiture of the claim in the event of neglect. The amount of the remission is not defined, it is to depend on the extent of actual cultivation: it would be as easy, therefore, to determine the amount of remission in a dry grain village as in a tank village, where, from over-assessment or other cause, remission might be necessary. The tanks, the lands of which the Collector intended to rent without condition, are generally sure of being filled once a year; but as this supply is not sufficient to bring the crops to perfection, they require to be filled twice, and sometimes thrice. These repeated supplies they are not equally certain of getting. The Collector thus found that the plan he at first proposed was more theoretical than practical. In short, he declares his opinion that tank lands cannot ever, with benefit to the Sirkar or the renters, be assessed unconditionally.

* Total number of renters 3,006, exclusive of fifty-one villages not yet entered as rented.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 20 Sept. 1813.

There exists no doubt, that the general practice of the native Governments was, with few exceptions, to divide the produce of the wet lands with the cultivators, while they took a money rent for the dry grain land. The great fluctuation in the quantity of the wet produce and in the price, appears to have made the native Governments unwilling to be content with an average rent: they preferred incurring all the loss to relinquishing all the profit arising in seasons of dearth, from the high value of the wet produce. But if it followed, as a true position, that tank lands cannot be rented unconditionally, the idea of a lease or permanent rent in many districts below the Ghauts must be relinquished. A conditional rent scarcely differs, but in name, from an annual rent, with the exception that the maximum rent is defined. If the maximum rent is the highest, or nearly the highest that the village has ever paid (and, as far as can be judged of from the talookwar statement, this appears to be the case), the rent is limited certainly, but limited to an amount attainable only under a combination of favourable circumstances: it renders the exception, therefore, of no great moment.

The Collector in the Bellary division of the Ceded Districts has addressed the Board, in a particular manner, on the subject of the loss and inconvenience resulting from the conditional assessment, and the Board have been induced to authorize arrangements for lessening the risk attending the condition, and in some cases of dispensing with the condition altogether. Agreed that a copy of the correspondence which has passed with Mr. Chaplin on the subject be transmitted, with a separate letter, to the Collector of Cuddapah for his consideration.

The Collector is of opinion, that the sum remitted for the repair of wells is not sufficient, being Star Pagodas 691 30 0 only. Agreed to inform the Collector that the Board are extremely desirous of improving these sources, and all other sources of irrigation, during the decennial lease, and that they will willingly receive from him any plan for repairing the tanks and watercourses, digging new wells or repairing old ones, that may be considered beneficial, and will readily recommend to Government to grant advances of money to all persons willing to undertake such works, who can find security for the repayment of the advance within a moderate period.

Mr. Ross has gone into a very detailed and satisfactory explanation of the Veesabuddy and Mohturfa revenue in the Ceded Districts, and has submitted the outline of a Regulation for the collection of these heads of revenue. The Board will have occasion to address the Honourable the Governor in Council separately on this subject: in the meantime they fully concur with Mr. Ross in the expediency of abolishing certain items of the bazee bab, particularly the gunacharee, which appears to consist of indefinite vexatious exactions, wholly inconsistent with the principles of the existing system of Government. It is resolved, therefore, to recommend their abolition to the Honourable the Governor in Council, and to desire the Collector to exclude them from any arrangement he may make for the mohturfa, &c.

The pottah issued by the Collector, and its counterpart the moochulka, appear to contain every necessary provision. The Board consider that it will be expedient to incorporate into the Regulation for the village settlement, now in progress, the principal points of this pottah.

Upon

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 20 Sept. 1812.

Upon the result of the first year's decennial rent a separate report has been received from the Collector, which will be laid before Government.

The Board have much pleasure in recording their entire approbation of Mr. Ross's proceedings in forming the decennial settlement of the district under his charge, and the satisfaction which they have derived from the perusal of his intelligent and perspicuous explanation of all the subjects connected with this important measure.

EXTRACT PROCEEDINGS of the BOARD of REVENUE at FORT ST. GEORGE,

The 28th December 1812.

READ the following letter from the Collector in Cuddapah:

To the President and Members of the Board of Revenue, Fort St. George.

GENTLEMEN:

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec. 1812.

1. The great number of the villages of the zillah of Kurpah having been rented out for ten or nine years, and the unfavourable circumstances of the present season precluding the hope of my being able to rent out those which remain for some time to come, I have closed the accounts, and shall now proceed to inform your Board of what has been already done, to explain the principles upon which I have proceeded in the introduction of the decennial lease settlement, and generally to acquaint you with the manner in which I have executed your orders on this most important subject.

2. At the time I had the honour to receive your Board's letter of the 26th March 1812, only one talook, chitwel, remained unsettled; and it was my wish to have begun the attempt at a permanent settlement in that talook, but the renters declined entering into engagements of a nature different from those concluded in the other parts of the district, and as the season was drawing to a close, I thought it better at once to make the same arrangements in Chitwel as elsewhere. An uniform settlement has accordingly been made for all the villages of the zillah, of which 1,733 have been rented for ten years, one hundred and nine for nine years, and fifty-one remained unrented at the time of closing the accounts: but since then nineteen of that number have been rented out; so that thirty-two villages only remain at present undisposed of.

3. My first object, in the formation of the settlement, has been to equalize the rents, and to proportion the quantum of assessment as nearly as possible to the real capability of each village, in order to prevent, as far as practicable, the deterioration of those which are now highly cultivated and highly assessed, by the competition which the possession of extensive waste would enable the poorer and worse cultivated villages to set up for the stock and labour of the Ryots.

4. In order to do this effectually, it was necessary to ascertain minutely the sources of the revenue derivable from each village; the real value of the waste land exhibited in its accounts; the number of resident and that of pykaree Ryots; the condition of its tanks, wells, nullahs, &c.; the highness or lowness of the survey-rent in proportion to the real value of the soil; the extent of land bonâ fiae cultivated in every year, and that which appeared only in the cultivation accounts; lastly, how far the revenue was paid by the body of the Ryots generally, or only by one, two, or three families, to whom the rest of the Ryots were little more than labourers, and on whose success or misfortune the welfare of the village in a great degree depended.

5. In order to make the equalization which I wished to establish, the mode of disposal of the waste land became a subject of particular consideration. Mr. Grœme

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec. 1812.

Grœme had proposed, that it should be retained in the hands of the Government as an available means of hereafter adding to the land revenue; but, from the discussion of that question in your Board's minute of the 12th August, it did not appear that you expected any great benefit from the adoption of the measure.

6. I was influenced, in my determination upon this point, by two considerations, which not having reference to the northern division of Arcot, were not brought forward by your Board in your discussion of the 12th of August. These considerations were, first, the great quantity of waste enaum in the zillah of Kurpah; secondly, the circumstance of the talooks, wherein there is the most waste land, being situated near the frontiers of the district.

7. The enaum land in Kurpah amounts to Star Pagodas 5,63,841 0 51, which is Star Pagodas 84 43 52¼ per cent. on the amount of the decennial rent: of that it is generally estimated that about ten-sixteenths is in cultivation. Were a check put upon the cultivation of the Sirkar waste, whilst the Enaumdars were allowed to cultivate their waste land without restraint, the remaining six-sixteenths, equal to about 2,11,440 pagodas, would certainly be brought into cultivation at the expense of the renters, and ultimately of the Government, for the renters could not possibly replace the labour and stock which would thus be drawn away from their farms. To prevent this mischief, only two modes appear to present themselves; restraint or competition: restraint on the cultivation of the Enaumdars; or competition, by giving over the Sirkar waste in toto to the renters. There is no doubt but that the custom of the country has always checked the cultivation of Enaumdars, when it was found to interfere with that of the Government lands, and it is possible that such a power might be acknowledged by the zillah court now; but, considering that the Regulations are perfectly silent on the subject, and that the restraint would act upon the renter who wished to give the Ryot land, I think the probability is against a favourable decision. The establishing a competition, by giving up the waste land without reserve to the renters, is then the only plan left us to adopt: if that be done, little need be feared from the Enaumdars, for besides being able to give land upon equally good terms, the former has the influence that naturally results from his situation in his favour, and he can at the worst take the enaum into his own hands and re-rent it to his Ryots.

8. In regard to the second consideration, your Board will observe, that the talooks in which there is most waste land are Doopad, Budwel, Giddaloor, Chitwel, Sidhout, Goorumkondah, Poolwindlah, and Raichotee. Of these, Doopad, and particularly that part of it which is called the Pergunnah of Kanukguree, is surrounded by the territories of other powers, if the palium of Venkutguree may be called so; and, as far as the present question extends, it well deserves the name, for there is the greatest rivalry for Ryots between the Sirkar and Poligar villages. Half the land almost of Kanukguree is cultivated by Pykarees from that palium; and, in order to have their labour, it is necessary to give them almost their own terms. Giddaloor is surrounded by the Nizam's territory, and Goorumkondah and Poolwindlah adjoin to that of Mysoor. Raichotee is but little distant. Land is obtainable both in Mysoor and in the Hyderabad country upon the easiest terms: and though the insecurity of property in those countries continually drives back our emigrants, yet it is with great difficulty that the Ryots are prevented from going thither; and knowing the advantage they possess, and the perfect liberty they now enjoy, it is not to be wondered at if they do not fail to make good terms for themselves with the renters of the Company's villages. These demands will increase daily; and without the full and unreserved possession of the waste, to enable them to give such terms, it is out of the question that renters should be able to keep the Ryots in their villages.

9. Under these considerations, it is my idea that the whole of the waste should be given up without reserve; and the only exceptions I have made to this general rule have been in certain cases, where I was fearful that the competition for the labour and stock of the Ryots, which the absolute possession of unlimited waste (if I may use the expression) in some villages, might prove detrimental to the interests of some of our own renters. In such cases I have made a reservation of a part of the waste; but the whole amount so reserved, as as your Board will perceive by the accounts, is only Star Pagodas 18,179 35 22, and this will be given up for cultivation on the easiest terms. These terms will be found under the head of remarks in the Statement, No. 4.

10. When entering upon a new system of Revenue management, similar to that which has now been introduced, it was absolutely necessary, as well as just, clearly to explain to the persons who were about to enter into engagements with the Government, the precise nature of those engagements, the terms upon which they were to receive the rents, and what portion of the power formerly exercised by the Sirkar was to be delegated to them, and what was to be withheld. It was with this view that, previous to commencing upon the settlement and advertising the rents, I issued the proclamation,* a copy and translation of which will form an accompaniment to this report. I therein stated, that no renter had the power, whether in conducting the business of the cultivation or collection, or on any pretence whatsoever, to strike or otherwise ill-use his Ryots, but that the above duties were to be conducted conformably with the Regulations. This was tolerably well understood before; but I thought that such a declaration, publicly made, was necessary, in order to do away all future pleas of misconception.

11. By this proclamation, also, I declared with whom it was my wish to enter into engagements for the rents of the villages, giving the preference to those who had undertaken and fulfilled the engagements of the triennial lease; next to them the Meerassadars and Potails, and lastly, in case of refusal on part of both the above offering the rents, to any resident inhabitants or Ryots.

The Meerassadars and Potails, for the most part, became renters under the triennial lease; but where they did not, I thought justice required that the preference should be given to those who had upon that occasion taken the villages, and had stood by the profit and loss resulting from their bargain. The Meerassadars were also, both in justice and policy, preferred to all other competitors, except the triennial renters.

12. Your Board are well aware of the extensive influence possessed by the Curnums of the Ceded Districts. The education of a Curnum will always give him an advantage over a Koondee; but, in addition to the superiority obtained by education, the Curnums here are, with few exceptions, Bramins, clever men, and well versed in the intrigues of a cutcherry. A settlement was now, for the first time, to be made in a manner independent of them, or, at least, in which they were to have no share, except on the condition of their relinquishing their claims to the Curnum Meeras.

13. The Curnums, however, are not the only intriguers who find their way into a Collector's cutcherry. In order, therefore, to guard against any attempt, either to lower the rents of the villages, or to dispose of them to others than those whom I considered most justly entitled to them, I resolved to fix the rent of each village myself, and after it had been fixed to advertise the amount of the rent, so that it might be known to every one desirous of becoming a bidder for the amount so advertised. I received all offers, and gave the villages to the persons amongst the bidders, whose right I considered to be the best established.

14. Your Board will observe, that by so doing I relinquished the benefit that would have been derived by the Sirkar from allowing of a competition, or in other words, from setting up the villages to the highest bidder; but I hope you will join with me in opinion, that the Government would, in the end, have lost more than it gained, by leasing out the villages in the latter way. The former renters, the Meerassadars, and those best qualified to manage the business to advantage, would frequently have been put aside, to make way for adventurers who would in a short time have ruined the villages, which would then have reverted to the Sirkar in a deteriorated state. The accounts in my possession, moreover, enabled me to form a pretty accurate estimate of the value of each village; and the natural desire to settle the highest rent, consistent with moderation, would always prevent my sinking too low in my demands.

* Marked D.

15. I

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec 1812.

15. I am in hopes that my object, in adopting the plan which I have detailed, has been pretty generally successful. That it had failed in some instances I know, by complaints made to me by persons who have lost their villages, by hanging back and refusing them at the instigation of the Curnums, who told them that, by so doing, they would get the rent lowered: while, in the mean time, other persons came forward, sometimes sent by the Curnums themselves, who gave the advice and got the villages.

16. Though it was my wish to make the settlement as independent as possible of the Curnums, I found that in many instances, it was impracticable to do so, and they have accordingly been occasionally admitted renters, and more frequently as securities. It is to be hoped that their influence in these cases will be exerted to the benefit of the Sirkar, which has thus become blended with their own. When they have become renters they have renounced their claim to the meerass, in the form laid down in the proclamation.

17. I shall now proceed to state to your Board the manner in which each village has been settled. In the first place, every item of moturpha and bazubab was separated from the land-rent: the kool ackut, or total amount of land by survey, was then taken, from which were deducted the enaum land and the amount of remissions made in the survey-rent; the remaining sirkar land was then divided into sagtawara or land in actual cultivation, laeg benjur or waste fit for cultivation, and anadu benjur, or waste which has not been cultivated for twenty years or upwards. To the amount of land in actual cultivation was added the fusl zuastu, or amount rent payable upon a second crop: this last was, in general, estimated upon an average of the amount paid on that account during a series of years; but, in some instances, where I found that this demand had only served to prevent the raising of a second crop, I gave it up altogether, and what is retained is only that due upon land under the largest tanks, which contain a twelvemonth's or more water, and from which a second crop is generally obtained. The jodee being nothing more than a mitigated rent paid by Enaumdars for land cultivated for the most part by the renters or Potails of the villages, I added it to the gross amount, but distinguished it particularly in the pottah, expressly depriving the renter of the power to raise or lower it. The rent was then fixed after a careful examination of the accounts, and a minute inquiry into the circumstances of the village, as detailed in paragraph 4. When the rent of all the villages of a talook had been thus adjusted, the total was cast up, and a revision took place, after which they were advertised in the manner laid down in the proclamation.

18. I must now solicit your Board's indulgence if I go into a rather prolix detail of the amount of the settlement in each talook; but as it is my intention to recommend the amount of the decennial settlement, with but little alteration, as that of a permanent settlement, I think it proper that your Board should be able to form a clear opinion upon the subject, to judge whether too much or too little has been assessed upon the country, and to rectify any mistakes that may appear to have been committed, previous to affixing the seal of perpetuity to the settlement. It may not be without its use also to shew, what I consider to be the state of the country at the time of making this settlement, in order to serve for future comparison. This information cannot be drawn entirely from the accounts alone. Your Board will there see remission in the cultivated lands, to the extent of near thirty per cent. on the jummah of one talook, whilst they do not amount to seven per cent. in another. You will see one talook assessed at a sum far above the average of any number of years, and exceeding, with one or two exceptions, the jumma of any single year, whilst, on the other hand, you will find another talook assessed lower than the average of the last three, seven, or ten years, and below the amount jumma of the greater number of the eleven years of the Company's government. My object is to explain the reason of this, to shew that it proceeds from the settlement having been made upon certain fixed principles, and not from the readiness or backwardness of the renters to bid for the villages. I must moreover acknowledge, that it is my wish that your Board should know that where there has been error, it has been that of judgment, and has in no wise proceeded from want of zeal or desire to execute in the best manner the important duty entrusted to me.

Cumbum.

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec 1812.

19. The amount of the decennial rent of this talook is Star Pagodas 37,935 8 16, which exceeds the amount of the collections of nine, and falls short of that of two years of the Company's Government. It exceeds the average collections of the whole eleven years in the sum of Star Pagodas 6,011 39 16; it exceeds the average collections of the ten years, from fusily 1211 to 1220, in the sum of Star Pagodas 5,519 8 58; it exceeds the average collections of the seven years, from fusily 1214 to 1220, in the sum of Star Pagodas 5,820 42 38; and lastly, it exceeds the average collections of the last three years in the sum of Star Pagodas 7,047 1 60. This talook has in one year yielded to the Government a revenue of Star Pagodas 42,430 8 40, and in another the revenue has sunk to Star Pagodas 17,923 10 34. This is owing to the great proportion of the revenue which is derived from tank lands, and particularly those of the cusba of Cumbum. The rent of the cusba alone is now fixed, and moderately too, at Star Pagodas 10,833 15; and the whole of the rent derivable from that tank, as now fixed, is Star Pagodas 14,721 3 10. The amount of unconditional assessment on this talook is only Star Pagodas 14,575 26 48, whilst that settled conditionally is Star Pagodas 19,149 30 47. The rent of such a talook as this could not be settled on any average of years. It was necessary to fix the rent considerably higher than any average of collection, in order to make up to the Government, by the excess in good years, for the unavoidable loss in bad years. I hope that the average collections of the next ten years will prove equal to the best of the averages of the periods shewn in the account; and considering the superior advantages under which the cultivation will now be carried on, from a maximum rent having been fixed, and the remissions of different kinds which have been made, I trust there is no reason to doubt that such will be the case if the seasons prove tolerably favourable, or even if they be as good as those of the last ten years.

20. To rent the cusba, also, was impracticable, as no one could give an adequate security; and even if they had been able to give security, none of the offers made for it were such as could be listened to. The disputes regarding the distribution of the water are so continual, and the established claims to it are so complicated, that it would be dangerous to the welfare of the other villages dependent upon its tank for water, to put it into the hands of persons who might thus obtain the power of doing much mischief, and with whom the revenue officers could not afterwards with safety interfere.

21. The kool ackbut of this talook is Star Pagodas 58,097 5 55, the fusl zuastee is Star Pagodas 3,944 9 49, making together Star Pagodas 62,041 15 24. The net land-rent, without peshcush and jodee, is Star Pagodas 32,499 16 61; to which if we add, first, amount of remissions made on several accounts, from which the renters can derive no benefit, being Star Pagodas 3,531 24 30,* and secondly, the land retained by the Sirkar, which is that situated in the beds of the tanks, being Star Pagodas 4,732 23 63, there remains the amount of land given over to the renters, being Star Pagodas 21,277 40 30. The proportion which is entered in the saglarivarree, or amount of land actually in cultivation, is Star Pagodas 7,186 24 6, which is Star Pagodas 22 5 4¾ per cent. upon the amount of the decennial rent. The waste land given over is Star Pagodas 14,091 16 24, which is Star Pagodas 43 16 9 per cent. on the amount of the decennial rent.

22. The cultivation in the beds of tanks in dry seasons is very considerable in Cumbum; and I have retained the amount above shown, to serve as a set off against the loss which the Sirkar will sustain by the want of wet cultivation in those years. Your board will observe a clause in the pottah of all the villages somewhat to this effect;† but the general receipts on this account will be very inconsiderable, for in making the accounts I have included the rent of all the dry land according to the survey. Now most of the land in the beds of tanks, down almost to the banks, was measured in by the surveyors, and that has been given over, without condition, to the renters, as dry land, which is alluded to in the clause of the pottah, is that lying between the line of measurement and the bank of the tank, which was by the survey thrown into the Purrampoke. Were

* Vide Statement, No. 3. † Article 4, Clause 4.

Were the renters allowed the benefit of this, without having to pay rent, they might be induced to turn the water from the tank for the sake of the crops growing there. The rent of land cultivated in the bed of the Cumbum tank, in fusily 1221, was Star Pagodas 571 34 23.

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec. 1812.

23. In the cumbum talook all the villages are rented out, except the cusba, which remains unrented, for the reasons above shewn.

Doopad.

24. The decennial rent of the Doopad is Star Pagodas 37,736 18 60. This sum exceeds the collections of seven, and falls short of those of four years of the Company's government. It exceeds the averages of collections of the several periods shewn in the accounts: that of the whole eleven years, Star Pagodas 4,231 32 79; that of the last ten years, Star Pagodas 3,298 15 61; that of the last seven years, Star Pagodas 903 0 28; and that of the last three years, Star Pagodas 4,172 35 22. Of the decennial rent, Star Pagodas 30,715 7 40 is settled unconditionally, and Star Pagodas 8,210 33 60 conditionally. The kool ackut is Star Pagodas 1,20,486 38 63; of which, after deducting the sum payable to the Sirkar, the land of twelve uninhabited villages not rented, and the amount of remissions, making altogether Star Pagodas 46,083 30 18, there remains Star Pagodas 74,403 8 45, which is the extent of the land given over to the renters. The proportion of that which has been cultivated is Star Pagodas 9,049 14 10, equal to Star Pagodas 23 31 1½ per cent. of the decennial rent: the remainder is no less than Star Pagodas 171 30 7½ per cent. on the decennial rent.

25 When considering the proportion of the sagtarwaree, or cultivated land, which is given up to the renters of this talook (and the same remark applies to cumbum and all the other talooks whose soil is principally red or mixed) it is to be kept in mind, that all the land which is considered as cultivated cannot pay rent the same year. These lands being poor are allowed occasionally to lie fallow. They have two modes of managing this. Sometimes the individual Ryot allows one of his fields to lie fallow once in two, three, or four years, according to the nature of the soil, but still retains his possession of the whole of his fields, though he only pays rent for such as are actually under the plough. The whole of his fields are entered, however, in the sagtarwaree. Sometimes the arrangement is made by the whole village, in which case a spot of land is pitched upon and cleared, and this is parcelled out and cultivated for five or six years together; it is then allowed to lie fallow for as many more, during which time another spot is cultivated in the same manner. All the land which has ever been cultivated in this manner is entered in the sagtarwaree. This will account for the great proportion of cultivated land which appears in certain talooks to have been given up to the renters. This is not the case with the black lands, which, like the paddy fields, are continually under the plough.

26. The Doopad talook is the poorest in the division. It is separated from the Nizam's dominions by high mountains and an immense extent of thick jungle; and on the side of Imakondah, also, the jungle is thick and extensive, the population is very thin, and the Ryots are very poor. The number of villages is three hundred and four, of which two hundred and ninety-one are rented for ten years, eight for nine years, and five remained unrented at the time of closing the accounts: one of these has been rented out since then.

Budwel.

27. The decennial rent of the Budwel talook is Star Pagodas 38,069 6 68. This is above the collections of eight, and less than those of three years of the Company's government. It exceeds the eleven years average in the sum of Star Pagodas 5,249 29 23; the ten years average, Star Pagodas 4,423 37 49; the seven years, Star Pagodas 1 608 4 41; and that of the last three years, Star Pagodas 2,439 36 12. The amount of that rent which has been fixed unconditionally is Star Pagodas 22,326 43 62; that which has been fixed conditionally is Star Pagodas 15,955 35 31. The kool ackut of this talook is Star Pagodas 70,166 36 12; the fusl zuaster is Star Pagodas 1,763 15 0; making together Star Pagodas 71,930 6 12. The amount of rent, remissions, and land reserved by the Sirkar, is Star Pagodas 38,995 32 23; so that the amount amount which is at the disposal of the renters is Star Pagodas 32,934 18 69, which is Star Pagodas 97 39 29½ per cent. upon the decennial rent, whereof Star Pagodas 13 18 28½ per cent. is cultivated; and Star Pagodas 84 20 76½ is waste. The greater part of the rent of the wet lands of this talook depends on the tanks of Budwel and Poormamullah, neither of which have been filled for these three years past, which is the reason of the average collections of these years having fallen short of those of the last seven years.

28. The talooks of Cumbum, Doopad, and Budwel, were not rented out for three years by Mr. Chaplin, but for two years only by Mr. Gregory, and then with the benefit of the condition for tank lands. They did not suffer, in consequence, from having to pay any rent for tank lands which were not cultivated; but they still have been great sufferers, during the last three years, from the unfavourableness of the seasons. The dry land of these talooks is the worst in the zillah; and partly owing to that circumstance, and partly to the extreme poverty of the Ryots, the method of farming is far inferior to that in use in the other talooks. The inhabitants depend less, too, upon their cultivation for their livelihood than elsewhere. The great extent of waste land affords, in general, a great deal of pasture, and the breeding of cattle and sheep, though of a poor species, is much attended to. A great part of the rent of many villages is paid from the produce of their herds and flocks. When a mortality or want of pasture diminishes the number of these, the Ryots suffer excessively, and they have experienced both these calamities of late. Another cause of the poverty of the Ryots of these talooks is the want of a ready market for their produce, which obliges them to dispose of it to a few wealthy merchants of Cumbum and Budwel, who in a great measure dictate their own price, to which their immediate wants, and the pressing demands of the Sirkar, oblige the Ryots to accede.

29 Of the one hundred and thirty-seven villages in Budwel, one hundred and twenty-seven are rented for ten years, seven for nine years, and three remain unrented Two of these are the Poligar villages, regarding which I had the honour of addressing your Board under date 29th April last, and the third is a shotrium, whose rent is only Star Pagodas 1 18 22. The jodee enam of the former deskaee has been thrown up by the family, and I have not yet been able to get it rented by other persons.

Gidaloor.

30. The decennial rent of this talook is Star Pagodas 17,938 43 10, which exceeds the collections of seven, and falls short of those of four years of the Company's government. It also exceeds the several averages: that of eleven years, Star Pagodas 2,320 13 38; that of ten years, Star Pagodas 1,980 42 1; that of seven years, Star Pagodas 156 41 53; and that of the last three years, Star Pagodas 363 43 38. The proportion of rent which has been settled without condition is Star Pagodas 15,092 16 70; that with condition is Star Pagodas 2,846 26 20. The kool ackut with the fuse zuastee of Gedaloor is Star Pagodas 40,257 12 19; from which if the rent, remissions, and land reserved, be deducted, there will remain for the renter's profit an extent of land equal to Star Pagodas 133 42 67½ per cent. on the jumma, of which, however, only Star Pagodas 13 5 47½ is under cultivation.

31. This talook is divided into two parts by the Nullah-mullah mountains, the summits of which are covered with immense forest trees, and their skirts with thick jungle: from this last all the land which is hereafter brought under cultivation must be gained. The Ryots of some of the villages of this talook are very poor, and pay a great proportion of the rent of the land which they cultivate from the produce of the forests, which they carry for sale to Bellary, Gooty, Adoni, Koorpah, and all the open parts of the Ceded Districts. It is from the westward of the Nullah-mullah hills that the black lands begin, and the soil of some of the villages of this talook is of that description. The number of Ryots of the cultivating class in this talook is small, the inhabitants being for the most part the dependents of the former Poligars, in whose possession the whole talook formerly was, and the time which has elapsed since the beginning of the Company's government has not been long enough to effect much alteration in the habits of these people, who are as yet but very sorry cultivators.

32. All

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec. 1812.

32. All the villages of this talook have been rented out for ten or nine years; but there is some jodee land in the village of Nurwah which has been thrown up by the Enaumdars, and of which I have not yet been able to dispose.

Jumulmudgoo.

33. The mode of arranging the talooks in the accounts brings us at once from Gidaloor to Jumulmudgoo, the most western talook in the district. It is divided into two parts by the Gundikotah hills, the western portion being known by the name of the Quiblee Puttee, the eastern being Jumulmudgoo proper. The soils of the two parts are essentially different, the former having much wet land watered partly by tanks, but principally by nullahs from the Pennah river, the latter being almost entirely black cotton land with not above four or five tanks.

34. The decennial rent of this talook is Star Pagodas 52,505 20 50, which exceeds the collections of six, and is below those of five years of the Company's government. It also exceeds the average of the eleven years in the sum of Star Pagodas 3,352 4 8, and that of the ten years in Star Pagodas 1,797 41 11; but it falls short of the average of the last seven years Star Pagodas 1,992 27 6, and that of the last three years Star Pagodas 3,115 21 3. The amount settled unconditionally is Star Pagodas 49,936 42 43, and that settled conditionally is Star Pagodas 2,568 23 7. The kool ackut and fusl zuastee together amounts to Star Pagodas 82,316 31 18, the rent and remissions are Star Pagodas 56,497 17 65, leaving to the renters Star Pagodas 25,819 13 33, equal to Star Pagodas 50 23 57¼ per cent. on the jumma, of which Star Pagodas 11,460 6 26, or Star Pagodas 22 19 16¾ per cent., is included in the sagtarwaree.

35 The survey rate of the land of this talook is rather high, and it has consequently suffered from over assessment, but it is otherwise a fine district and capable of much improvement. The black land in the northern part of it is of excellent quality, but the whole is overrun with the nuth or long-rooted grass, which it will take many years to extirpate properly. All that is in that state must be cultivated on cowle, of at least seven years, which consideration, with that of almost the whole rent being payable unconditionally in all seasons, is the occasion of the greater remission and lowness of assessment which your Board will observe in comparison with the collections of former years. The rent of this talook, in fusly 1218, was Star Pagodas 58,654 30 56; that of 1219 was Star Pagodas 58,537 5 45; and that of 1220 was Star Pagodas 60,419 15 47, making an average of the three years of Star Pagodas 55,620 41 53. Comparing the assessment of these years with that of former years, and calling to mind the badness of the two last seasons of the triennial lease with the low price of grain, I trust you will not think that I have sunk too low in my demand. There are some villages in this talook which I have been obliged to rent below what I conceive ought to be the amount of the permanent lease, and I therefore think that your Board may look to some little increase in them.

36. Of the villages of this talook, in number one hundred and fifteen, ninety-seven have been rented for ten, and the remainder for nine years.

Dooor.

37. The decennial rent of this talook is Star Pagodas 58,156 16 79, which exceeds the amount of the collections of six, and falls short of those of five years of the Company's government. It exceeds the average of the whole eleven years in the sum of Star Pagodas 1,156 21 12; but falls below that of the last ten years Star Pagodas 388 6 50, that of the last seven years Star Pagodas 1,770 13 43, and that of the triennial lease Star Pagodas 5 16 47. The amount settled without condition is Star Pagodas 54,802 35 31, and that with a condition attached is Star Pagodas 4,728 26 48. The kool ackut is Star Pagodas 83,452 28 15; the rent, remissions, and reserved land amount to Star Pagodas 63,612 8 6; leaving to the renters Star Pagodas 19,840 20 9, equal to Star Pagodas 35 10 11¼ on the amount of the rent, of which Star Pagodas 12,205 35 69, or Star Pagodas 21 30 13 per cent., is cultivated, and Star Pagodas 13 24 78¼ is waste.

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec. 1812.

38. I have before this had occasion to notice to your Board, that this talook was the first surveyed, and that the rates were accordingly fixed very high and very unequally. A great deal of waste has also been regularly entered into the cultivation accounts, and the amount remaining as benjeer is Star Pagodas 13 24 78¼ on the amount of the present rent. In fact, there is no available waste, generally speaking, in this talook, and all that the renters have to look to is the amount given up to them out of the land in cultivation. A great deal of this is overrun with the nuth, and it will be some years before they can derive the full benefit intended for them. Two or three villages only have been assessed lower than I think they ought permanently to be.

39. One shotrium village alone remains unrented in this talook.

Koilgoontlah.

40. The decennial rent of this talook is Star Pagodas 43,234 34 55, which exceeds the amount of the collections of seven, and is less than those of four of the years of the Company's government. It exceeds the average of the eleven years in the sum of Star Pagodas 2,376 23 44; that of the last ten years, Star Pagodas 1,688 40 77; and that of the last seven years, Star Pagodas 193 17 60; and falls short of that of the last three years by Star Pagodas 2,732 0 9. The amount settled unconditionally is Star Pagodas 38,152 16 65, and that settled with a condition is Star Pagodas 5,971 44 10. The kool ackut with fusl zuastee is Star Pagodas 55,889 36 78, whilst the amount of rent and remission is Star Pagodas 43,324 38 54, leaving to the renters only Star Pagodas 12,564 43 24, equal to Star Pagodas 31 3 65¾ per cent., on the amount of the rent: of that Star Pagodas 19 43 22¼ is cultivated, and Star Pagodas 11 5 33 is waste.

41. The renters of this Talook will derive but little benefit from the waste, but with what has been given up to them they will easily be able to pay the amount of their rent. Their land is moderately assessed and is the best in the zillah, and the only thing they have to fear is an excessive fall in the price of grain and cotton, similar to that which was experienced in the former article two years ago. The regular demand for cotton, which must now be the consequence of the establishment of a factory in these districts, leaves the inhabitants but little to fear from an excessive depreciation in the price of that article. There is also but little grass in the cotton districts, and the necessity which the cultivators are thereby reduced to, of raising a sufficient supply of food for their cattle, will always put a check upon the too great growth of cotton, to augment the production of which they only use the waste lands, which they may hereafter bring into cultivation, and only a part of these, because the increase of the number of cattle required for that purpose will also render an increase of food necessary.

42. There are seventy-one villages in this Talook, of which sixty-three have been rented for ten, and six for nine years: two still remain on hand. I only recollect one village in this Talook whose permanent rent ought to exceed that now fixed.

Nosoom.

43. The rent fixed on the Nosoom talook is Star Pagodas 16,804 7 40, which exceeds the amount of the collections of six, and is less than those of five years of the Company's Government. It exceeds the average of the eleven years in the sum of Star Pagodas 1,815 4 74, and that of the last ten years Star Pagodas 1,019 14 66, and it falls short of the average collections of the last seven years Star Pagodas 309 22 73, and that of the triennial lease Star Pagodas 1,141 39 49; and of the whole rent only Star Pagodas 93 34 46. The tank land of the cusba is settled conditionally, the rest being payable under all circumstances. The kool ackut is Star Pagodas 21,767 0 47; the amount of the rent, remissions, and reserved land, is Star Pagodas 17,344 2 46, leaving to the renters Star Pagodas 4,372 43 1 or Star Pagodas 28 38, 71½ per cent. on the jumma of which Star Pagodas 24 36 1½ is in the cultivated, and Star Pagodas 4 2 70 in the waste land.

44. This talook is cultivated to its fullest extent, and almost entirely settled without condition, so that it was necessary to make ample allowance to the renters renters from the cultivated land: and I do not think that the present rent ought, on any account, to be exceeded.

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec. 1812.

45. The number of villages is nineteen, which have been all rented out for ten or nine years.

Chitwel.

46. The decennial rent of Chitwel is Star Pagodas 57,947 31 42; which exceeds the amount of the collections of five, and falls short of those of six years of the Company's Government. It exceeds the average of the whole eleven years by Star Pagodas 3,500 7 26, and that of the last ten years by Star Pagodas 867 40 72; and falls short of the last seven years Star Pagodas 1,018 31 18, and that of the last three years Star Pagodas 3,164 39 72. The amount of unconditional assessment is Star Pagodas 39,276 1 28, and that which is conditional is Star Pagodas 19,684 33 74. The kool ackut and fusl zuastee together amount to Star Pagodas 1,11,208 32 56; the rent, remissions, and reserved land to Star Pagodas 57,347 2 47; which leaves to the renters Star Pagodas 53,761 30 9, or Star Pagodas 108 9 37 per cent. on the jumma, of which Star Pagodas 17 7 32 is in the cultivated, and Star Pagodas 91 2 5 in the waste land. Of one hundred and thirty-nine villages which compose this talook, one hundred and nine have been rented for ten, and eighteen for nine years: the remaining twelve are still undisposed of.

47. This talook possesses great advantages, and appears to me capable of much improvement, but it will be some years before this can be effected. The cutting down the trees and destroying the jungle will require great labour, and the land must be given upon a long cowle, and at an easy rent. There is a great deal of land watered by nullahs in this talook, part of which has been covered by sand from the floods, in fusilies 1214 and 1219 What cannot be recovered at all I have struck out of the accounts, and for that which may be cleared in two or three years I have made allowances. Some service enaums have been destroyed in the above manner, instead of which other land of equal value has been given to the Enaumdars. From these causes the amount of remission is greater in this than in any other talook: moreover, a great portion of the Ryots of this talook are Rachewars, who have of late years had a remission of from two to four annas on their cultivation granted to them, in consequence of the customs of their caste preventing their having the services of their women in the field; but though thus favoured, they are not equal to the common Koombus as cultivators.

Sidhout.

48. The decennial rent of the Sidhout talook is Star Pagodas 43,565 16 70, which sum exceeds the amount of the collections of six, and falls short of those of five years of the Company's government. It is above the average of the eleven years Star Pagodas 2,203 31 9, and that of the last ten years Star Pagodas 727 8 30; but is below that of the last seven years Star Pagodas 934 37 7, and that of the last three years Star Pagodas 1,747 22 40. The amount settled unconditionally is Star Pagodas 28,430 25 30, and that settled conditionally is Star Pagodas 15,370 6 40. The kool ackut and fusl zuaster is Star Pagodas 87,274 3 69; the amount of rent and remissions is Star Pagodas 48,003 14 5, which leaves to the renters Star Pagodas 39,270 34 64, equal to Star Pagodas 91 31 42 per cent. on the jumma, of which Star Pagodas 16 9 2 is cultivated and Star Pagodas 75 22 40 is waste.

49. This talook contains some of the finest garden land in the Ceded Districts; but it is assessed at its highest value, and with it a good deal of bad land was generally written into the pottahs of the Ryots. This last has now been given up or cultivated separately upon a low rent. The beriz of some of the villages has accordingly sunk in some degree, and the permanent rent of these ought to be fixed a little higher than the present rent. There appears a great deal of waste in the accounts, but only a small part of it is really available. This is a fine district, but it has suffered in some degree from over-assessment; and a mortality in some of the villages, during fusilies 1220 and 1221, has occasioned some poverty and distress. I have been obliged, in consequence, quence, to bring the rent up progressively to the fixed standard, which it will not attain, as you will observe by the accounts, until fusily 1225.

49. The whole of the Sidhout villages have been rented for either ten or nine years.

Chenoor.

50. The decennial rent of the Chenoor talook is Star Pagodas 37,482 9 49, which exceeds the amount of the collections of seven and falls short of those of four of the years of the Company's government. It likewise exceeds the average of the whole eleven years Star Pagodas 3,124 14 5; that of the last ten years, Star Pagodas 2,544 2 56; that of the last seven years, Star Pagodas 2,335 18 41; and that of the last three years, Star Pagodas 295 22 54. The amount settled without condition is Star Pagodas 28,426 4 32; that settled conditionally is Star Pagodas 9,106 5 17. The kool ackut is Star Pagodas 49,867 1 65; the amount of rent, remission, and land retained, is Star Pagodas 40,436 8 26; leaving to the renters Star Pagodas 9,430 38 29, equal to Star Pagodas 25 29 1¼ per cent. on the jumma, of which Star Pagodas 8 1 53 is cultivated and Star Pagodas 17 27 28¼ is waste.

51. This is, perhaps, the most favoured talook in the Ceded Districts. The survey-rent of the lands is moderate, little more than the land actually cultivated has at any time paid rent; the Ryots are for the most part wealthy, the science of husbandry is well understood, and it is very seldom that it suffers from drought. From these circumstances, and the regularity of the rent which the villages have every year paid to Government, most of them have been settled according to the average collections of a certain number of years; and when this has been exceeded, it is in the large tank villages, where a very great proportion of the rent has been settled conditionally, and where it became necessary to guard the Government against loss.

52. The whole of the villages of this talook have been rented out for ten or nine years.

Chintagoontah.

53. The rent of this talook is Star Pagodas 21,756 5 50, which exceeds the amount of the collections of eight, and falls below those of three of the eleven years of the Company's government. It exceeds the average of the whole eleven years Star Pagodas 1,112 17 51; that of the last ten years, Star Pagodas 845 17 4; that of the last seven years, Star Pagodas 348 22 57; and that of the last three years, Star Pagodas 450 11 29. The amount settled unconditionally is Star Pagodas 20,860 35 55, and that settled conditionally is Star Pagodas 895 14 75 The amount of land which remains to the renters of this talook, after deducting the rent, remissions, and land reserved from the kool ackut, is Star Pagodas 3,717 41 6, being Star Pagodas 17 9 45 per cent. on the amount of the rent, of which Star Pagodas 6 37 31 is cultivated and Star Pagodas 10 17 14 is waste.

54. The survey-rate of the lands of this talook is very moderate, and the cultivation is carried nearly as far as it can be. All that I had to do was to strike out the little portion of uncultivated land which was mixed with the other, and to make the remission which appears in the accounts, the whole of which will be a clear gain to the renters and Ryots.

55. Except one village, the whole of this talook has been rented ont for ten or nine years.

Kamulapoor.

56. The rent fixed for the Kamulapoor talook is Star Pagodas 37,847 32 9, which exceeds the collections of five, and falls short of those of six years of the Company's government. It exceeds the average of the whole eleven years Star Pagodas 710 31 0, but is below that of the last ten years Star Pagodas 176 32 46, that of the last seven years Star Pagodas 1,132 25 40, and that of the last three years Star Pagodas 934 26 57. The amount settled unconditionally is Star Pagodas 35,815 40 63, and that settled conditionally is Star Pagodas 2,031 36 26. The kool ackut is Star Pagodas 48,751 38 77; the rent, remissions, and land reserved, amounted to Star Pagodas 39,594 41 58: leaving leaving to the renters Star Pagodas 9,156 39 19, being Star Pagodas 24 36 55½ per cent. on the amount jumma, of which Star Pagadas 10 31 61 is cultivated, and Star Pagodas 14 4 74½ is waste.

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec. 1812.

57. The rent of the lands of this talook is tolerably moderate; but some of the villages suffered greatly from the scantiness of the crops and the low price of grain, in fusilies 1219 and 1220. A good deal of waste, too, was in fusilies 1217 and 1218, written in with the cultivated land, and perhaps two or three per cent. of that which is called cultivated is of that description. There is much wet land in this talook watered from the Pennah and Komarkalwa rivers, which has been settled without condition, on which account the demand was in some degree lowered. The available waste is trifling.

58. I have not yet been able to rent three villages of this talook, which suffered in a particular degree during the late lease.

Goorumkondah.

59. The rent of the Goorumkondah talook is Star Pagodas 85,254 10 6, which exceeds the collections of seven, and is below those of four of the eleven last years. It is above the average of the whole period Star Pagodas 7,403 9 72, also above that of the last ten years Star Pagodas 5,628 17 56, and that of the last seven years Star Pagodas 1,625 13 15; but is below that of the last three years Star Pagodas 4,097 35 55. The amount rented unconditionally is Star Pagodas 47,761 2 79, and that rented conditionally is Star Pagodas 43,133 38 2. After deducting the amount of the rent and remissions ackut and fusl zuastee, there remains Star Pagodas 89,925 44 23, equal to Star Pagodas 102 8 9¾ per cent. on the jumma, of which Star Pagodas 8 13 68¼ is cultivated, and Star Pagodas 93 39 31 is waste.

60. The revenue of this talook is collected from an immense extent of land, over which population is but very thinly scattered. The soil is poor, and let the rent of it be ever so low, many acres must be ploughed before the smallest profit can be obtained. The Ryots are very poor, and are principally kept up by the great number of small tanks, of which there are two or three, sometimes more, around every hill, to each of which a small deerwundum is attached, by possessing or cultivating which upon easy terms they are enabled to meet the Sirkar demands. The number of these enams leads in part, also, to the existence of a number of hamlets near them, so that the population of this talook is particularly dispersed, the number of populous towns or villages in it not exceeding perhaps a dozen, whilst the rest are made up of from two or three to thirty or fifty of these hamlets. The village of Moodverd, whose rent is Cantaria Pagodas 2,250, is composed of the cusba and one hundred and four hamlets. This talook will improve gradually, but slowly; for the prime want is that of population, which can only be slowly supplied, and its increase very frequently meets with checks from the small pox and epidemic disorders.

61. All the villages of Goorumkondah have been rented out.

Poolwendlah.

62. The decennial rent of Poolwendlah is Star Pagodas 64,847 9 11, which is above the collections of seven, and below those of four of the years of the Company's government. It exceeds the average of the whole eleven years Star Pagodas 5,993 37 54; that of the last ten years, Star Pagodas 4,010 19 8; that of the last seven years, Star Pagodas 1,086 22 40; and that of the last three years, Star Pagodas 1,261 16 47. The amount settled unconditionally is Star Pagodas 57,518 29 24, and that settled conditionally is Star Pagodas 7,328, 24 67. After deducting the amount of rent, remission, and reserved land, from the ackut and fusl zuastee, there remains to the renters Star Pagodas 48,141 36 50, equal to Star Pagodas 74 44 34¼ per cent. on the amount of the jumma, whereof Star Pagodas 29 10 41¾ is cultivated, and Star Pagodas 45 33 72½ is waste.

63. The triennial rent of this talook was fixed very high, but could not be paid; and though the balance outstanding was considerable, yet the collection of that which was realized bore very hard upon the talook, prrticularly on the western part, which consists almost entirely of black land of an inferior quality, lity, now overgrown nuth. The Ryots have had but little produce for these three or four years past, and for that they got an inadequate price in the two years when the Sirkar demand was heaviest upon them. A great deal of waste used to be written in the cultivation accounts of this talook: the consequence is, that I have found great difficulty in renting the villages in the western summuts, and when I ordered the accounts to be closed, twenty-three villages remained on hand. Of these, however, seventeen have since been disposed of, at a progressively increasing rent, as your Board will see by the list No. 7; and I hope it will not be very long before I get the rest settled also I am fearful of giving too good terms for these villages, lest, being on Mr. Chaplin's side, an emigration to them be encouraged from his villages in Dhurmavur.

Raechotee.

64. The decennial rent of this talook has been fixed at Star Pagodas 38,287 3 41, which exceeds the amount of the collections of six, and is below those of five of the years of the present government. It exceeds the average of the whole of that period Star Pagodas 2,401 2 9; that of the last ten years, Star Pagodas 2,070 25 34; and that of the last seven years, Star Pagodas 819 32 4; and is less than that of the last three years Star Pagodas 1,845 27 48. The amount settled unconditionally is Star Pagodas 29 498 9 41, and that fixed conditionally Star Pagodas 10,398 38 2. After deducting the rent, remission, and reserved land from the ackut and fusl zuastee, there remains to the renters Star Pagodas 42,175 39 31, equal to Star Pagodas 106 28 59 per cent. on the amount of the jumma; of which Star Pagodas 19 19 13¼ is entered as cultivated, and Star Pagodas 87 10 48 as waste.

65. This talook bears a great resemblance to Goorumkondah, to which it was formerly attached. With the exception of the cusba, there is hardly a place of consequence in it. The Ryots are poor and are scantily scattered over a great extent of country. It partakes, though in a smaller degree than Goorumkondah, of the advantages derived from small tanks and numerous duswundums. It can always meet the Sirkar demand; but its progress in improvement must, like that of Goorumkondah, and from the same causes, be slow.

66. All the rachotie villages have been rented out for ten years.

67. The total decennial rent which has been fixed for the zillah is Star Pagodas 6,89,368 5 16. It exceeds the amount of the collections of fusily 1210 in the sum of Star Pagodas 2,30,618 43 59*; that of fusily 1211, in the sum of Star Pagodas 1,04,501 17 41; that of fusily 1212, in the sum of Star Pagodas 89,118 27 10; that of 1213, in the sum of Star Pagodas 1,10,779 5 25; and that of fusily 1214, Star Pagodas 15,902 2 36; it is below that of fusily 1215 Star Pagodas 45,426 20 11, and exceeds that of 1216 Star Pagodas 1,14,117

Excess..	1,10,779 5 25	Less....	21,344 0 79

1,14,117 27 3. It it below that of fusily 1217 Star Pagodas 21,344 0 79, also below that of 1218 Star Pagodas 48,914 3 59; but exceeds that of 1219 Star Pagodas 3,576 37 63, and also that of fusily 1220 in the sum of Star Pagodas 36,264 3 27.

68. The decennial rent is above three of the averages which I have drawn,* and is below the fourth. It exceeds that of the whole eleven years in the sum of Star Pagodas 53,563 4 40,* or 8 19 8 per cent,; that of the last ten years, Star Pagodas 35,857 23 7, or 5 21 73¼ per cent.; and that of the last seven years, Star Pagodas 7,739 11 30, or 1 6 7½ per cent. It is below the average receipts of the triennial lease Star Pagodas 3,024 17 38, or 19 52 per cent.

69. Having already entered so fully into the detail of the settlement of each talook, it will not be necessary to say much on the sum total, on which I shall therefore only make a few remarks.

70. At the time I did myself the honour to propose a septennial lease to your Board, I recommended that the average of the collections of the last seven years, or something less, should be taken as a standard for the amount. The amount of the settlement which has been made exceeds that average, as above shewn, about Star Pagodas 7,700, or Star Pagodas 1 6 7½ per cent. The reason is this. I in the first place did not, at the time I wrote, expect quite so great a defalcation as occurred in fusily 1220, which reduced the average considerably In the next place, I at that time calculated on settling only about Star Pagodas 1,37,000 conditionally; but the amount which has actually been settled conditionally is about Star Pagodas 1,67,500, and the excess of rent above what I intended is a set-off to this excess of conditional assessment I found that the plan I at first proposed was more theoretical than practical. The tanks, whose land I intended to rent without condition, are those small ones which generally are sure of being filled once a year, but for whose cultivation that is not sufficient: they require to be filled two, and sometimes three times, to bring their crops to perfection, and these repeated supplies they are not equally certain of getting. In short, I do not think that tank lands can ever, with benefit either to the Sirkar or the renter, be assessed unconditionally. I made this alteration from my first plan without reference, as I felt confident that your Board would sanction the measure, and as a reference would therefore have only occasioned a loss of time. I trust your Board will consider the increase which I have made as a benefit to the Government, equal to any loss that it can sustain by the extension of the condition. I think, also, that the sum appropriated to the repairs of wells, &c. is too small, being only Star Pagodas 691 30 0, and it might be as well, perhaps, to extend the remission. On that account, I have provided by the pottah for its due application to the purpose for which it is intended †

71. The cultivated land which has been given over to the renters averages for all the talooks Star Pagodas 17 21 66¼ per cent. on the jumma now fixed, and the waste land Star Pagodas 59 10 70½. By one of the statements which accompanied my letter of the 17th January 1812, your Board has seen that the average of the bunjeer land which had paid rent during the six years, from fusily 1214 to 1219 was Star Pagodas 3 14 41¾ per cent.; but that it had increased of late years, and was in fusily 1219, Star Pagodas 6 36 15 per cent. on the rent of that year. If we calculate it at Star Pagodas 7 21 61¼ (and that will, perhaps, be more accurate than the other), there will remain a profit of ten per cent. upon the land in actual cultivation for immediate enjoyment.

ment. I estimate that the renters will be obliged to cede at least the half of that to the Ryots, to induce them to keep up their old cultivation, and to take good and bad land together. If I be correct, there will then remain a profit for the renters to begin with, of about five per cent. on the rent of their villages. What they afterwards get beyond this must be derived from the breaking up of waste, of which benefit the Ryots will take care to have their full share.

72. I have now endeavoured, Gentlemen, to lay before you, in the fullest manner, the settlement which I have made, in order that you may be better able to judge how far it will be proper to convert it into a perpetual settlement. I do not hesitate to recommend it, with the revision of a few villages, as such. In those villages, perhaps, there will be a trifling increase; but as a drawback to that, I have to recommend that the benefit of the condition be extended to wet lands watered from a certain description of nullas in the southern part of the districts. These nullas are formed principally from the surplus water of some large tanks assisted by small streams from the hills. Unless the tanks overflow, however, the latter alone are of little use; so that the land, though watered as nulla land in the accounts, is in reality watered from the tanks, or what is even more precarious still, the overflowing of the tanks. According to the principle and rules which I have laid down, I could not extend the condition to those lands, though much solicited to do so; but I recommend its being done if the lease be rendered permanent.

73. Your Board have already been furnished with a copy of the cowle on which the villages have been rented; another, however, with one of the moochulka, will form a number in the present packet. You can judge how far it is proper to be adopted for a permanent one. Its excessive detail is certainly objectionable, and that may in part be remedied; but it will still be necessary to define the rules of assessment for the tank lands.

74. I see no reason, at present, to doubt the readiness of the decennial renters to take their villages on the present terms in perpetuity. On the contrary, if the Board and Government approve of the amount of the rent, and see nothing objectionable in the terms of the pottah, I trust that a few months will be sufficient to convert the present into a permanent settlement.

75. Referring again to the proclamation which was published, it may be necessary to explain one or two parts of that document to your Board. The former Meerassadars were informed by it, that by the establishment of fixed rents the office of Reddee or Potail was virtually become extinct, and that the continuance of a separate renter and separate Reddee in one village was totally inadmissable; that in case the former Meerassadars accepted the lease the enaum would be continued to them, as no dispute could thereby arise; but that in case the lease were taken by others, it would rest with the Sirkar either to resume the whole enaum for its own use, or give it to the new renter, or on a consideration of the former services of the Meerassadars to continue a part of it to them, and resume or dispose of the rest.

76. The enclosed copy, with its translate, of a circular order to the talooks, under date 11th September last, will shew your Board the particulars of the arrangement which I have made in regard to the Reddee enaums, with the exceptions of a few villages whose enaum has been entirely given over to the decennial renters; the rule has been to give three-quarters of the old established Reddee enaum to the renters, and to continue the remaining quarter to the former Meerassadars, when the latter were not possessed of other enaum equal to that fourth. If they had other enaum (not duswundum) less than one fourth of the reddeé maunium, a quantity equal to that fourth was made up to them: if they possessed enaum equal to a quarter of the reddee maunium, no share of it was given to them, but the whole was made over to the renters.

77. I did not consider the new Potails, appointed during the Company's government, as entitled to this indulgence which I confined to the old Meerassadars only. In the same manner, I looked upon the old Meerassadars as entitled to a share of the old established maunium alone, and the kumbhurtie quedie enaum (which is the augmentation made in the Reddee enaum of certain villages, when it formerly was below the standard fixed by Colonel Munro) has been given over entirely to the decennial renters.

Report from Collector of Cuddapah, 22 Dec. 1812.

78. This share of the enaum has been continued to the former Meerassadars, on the condition of good behaviour, and of their not creating disturbance, or using their endeavours to impede the cultivation or oppose the renters. They have been informed, that if they do so it will be taken from them. But in case of that becoming necessary, the land ought to be kept by the Sirkar for its own use; for if the renters are to profit by the resumption they will not fail to prefer complaints against the Meerassadars without any foundation, and merely with the view of getting possession of the rest of the enaum.

79. Considering how long the Meerassadars have been in possession of these enaum lands, and the expense and labour which they have laid out in general upon them, I thought it but fair to continue them in possession of the lands themselves, provided they agreed to pay the survey rent for them to the renters; and this has been generally agreed, so that both parties have every cause to be satisfied. It is also understood, that the enaum is to go along with the village, and will be forfeited by any renter whose lease may, on any account, be taken from him.

80. Very few villages, compared with what I expected, have been subdivided. Many persons wished to do so, but they could not make the necessary arrangements among themselves; and I would not accept of any offers for a portion of a village separately, but required the whole to be first settled. Had I not done this, I might have had the best half of a village rented out, and the worst half upon my hands. I enclose a list, No. 9, of the large villages, which have been subdivided and rented under separate pottahs. Your Board's orders, in regard to the gram sibbendi of such villages, have been attended to and acted upon.

81. There were two causes that appeared to me to have operated towards the failure of the three years lease in some villages. These were, the great number of persons admitted to shares in the pottah, and the division of some villages into methus or distinct shares, each methu being answerable for a distinct portion only of the rent, for which also a separate security was given. The quarrels, criminal complaints, and law-suits, which occurred in these villages were incessant; the villages were torn to pieces, the cultivation was stopped, and in the end the rent remained unpaid.

82. The division into methus was so objectionable, that I would not listen to any offer for renting a village in that way. In the other case, where there were many partners who came forward together, I entered in the pottah the names of two, three, four, according to the size and beriz of the village, of the most respectable and leading men in it. I had seldom occasion, however, to make this arrangement, for I almost uniformly found the partners at variance with each other: they presented separate offers by two's and three's, and for some villages there were as many offers as partners

83. The fewer renters there are in a village the better, for where there are many each has his party. The Ryots are divided; an appeal is made to one from the orders of another; one makes agreements which the others will not sanction; one directs the neerhutee to let the water out, another goes and closes the sluice; and the whole ends in the cultivation being neglected, and all parties coming and spending their time unprofitably in the Court. The renters ought, therefore, to be confined to the smallest number, by which the business of the village can be efficiently conducted. This does not prevent the subdivision of shares, according to the rights of all the partners, however numerous; but by having a limited number of responsible persons, it simplifies the transaction of business, and lets the Ryots know who are the persons really in charge of the village, and to whom they are to look for orders.

84. The Statement No. 10 shews the number of villages rented by old renters and Potails, and of those rented by new persons.

85. The veesabuddy mohturfa and bazeebab having now been entirely separated from the land revenue, I have the honour, in compliance with your Board's instructions, to submit a draft of a Regulation to legalize the former of these taxes, and to suggest some rules for the future assessment and collection of the others. The draft varies but little from that sent by Mr. Chaplin. It should have

have been submitted long ago; but I have been trying whether I could, by some means, assimilate the veesabuddy and mohturfa so nearly as to bring them within the scope of one Regulation, and to collect them exactly in the same manner. The preparation of the mohturfa accounts, from the intimate manner in which they were formerly blended with the land rent, took up a great deal of time; and, after all, I have not succeeded in my object, and the Regulation which I now propose, like that of Mr. Chaplin's, merely prescribes rules for the veesabuddy, leaving the mohturfa and bazeebab to be collected under the orders of the Board generally. The plan I have to propose for the future assessment and collection of the mohturfa, will, however, bring it pretty near to the veesabuddy, by allowing the greater part of those paying it to assess themselves, or rather to distribute among themselves their several shares of the general assessment.

86. This principle of the veesabuddy is excellent; but still there is one great objection to the tax, viz. the uncertainty with which the gross amount must be fixed upon a district or talook. The data upon which Colonel Munro made his estimate are the best certainty which can be obtained; but experience has shewn, that the detail of the estimate was still very imperfect. The Statement No. 12 will explain to your Board the mode in which the veesabuddy tax was assessed on this zillah last year, and its inequalities will be apparent.

87 The person who pays the highest veesabuddy in the zillah is a merchant of Gidaloor. The proportion which this person contributes is perhaps very fair, when compared with the other traders in his own talook; but it is quite the contrary, when compared with those of the rest of the zillah, of whom at least a dozen carry on a greater and more thriving trade than he does, and are much more able to pay at a high rate. As the veesabuddy is regulated, this man's contribution cannot be reduced, without a proportionate reduction on every other trader in the same talook.

88. Doioor is certainly the first trading talook of the zillah: in it the highest rate of contribution is Star Pagodas 13 42 43, and the lowest Star Pagodas 0 6 12½. The average per man, in fusily 1221, was Star Pagodas 1 43 18, and taking the same number of men, the average on Colonel Munro's estimate would be Star Pagodas 1 43 5½. In Doopad, the poorest and least trading talook, the highest rate is Star Pagodas 16, the lowest is Star Pagodas 0 1 70. The average paid last year was Star Pagodas 1 10 15¼; and if the whole sum estimated had been collected, the average would have been Star Pagodas 2 39 6¼.

89. In Chintagoontah, the lowest sum contributed is Fanams 19 55: in Cumbum it is only 37½ cash. Can there be a proportionate difference between the circumstances of the contributors in the two talooks? The traders of each talook are, perhaps, as I have said before, very fairly assessed in respect to each other; but I think this statement shews how very much it is the contrary, when the quotas of the traders of the whole district come to be examined with each other. This proceeds from the imperfection of the data upon which the general estimate is formed, which leads to the great disproportion in which it is assessed upon the talooks.

90. I do not consider the gross estimate of the veesabuddy made by Colonel Munro as too high, but I think it ought to be very differently divided upon the different talooks; and as soon as a regulation is passed, I propose to revise it, though in doing so, we lose sight of the accounts on which the estimate was formed, which were made out talookwar. At present I must acknowledge that I find the collection of this tax a matter of no small difficulty. I then propose calling together the forty principal merchants (vide col. 10 of the Statement), and by ascertaining the relative circumstances of these persons, and from them the circumstances of their respective talooks, I hope to be enabled to make a more satisfactory distribution of the total amount of the tax.

91. In neither of the plans, proposed by Mr. Chaplin or myself, is there any very minute detail of the mode of assessing the veesabuddy on each individual; and after much consideration of the subject, I am inclined to think that it will be better not to attempt any such. I have the heads of an old Bengal Police Regulation now abolished, similar to the veesabuddy, where the tax was distributed tributed by assessors; but I think that our mode of assessment is much better than the one laid down. Merchants being interested, could not, with safety, be appointed as assessors; and were the tax to be distributed by persons appointed by the Sirkar, who are unacquainted with the circumstances of the merchants, an investigation of books and accounts would in every case become necessary, than which nothing can be imagined more obnoxious to the trading community. Little or nothing of the sort is necessary, if the business be left to the people themselves, who are all acquainted with each other's circumstances, amount of trade, and mode of life, and whose mutual interests prevent their having recourse to such an exposure.

92. The present mode of settling the veesabuddy, and which is what I propose shall be continued, is nearly as follows.

The Tehsildar, on receipt of the Collector's order to prepare the veesabuddy accounts, assembles all the shopkeepers, merchants, and traders of each village, and directs them to present to him a statement of their relative trade and circumstances. This, from their intimate acquaintance with each other's means, is not in general very difficult, though at times disputes arise which are referred to the Tehsildar, who appoints a punchayet of merchants, &c. from the neighbouring villages, whose decision is generally approved, though at times the disputant will not agree to that, but appeals to the huzoor, or withdraws without giving his signature; and in some cases, when he imagines that there is a general prejudice against him, he goes to another talook and settles there. When the veeses, or shares of every village, have been adjusted, a statement signed by each individual is given in, and certain persons from each village assemble together to prepare a similar statement of the relative shares of the several villages. Here it is that the great difficulty occurs; for every village tries to get rid of as much as possible of its own share of contribution, and to fix more upon the rest. The adjustment is not made without a good deal of clamour and reference, which last is decided, like the former, by punchayets. When the whole is arranged, the shares of the villages are, as were those of the individuals, signed by all parties, and the general accounts are sent to the huzoor; and the sum being fixed, pottahs are given to each person, and the amount is collected according to the statements. Appeals are at times made to the Collector from the decisions in the talook, both by individuals and by villages, which are, in like manner, settled by punchayets selected from other villages or other talooks, as the case may require.

93. It must happen that, in an arrangement of this sort, a few of the principal men of each village and talook must lead, and some of these persons will not fail at times to take advantage, for their own benefit, of the influence they possess. But there is no transaction in human life where this does not occur, and all that can be done is, as far as possible, to prevent it, and that is always attempted, but to put a stop to it altogether will be impossible. The principle of allowing a body of men to assess themselves is so good, that for the benefit we may put up with some of the evils resulting from it.

94. The amount of veesabuddy payable by a district ought not to be varied or increased too often. Nothing is so disheartening as the rapid succession of taxation upon improvement: in fact, it goes a great way to prevent improvement altogether. The wealth and means of an individual may vary every year, but the general amount of wealth in a district under ordinary circumstances does not. The revenue derivable from the veesabuddy can never be permanently fixed, but the nearer it can be brought to permanency the better; I have, therefore, proposed that the amount of the veesabuddy assessable on a whole district shall be fixed only once in every five years. A periodical revision of that sort will, without injury to the revenue, be much more satisfactory to those who have to pay the tax, than an annual and variable assessment. In order to prevent detriment to the revenue from any intentional false assessment on the part of the principal merchants, I propose that the amount balance of one year shall be added to the veesabuddy of the next. This will also render it a general object to prevent emigrations, and to bring forward any who attempt to avoid payment of the tax. A clause in the draft provides for the future extension of the veesabuddy laws to the mohturfa, in case it hereafter shall be found practicable and expedient to do so.

95. Of the total amount of the mohturfa of last year (viz. Star Pagodas 14,024 39 21), Star Pagodas 10,686 23 12 was paid by four descriptions of people, viz. weavers, cotton-cleaners, shepherds, and the punchal (or five casts), which includes goldsmiths, braziers, iron-smiths, carpenters, and stone-cutters. Of the remaining sum Star Pagodas 1,023 21 59 will now be placed under different heads, and Star Pagodas 325 8 35 will be carried to the veesabuddy, so that Star Pagodas 1,989 30 75 remains to be paid by the forty-seven descriptions of persons shewn in the last division of the Statement No. 13.* This sum is paid so much in detail, that it will not be worth while to attempt laying down any particular rules for its collection, and it may continue to be taken as at present.

96. I am confident that the number of looms in this division is very nearly twenty thousand, which I believe is as much as Colonel Munro estimated for the whole Ceded Districts in fusily 1215. But it is very difficult to get true accounts of them, as the Reddees and Curnums always conceal those which are worked for themselves, or in their own houses, and frequently all that belong to the barabutstee of the village. The number of looms at present on our accounts is 14,488; but in the accounts of the present fusily, which are already received from five talooks, there is an excess above last year of 1,371 looms. Few of these are new looms: they are only what have been always omitted in the accounts.

97. The mode of settling the mohturfa on looms, hitherto, has been very minute: every circumstance of the weaver's family is considered, the number of days which he devotes to his loom, the number of his children, the assistance which he receives from them, and the number and quality of the pieces which he can turn out in a month or year; so that, let him exert himself as he will, his industry will always be taxed to the highest possible degree. This mode always leads to such detail,† that the Sirkar servants cannot properly enter into it, and the assessment of the tax is, in consequence, left a great deal too much to the Curnums of the villages. No weaver can possibly know what he is to pay to the Sirkar till the demand comes to be made for his having exerted himself in the course of the year; and having turned out one or two pieces of cloth more than he did the year before, though his family and looms have remained the same, is made a ground for his being charged with a higher mohturfa, and at last instead of a professional it becomes a real income tax.

98. These errors may, I think, be rectified, by fixing a number of rates (I have, in the account No. 14, estimated only sixteen, but the number is immaterial provided it be defined) at which the different looms are to be charged. Every description of loom will be included in one or other of these rates. If a weaver have one loom, he will pay for one; if two, for two, according to the rate, and it will be left to himself to manufacture as much or as little as he pleases: he will not be assessed more highly because he is industrious, or more lightly because he is idle. The looms of those who have other associations besides weaving will be entered into the lower rates, and those of weavers only will be rated according to the nature of the loom and of its produce. The looms will be rated by the different descriptions of weavers themselves, assembled at the talook cutcherry for that purpose. After the rates shall have thus been fixed, the increase of revenue which may arise will be derived from the increased increased number of looms, and not from raising the tax upon those already in existence: the only thing to be guarded against is a collusion of the weavers of a talook, in the first instance, to throw an unfair proportion of looms into the lower classes; but this will easily be prevented, by a reference to the accounts of what the looms, which they may try to depreciate, have previously yielded. The accounts can be settled in a few days in the cutcherry, and concealment can be easily prevented by the levy of a fine, in addition to the rent, upon the looms concealed; half, or the whole, to be given to the person who informs the Sirkar of the circumstance.

99. There is one question which I wish to put here for the consideration of your Board. Ought the looms of cultivators to be taxed, considering that they pay no duty on cotton or thread? and referring to the remission of customs lately made on the produce of their looms, and that these will, for the most part if not entirely, be entered in the lowest rates, I see no just reason for their exemption. Indeed, it is a sort of justice to the regular weavers who pay duty, and to whom they are pretty formidable rivals, that they should be taxed.

100. The cotton cleaners, who are also weavers, ought to have their bows and looms rated by themselves, in the same manner as weavers. These persons have a sort of prescriptive right established by long custom to clean the cotton in certain ranges, containing a greater or smaller number of villages, in which others are not allowed to set up. Some of them have thus employment for the whole twelve months, whilst others are not employed for six months in the year. This creates the variety in the value of their bows, which will be rated accordingly.

101. Shepherds pay a tax upon their flocks in every part of the district; and in three talooks, where they weave kumlees, they pay separately for their looms also. This tax is assessed very irregularly, as your Board will observe by the Statement No. 17. In Koilgoontlah a flock of four hundred sheep pays on the average Star Pagodas 10 10 16¼, whilst in the district Nosoom it pays only Star Pagodas 5 18 58, and in Goorumcondah only Star Pagodas 1 9 13¼. In the last district the shepherd certainly pays separately for his loom: but then the tax thereon is only Fanams 4 11¼, which is far from making up the difference. In Doopad, where there are most sheep, the average is Star Pagodas 5 3 1 per flock of four hundred. Flocks differ considerably in value, according to the number of ewes in each, and the pasture which they can obtain; and the rates which they pay have long been established by custom in each talook. The difference of the rates, too, is so considerable, that it will be difficult to arrange them on any uniform plan. The best thing, therefore, will be to leave them as they are, assessing the present rates, and allowing the increase in number to determine the increase of rent. Three or four different rates may be fixed, and the flocks in each talook may be rated according to their value, by the shepherds themselves assembled in the cutcherry. In the same manner as with the looms, a penalty on proof of concealment may be levied, to be disposed of in the same manner.

102. It is also a question to be decided by your Board, whether the flocks of the cultivating classes, which are chiefly kept to manure and enrich the land, should be taxed, or exempted entirely, or taxed at a reduced rate. These persons benefit as well as the regular shepherds by the breeding of their flocks. The flocks of koonbees, who do not cultivate Sirkar land, have always been taxed by the custom of the country.

103. The punchayet, or five casts, may I think be allowed to assess themselves exactly in the same manner as the veesabuddy; the amount to be estimated upon what they have always been in the habit of paying, making an increase or decrease, according to the increase or decrease in their numbers.

104. The mohturfa will, by the above arrangements, be brought as near as it can be brought to the veesabuddy, without being actually incorporated with it. The plan I propose will be much more popular than the veesabuddy, for the revenue will increase only with the increase of looms, flocks, &c. and will not be raised by adding to the tax already paid. It is also, in my opinion, far more simple, for the contribution of any individual may be altered altered without affecting the rest, whereas I have already shewn that a person paying the veesabuddy cannot be increased or lowered, without a correspondent alteration being made in the whole of the talook.

105. The last head of revenue which comes to be noticed is the bazebab. This consists of a number of small taxes, which are annually rented out to the highest bidder. The renting out of taxes, when they can with equal ease be collected by the Sirkar, is objectionable, as it is thereby impossible to ascertain what is really collected, and how the tax bears upon those who have to pay it. Some of the taxes collected under the head of bazebab appear very objectionable, and in their nature incompatible with the spirit of the Regulations, and the mode of collecting them must, one would think, be vexatious. These mostly exist in the parts of the country which were formerly in possession of Poligars, where the collection of the revenue was more minutely conducted than in the Sirkar districts. Most of the names of these taxes ought to be abolished, the amount of some remitted altogether, and the amount of those which are retained thrown in with the mohturfa, and the whole collected in an uniform manner directly by the Government.

106. The first of the taxes which I have alluded to is the shetee gunachree, which is the right of chieftainship or headship of certain casts; all those, I believe, which are generally included under the head of "right-hand cast." This right is rented out every year to the highest bidder, who may be of any cast, as he can act by deputy, and it is accordingly rented to Bramins and Mussulmans as often as to others. The renter or his deputy presides at all festivals, marriages, and religious ceremonies, at which he has the seat of honour, and is first helped to betel, &c. His emoluments of office are drawn from three sources: first, the wurtuna, or usual fees; secondly, the nuzur or present, or more properly the extra fees; thirdly, the joremanee, or fines: the first of these is the regular present, or fee, which he receives on occasion of marriages, naming of children, deaths, &c.: this, however, is but a trifle. The nuzur he receives on extraordinary occasions, such as divorces and the marriages of women to second husbands; this is more considerable than the former, but occurs less frequently. The renter's great source of emolument and advantage is the joremanee, or fine, and in the levying of this it may well be imagined that he is more guided by avarice and a view to profit, and to reimburse himself for what he has to pay to the Sirkar, than by any rules of moderation and justice. His principal business, formerly, was to inquire into and bring to light the misconduct of the females of families. This power, however, was so productive of domestic misery, and was in its nature so unjustifiable, that Colonel Munro directed that it should no longer be considered a part of the renter's duty. This prohibition does not appear to have been properly attended to, for on my repeating and enforcing it, it was made a plea for reducing the offers of rent. On inquiring how the fines were regulated, I was answered that the renter collected all he could, and was only stopped by the other party threatening to complain. The mode of enforcing the payment of these fines is by prohibiting the washermen, barber, potter, &c. from assisting in the necessary domestic duties of the family fined. Surely this is a sad despotic power to be vested in the hands of a greedy renter, who has to plead for every exorbitance his engagement with the Sirkar: add to this, that the grievance is only partial, for the shetee gunacharee does not exist in every talook; and a part of the people of the district are thus suffering, whilst the rest are free from the nuisance. Where the gunacharee does not exist, a respectable chief is selected from amongst themselves, who performs the requisite offices and receives his wurtuna, or nuzur, as a free and voluntary contribution, and who, if he occasionally collects fines for a misdemeanour, has not at least the plea of engagements to the Sirkar to justify injustice. Indeed, if he do not give satisfaction he will be turned out, and another be put in his place. The rent of the shetee gunacharee, in fusily 1221, was Star Pagodas 558 34 36. The persons who pay this also pay to the Sirkar under the head of mohturfa, Star Pagodas 7,285 17 38.

107. The chumbar manium, the mooruskoolachar, and yerlumkoolachar, are taxes of the same nature as the shetee gunacharee, and are liable to the same objections, viz. the improper nature of the tax and its partiality; for the two latter latter are confined to one talook, and the first to three talooks. The receipts last year on account of the chumbar manium were Star Pagodas 27 4 37; those of the mooruskoolachar were Star Pagodas 84 23 72; and those of the yerlumkoolachar were Star Pagodas 16 30 75.

108. The gollakarum, the dhungur manium, and the wuntoo bukrè, are all the same tax under different names: it is a contribution paid to the Sirkar (formerly the Poligar) out of every flock of sheep. In Gidaloor this tax has always been kept in aumany, the sheep being collected and sold by public auction; but in the other talooks where it exists, it is rented out to the highest bidder. Some shepherds in Budwel, besides the shetuggunacharee, pay both the gollakarum and dhungur manuim, and also contribute to the peth mohturfa, which will be described presently. These taxes are liable to the great objection noticed in regard to the preceding ones, viz. that they are partially collected in a few talooks, which were formerly possessed by Poligars. The persons who pay these taxes also contribute to the Sirkar revenue, under the head of mohturfa, Star Pagodas 2,907 1 56, and are liable to the payment of the shetee gunacharry. The amount of the gollakarum last year was Star Pagodas 359 30 57, that of dhungur manium was Star Pagodas 60 5 50, and that of wuntoo bukrè was Star Pagodas 10 26 21.

109. The peth mohturfâ is a tax collected formerly by the Deshaie, or head-inhabitant, of poormamullah, in the Budwell talook: it was a sort of commutation for presents of betel-nut, tobacco, sheep, &c. which were made to the Deshaie on his coming to the village. It has generally been rented to the Deshaie's family The persons who have to pay it contribute besides to the veesabuddy, mohturfa, and other taxes; and it is, in fact, an extra tax, collected only from the shopkeepers, &c. of a single village, on which account alone I think it is very objectionable. The amount of it last year was Star Pagodas 56 23 73.

110. The above are the most objectionable of these small taxes, which ought to be either wholly or in part remitted. The remainder are the umrac, or rent of the orchards; the kuman puttee, or tax paid by cotton cleaners; the heera gunnee, or rent of the diamond mines; the zussac gootta, or tax on butchers' shops; the julaguroo, or tax taken from the purchasers of the broken crucibles, &c. of gold and silversmiths, which generally contain a small portion of the precious metals; and the puhar rumna, or exclusive right to cut grass on the Gundikottah hills. The articles of baze-bab, which I have not mentioned, are only levied in the Poonganore district, and they will be taken into consideration when that district comes to be finally settled.

111. The Statement No. 19 will explain to your Board the mode in which I propose to dispose of these taxes in future. The second column exhibits the total amount of bazebab of fusily 1221, being Star Pagodas 17,390 26 20, exclusive of poonganore. From column 3 to column 10 are the items which I propose shall be in future continued under this head. They are 6 in number: the first of them is the ackary, the second the umrac or rent of fruit gardens. These have hitherto been brought to account, partly under this head, and partly under that of mohturfa. I intend that they should all be brought to this head in future, as they cannot with propriety be classed with income or professional taxes, and it has never been the custom to include them in the land-rent. They are now in a train of being rented for nine years. The third item is the yanadu goottah, which is the exclusive right to bring down honey, wax, drugs, &c. from the hills. My view in recommending the continuance of this right is, the benefit which the Government may derive from the information which the renter can at all times give of the haunts of these wild inhabitants of the hills, with whom he has to deal, the Yanaduwars, from whom the tax takes its name. These persons are frequently desperate robbers, and it is with the greatest difficulty and danger that they can be followed amongst the hills, and seldom without the information afforded by the renter: on this account, I think it will be politic to continue this exclusive privilege. The next item, the diamond mines, could not be classed under any other head; nor could the dublee kanuka, or alms-boxes. The julgurgoo is continued under the head of bazebab, because the amount of the tax is so small, that it could not well be collected in detail by the Sirkar. It is, indeed, so trifling that I should be willing to to recommend its abolition, but I do not find that those who rent it in general, pay any other contribution to the Government. All the items of bazebab will, as heretofore, with the exception of the fruit gardens, be rented annually.

112. After deducting these items, there remains to be otherwise disposed of the sum of Star Pagodas 1,326 6 27. Column 18 is the total of the items which I propose should be entirely remitted, for the reasons above shewn; they are the mooruskoolachar, the yerlumkoolachar, the wuntoo buke, the golla-karum, the peth mohturfa, and the puhar rumnah. The amount is Star Pagodas 287 29 43, to which ought to be added that part of the shitee gunachar which is paid by persons who are otherwise fully taxed by the Sirkar, the amount of which is estimated at Star Pagodas 279 17 46, making the total amount of remission Star Pagodas 567 2 9. The remaining items of bazebab I also propose to abolish; but the amount of revenue derived from them will be incorporated with the mohturfa.

113. The sequel of the statement shews the proportions hitherto paid under the different heads of bazebab and of mohturfa, and the descriptions of persons who are to pay it.

114. In submitting the above considerations, I do not presume to recommend the proposed plan for settling the minor items of revenue as the best for general adoption. It is tendered, in conformity with your orders, as the best which has suggested itself to my mind, to be compared with those proposed by other Collectors. It is, I think, applicable to this district, and will, by simplifying the mode, allow of considerable reductions being made in the expenses of collection.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,
Your very obedient humble servant,
(Signed) E. R. ROSS,
Collector.

EXTRACT from the MINUTES of CONSULTATION,
Dated the 21st June 1814.

Minutes of Consultation, 21 June 1814.

Par. 1. The Governor in Council proceeds to take into consideration the village lease settlement for Cuddapah, submitted by the Board of Revenue in the proceedings which accompanied their Secretary's letter, dated the 20th September last.

2. As in the case of the other settlements which the Board of Revenue have brought under the consideration of Government, the expression of its sentiments will, on the present occasion, be confined to the principles according to which the settlement has been concluded. The confirmation of the several settlements now in progress must be postponed till sanctioned by the Honourable the Court of Directors; but it will, in the mean time, be of service to point out, for the guidance of the Board of Revenue and of the Collectors, in what respects they are considered to have conformed to the declared views of the Honourable Court, and to the principles to which it behoves the Government to adhere, in an arrangement of this nature, and in what respects to have overlooked them.

3. The settlement of Cuddapah has taken effect from fusily 1221, and is limited to a duration of ten years from that time; but the Collector expresses his conviction, not only that it would be advisable to convert it into a perpetual settlement, but moreover that the renters would accede to the measure. The Collector has very properly provided, that the settlement of such villages as were settled subsequently to the general commencement of the lease shall expire at the same period as the others.

4. The Governor in Council cannot bestow too high praise upon Mr. Ross, for the pains taken by him to determine what rent was proper to be fixed on each village, and for the judgment by which his inquiries on that point were directed. Besides attending to the more obvious considerations relating to it, he

he has laboured to ascertain the value of the waste land, the number of resident and pyacarry ryots, the condition of the different means of irrigation, the pressure of the survey rent upon the inhabitants, the extent of land which had really been cultivated compared with that which had been entered as such in the public accounts, and the fact how far the rent of the villages had been paid by the Ryots generally, or only by a few of them. The information which he acquired regarding those particulars, enabled him first to form an equitable general basis for the rent, and then to apply it, with a just and discriminating regard, to the circumstances of the people.

Minutes of Consultation, 21 June 1814.

5. The general basis on which the rent was originally fixed was the average amount collected for the preceding seven years; but, from considerations explained by the Collector and the Board of Revenue, it was afterwards thought fit that the rent should exceed that average in a small proportion.

6. In the assessment are included only the ordinary land rent, and the Enaumdar's jodee or quit-rent. The veesabuddy, mohturfa, and bazebab, are excluded from it, and constitute sources of revenue which are represented as being susceptible of improvement.

7. Out of 1,893 villages, composing the district of Cuddapah, 1,861 had been settled, and there remained only thirty-two to be settled at the date of the Collector's report.

8. The assessment in the aggregate amounts to Pagodas 6,89,368. It exceeds the average of eleven years, being the whole period during which the Ceded Districts have been in the hands of the British Government, and also the average of ten years, and also, as above stated, that average of seven years which was originally intended to form the basis on which it was to be fixed. It exceeds the collections of each of eight out of the whole eleven years, and falls short of those of only three fusilies, viz 1215, 1217, and 1218.

9. When the Collector had terminated the inquiries by which he was rendered competent to fix the rent proper to be put on each village, he published its amount for the information of those whom he was willing to admit as renters. These were stated in his proclamation to be, first, the triennial renters, who had made good their engagements; secondly, the Meerassadars, Reddies, and Potails of the villages; thirdly, any other resident inhabitants or Ryots. Curnums were admitted as renters, on relinquishing their office and the enaum attached to it. The competition invited by the Collector was for the purpose of procuring eligible renters, not an increased rent. The rent had been fixed beforehand; and in receiving tenders from all who wished to make them, the Collector declared his object to be that the lease might be given to the parties best entitled to receive it. There was extreme propriety in this mode of proceeding, and the order according to which the Collector admitted the several candidates as renters, has nothing in it which the Governor in Council is disposed to object to, as the Collector has stated that Potails had generally been triennial renters, and as triennial renters who were Potails, had unquestionably a claim to be admitted to the decennial lease superior to all other candidates.

10. It had been repeatedly intimated to the inhabitants of the zillah, that the enaums held by the Reddies and Meerassadars were strictly service-enaums; and it was explained to them that, as such a description of persons was incompatible with that of the renters to be established under the decennial lease, or rather as the one character must, where the two interfered, be considered as merging in the other, the office of Reddy, Potail, and Meerassadar would become extinct when the lease was introduced, and it would rest with the Government to dispose of the enaums attached to it as might be found expedient. The Potails were, however, allowed a preferable title to become renters; and it is accordingly stated that of 1,861 villages which have been leased out, 1,328 have been leased out to triennial renters, who generally were Potails, or to Potails who had not been triennial renters. It has been arranged, with a few exceptions, that the service-enaums of the Potails, which became resumable on the introduction of the decennial lease, whereby the office to which they were attached was abolished, should be divided between the renters and the Potails, in the proportion of three-fourths to the former, and one-fourth to the latter, and that the share allotted to the Potails should be forfeited to Government for misconduct. As the Potails have long occupied their enaum lands, they are still, when not renters, allowed to occupy them, on paying rent to those to whom they have been leased.

11. The Collector has stated it to be his opinion, that the fewer the renters in each village the better, and has explained the grounds of experience on which his opinion rests. Without question as to the validity or futility of those grounds, it is evident that the conclusion drawn from them is opposite to that to which it was thought that the principles of the present settlement would lead.

12. The first principle on which the zemindarry system, as it has been introduced into the territories under this Government, has been objected to, is, that contrary to policy, it exposed to sale the property of Government in the soil, and transferred it to persons who possessed no inherent interest in the prosperity of the country, and who would be, in consequence, likely to regard it in no other view than as a source of pecuniary advantage.

13. The second principle of objection to the zemindarry system, as hitherto introduced, is, that the instruments through which its professed objects are to be effectuated, are not sufficiently numerous to transfuse through the people at large the full measure of the spirit requisite for the complete accomplishment of those objects.

14. The first of these objections can hardly be, in any degree, applied to Mr. Ross's settlement of the Cuddapah district. The competition of candidates for renting the villages has not, like that of the zemindarry system, been invited for the purpose of selling the leases, on the terms fixed by Government, to the highest bidder, whereby an attention to the claims or qualifications of the persons placed over the inferior tenantry is effectually precluded, but with a view of securing the Government right in the soil to those best entitled to it, from the interest which they may be found already to possess in it, and the whole of the Collector's conduct, in this respect, has the unqualified approbation of the Governor in Council.

15. But from the second objection to the zemindarry system, as introduced into these territories, the settlement of Cuddapah does not at first seem to be equally free. The Collector has explicitly laid down the principle, that it is better to make the settlement of each village with only a few renters. He thinks it preferable to exclude a large number from any participation in the advantages of the lease, than to include such a number in it as would, in his opinion, tend to defeat the objects for which the lease is formed. This part of the Collector's arrangement being contrary to what, in the respect to which it relates, was in the contemplation of Government, it is natural that the first view of it should strike the Governor in Council as being objectionable. It did so strike the Governor in Council; and, with all the attention due to any arrangement formed by an officer actuated by such wise, considerate, and tender-hearted principles as Mr. Ross, throughout the whole of his proceedings in this very important undertaking, has evidently been, the Governor in Council was not without difficulty in acquiescing in the conclusion at which Mr. Ross's mind had arrived. Yet even then the Governor in Council admitted, that there was truth in what the Collector represented, and felt the force of it. The disputes into which the numerous conjoint renters may be apt to fall, the mismanagement of their villages, the expensive law-suits and the mutual rankling and distress into which their disputes are likely to lead, were acknowledged by the Governor in Council. A consideration of these points might, however, have failed to reconcile the Governor in Council to this part of the Collector's arrangements, but for the precautions taken by him to give the lease to those, few as they might be, who were best entitled to it; his admission of as many persons as could come to a mutual agreement to that effect, to become joint-renters with those who stand responsible to the Government for the rent; and the excellent measures taken by him, to ensure to persons not included among the renters the enjoyment of every right and privilege which have hitherto belonged to them. On the whole, the Governor in Council sees reason to approve of the Collector's mode of renting the villages, in which the character and conduct of Mr. Ross, as exhibited throughout the whole of his proceedings, with regard to the settlement, would, even on less sufficient grounds of approbation, have led him to acquiesce.

Minutes of Consultation, 21 June 1814.

16. The suggestion of the Board of Revenue, that the responsibility for the rent to Government should be extended as widely as possible, and if possible should be made to reach to those whom it might be impolitic to entrust with the management of villages, and inconvenient to place in immediate intercourse with the Government, seems highly judicious, and it is hoped that the Collector may have been able to avail himself of it.

17. The Governor in Council has, on a former occasion, as well as in a previous part of these proceedings, expressed his sense of Mr. Ross's merit, in the provision made by him in the pottah to be executed by the renters, for securing to the under-tenants and cultivators the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges which have hitherto belonged to them: and it is satisfactory to the Governor in Council to learn, that the Board of Revenue propose to incorporate the substance of that instrument in the Regulation which will require to be enacted for the village lease settlement.

18. The sentiments of the Governor in Council, with respect to the question, how far, and under what circumstances, it is expedient to include the waste land in a settlement of the land under cultivation have been fully explained in his proceedings on the settlement of the southern division of Arcot, bearing date the 4th of February last, and admit of easy application to every case in which the question can arise. In the settlement of the Cuddapah district, the whole of the waste land, with a trifling exception, has been included; but the Collector has not in this case, as in that of the southern division of Arcot, represented it to be almost on abstract principles desirable for the Government to divest itself of the possession of waste land, but, on the contrary, has seen it necessary to enter into an explanation of the special reasons for which he conceives it to be essential to the success of a settlement of the land under cultivation in Cuddapah, that the waste land should be settled along with it. This mode of reasoning is perfectly correct, if the grounds on which it rests be well established. The Governor in Council has always admitted, that if the lands under cultivation could not be settled unless the waste lands were included, or if the waste lands should even add to the value of the lands under cultivation, and be taken into account by those by whom the others are rented, then it might be both right and necessary to include the waste lands in the lease. The Governor in Council has objected only to their being gratuitously and inconsiderately surrendered, as a measure contrary, at the same time, to the express orders of the Court of Directors, and to the obvious interests of the Government.

19. The reasons which have induced the Collector to consider it necessary that the waste land should not be reserved are: first, That the Enaumdars in the district possess so much waste land; and secondly, That the talooks where there is most Sircar waste land lie on the frontiers of the district, and are adjacent to foreign territories. He apprehends that the Enaumdars and the foreign landholders will hold out the inducement which an offer of waste land on favourable terms affords, to decoy the Ryots from the renters' villages, unless the renters possess the means of counteracting their endeavours by similar offers on their own part. It appears, however, to the Governor in Council, that this view of the matter is in several respects erroneous.

20. In the first place, it proceeds upon the assumption that waste land is preferred by the Ryots to land already cultivated on the terms on which the two may respectively be occupied; that this preference will lead to waste land being taken into cultivation, and cultivated land being deserted; and that the only effectual correction against the evil consequence of taking into cultivation the waste land belonging to those who are not renters, is to take into cultivation waste land belonging to those who are renters. But it seems clear, that the mere power of giving waste land to Ryots will be of no avail to the renters, unless it be exercised by them; and, if exercised, that its effect, instead of being any mitigation of the evil of Ryots' emigrating from cultivated land, will evidently be to aggravate that evil. If the Ryots prefer to occupy waste land, and the Enaumdars, by letting them have it, withdraw them from the cultivated land of the renters, they will be withdrawn only so much the more if the the renters too supply them with waste land; and the advantage of retaining the Ryots on the renters' estates will be but nominal, if their labours are to be confined to such parts of the estates as are unproductive of advantage. Any measure which might fix the labours of the Ryots to the lands of the renters already under cultivation, would unquestionably be of the highest importance; but the means of attaining that end proposed to be furnished to the renters by including the waste land in the lease, seem, in as far as they may not prove entirely nugatory, to be calculated to produce directly the reverse of the intended result.

21. In the second place, the projected remedy for the evil of Ryots being tempted by the offer of waste lands to desert the renters' estates, even if likely to be of any use in that way, is so partial in its application, that it must be considered extremely imperfect as a ground of dependence on the success of so general an arrangement as the lease of a whole district. Supposing it to ward off the apprehended mischief from those renters who are plentifully supplied with waste land, it will afford no relief to the rest: or to speak more truly, it will, to the extent of its operation, add to what they would otherwise have suffered; for the Collector has no means of apportioning the waste according to the cultivated land, and thus obviating the hardship here pointed out. What is true of the whole district, in this respect, must hold true of every separate village in it; and if, therefore, the whole district could not be settled if the waste land were reserved, then neither can any village in it be settled which is without waste land. So also, if the success of the settlement of a whole district be endangered by the waste land possessed by those whose lands adjoin to the lands of the renters, the settlement of each village must, in the same degree, be endangered by the same cause: for it deserves to be repeated, that the surrender of the waste land in the bulk has no universal influence over the whole district; but that if the surrender answer the purpose for which it is made, the case is directly the reverse, and every village having itself no waste land is actually damnified by the waste land which other villages have.

22. The Governor in Council believes the foregoing reasoning to be correct, and accordingly allows that, if in fact the offer of waste land on favourable terms is sufficient to withdraw the Ryots from their villages, there may be reason to entertain, to a very considerable degree, the Collector's apprehension that the success of the decennial lease is thereby thrown into no small jeopardy. The general position, however, that it is more advantageous for the Ryot to bring waste land into cultivation than to carry on the cultivation of land already cultivated, seems to admit of doubt, both from the nature of the thing itself, and from the fact that, under the revenue system formerly enforced in the Ceded Districts, the complaint on behalf of the people invariably was that they were compelled to extend cultivation too far, never that they were restrained from extending it. With respect also to foreign landholders, the Collector goes a great length towards admitting, that the superior security of property under the Company's government counterbalances the advantages which the possession of waste land might afford them in procuring the services of Ryots. It is from the waste land of the Enaumdars that his apprehensions chiefly arise. He has calculated the whole enaum land in the Cuddapah district to be worth Pagodas 5,63,841, or about eighty-five per cent. on the amount of the decennial rent. Of this extent of enaum land he estimates ten-sixteenths to be under cultivation, and the remaining six-tenths form the source of his apprehension that the Enaumdars will succeed in drawing away the renters' Ryots. He has stated, however, that "there is no doubt but that the custom of the "country has always checked the cultivation of Enaumdars' waste, when it "was found to interfere with that of the Government," and that a restraint of this nature would answer the object of preserving for the renters the labours of the Ryots now attached to their villages. The Governor in Council believes, at once, that the restraint would answer, that it is not unjust to enforce it, and that the competition which the Collector, by means of giving up the waste, proposes to substitute for it, would not merely fail but aggravate the evil it is designed to remedy.

23. No question has been raised regarding the disadvantage which arises from so great a proportion of the lands in the Cuddapah district being in the hands hands of Enaumdars; and if it be a disadvantage, it is fit to confine it within such limits as justice will authorize. In respect of right, the enaums in the district of Cuddapah cannot be considered as conferring any not conferred by them at the period when they were granted. The additional value imparted to them by the security which every species of property has acquired from a strong and stable government, by the limits which the Government may be pleased to affix to its demands on landed estates, or by any other consequences of the protection derived from Government, and the liberality which it extends over its subjects, are to be regarded not as qualities inherent in the possession as originally obtained, but as additional bounties which it is free for the Government, as it may judge meet, either to confer or to withhold. If, therefore, the prosperity of a whole district, or the revenues derivable from it, be endangered, by allowing those who have hitherto tasted largely of the liberality of Government to taste of it more largely still, it becomes the duty of Government to interpose its authority and avert the consequences of such wasteful and injurious munificence. The usages of past times, it is asserted by the Collector, and no doubt too the feelings of all parties concerned, warrant such an interposition, and will pronounce it, not merely according to abstract notions of right, but according to every received idea of equity and good faith, to be such as the Government, in case of need, is bound to exercise. Minutes of Consultation, 21 June 1814.

24. What may be the most effectual and least objectionable mode of attaining the object in view, whether by declaring it illegal for any Enaumdar to employ any Ryot before employed on the estate of any renter, or by declaring it illegal to extend the cultivation of enaum lands except on conditions to be specified, or by requiring Enaumdars to make a settlement with the Sirkar for all lands which they may wish to bring into cultivation, in the same manner as if the lands were not enaum, is a point open to consideration, and on which contrary opinions may not unwarrantably be supposed to be entertained. The general principle, that it is lawful and equitable, and expedient to place the cultivation of enaum lands under such a degree of restraint as that their value shall not increase at the expense of Government, and in consequence of the liberal measures adopted by it for the improvement of other lands, is all that the Governor in Council desires at present to urge upon the attention of the Board of Revenue and of the Collector

25. If the foregoing view of the subject, in respect either of equity or expediency, be shewn to be erroneous, the Governor in Council will readily adopt the sentiments of the Revenue Board, and sanction the measures which they have recommended; but it would be unfitting that, in a matter of such grave importance, and in progress towards final adjustment, the Governor in Council should acquiesce in views regarding one of the most essential parts of it, which his judgment does not approve, and which, in their consequences, seem to him likely to prove prejudicial to the interests of the Government and of the people

26. There is an expression in the Collector's letter relating to the point under consideration, the exact import of which the Governor in Council does not accurately apprehend. He says, "the renter can, at the worst, take the "enaum into his own hands and re-rent it to his Ryots." The Governor in Council is not aware how it should be optional with the renter to do so; but taking for granted that, according to what the Collector states, it is always practically in his power to take the enaum into his own hands, and concurring with the Collector as to the influence over the Ryots which the footing of the renter must necessarily give to him, the Governor in Council sees reason to hope that these circumstances alone would go far to counterbalance the advantage which the Enaumdars might derive from their waste land, even if permitted to bring it into cultivation without any restraint, in the same manner as the advantage which foreign landholders might derive from their waste is admitted by the Collector to be, in a great degree, counterbalanced by the superior security of private property in the Company's territories.

27. It is unnecessary for the Governor in Council to make any observation with respect to the small part of the waste land which the Collector has reserved, for reasons similar to those for which he has included the rest in the lease,

Minutes of Consultation, 21 June 1814.

lease, further than to state that, according to the sentiments above expressed, the reservation is approved.

28 The Collector has endeavoured to calculate the profit which the renters may derive from the lease of the waste land, and the proportion of it which they must make over to the Ryots, in order to secure their labours; but the Governor in Council agrees with the Board of Revenue in considering an estimate of that sort as too speculative and uncertain to be relied upon.

29. Of the whole rent of the Cuddapah district, amounting to Pagodas 6,89,368, a proportion, amounting to Pagodas 1,67,000, is conditional. The lands for which that proportion is payable are watered by tanks, and though the condition is not particularly defined, nor the probable effect of it in reducing the rent estimated, payment of the rent is, in general terms, made to depend upon the filling of the tanks, and required to be only proportional to that circumstance. The Collector is desirous of extending the conditional rent to lands watered by a certain description of nullahs, which evidently, by his account of them, are even better entitled to that indulgence than the tank villages which have already experienced it. The Governor in Council, therefore, authorizes the proposed extension of the conditional rent.

30. It is remarked by the Board of Revenue, that a conditional rent is in no other sense a fixed settlement, than as a limit is thereby fixed to the demand of the Government, and the correctness of their representation to that effect is unquestionable. But although it is matter of regret, that the condition of any part of the people or of the country, or the nature of the climate, or any other circumstances, should prevent the land revenues from being collected at their full amount, yet no cause is, on that account, to be found for not fixing the full amount of the land revenues. It would be a short-sighted as well as illiberal policy, to keep its amount uncertain, in order that the excess of one year might compensate for the deficiency of another. The effect of such a policy would be to render deficiency frequent, and to check every improvement likely to produce that excess, which, if the people are allowed to acquire it, will infallibly find its way, in a just proportion, into the public treasury. It forms the radical principle of that settlement of the land revenues which the Government is so anxious to introduce, that the people should be encouraged to become skilful, industrious, and provident in their agricultural pursuits, under the persuasion that they will be left to enjoy the fruits of their skill, industry, and forecast.

31. While this view of the subject leads the Governor in Council to acquiesce, without hesitation, in the propriety of making conditional the payment of the rent of all villages from which an equitable fixed rent could not in all years be exacted, it also suggests to his mind a doubt, whether the rent of tank villages should be made entirely proportionate to the water with which the tanks are filled. Although the produce of a tank village may depend chiefly upon the water with which the tank has been supplied, yet the value of that produce will depend also upon the water supplied to other villages, and upon various circumstances, all entitled to consideration when the fluctuating rent of the particular village in question is to be determined. It will be for the Collector and the Board of Revenue to judge, whether any better rule can be laid down than that according to which the tank villages in the Cuddapah district have actually been settled. The Governor in Council has thought it right to point out the imperfection of that rule, as it is liable to draw the Government into larger remissions of revenue than may be necessary, and to afford but partial relief to those for whose benefit it is designed.

32. The Board of Revenue have intimated their intention of considering farther the question of a conditional settlement in the formation of the Bellary lease, and the Governor in Council will be happy to be made acquainted with their sentiments upon it when that lease is submitted for his review.

33. The Governor in Council will readily consent to such an increase of the allowance for repairing and improving the means of irrigation in the district as may seem reasonable.

34. The

34. The Governor in Council observes that the renters have only been required to pay the rent " in coins approved by the Sircar;" but the instructions addressed to the Board of Revenue, on the 31st of December 1811 and 24th of March 1812, do not seem by that provision to have been fully carried into effect. It is proper that the people should be made completely aware, that such coins only as have issued from the Company's mint will be considered a legal tender of payment. Minutes of Consultation, 21 June 1814.

35. As nearly two years have now elapsed since the expiration of the first year of the decennial lease for Cuddapah, the Governor in Council will expect to receive, at an early period, the promised report upon the result of that year.

36. The Governor in Council will also expect the Revenue Board soon to submit their separate report concerning the mohturfa and veesabuddy taxes.

37. The Governor in Council concurs with the Revenue Board and the Collector as to the propriety of abolishing certain taxes under the head of bazeebab, which are trifling in their amount but oppressive in their operation. The particular taxes are not specified by the Board of Revenue, and the amount of them is stated in the Collector's letter to be Pagodas 567 2 9, but in the statement to which he refers they amount to Pagodas 580 24 49.

LETTER to the BOARD of REVENUE,
Dated the 2d August 1814.

To the President and Members of the Board of Revenue.

GENTLEMEN:

In preparing a final reply to the letter from the Honourable the Court of Directors, in the Revenue department, dated the 16th of December 1812, the Honourable the Governor in Council has found that the information before Government on particular points, concerning the practical introduction of the decennial village lease settlement, the usage in former Revenue settlements, and the nature of landed tenure, is less precise and complete than the Governor in Council and the Honourable Court would wish to possess; I have, therefore, been instructed to frame the annexed queries, and to desire that they may be circulated, for answers, to the Collectors of the several districts into which the decennial village lease settlement has been introduced, and that the first seventeen queries may be sent for answers to the Collectors of Malabar and Canara, and to any other Collectors from whom you may conceive that useful information on the points to which they relate may be obtained. Letter to the Board of Revenue, 2 Aug. 1814.

1. How has meerassy right hitherto been recognized and respected, where Meerassadars were not the renters? (This point was referred to you in the last paragraph but one of the letter dated 3d September last, but no reply has yet been received from you.)

2. Does meerassy right extend to waste lands?

3. Is meerassy right forfeited for ever, when cultivation is for a single season discontinued?

4. Where meerassy right exists, has it always been respected by the officers of Government in framing the jummabundy?

5. If not respected by the officers of Government, has it nevertheless been respected by the people themselves?

6. In how many villages of the district does meerassy right exist?

7. In how many villages is there no meerassy right?

8. How many Meerassadars are there in the district?

9. How

Letter to the Board of Revenue, 2 Aug. 1814.

9. How many cultivators are there?

10. What is the average annual value of meerassy right in proportion to the produce?

11. What is the average annual value of meerassy right in proportion to the revenue?

12. Is meerassy right ever sold?

13. How many years purchase of its annual value is meerassy right generally sold for?

14. What is the greatest, the least, and the average annual value of the meerass of one Meerassadar?

15. Do Meerassadars attach any other besides a pecuniary value to their meerass?

16. Where there is no meerassy right, is there any other tie by which particular individuals are attached to particular fields, and what is it?

17. Where there is no meerassy right, has it been usual for the Ryots to remove from one village, and from one part of a village to another, and has their removal depended on their own choice or on that of the Collector?

18. How many renters are there under the decennial settlement?

19. What is the amount of the rent of the whole district?

20. What is the greatest, the least, and the average number of renters in a village?

21. How many of the renters are Meerassadars?

22. How many of the Meerassadars are not renters?

23. How many of the Meerassadars who are not renters would have chosen to be renters, had the terms of the rent been more favourable to them?

24. How many of the renters who are not Meerassadars were renters under the triennial lease?

25. Are the renters in any village merely the representatives of the Meerassadars at large and only responsible jointly with them?

26. Would it be practicable to frame a village settlement, in which the renters should be merely the representatives of the Meerassadars at large and renters on their behalf?

27. Where the renters are not merely the representatives of the Meerassadars, according to what rule is the produce divided between the cultivating Ryot, the Meerassadar, and the renter, and in what proportions do they respectively reap the benefit of a good crop and sustain the loss of a bad one?

28. Is the renter to derive the whole advantage afforded by the waste land, or is he to share it with the Meerassadar?

2. The Governor in Council is aware, that the answers to some of the foregoing queries are to be found in the papers already before Government, and that the points involved in others of them may be familiar to persons who have been employed as executive Revenue officers; but it is nevertheless deemed desirable, that the information which the answers to the whole of the queries will afford should be embodied together, as one part of it will be required to illustrate another. You will, therefore, instruct the Collectors to give a specific answer to each query, and to subjoin to it any explanatory observations which they may think proper to offer.

3. It will also be proper that you should desire the Collectors to spare no pains in ascertaining the accuracy of the information they may afford, and to lose no time in submitting it. The Court of Directors will be led to expect it at as early a period as is reasonable; and it may be supposed that the scrupulous attention which the Honourable Court have paid to the revenue affairs of this Government, will induce them to attach particular importance to information bearing so closely on the discussions concerning them, into which they have of late late entered with such earnestness. The Governor in Council desires that the answers of each Collector may be submitted as soon as they are received, and may not be detained for the general report concerning them which it will be expected of you to prepare, after the whole of them have come under your observation.

Letter to the Board of Revenue, 2 Aug. 1814.

In connection with the subject of this letter, the Governor in Council desires me to bring to your recollection that, though so considerable a part of the whole period of the decennial lease has already elapsed, the settlements of only two of the districts have yet been submitted to him, and to observe not only that so great a delay is productive of extreme embarrassment to Government, and must be most unsatisfactory to the Court of Directors, after their recent complaints on the same score, but that it tends to defeat the object of revising the settlements which have been formed, and of taking timely measures for providing, that, when the ten years expire, the most approved system may then be introduced.

5. I am further directed to enumerate the undermentioned important papers, which it was expected you would long ago have laid before Government.

1. Draft of a Regulation for the decennial settlement.

2. The report on the revenue of Malabar, called for on the 12th and 30th of June 1812.

3. The mohturfa Regulation, stated in your letter of the 4th of March 1813 to be then in progress.

4. The report upon the swarnadayem in the southern division of Arcot, called for in the proceedings of Government dated the 4th of February 1814.

5. The report upon the enaum lands in the same district, called for in the proceedings abovementioned.

6. The report upon the mauniams to village watchers in the same district, also called for in the proceedings abovementioned.

7. The reports upon veesabuddy in Cuddapah, promised in your proceedings dated the 20th of September 1813.

8. The report upon the result of the first year of the decennial settlement in Cuddapah, promised in the same proceedings.

I have the honour to be,
Gentlemen,
Your most obedient servant,

Fort St. George,
2d August 1814.

(Signed) DAVID HILL,
Secretary to Government.

10. We have directed that a copy of these paragraphs be furnished, for the information and guidance of the Board of Revenue.

(87 to 97.) Review the revenue management of the southern division of Arcot, and observe generally upon the different systems formerly and at present pursued.

17. Your Honourable Court will have obtained a full explanation on the points noticed in these paragraphs, in the communications which we have made regarding the village lease settlement of this district; but we have directed that a copy of them be furnished for the information of the Board of Revenue.

(98 to 100.) Enter into a consideration of the settlement of the northern division of Arcot.

18. We have directed that a copy of these paragraphs be transmitted to the Board of Revenue.

(101.) Concur in the expediency of making advances to the cultivators.

19. We are happy to observe this coincidence of your Honourable Court's sentiments with the practice to which we have uniformly adhered, when advances of tuccavy are represented to be necessary.

(104 to 108) Offer some observations upon the settlement of Dindigul and Madura.

54. Needs no particular remark.

(165.) Hope that the rights of the landholders in Malabar and Canara will not be invaded.

55. We have directed that a copy of this paragraph be transmitted to the Board of Revenue.

(166) Speak in favour of a ryotwar settlement.

56. Your Honourable Court are already in possession of our sentiments on the subject of a ryotwar settlement, to which this paragraph chiefly relates; and such explanations regarding it as, we trust, will be deemed satisfactory, have already been, and are at present in the course of being communicated to your Honourable Court.

(167.) Regret that Mr. Thackeray's report was not sent to England sooner, and that it was not taken into consideration by the Government and by the Board of Revenue.

57. We regret that the report here alluded to was not forwarded at an earlierperiod; but, with reference to one part of the observations of your Honourable Court, we beg leave to explain, that Mr. Thackeray was himself a member of the Board of Revenue, on the discontinuance of the ryotwar mode of management in 1808-9.

EXTRACTS REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE, Dated the 1st of March, 1815.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 1 March 1815.

Par. 73. At our consultaition of the 18th January last, we took into consideration a communication from the Board of Revenue, reporting very unfavourably regarding the nature of the season in the districts of Madura and Tinnevelly, and in some parts of the district of Nellore. The Board of Revenue venue submitted to us the request of the Collector of Madura for permission to make advances to those inhabitants who might be in distress, and to employ them in deepening tanks, repairing roads, or other works of public utility; and as similar measures had been authorized to be adopted in the preceding year, they recommend that the Collector's request should be complied with.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 1 March 1815.

74. The Board of Revenue also suggested the expediency of authorizing a measure proposed by the Collector of Nellore, with the view of affording relief to the suffering inhabitants in his districts. It appeared, that several Persian merchants residing at Masulipatam having found much difficulty in remitting to the Nellore district money which they were desirous of advancing for the purchase of cloths, had requested the Collector to assist them in effecting the remittance. Mr. Fraser being of opinion that the circulation of the money would be attended with advantage, recommended that authority might be given to the Collector at Masulipatam to receive the money, and himself to repay it in any part of his district, on the production of a receipt from that officer.

75. In consequence of the representation of the Board of Revenue, we authorized the Collector of Madura to employ such persons as stood in need of employment, in deepening tanks, or any other public work of real utility. We at the same time directed, that he should report periodically, what number of persons were employed under this permission, what expense was incurred on account of them, and what works had been executed by means of their labour.

76. We likewise granted authority for carrying into effect the measure suggested by the Collector of Nellore for the relief of that district;* but directed that, instead of receipts payable on presentment, the Collector at Masulipatam should grant drafts on Mr. Fraser's treasury, payable at ten days' sight: an alteration which was recommended by the Accountant-General, whose opinion we had taken upon the measure The Revenue Board were apprized that this measure was only of a temporary nature.

77. By a letter from the Board of Revenue, under date the 30th of June last,† we were informed that a considerable quantity of rain had fallen in the district of Madura, and were led to believe that it would be unnecessary to continue the disbursements which had been made to prevent the labouring poor from emigrating.

78. On reference, however, to our proceedings noted in the margin,‡ your Honourable Court will observe, that the season has continued so very unfavourable, that we have thought it necessary to authorize further disbursements on this account. The total amount expended, up to the 30th of September, is Pagodas 11,294 2 42; and we are concerned to observe that, at that period, the scarcity had not ceased to be felt. It is, however, satisfactory to us to reflect, that independently of what has been gained by preventing emigration, there is every reason to believe that the works executed by the people who have been employed will prove highly beneficial.

144. In referring your Honourable Court to the proceedings of the Revenue Board, with respect to the settlement subsisting in the Tanjore district, and the reply which we have caused to be addressed to that Board,§ we beg leave to explain that we have made it our object, on this and all similar occasions, to conform to the resolutions adopted by this Government, in consequence of the receipt of your Honourable Court's dispatch bearing date the 16th of December 1812, as already communicated to your Honourable Court, until we shall be apprized of the further orders regarding our revenue arrangements, which your Honourable Court may issue on hearing the nature of those resolutions.

EXTRACTS REVENUE LETTER to FORT ST. GEORGE,

Dated the 3d September 1817.

Letter from, dated 12th August 1814.

(Par. 1 to 32.) Reply to the Court's Dispatch dated the 16th December 1812.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 3 Sept. 1817.

Par. 3. AT the period when our dispatch of the 12th April 1815 was written, we had before us your revenue letter of the 12th August 1814, in reply to our instructions of the 16th December 1812, directing that a ryotwar settlement should be introduced into all the provinces which might be unsettled when those instructions should reach you. The arguments advanced by you against that form of settlement having been fully weighed and discussed in our dispatch of the above-mentioned date, it is unnecessary for us on the present occasion to do more than refer you to that communication, for our sentiments and directions respecting the future administration of the land revenues subject to your government.

Letter from, dated 1st March 1814.

(Par. 73 to 78.) Measures adopted for affording relief to the inhabitants of Madura, under the distress experienced by them in consequence of the unfavourable state of the season in 1814, and for facilitating the commercial transactions of some Persian merchants with the district of Nellore.

79. We sanction the expenditure of Star Pagodas 11,294 for the relief of the inhabitants of Madura, under the distress which they experienced from the drought and scarcity, which appear to have been severely felt in that district in the course of 1814. The principal part of this sum is stated to have been paid, in the shape of wages, to the inhabitants who were employed on works of public utility. This was unquestionably the most unexceptionable mode of administering to the necessities of a population, provided (as we have no reason to doubt) that proper care was taken by the Collector, conformable with his assurance, to prevent the liberality of Government from being abused.

(144.) Referring to the proceedings with respect to the subsisting settlement in Tanjore.

147. The proceedings to which you have drawn our attention in this paiagraph, are explanatory of the revenue affairs of Tanjore in fusily 1223, the fourth year of the quinquennial lease.

148. The jumma, or demand on account of land revenue, in fusily 1223, is stated to have been Star Pagodas 9,87,317, exceeding the jumma of the year immediately preceding by Star Pagodas 7,477. The balance of land revenue uncollected at the end of fusily 1223 was Star Pagodas 45,126, nearly one-half of which was expected to be easily realized. The corresponding balance outstanding at the close of fusily 1222 was Star Pagodas 72,434. The total jumma of 1223, including customs, salt, abkarry, farms and licenses, was Star Pagodas 11,46,235, exceeding the total jumma of the preceding fusily by Star Pagodas 22,270. The total collections, including former balances, were

In fusily 1222 .... Star Pagodas	11,11,949
In fusily 1223	11,57,320
Increase in the latter fusily......Star Pagodas	45,371

149. We have particularly noticed what is stated by the Collector on the subject of balances within this province. The amount at the end of the fusily 1223, as we have already had occasion to observe, was Star Pagodas 45,126. Of this sum he fully expected to realize Star Pagodas 20,541, or nearly one-half, consisting principally of unadjusted demands, which would be settled as soon as the Meerassadars could most conveniently absent themselves from their estates; but the remainder, Pagodas 24,585, was due from villages, the entire produce of which, or, as it is stated in a marginal note to the report of the Board of Revenue,* the entire income of the Meerassadars, fell short in that amount of the revenue due, including advances for cultivation, for the recovery of which they possessed little or no other resources than their lands, and the liquidation liquidation of it the Collector looked for from the revenue of the existing fusily 1224. This sum, therefore, was all, according to the report of Mr. Hepburn, that could be considered as an actual balance for the year, arising from difficulty in the collection; and it appears that this balance arose upon two hundred and eighty-four villages only, forming but a very inconsiderable part of the number of villages of which the province consisted. This amount of balance for the whole province we cannot consider as large, when we advert to the observation of the Collector, "that he imagined it quite obvious that the "last was not only a year in which little profit could have been made by the "Meerassadars in general by their rents, but that, in many cases, a deficiency, "equivalent to the sacrifice of the whole, or nearly the whole produce, must "have been experienced." Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 3 Sept. 1817.

* Revenue, &c. due.................. Star Pagodas 95,890
Value of produce ditto.............. Star Pagodas 71,304

150. We find, too, that in addition to the current revenue realized in the year 1223, the sum of Pagodas 59,043 had been realized of old balances, which, considerable as the amount is, was less, by Star Pagodas 5,999, than that recovered under the same head in the preceding year; and that large balances of the same description were still outstanding against the province, but to what amount does not appear. It appears, however, that upon those villages only in which the share of clear rent of the Meerassadars, as the Board of Revenue state it, had in 1223 proved insufficient for the payment of the current revenue, and against which a new balance, as we had observed, had arisen, of not less than Pagodas 24,585, the old balance amounted to half a lack of pagodas.

151. On the subject of such balances Mr. Hepburn has observed: They are "heavy burdens upon the prosperity of the province, operating, as they must "necessarily do, as a virtual increase of rent from the lands of it, and that to a "very considerable extent;" the collections "on account of them in the two "last fuslies having amounted to Pagodas 124,086, which would otherwise "have gone to the augmentation of the means of the people, to enable them "to meet with more effect the inequalities of season, produce, and price, to "which this province seems peculiarly liable."

152. We should have been glad to have been acquainted with the sentiments of the Board of Revenue on this subject; but neither in their letter to you of the 6th of February 1815, nor in their proceedings transmitted with it concerning the settlement in Tanjore, is any notice taken of this passage of the Collector's report. The only part of those proceedings which can be considered to have any bearing upon the subject, is that wherein, with reference to the statement of the Collector, that in the villages against which there was remaining, at the close of 1223, a balance on account of that year of Pagodas 24,585, the Board of Revenue observe as follows: that "if the Collector had, in fact, "taken the entire produce of these villages" (it would appear from a subsequent explanation of that officer that he meant the entire meerassy share only or clear rent) "in liquidation, as far as it would go, of the demand upon them, "he had not acted in conformity to the spirit of the Board's instructions, com-"municated to him in an extract from their proceedings upon the settlement "of the southern division of Arcot, under date the 29th March 1813, that "those proceedings approved by Government permitted the Collector to grant "remissions, in certain cases, with the concurrence of the Board, &c."

153. We do not, however, find that any part of the balances against the district, either old or new, was proposed by the Board to be given up, while it clearly appears, from the report of the Collector, that he had not conceived himself at liberty to propose remissions, on the ground of inability to satisfy the public demand, and that it was his practice to carry on the sums uncollected in each year from the renters, as arrears to be collected with the current revenue of future years, as far as they could be, short of selling the meerassy property for the realization of them.

154. We must confess that we do not see how the internal state of the province can improve under such a course of proceeding.

155. The Board of Revenue, in their proceedings of the 23d January 1815, have given a comparative statement of the revenues of Tanjore for four years prior to the quinquennial lease, and the first four years of the quinquennial lease. The result of the comparison is in favour of the latter period. This would not,

 however,

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 3 Sept. 1817.

however, be the case, were the disastrous fusily 1216 excluded, as it ought in fairness to be, from the former period.

156. Keeping in our view the local peculiarities of a very considerable portion of this province, we are not disposed to object to the directions which have been given to the Collector, to prolong the lease to the term of ten years; and we trust that, in the execution of this arrangement, Mr. Hepburn has paid particular attention to the instructions issued by the Board of Revenue to his predecessor, under date of the 7th March 1814, to allow an option to all the Meerassadars who were excluded from the rent of their villages under the quinquennial lease, to become renters at the period of its renewal. We likewise approve of your Revenue Board having, in conformity with the general orders contained in our dispatch from this department of the 16th December 1812, directed the Collector's attention to the expediency of introducing a ryotwar system of collection in the high districts of Tanjore. For our sentiments on the resolutions adopted by you on the receipt of the above-mentioned dispatch, we refer you to our letter in this department, dated the 12th April 1815.

157. We cannot refrain from joining in the regret you express at the backwardness of your Revenue Board, in reporting their proceedings on the pending settlements of the districts under their superintendence. In those cases, where the settlements have not been completed, annual reports ought undoubtedly to be submitted to you of the progress that may have been made in their formation, as well as of the state of the revenues in charge of the different Collectors.

Revenue Letter from Fort St George, 5 Jan. 1816.

Par. 98. With reference to the one hundred and tenth paragraph of our letter of the 1st March last, in which we reported the terms on which the farm in the zillah of Ganjam, held by the late Major Evans, had been resumed, we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to a communication from the Board of Revenue, recorded on our proceedings noted in the margin,* relative to the settlement of the lands which were comprized in that farm for fusily 1225, and to certain arrangements which have been found necessary, in consequence of its resumption. You will observe, from the reply written under our orders, that though we sanctioned the settlement that had been made, as well as the arrangements proposed by the Board of Revenue, yet as they had taken their measures with a view to a decennial lease, and did not appear to have adverted to your injunctions for taking every opportunity of forming a ryotwar rent, we deemed it necessary to call their attention to those injunctions, and to desire that they would report upon the practicability of carrying them into execution in the present instance. The report of the Board of Revenue upon this subject has not yet been received.

130. At our Consultation of the 13th May, we took into consideration a communication from the Board of Revenue, in which they recommend that the Collectors of several of the southern districts should be authorized to exercise their discretion, in suspending the rigid exaction of the rents on account of an unusual cheapness of grain. We caused the Revenue Board to be informed, that we fully participated in the sentiments on which their recommendation was founded, and accordingly sanctioned the practice of forbearance in the exactions of the kists at the stipulated periods of payment, whenever a rigid adherence to the terms of the lease would compel the renter to sell to disadvantage. We desired, however, that the Collectors would be sensible of the responsibility which rested with them, for ultimately realizing the rents, and the necessity of an early and special report of every case in which they might be obliged to resort to the line of conduct we had authorized.

144 In a letter which is dated the 29th of June, and was received on the 19th of July last, the Board of Revenue reported to us the result of their inquiries with regard to the allegations against Mr. William Garrow, the late Collector of Coimbatore, and his native public servants, contained in certain representations which we had referred to them for their investigation and opinion. It was with much concern that we saw reason to believe that abuses, to a great extent, had been practised by the public servants employed under the orders of the late Collector.

145. On the 26th of September, our President recorded a minute, in which, adverting to the above-mentioned abuses, as well as to several letters from the Board of Revenue on the same subject, and to a Report received from them on the revenues of Coimbatore, for fusilies 1221, 1222, and 1223, he proposed, posed, under all the considerations which arose out of the circumstances of the case, that Colonel Thomas Munro should be appointed a Commissioner, in conjunction with Mr. John Sullivan, the Collector of Coimbatore, to examine generally into the state and condition of that district, and to report fully upon every subject connected with its concerns, whether respecting the defalcation of the revenue of the Company, the distress of the inhabitants, the remissness of conduct, or the delinquency of the agents, who either were then or had lately been employed in the Revenue department there. The President further proposed, that Colonel Munro should be directed to proceed without delay to Coimbatore, to join the Collector. Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 5 Jan. 1816

146. The recommendations of the President being adopted, instructions to the proposed effect were accordingly immediately issued.

147. For a full knowledge of the sentiments of our President, with regard to the state of affairs in the district of Coimbatore, we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to his minute of the 26th of September.

148. Mr. Fullerton, in a minute dated the 5th, and Mr. Alexander, in a minute dated the 12th of October, have also recorded their sentiments on the subject.

149. The result of the investigation which has been entrusted to Colonel Munro and Mr Sullivan will be hereafter reported to your Honourable Court. In the present stage of proceedings, we shall only point out, for your eventual reference, some further correspondence which has taken place relative to the subject, and which has been recorded on our Consultations noted in the margin.*

REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE,
Dated the 26th September 1816.

To the Honourable the Court of Directors for Affairs of the Honourable the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies.

HONOURABLE SIRS:

1. In our general letter in this department, under date the 5th of January last, we acquainted your Honourable Court, that in consequence of the discovery of extensive abuses which had been practised in the management of the district of Coimbatore, we had appointed a Commission, consisting of Colonel Thomas Munro and Mr. John Sullivan, the present Collector, to examine into the state of that district, and to report fully upon every subject connected with its concerns, whether respecting the defalcation of the revenue, the distress of the inhabitants, the remissness of conduct or the delinquency of the agents, who either were then or had been lately employed there in the revenue department. Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 26 Sept. 1816.

2. We have now the honour to transmit, for the information of your Honourable Court, two printed copies of the report received from the Commission, together with a copy of a minute recently recorded by our President on bringing that report under our particular consideration, and also a copy of the instructions which have been addressed in consequence to the Board of Revenue.

3. We avail ourselves of the present opportunity to transmit to your Honourable Court the broken set of our proceedings in this department, brought down to the 7th ultimo.

We have the honour to be, with great respect, Honourable Sirs,
Your faithful humble servants,

(Signed) H. ELLIOT,
T. HISLOP,
R. FULLERTON,
ROBT. ALEXANDER.

REPORT from COMMISSIONERS in COIMBATORE,
Dated 26th February 1816.

To the Right Honourable Hugh Elliot, Governor in Council, Fort St. George.

RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR:

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 February 1816.

Par. 1. The Commission for the investigation of the affairs of Coimbatore met at Bhowani on the 20th of October, and immediately commenced the enquiries for which it was appointed by the letter of the Chief Secretary, dated the 29th September 1815.

2. But before giving any account of their proceedings, it will be proper to mention what has already been done, in bringing to light the frauds committed against the Revenue by the late Collector's servants. Though the charges preferred against Cass Shitty, the treasurer, by the inhabitants who went to Madras, had been long and generally known, his influence in the province of Coimbatore was so great, that it was not till the month of April that full proof was obtained of any irregularity having actually taken place. On the 17th of that month Mr. Bell, the Acting Collector, received information that thirteen thousand pagodas had been issued from the Treasury, on the 1st and 14th of the preceding month, for the tobacco monopoly, without orders.*

3. And shortly after Mr. Bell saw reason to believe that fraud prevailed, not only in the tobacco, but in other branches of Revenue. About the middle of July he suspended Sita Ram Sing, the head of the tobacco department, for altering the pay list of the servants under him; and a few days afterwards the Tehsildar of Parundory, on a charge of having embezzled forty thousand rupees†. In the beginning of August he discovered that Cass Shitty had, in the month of January or February, sent eight thousand pagodas from the Treasury to the pearl fishery at Tutacorin, of which sum six thousand five hundred pagodas were afterwards replaced. He suspended him for this transaction; and a few days after the Tehsildar of Pulladum, for destroying papers from Cass Shitty and Sita Ram Sing. In the beginning of September he detected the son of Aunaviah, the suspended Tehsildar of Parundory, in the act of paying a bribe of five hundred pagodas to some heads of villages, to induce them to suppress information against his father and Cass Shitty; and he learned from Aunaviah himself, that he had collected and paid to Cass Shitty, on account of the decennial lease, thirty-two thousand rupees for his own district, and sixteen thousand for Darrapooram.

4. On the 12th September Mr. Sullivan‡ took charge of the district: he prosecuted the inquiries which had been ably begun by Mr. Bell, and in less than a month substantiated all the embezzlements in the Treasury, and a considerable part of those in the country, which form the subject of this report.

5. When we met, therefore, it was found that every necessary investigation concerning the frauds in the Treasury had previously been made, and that nothing remained to be done on this head, but to examine a few additional witnesses respecting the truth of the statements which had been given in. But though the business of the Treasury might be considered as finished, a wide field of inquiry remained in the country. It was necessary to undertake an examination of the accounts of every village for the last nine years, in order to ascertain the nature and amount of the balances reported to be outstanding, the amount of unathorized collections, and what part of them had gone to Cass Shitty and the various classes of Revenue servants, and the quantity of tobacco received from the cultivators, and the money paid for it; and it was also necessary, at the same time, to institute separate inquiries into the extensive frauds practised in the home tobacco monopoly, and likewise into the various complaints against Cass Shitty, for the private monopoly in ghee and other articles, which he had endeavoured to establish.

6. With

‡ Mr. Sullivan's letters to the Board of Revenue, dated 12th, 16th, and 18th September 1815.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 February 1816.

6. With the help of only the ordinary establishment of Revenue servants, no satisfactory information upon all these matters could have been gained in less than twelve or eighteen months, nor without materially interrupting the current business, and probably causing a loss of revenue. These considerations rendered it expedient to employ, at once, such an establishment as might be able to complete all the requisite inquiries and accounts in two or three months at farthest. In pursuance of this resolution, from five to ten additional Gomashtas were sent to each Aumildar, to assist in making out the ryotwar accounts of regular and unauthorized collections. Two Gomashtas were sent to each Tehsildar, for the exclusive purpose of making out from the Curnums' accounts and the reports of the heads of villages, the ryotwar accounts of the quantity and value of the tobacco delivered by each village to the monopoly servants, and of the price paid for it One or two Gomashtas were also sent to particular villages, where there was reason to believe that the extra collections had been unusually heavy, in order to take the accounts of them from the Ryots themselves on the spot, and a considerable additional number were employed in the Collector's cutcherry.

7. As the investigations would have run on to an inconvenient length, had the Commission superintended personally those of every district, it was resolved to examine the accounts of only three districts with the aid of the Collector's cutcherry, and to let those of the other districts be examined by their respective Tehsildars, who had been newly appointed. By this arrangement, it was intended that the accounts of all the districts should be ready nearly at the same time, and at so early a date as would afford leisure to the Commission to revise and correct them wherever they might be found defective, whether from negligence or design.

8. The districts whose accounts were examined immediately by the Commission were Andore, Parundory, and Coimbatore. The accounts of Andore and Parundory were investigated at Bhowani; and when finished, the Commission proceeded to Coimbatore, and investigated those of that district.

9 The Curnums and heads of villages of each district were assembled at the district cutcherry. The accounts of the collections were drawn up from the Curnums' accounts, and the information of the heads of villages and of principal Ryots, who, in almost every village, gave in statements of extra assessments. The accounts were what are called ryotwar, or the accounts of every Ryot individually; but these accounts were not checked by comparing them on the spot in the villages with the reports of the Ryots: so minute a process would have occupied too much time, and was not required, since without it enough could be learned to answer all the objects of the Commission. While these accounts were preparing, and the inquiries suggested by them were going forward, separate investigations relative to the tobacco monopoly, and the restrictions laid on the trade of ghee and other articles, by Cass Shitty, were at the same time carried on by the Commission.

10. Great obstacles were encountered in tracing the frauds committed in the tobacco department, from the concealment or destruction of every account belonging to it. A great part of the concealed accounts were at intervals found in different remote villages, and though frequently mutilated, enough were at last got to exhibit a complete view of the complicated system of fraud which prevailed in every branch of the monopoly.

11. All the different accounts being finished, they gave the results contained in the several statements which accompany this report.

12. As the Revenue affairs of Coimbatore had for some years been conducted with a degree of regularity and vigilance which could hardly be surpassed, and as the abuses which afterwards took place were introduced and directed solely by one man, it may be proper to say a few words concerning him. Cass Shitty was entered on the records of the Collector as treasurer on the 1st of January 1805, but he did not join the cutcherry till the following year. His situation was a subordinate one, which merely invested him with the charge of the money collected, but gave him no share in the making of the settlements, nor any weight among the inhabitants, and as he was not at first permitted to interfere in the general management of the Revenue, he was dissatisfied, but not discouraged.

13. Cass

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 February 1816.

13. Cass Shitty, from his first appointment, seems to have directed his attention constantly and anxiously to the converting of every person, and every thing in the country, to the benefit of his private trade. He had not at first all the influence which the accomplishment of his designs required, but he gradually obtained it. He began, as early as fusily 1216 (1806-7) to write privately to the Tehsildars to send him lists of the prices of grain, oil, ghee, and other articles of merchandize. Some Tehsildars paid little attention to his letters, others did not even answer them: but when they saw that those who had offended him were generally removed on some pretence or other, they were compelled, in order to retain their situations, to enter into his views, and to become his agents, in forming partial monopolies, in interrupting the dealings of the established traders, in extorting from the Ryots the produce of their lands at a rate far below the market price, and sometimes without any payment whatever, and in storing and delivering over the articles thus procured. These men, though they felt little scruple in defrauding the Revenue in the ordinary way, by concealing a part of the produce, did not without reluctance submit to become the private servants of a Bazar-man. They were so much ashamed of it, that several of them would not acknowledge it, notwithstanding the clearest proof of the fact, though they confessed with little hesitation their embezzlements of the Revenue, which they had carried on to so great an extent.

14. The embezzlements may be classed under two heads, namely; those in the Collector's general treasury, and those in the districts; and the whole were directed by Cass Shitty, the Treasurer. We shall begin with those in the Treasury, which were made under his immediate orders, with the aid of the public servants, whom he employed both in writing the accounts of the Treasury and of his private affairs. From the accompanying account (No. 1)* it appears that the whole of his embezzlements at different periods, from fusily 1217 to 1224 inclusive, amounted to:

	Pagodas.	F.	C.
In general receipts from the cash chest	2,04,305	20	57
In receipts from specific heads	2,14,010	30	40
Total...	4,18,316	6	17
Of which he replaced	2,04,305	20	57
Leaving a balance embezzled of	2,14,010	30	40

15. The way in which he committed such enormous depredations was chiefly by overcharging the principal heads of disbursement, such as the tank repairs, the tobacco monopoly, &c. The amount overcharged was removed to a separate chest, in the treasury appropriated for the keeping of his private money, and from thence he either issued it on account of his trading concerns, or replaced it in the public chest, in order to make up the deficiencies (produced in the kists, from the districts) by the Tehsildars having by his orders applied a part of their collections to carry on his private trade. His demands on the Treasury were at first moderate, in comparison of what they became at a subsequent period; for he had then little more to look to than the tank repairs as a fund for peculation: but when the monopoly of tobacco was established, his frauds increased, as his means of committing them were enlarged.

16. His general receipts from the Treasury begun as early as fusily 1217 (1807-8), as appears from the following abstract:

	S. Pags.	F.	C.
In 1217	7,571	38	45
1218	18,359	16	54
1219	27,140	40	26
1220	3,264	44	59
1221	52,675	38	70
1222	27,889	8	29
1223	17,589	0	36
1224	49,814	12	68
Star Pagodas	2,04,305	20	57

* These accounts are too voluminous to be inserted in this collection.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

These sums were replaced in the Treasury as follow:

	Pagodas.	F.	C.

By cash charged for the tobacco monopoly, not disbursed......	1,10,517	13	44

By embezzlement of a part of the money paid by the Commissaries for sheep and grain furnished by the inhabitants, &c.	2,378	41	44
By sundry Treasury notes for private cash paid into the Treasury at Madras by Cass Shitty..................................	34,541	21	73
Star Pagodas...	2,04,305	20	57

17. The statement No 2, Appendix A, gives the particulars both of his general receipts from the Treasury, amounting to Pagodas 2,04,305 20 57, and of his repayments of that sum. From this statement it appears, that his first receipt from the Treasury was as early as the 26th February 1808, and amounted to..Pagodas 6,000 0 0
That on the 31st March 1808 he received 1,571 38 45

Making a total of...Pagodas 7,571 38 45

which sum was due by him at the close of the fusily year 1217. That in fusily 1218 he drew from the Treasury Pagodas 18,359 16 54, and replaced from his private funds Pagodas 9,502 16 71; that the balance against him at the end of that year was Pagodas 16,428 38 38. That in 1219 he first began to employ the money destined for tank repairs in replacing his receipts from the Treasury; and that in 1220, the very first year of the tobacco monopoly, he applied under that head a sum of Pagodas 10,746 11 35 to the reduction of his Treasury balance. But notwithstanding his appropriating so much of the public money to this purpose, there was still a deficiency in the Treasury on the 31st July 1812, amounting to Pagodas 52,496 35 65.

18. The following abstract, taken from the Treasury general account No. 1, exhibits the amount of Cass Shitty's embezzlements from various sources, amounting to Pagodas 2,14,010 30 40, by means of which Cass Shitty was enabled to replace his receipts from the Treasury chest.

19. Having shewn the amount of the embezzlements in the Treasury, we shall now endeavour to explain the manner in which they were carried on, under the different heads of tank repairs, tobacco monopoly, nuzzeranah collections, &c. The tank repairs, until fusily 1217, were conducted in the usual way, by the Tehsildars of the districts in which the tanks and watercourses were situated; but as the public mode in which the accounts were kept did not suit Cass Shitty's views, the management of the repairs was in that year placed under a new department, composed of his own confidential agents. The country was divided into two divisions, called the northern and southern, to each of which a Superintendent of Repairs was appointed, to whom the Tehsildars were directed to pay the balances remaining in their hands on account of these works. Both of the Superintendents sent their accounts to a person named Sarungapani Pilla, who under the title of Sumperte, or head accountant, directed the whole business. This man resided constantly at the Hoozoor or Collector's cutcherry, and had two Gomashtas, one for the northern and the other for the southern division. He had a private cutcherry of his own, in which all his accounts were prepared. They were not, however, left there, but were carried to his own house every night to prevent discovery. The two Superintendents of divisions were occasionally summoned to attend him, and Cass Shitty then determined the amount that was to be overcharged in the repairs; and Sarungapani Pilla, with the Superintendents, in order to cover the fraud, fabricated from the true accounts a set of false ones, which were delivered to the Collector's cutcherry. In February 1223 (1814), Sarungapani Pilla having been appointed Tehsildar of the district of Satteamungul, was succeeded by Ram Row,* the Tehsildar of Sair, in the Collector's cutcherry, by whom the original accounts of repairs were falsified, as usual, until he was removed by Mr. Bell. But Sarungapani Pilla, though employed as a Tehsildar officially, still continued to assist in the fabrication of the tank accounts; and when Cass Shitty Shitty wanted him for that purpose, he procured leave of absence for him from his district.

20. It was easy for Cass Shitty, with such a set of agents, appointed in fact by himself and entirely devoted to his will, to commit whatever frauds he pleased in the repairs. He took precautions to guard against detection, which were hardly necessary at the time, considering the little vigilance that was exercised over him. He contrived to make the tank repairs a separate department, subject to no controul but his own. Neither the Tehsildars of the districts nor the Curnums of the villages in which the repairs were made were permitted to assist in them, or to have access to the accounts: and none but fabricated accounts were ever delivered into the Collector's cutcherry. The true ones were entrusted to the charge of Sarungapani Pilla, by whom they have been destroyed, or concealed so effectually, that not a single one has ever yet been discovered.

21. But though the particulars of tank embezzlements cannot at present be known, the gross sums, amounting to Pagodas 43,894 19 79, have been ascertained by the means of Narnapah, the treasury Gomashta,* who besides acting in his official capacity under the Treasurer, Cass Shitty, was also employed by him in keeping his private accounts: Narnapah, therefore, knew every sum that was transferred from the Treasury to Cass Shitty's private account, and the particular head in that account to which it was carried. He was ordered, in November 1814, by Cass Shitty, to come from the Treasury at Bhowani to Coimbatore, and to bring with him the accounts of the tanks and of all Cass Shitty's private concerns. He lived in Cass Shitty's house till May 1815, and was during all that time engaged in arranging and settling his accounts; and though, when finished, Cass Shitty took the whole from him, he was so completely master of the subject, as to be able, with the help of the public account, and some memorandums of his own, to shew not only the whole amount embezzled in the repairs, but that of each year, and the particular works to which it was falsely charged. The money for repairs was either remitted from the Collector's Treasury, or advanced by the Tehsildars, who deducted the amount from their kists; and as the payments in both cases were real, they were entered in the Treasury accounts, and the particular works for which they were intended, or the Superintendent to whom they were made, was at the same time specified. The difference between the amount of these payments and that charged for repairs, was the embezzlement; and it was usually entered in the Treasury accounts simply as an "advance for repairs," and was therefore easily distinguished from the actual advances, which were never inserted without stating the particular work for which they were destined, or the name of the officer to whom they were remitted.

22. The statement (No. 3, A.) translated from the Treasury accounts, exhibits the embezzlements in all the detail that could be obtained. The annexed abstract shews what they were in each year; but as it is formed from the Mahratta accounts containing the real transactions of the Treasury, the sum charged does not in each year correspond with the Collector's estimate, though it does for the whole period, from 1217 to 1224.

* Depositions of Narpanah Appaujee Row and Paupachitty.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 February 1816.

23. In 1217, though the disbursement for repairs amounted to so great a sum as Star Pagodas 31,800, the Treasurer, Cass Shitty, does not appear to have embezzled any part of it; which can only be attributed to his authority not having been then sufficiently established, for he began the following year, and never failed in every subsequent one to appropriate to himself a part of the money allotted to repairs. In 1218 he embezzled Pagodas 5,000 from the estimate of Pagodas 30,000; and in 1219, the estimate being small, amounting only to Pagodas 6,000, he took the whole, and in addition to it a sum of Pagodas 2,344 19 79, composed of the balances of former estimates not expended.

24. The account given in by Narnapah, the Treasury Gomashta, is sworn to by Appajee Row, the Deputy Treasurer, who states that he was employed with him in keeping Cass Shitty's private accounts, and that the book in which these accounts were written was delivered to Cass Shitty in May 1815.

25. Besides the statements of the two Treasury servants, some information has been given concerning the repairs by Dhirmaroy Pilla, who was employed as a Gomashta under Sarungapani Pilla and his successor, from 1217 to 1224 (1807-8 to 1814-15), and by "Shimivas Row," who was Superintendent of the southern or Dharapooram division, from 1807-8 to 1812-13. The original accounts of both divisions passed through the hands of Dhirmaroy Pilla, who states that he delivered them to Sarungapani Pilla, after fabricating new ones, with a sum of 45,000 pagodas added to the actual expenditure. Shimivas Row states, that during the period that he was employed, the actual disbursements in his division were only Pagodas 34,000, and that Pagodas 26,000 more were charged. Though his information is limited to one division, and to a period of only five years, yet as he personally superintended the repairs, paid the workmen, wrote the original accounts, and assisted in framing the false ones, he has a perfect knowledge of the details of these frauds, and undertook, therefore, to draw out an account, shewing the particulars; but bad health has prevented his finishing it.

26. The destruction of the original accounts, and the death, sickness, or flight of the principal agents employed, obliged us to be satisfied with the short abstract of tank repair embezzlements entered in the Treasury statement. If the head tank-diggers can be found, the Collector may be able hereafter to obtain a particular account of the real expenditure on every tank and water-course, and such an account will most likely exhibit a still greater embezzlement than is now done; for, from many complaints which have been received, there is reason to believe that Cass Shitty, by paying the workmen only a small portion of their hire in money, and the rest in grain, tobacco, salt, and other articles, the produce of his own villages, or bought or taken at a low price from others, and charged at an exorbitant one, will be found to have diverted from the repairs to his own use a still greater sum than appears in the Treasury account.

27. What this excess may be cannot be correctly ascertained, unless from a minute investigation when the principal tank-diggers shall have returned; but a tolerably just idea of it may be formed from the accompanying statement (No. 5, Appendix A), drawn up from the Curnums of the villages in which the repairs were executed. These estimates shew what the Curnums know, or compute to have been the amount of the expenditure; and how greatly it has been overcharged, will appear from the following abstract:

	Pagodas.	F.	C.
Curnums estimate expense of repairs	39,356	39	16
Expense by the Treasury accounts	80,091	8	34
Amount charged in the public accounts.........	1,26,759	18	29

This statement exhibits a malversation in the repairs of Pagodas 87,402 24 13; from which Pagodas 498 24 59 is to be deducted as recovered, or nearly double the amount known to the Treasury Gomashtas. It is not, in its present state, to be much relied upon; but it will be an useful document to bring forward hereafter, when the Collector has had time to correct it by further inquiries on the spot. It may be found that some of the Curnums have lessened the expenditures from enmity to Cass Shitty, and that a part of the collections lections from Cass Shitty's own villages have been employed in the repairs, but it is not supposed that these and other sources of error will make a difference of above ten or fifteen thousand pagodas. The Curnums and Potails had almost every where the means of knowing the actual expenditure. They usually collected the tank-diggers and settled their rates of hire. They were present, and learned from themselves whether they were paid or not; and though the Curnums were not allowed to see the accounts, they saw the works, and could judge pretty nearly what they cost.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

28. But there are some instances in which they actually kept the accounts, and one of them will serve as an example of the manner in which the fraudulent charges were every where made. In the village of Delavoyaputtanum, in the district of Dharapooram, the charges for repairs, from fusily 1217 to 1223 inclusive, are as follow:

	S. Pags.	F.	C.	S. Pags.	F.	C.
In 1217, for an anna or dam	1,300	0	0
.... for a nalla or watercourse	500	0	0
In 1220, for an anna	835	9	32
.... for nallas	101	33	58
In 1221, for nallas	257	6	42
In 1223, for nallas	202	2	65
				3,196	7	37
The actual expenditure was:
In 1217, for a dam or anna	314	0	0
In 1221, for nallas	18	0	0
In 1223, for nallas	14	11	20
Overcharged				2,421	4	17

In 1217, the Superintendent of Repairs being sick, the Curnum superintended them, and wrote the accounts, which are still in his possession. In 1220 he again wrote the accounts, but when finished they were taken from him. In 1221 and 1223 the repairs of the nallas were made entirely by the Ryots, for which they were paid in one year eighteen pagodas, and in the other fifty rupees.

29. In support of the Curnum's estimate, it may be observed, that even if there had been a disposition to disburse large sums for the repairs, labourers could not have been found. There are but few tanks in the province, and consequently but few tank-diggers. It is not supposed that, with the additional numbers to be obtained from the neighbouring districts, their united work could exceed in one year the sum of eight or ten thousand pagodas, even if they were employed and paid.

30. The abuses in the tank repairs, however great, were trifling in comparison to those in the tobacco monopoly, both as they affected the revenue and the inhabitants. This monopoly was the grand source of Cass Shitty's embezzlements, and from which alone they amounted in one year to the sum of fifty thousand pagodas. It will be necessary to enter at some length into the explanation of the system, by which he was enabled to defraud the revenue to so great an extent.

31. In the fusily years 1220 and 1221, the Collector of Coimbatore, in consequence of orders to supply tobacco for the monopoly in Malabar, furnished, by means of contractors, Candies 3,220 $7\frac{10}{16}$, at a charge of Pagodas 29,141 17 56. In fusily 1221, the monopoly having been extended to Coimbatore, it was thought advisable that the Collector should furnish the tobacco destined for Malabar, by purchasing it himself from the Ryots, in preference to contract. But this could not be done without an establishment of servants to make advances to the cultivators, to receive, and sort, and store the tobacco, and finally to transport and deliver it over at Pannani to the Collector of Malabar.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

labar. Cass Shitty had, during the period of the contract, received a share of the profits, and had learned from his partners that these profits might be greatly augmented: he therefore saw, at once, the advantages which he himself might reap from the new plan, and indeed there can be little doubt that it was himself by whom it was suggested.

32. He began by placing his own confidential agents at the head of the new department, and by making it independent of every body but himself: neither the Collector's cutcherry nor the Tehsildars had any control over it. The whole was directed by the Superintendent, Sita Ram Sing, who corresponded privately with him, was implicitly guided by his instructions in every thing, fabricated accounts according to his directions for the Collector, and retained all the originals: so that Cass Shitty had thus at his disposal a set of accounts, which he could conceal, alter, or destroy at pleasure. The establishment under Sita Ram Sing was composed of various classes of servants, to keep the accounts, to sort the tobacco, to pay for it, to transport it to Pannani, and deliver it to the Collector of Malabar, and to prevent smuggling. The Curnums were directed to take an account of the number of bundles delivered by the Ryots, and of the value paid to them; and these payments were directed to be made immediately to the Ryot himself, in the presence of the Curnum and of the Tehsildar, or one of his Gomashtas. In this arrangement there was great appearance of regularity and check to prevent fraud, but in reality none. The only efficient checks were wanting: open and full accounts, and authority to the Tehsildars and Collector's cutcherry to inspect and control them. The Tehsildars in general had, it is true, an account of the number of bundles delivered, and of the price paid, but none of the quantity in each class into which the tobacco was sorted; and as the price of the first was eight pagodas, and of the fourth sort only two pagodas, it is evident that his accounts could give no information as to the actual value of the article received from the Ryot. But their accounts, imperfect as they were, were not always kept. The Tehsildar of Coimbatore, the principal tobacco district, never kept any; and most of the other Tehsildars, and even the Curnums gradually neglected the practice of seeing the tobacco weighed and the payments made to the Ryots. There is evidence to shew that this neglect was not entirely voluntary, but was chiefly owing to instructions from Sita Ram Sing, prohibiting his servants from letting the Curnums take an account of the weight of the tobacco. The only accounts, therefore, received by the Collector's cutcherry, were such as Sita Ram Sing, in concert with Cass Shitty, gave in once a year; and afterwards, from the beginning of 1224, at the end of every quarter. The facility with which frauds could be carried on, under such freedom from all check, is obvious; and will be still more so, from a short explanation of the manner in which the tobacco was purchased and disposed of.

33. The principal agents under the Superintendent, Sita Ram Sing, were the sorters and the purchasers of the tobacco. There are five purchasers on the list, two of whom never were seen; one died in fusily 1222 and was not replaced, and the remaining two are brothers of Sita Ram Sing; and Mennaniah, the elder, appears to have guided the whole establishment and even Sita Ram Sing himself. The duty of the purchasers was to make advances to the cultivators in the beginning of the season, and to pay the balances due after the tobacco had been sorted and weighed. They do not seem to have been governed by any fixed rule in making advances. In some cases they made them according to the quantity expected to be delivered, or to the condition of the cultivator; but in other cases of whole villages, and even of a whole district, they made none. In some districts they settled the price, and paid it within one or two months after the delivery of the tobacco; in others not until after an interval of six or seven months. As they could, through their brother Sita Ram Sing, draw money whenever they stated it to be wanted for the monopoly from the Treasury of the Collector, or any of the Tehsildars, they by this means enabled Cass Shitty to obtain possession of considerable sums of money drawn for the payment of the Ryots, and to employ it in his own private trade, either through them or some other of his agents.

34. The most useful agents in carrying on the frauds of the monopoly were the sorters, of whom the established number was six; but the number altogether employed, in consequence of frequent removals, amounts to eleven. They were in general natives of the district, who had formerly carried on the tobacco trade, and were of course perfectly acquainted with all its details. Their business under Sita Ram Sing was of a mixed nature, as they acted both as sorters and purchasers. When the season arrived that the tobacco was cut and ready for removal, each sorter went to the different villages belonging to his own division, he examined the tobacco of each Ryot, and ordered it to be conveyed to the district godown, which was done at the expense of the Ryot, but sometimes of the Sirkar. Previously, however, to the removal of the tobacco, the sorter and the owner severally drew from the heap one or two bundles as samples. The sorter, no doubt, drew the worst, and the owner the best. These samples were tied up separately, marked and sealed, in order to be produced when the account came to be settled. The small parcels or bundles into which the tobacco is tied up are generally of the same thickness, but differ greatly in length, according to the quality of the article. All that the Ryot knew when his tobacco was removed was the number of bundles he had given, but he was ignorant both of the weight and the quality which would be affixed to it. After it was lodged in the godown, the sorter classed it into different sorts at his own discretion, and when it was perfectly dry he weighed it. The Ryot was then sent for and told that his tobacco weighed so much, and belonged to such and such sorts, and the regulated price, or if he had received an advance the balance due was then paid to him. He knew very well that his tobacco had been underweighed and underrated in the sorting, but he could not help himself; he could not afford to lose time in a fruitless contest for a higher price, which he knew would have no other effect than to provoke the sorter to throw his tobacco into a still lower class next season.

35. The Ryot was never present at the sorting, and very rarely saw the weighing; and if he had always attended on both occasions, it would have made no difference, he could not have prevented the sorter from falsifying the weight, or placing his tobacco of the first and second sorts in the second and third, or even lower. The samples which had been so carefully set apart were of no use to him, for the sorter paid little attention to them; and as he did not sort in the presence of the Ryot, it was easy for him to assert that the number of the bad was much greater than that of the good bundles. The loss which the Ryot suffered in the weight was usually from five to twenty per cent., and in the sorting it was still more considerable. To perceive how much he lost by his tobacco being placed only one class lower than that to which it really belonged in the sorting, it is only necessary to look at the prices ordered by the Board of Revenue to be given to the Ryots. They were as follows:

First sort ....Pagodas	$7\frac{1}{2}$ to 8
Second ditto..................................	$6\frac{1}{2}$ to 7
Third ditto	$5\frac{1}{2}$ to 6
Fourth ditto..................................	3

The tobacco taken from the Ryot as the fourth sort was often charged to Government as the second or third, and sent to Malabar. His tobacco of the first, second, and third sort was sometimes taken as the fourth, and sometimes as unfit for use, without any compensation whatever: yet this very tobacco was retailed afterwards to the owner and his neighbours at fifty rupees per candy. In some cases, the Gomashta of the Tehsildar, by attending at the weighing, obtained better terms for the Ryots; and in others, some of the head Ryots, by their influence, secured a more favourable price for themselves: but these were merely exceptions, and scarcely affected the general practice which has been described.

36. The tobacco which was not required for Malabar was reserved for the consumption of Coimbatore, under a monopoly which opened a wide field for defrauding both the consumers and the revenue. In order to retail this tobacco, sixteen dealers were licensed by the Collector; but owing to removals, the number employed at different times amounts altogether to forty. Each of these had under him a number of subordinate retailers, whose names were inserted in his pottah, and who had also separate pottahs from the Collector. Their number was very considerable, amounting to nearly four hundred. But it will will be necessary to confine our observations chiefly to the transactions of the head retailers, because the accounts of the inferior ones could not be examined, without consuming more time than the object would be worth. The whole of the tobacco for the home monopoly passed through the hands of the head retailers to the subordinate ones, by whom it was sold to the inhabitants.

37. It was ordered by the Collector to be delivered from the godown to the retailer at the prime cost, with the addition of a duty of Pagodas 5 15 per candy; and he was bound to sell it to the consumer at an advance upon the price not exceeding two pagodas per candy. This two pagodas was intended to form the whole profit of both descriptions of retailers; but as the head retailer, in almost every instance, reserved the two pagodas himself, the subordinate ones were obliged to sell the article to the consumers for as much more as they could get. One example will be sufficient to shew the manner in which the home monopoly was conducted. When a head retailer wanted a supply of tobacco, say ten candies, he received it by order of the Superintendent from the nearest godown. The different sorts of which it was usually composed were not specified, but he was most frequently directed to sell it all as the first sort; or if there was a large proportion of the third, fourth, and inferior kinds, as the second, and sometimes as the third sort. He was ordered to pay the produce of four or five candies to the Tehsildar, and of the rest either to Sita Ram Sing or one of the purchasers or sorters, who all acted as his private agents. The money paid to the Tehsildar was on account of the tobacco reported to be in store belonging to Government; that paid to Sita Ram Sing was for the tobacco taken from the Ryots by false weights, and not entered in the public accounts. Sita Ram Sing knew the whole quantity in store, and how much of it was reported to have been purchased on account of Government, and he could easily calculate, in his issues to the retailers, how much of the produce was to be carried to the public, and how much to his own account. In many villages, the tobacco, instead of being sold, was distributed among the Ryots, according to the supposed consumption of their respective families. They were compelled to take it, for if they objected they were charged with either having secreted a part of their own or smuggled other tobacco.

38. From a statement drawn up from the accounts of the sorters, through whose hands all tobacco, whether for Malabar or the consumption of Coimbatore, passed, it appears that the profits gained by fraudulent weighing amounted to ....Star Pagodas...36,805 32 30 and by fraudulent sorting to..45,708 16 74
The mode in which these iniquitous practices were conducted cannot be better described than by Sita Ram Sing himself, in a letter to one of his sorters in the district of Caroor, dated 26th November 1812. He directs him "to sort and "weigh as he had shewn him; not to pay more than four pagodas on an "average, because there is no high priced tobacco in that district. To take "receipts, leaving blanks for the number of maunds; to fill them up agreeable "to the Cutchery accounts, to pay the Ryots themselves, and not trust it "to the Curnums; to give the Curnums an account of the number of bundles "and the price, but not of the sorts or weight; to write the original accounts "on cadjans and send him a copy on paper, and keep the originals carefully "where nobody may find them; to consider all the Caroor tobacco as the "third and fourth sorts; to keep the Vetmungal tobacco; to purchase from "other villages for the godown; to weigh the tobacco on receiving it and "again on delivery to the godown, and to keep the quantity gained by the "weighing." This letter shews clearly how the system of deception was to be carried on by false receipts and accounts, and concealing the true ones. The Vetmungal tobacco alluded to, is the produce of that village; and as it is of a superior quality, it is to be sent to Malabar, and to be paid for as if it were only of the third or fourth sort. The exorbitant profit so easily acquired from merely changing the denomination of the different sorts, seems to have suggested to Cass Shitty the idea of extending this advantage, by introducing the Madura tobacco, if not into the district, at least into the accounts. As this tobacco was reported to be much higher priced than that of Coimbatore, it is obvious that, by substituting the one for the other, the gain would be much greater greater than between the different kinds of the same district. An opportunity soon offered for making the experiment, for the late Collector apprehending, from the unfavourable nature of the season, that the produce of the district would be inadequate to the demand of Malabar, informs the Board of Revenue, on the 20th June 1813, that he has contracted for the delivery of a thousand candies of Madura tobacco, at fifteen and a half pagodas per candy, at Pollachi in Coimbatore. This quantity was afterwards, by subsequent contract, increased to 2,400 candies, at the same price. These contracts were, however, altogether fictitious. The whole quantity of Madura tobacco imported amounted only to Candies 554 4 0, and it was delivered at seven and a half, instead of fifteen and a half pagodas per candy charged to Government, leaving a profit to Cass Shitty of eight pagodas per candy. On the remaining part of this contract the rate of profit was still greater, as for the whole quantity, amounting to Candies 1845, 16 maunds, Coimbatore tobacco, bought at all prices, from three to six pagodas, was substituted.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 February 1816.

39. In order to cover this nefarious transaction, accounts and receipts were fabricated, and a pretended Contractor named Nayenna Chitty, was brought forward. This man was formerly a petty shopkeeper of Rasipoor, in the Salem district, from whence he came in fusily 1221, and joined Cas Shitty, by whom he was employed in managing some of the villages which he held in the name of other persons, and in other private concerns. He furnished no tobacco, either from Madura or any other quarter; but, at the desire of Sita Ram Sing, he put his name to no less than nine documents, describing himself as a contractor for Madura tobacco, as receiving advances on account of his contract; and on one occasion, in order to give the greater appearance of reality to the transaction, as receiving more than was due for what he had delivered. The receipts which he is supposed to have given at different periods are all comprehended in two general ones, which specify the whole quantity of tobacco delivered and the value received by him for it, viz.

	Candies	Pagodas
Receipt dated 10th July 1813, for Candies	950	16,100
.... 28th April 1814	1,000	14,200
Total Candies	1,950	30,300

These documents were all given in one day in April 1814, for transactions which never took place. The produce of Coimbatore was, in fact, amply sufficient to answer every demand, and there could have been no motive to purchase any Madura tobacco at all, unless to propagate the belief that the whole quantity entered in the fictitious contract was imported from thence. So far from there being any scarcity in Coimbatore, Cass Shitty was at this very time actually sending 139 candies of tobacco to Salem and Trichinopoly, for his private trade. But while tobacco is clandestinely exported to Salem a purchase in that district of candies 250, for Pagodas 1,410, is stated in the public accounts to have been made for the consumption of Canara. This purchase, however, was equally fictitious with the Madura contract, and instead of Salem tobacco, 250 candies of that which remained in store from the produce of false weighing, was sent to Mangalore.

40. Besides the embezzlement in the tobacco itself, there is also one to a considerable amount in the charge for servants, some of whom were never entertained and others not fully paid; and there is likewise an overcharge in the disbursements for building godowns. The whole amount of embezzlement, under each of these heads, as already stated, is by the Account No. 4, Appendix A of the Treasury servants, as follows:

	Star Pagodas
Tobacco	1,20,925	27	11
Sibendy or servants	8,877	31	69
Godowns or store-houses	1,813	44	44
Star Pagodas	1,31,617	13	44

In order to exhibit more fully the manner in which these charges were made, the accompanying detailed statement has been prepared by the Treasury Gomashta, Narnapah. The following abstract shews the transactions of each year separately.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 February 1816.

	Amount charged in the original Treasury Account.			Amount actually disbursed for Tobacco.			Balance not disbursed, deposited in a separate chest.

	.... in building storehouses.....						1,813	44	44

41. From this abstract it appears that Cass Shitty looked with so much confidence to the future benefit he was to reap from the monopoly, that he ventured in the very first year, when it was not yet even introduced into Coimbatore, and was supplied in Malabar by contract, to appropriate to his own use the sum of Star Pagodas 10,746 11 35. It also appears, that in the last year, fusily 1224, he took for himself so great a sum as Star Pagodas 52,745 19 23; and there can be little doubt that, had his career not been stopped, his demand for the present year would have been still higher: for the advances were greater than in any preceding year for tobacco, and he had taken measures to procure one thousand candies from Madura, in order that from the supposed high price of this tobacco he might have the better plea for augmenting the charges.

42. As the accounts of the Treasury could only exhibit the charges and the actual disbursements, and as there was reason to suppose that they did not include the whole of the malversation, it became necessary to get possession of Sita Ram Sing's accounts: but as he had concealed them previous to his absconding, search was made for the accounts of the sorters, by whom all the tobacco was received and valued, and from whose accounts his own were framed. The sorters' accounts* were discovered by degrees, and from them the accompanying abstract has been made, which gives a greater actual disbursement and a greater embezzlement than the Treasury accounts. The difference is owing, on one side, to an actual payment to the servants, and on the other to an overcharge on the carriage of tobacco to Pannami, neither of which were known to the Treasury Gomashta. The following are the embezzlements according to the sorters' accounts:

				Pagodas	F.	C.
From weighing				36,806	32	30

* The sorters were sworn by the Collector to the truth of these accounts.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 February 1816.

Should this statement be found hereafter, on inquiry by the Collector, to be correct, the total embezzlements in the tobacco department will then amount to	1,45,701 30 9
Of this amount there has been recovered from sorters and retailers	1,788 16 27
Leaving a balance of	1,43,913 13 62
The sum unaccounted for by Sita Ram Sing	49,029 25 38
After deducting the advance of the Ryots...	12,119 0 67
Leaves a balance of	36,910 24 51

which is stated by the sorters' accounts to have been disposed of as follows:

Paid to public servants, private traders, agents, &c., by order of Sita Ram Sing	9,196 21 78
Balance due by Sita Ram Sing	27,714 2 53

43. The sum of Star Pagodas 1,43,913 13 62 comprehends the amount of the embezzlement, as far as it can be ascertained from the accounts of the tobacco servants; but it does not shew the whole; for as the head retailers retained the two pagodas per candy allowed as profit on the home sale and as the subordinate retailers who sold the tobacco to the consumers must likewise have had their profit, it is evident that the whole of this separate profit was illegal. It would, however, be a tedious, and indeed an useless process, to discover the amount, for it would be vexatious and oppressive to collect it.

44. It would be endless to detail the various frauds committed in the monopoly. Among them may be noticed the custom of taking false receipts; for besides those of the Madura tobacco already mentioned, there are no less than two hundred and fifty-five, for Pagodas 21,921 14 66, from persons who neither gave tobacco nor received money. The practice of overcharging the bullock-hire to Pannani is another. This has already been rectified by the Collector, who has dispatched 1,862 bullock-loads to Pannani, at two and a quarter rupees per load, instead of three and a half rupees charged by Sita Ram Sing; and the offers of bullocks at the reduced rate have been so abundant, that the only difficulty has been to satisfy the candidates by employing some belonging to each of them.

45. It may be advisable to consider whether it be expedient to continue a system which has been productive of so much fraud, both with regard to the inhabitants and to the consumer, and which has converted the greater part of the public servants into tobacco dealers and smugglers. The only argument that can be urged in favour of its continuance is the revenue which it yields. We are ignorant of its amount in Malabar. It is estimated by Mr. Warden, under different circumstances, at Pagodas 44,000, 55,000, and 76,928.* In Coimbatore it does not exceed 3,000 pagodas, and is of no consequence compared with the injury which it causes. The Malabar revenue is, however an object of importance; but were it even more so, it would not counterbalance the mischief which it has already produced, and must always produce while it remains on its present footing. By the Regulation for the monopoly, no Ryot can cultivate a smaller quantity than ten maunds. This is itself a hardship to numbers of inferior Ryots, who cultivated less than that quantity, and often not more than one or two maunds. The number of Ryots in this predicament is so great, that the late Collector found it necessary to let five or six Ryots together be included in one pottah to make up the ten maunds. This was still attended with much inconvenience, though of course with less than a total prohibition; and it was also a departure from the Regulation. By limiting the quantity to ten maunds, a partial monopoly is established in favour of the richer at the expense of the poorer Ryots, who cannot cultivate so much.

46. Different

46. Different districts are likewise very unequally affected by the Regulation, some suffering little, and others a great deal by it. The tobacco exported to Malabar is chiefly for chewing, and a much higher price is given for it than for that which is used in the district, which is principally for smoking, though both perhaps are equally valuable when the trade is free. The tobacco used for smoking is of a drier quality, and much of it broken and wasted in moving and sorting. It was formerly, like all other tobacco, sold by the bundle, and as it is now sold by the weight and is very light, it suffers a great reduction in its value. It is in vain to expect that the numerous cultivators of both sorts of tobacco will give up the whole produce to the monopoly without reserving a single leaf for their own use. They often do reserve a little; but whether they do or not, they are harassed with constant visits from the Revenue servants, and frequently obliged to buy tobacco which they do not want, in order to escape the charge of smuggling. Another great evil arising from the system is, that it places the cultivators, in the valuation of their tobacco, entirely at the discretion of the sorters, to be favoured or defrauded at pleasure. Some are paid the full value, others are paid nothing on pretence of the whole being unfit for use; some are paid a trifling price for a small portion and nothing for the rest. One Ryot will serve as an example. He delivered nine hundred bundles; six hundred were called unserviceable and nothing paid; for the remaining three hundred he received fifteen fanams. The value of the whole was about sixteen pagodas. Checks might be established to ensure a fair valuation; but it is probable that they would, in practice, impede the business of the monopoly, without proving effectual. The Regulation provides that the cultivation of tobacco is to be made upon licenses, but it does not limit the extent to which cultivation shall go. If there be no limitation, and Government agree to take the whole produce, the quantity would, in two or three years, be more than double what it could dispose of, and would reduce the profit of the monopoly to nothing. That this has not already occurred has been solely owing to the cultivators being defrauded: let them be paid the regulated prices, and there can be no doubt that the produce will very soon be more than Government can receive without losing by the monopoly. If the cultivation is limited, the distribution of the licenses must be left to the Revenue servants, and a wide field of abuse be opened, by enabling them to favour whatever Ryots they please. No Ryot could be sure of the quantity he is to cultivate, or whether he would be permitted to cultivate at all; and a vexatious interference would be established, far more extensive than in all the land revenue.

47. It would, perhaps, be better that there should be no restraint on the cultivation of this article, and that government should let it be produced freely, and then look for its revenue in some way more easy to the inhabitants than the present. The licenses cannot be extended, without eventual loss instead of gain from the monopoly: they cannot be limited, without injustice in depriving hundreds of the poorer Ryots of the advantage which they have always till of late enjoyed, of discharging a part of their rent by the help of a small tobacco plantation. There is a wide difference between a Government preventing the cultivation of a new article, and of one which has always been cultivated and is one of the ancient staples of the country.

48. The late Collector has stated the difficulty of preventing fraud: that more time is occupied by the tobacco than by all the rest of the revenue, and that he is "forced to exercise his attention and vigilance from the plough up "to the wharf."* This statement alone ought to induce a change of the present system: but a still stronger argument for its overthrow is, that it cannot be continued without serious injury to the inhabitants, nor without corrupting every servant employed in the monopoly, and introducing fraud into every other branch of the revenue; and if, independent of these considerations, it be found that the change may be effected, without even any loss of revenue, there can hardly be any well founded objection to its adoption. In fusilies 1220 and 1221 tobacco was delivered for the Malabar monopoly at Palghaut by contract, and this mode of supply may be reverted to again without loss of revenue, and with great advantage to the cultivators. There does not appear to have ever been any good ground for abandoning it. The Collector was probably influenced fluenced by the expectation of a saving, but the saving was imaginary; and even if it had been real, would have been dearly purchased by the fraud and vexation which attended it. The contract tobacco was delivered at Palghaut, including every charge except customs, at the rate of Pagodas 13 22 40 per candy of 680 lbs. The expense of transport to Pannani would have been Pagodas 1 3 17 per candy, making altogether the expense of delivery at Pannani Pagodas 14 25 57 per candy. The actual expense of delivery at Pannani, for the last three years, has been as follows:

	Pag.	F.	C.
Fusily 1222, per candy of 680 lbs.......	19	35	2
.... 1223	23	18	34
.... 1224	22	28	5
3)	65	36	41
Average	21	42	14

49. No difficulty could have been found, at the time, in getting the tobacco at as low a rate as this average by contract, had not Cass Shitty been a sharer in the contract, and wished to introduce a system more open to embezzlement. There will now, however, be no difficulty in finding contractors to deliver the tobaccco at Pannani below this average. Under a free competition, there is reason to believe that the price demanded would in no case exceed, and in some be far below it. The offers would, it is supposed, run from seventeen as low as eleven pagodas per candy of 680 pounds, or still lower. This diversity would arise from circumstances by which such offers are always regulated. The contractor who has the least connection with the monopoly servants in Malabar will demand the highest price, because he is aware that in delivering over the tobacco they will exact more than the just weight, with which he must comply, or expose himself to loss and detention, on pretence of its not being yet sufficiently dry. It is well known, that wherever grain is to be stored, the servants of the public department receiving it always contrive to gain by the weight or measurement. It is the same in tobacco, and the Contractor who shares his profit with the monopoly servants can therefore afford to supply the article on lower terms than he who does not. If the contractor were also to issue the tobacco to the retailers in Malabar, he would be the storekeeper himself, and as he would save the loss on weight, which is always incurred on delivering the tobacco to a public department, he would be able to furnish it cheaper than in any other way. This saving alone would probably be sufficient to cover all his expenses, and yield him a fair profit; for the Ryots, in selling their tobacco, even where there is no intervention of authority, give a weight much more considerable than is used in retail.

50. We have received a proposal from some inhabitants of Coimbatore by whom the tobaccco trade with Malabar was formerly carried on, to deliver four thousand candies, of 680 lbs., at Pannani, at eleven and a half pagodas per candy, free of all charges to Government. All that they stipulate for, is an advance of money to distribute to the Ryots, escorts to be furnished to accompany the tobacco, and the prevention of the exportation of any tobacco except their own to Malabar. Their proposal is founded upon the supposition that the Ryots are to cultivate and sell their tobacco freely, and that the exportation of the article shall be open except to Malabar; and also that, in the event of the produce falling short in Coimbatore, they shall be permitted to bring the deficiency free of duty from Madura. There seems to be no cause to fear that they will not be able to fulfil their engagement; and as their offer is above ten pagodas per candy lower than the average charge of the last three years, the saving, supposing the demands for Malabar to be candies 2,149½, would be Pagodas 22,432 9 0.

51. If the tobacco for Malabar is to be supplied by contract, it would be advisable that the contracts should be made solely by the Collector of that province, and that the Collector of Coimbatore should have nothing to do with them, further than forwarding to him such offers as may be received. This is necessary, in order to obviate the frauds always practised in transferring the tobacco from officers under one authority to those under another, as well as to convince the Ryots that the sale is free, and that the Contractors are not the servants of Government, and must purchase like private merchants.

52. No interference whatever of the public servants can in any case be necessary to procure tobacco, because a great part of that which is grown in the southern and western parts of Coimbatore is unfit for use any where but in Malabar, has never had any other market, and must always go there. The Ryots of the villages where the first and second sorts of this tobacco are produced, have declared, in opposition to those of all the other villages, that they gain by the present system, because their tobacco being prized in Malabar, and not at home, is always taken for exportation and readily paid for; and as they only received five and six, instead of seven and eight pagodas per candy charged to Government, they will undoubtedly still be glad to sell it at the same reduced prices.

53. With regard to the internal monoply of Coimbatore, the produce, upon an average of the last three years, has been Pagodas 3,399. It might, under better management, have been considerably more.

54. Under whatever form it may be deemed expedient to continue it, whether under licenses including only the principal towns and villages, or comprehending the whole country, it ought not to touch the Ryot directly, either in the cultivation or the sale of the article. The revenue arising from such a system is seen at once; the loss is not; it is only seen indirectly and slowly, in the reduced cultivation, or total failure of many of the inferior Ryots. There is, however, abundant cause to fear that more is lost to the land revenue by the restriction on the cultivation of tobacco, than is replaced by the internal monopoly.

55. The next principal head of embezzlement stated in the treasury account No. 1, Appendix A. is Nuzzeranah, amounting to Star Pagodas 31,343 8 35. The collection of it began in 1222, and was continued during the succeeding two years.

56. By nuzzeranah, among the natives of India, is usually meant the fees which are paid on the appointment or succession to public offices, jaghires, &c. The sums which are occasionally paid by tributaries exclusive of their regular tribute, and the contributions which are sometimes levied, in cases of emergency, upon the whole country, by the sovereign himself, independent of the ordinary revenue, as was done by Tippoo Sultan in 1792, to enable him to discharge the demand of the allies for the expenses of the war. This term was probably adopted by Cass Shitty, from the idea that, by giving to the exactions the appearance of a public demand, it would be the more easily realized; and he therefore declared, both verbally and in writing, that it was on account of the Collector, and that the other extra assessments levied at the same time, under different denominations, were for himself.*

57. The triennial lease seems to have suggested to Cass Shitty the plan of the nuzzerana assessment, and the decennial lease furnished the occasion for carrying it into execution. Long before the expiration of the triennial lease he had acquired the confidence of the Collector so completely, that the entire management of the revenue, and the appointment and removal of servants were left to him. Many of the village renters had gained under this lease, and wished to get a new one under the same or more favorable terms. A still greater number had lost, and in order to pay their rents had deteriorated their villages by heavy exactions from the Ryots, and were anxious to obtain a remission in future, much beyond the actual decrease of cultivation. By the reduction of the rent, in 1221, below what the state of the country really required, he served considerably both these classes; and the report of the intended decennial lease, by enabling him to promise them more lasting advantages, rendered it the more easy to persuade them to accede to his demands.

57. The nuzzerana was intended to comprize only what was paid in order to secure a favorable decennial lease; but this was not attended to by the Curnums, nums, nor by some of the Aumildars, and it is therefore mixed in their accounts with other private assessments, in such a manner as to make it impossible to state the amount of each separately. But this is of no consequence, as they are the same thing in fact, however they differ in name. The chief agents of Cass Shitty in settling the nuzzerana, were Aunaviah, the Tehsildar of Parundory, and about thirty-six of the principal Monigars or Potails of different districts. From the amount actually collected in some districts, as well as from Cass Shitty's directions to some of the Tehsildars, it appears that his design was to have fixed it at the rate of one rupee to one pagoda of the land rent: but it was collected at many different rates, from two and a half to fifty per cent. When four or five of these head Potails had agreed with Cass Shitty as to the amount of nuzzerana to be collected from a district, they were authorized by him to levy it, and the Tehsildar was instructed to assist them. The head Potails were not confined to their own district or talook, but were employed on this service in all the districts of Coimbatore. Their influence was necessary, in order to reconcile the other Potails to the measure, as well as their knowledge of the circumstances of the Ryots, in order to determine what villages should pay more or less than the general rate; and as they were promised the lease of several villages in addition to their own on favorable terms, they were sufficiently active in the discharge of this duty.

58. When the nuzzerana was collected, it was either remitted privately to the Treasury and kept separate from the public money, or it was paid in the districts by order of Cass Shitty to his agents for his private trade. When it was not realized soon enough by the ordinary process of collection from the heads of villages, it was in some instances realized at once, by their receiving back from the Tehsildar part of the public revenue actually collected, and returning it immediately to him under the head of nuzzerana, while the balance of the kist was left to be recovered at a future period, and more frequently to be written off as a loss from bad seasons or the death of the Ryots. It is only that part of the nuzzerana which was remitted to the Treasury that is entered in the general Treasury account; that which was paid away in the district is included in another account.

59. While Cass Shitty was engaged in collecting the nuzzerana, he was at the same time levying another private assessment, under the head of monyim or office tax, from the greater part of the Potails of the province. There was, in general, no fixed rate for this demand. It varied according to the ability of the individuals who were to pay it, though a certain per-centage upon the revenue was sometimes adopted for a whole district. This monyim, or official tax, was levied under different pretences: the general one was, the confirmation of the Potails of villages in their official situation. By some Potails it was paid to prevent the rent from being raised, by others to get it lowered; by some because they had enjoyed the triennial lease on favorable terms, by some to get the management of villages which did not belong to them, and by many to secure themselves from being removed in order to make room for strangers. It was meant that this tax should be paid by the Potails, and the nuzzerana by the Ryots: but as most of the Potails threw their own tax upon the Ryots, and as the villages were sometimes unable, and sometimes unwilling to discharge both, the collections did not proceed so fast as had been expected. The difficulty was augmented by the receipt of an order from the Board of Revenue to the late Collector, dated the 2d August 1813, to stop all proceedings in the decennial lease. It was chiefly the assurance of being greatly favoured in the decennial lease, that had induced the head Potails to act so zealously as Cass Shitty's agents, and it was the expectation of being equally favoured that had induced many of the common Potails to enter into his views of levying extra assessments. A considerable part of these were still due, and Cass Shitty saw that their recovery would be rendered doubtful, and his influence be lowered among the leading Potails, by the abandonment of the decennial lease. He knew, likewise, that the execution of this measure would greatly reduce the value of many villages which he had already secured for himself; he was therefore urged, by every motive of private interest, to endeavour to find some way of evading the order, and the plan which he fell upon completely answered his purpose.

Report of Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

60. The lease had not yet been even begun; but to remedy this inconvenience he instantly summoned the Serishtadar, and directed him to make out a statement immediately of a decennial lease settlement of six hundred and four villages. Recourse was had to a list of all the villages of Coimbatore which had formerly been submitted to the Board of Revenue, with a proposal for a lease settlement, and from it six hundred and four were selected; and after adding to the rent of each what was thought necessary as its share of the increased settlement proposed by the Board, the new statement was finished. The whole of this transaction occupied only three or four days. The list exhibiting the supposed progress in the lease was transmitted to Madras;* instructions were in consequence received to prosecute it to a conclusion,† and Cass Shitty was thereby enabled to keep his promises to his friends, and to ensure the gradual realization of the nuzzerana and other extra demands. It may seem extraordinary, that after such unusual means had been resorted to, for securing the establishment of the lease, the work should not have been even begun for above six months after. The interval was spent by Cass Shitty in determining what villages he should reserve to himself and those who most zealously promoted his designs, and in settling privately who were to be the future renters of villages, according to the sums they had already respectively paid, or were likely to pay him. The lease which was stated on the 10th September 1813 to have been extended to six hundred and four villages, was not begun till March 1814, nor the first village given away till the 23d April. In June 1813 a proclamation was issued by the Collector, notifying to the inhabitants that it was intended to make a decennial lease settlement of the country, from 1223 to 1232 inclusive, that the rent of the different villages had been already determined upon, and would not be regulated by the razinamah or cultivation agreement accounts, and exhorting the inhabitants to increase their cultivation as much as possible. In March 1814 another proclamation was issued, announcing to the inhabitants that the decennial lease settlement was to commence immediately, and inviting the Monigars or Potails and principal Ryots who were disposed to rent the villages, to put their sealed proposals into a box placed for that purpose at the Collector's house. The settlement was first began at Cangayem, in March 1814. The proposals given in by the candidates did not state the amount of rent to be paid: they merely stated, according to the form which had been circulated, that the candidates were willing to rent the villages on the terms which might be fixed. The box was opened at the period limited for the offers to be given in by Cass Shitty, who with the Moonshey, Gopauliah, and the Writer, Vencatachellia, examined the contents. A list of the candidates was made out, and wherever there were two or more for one village, a mark was made under the name of him who was approved. The list was then carried to the Collector, who put his signature opposite to the names thus marked, and the persons whom they designated were declared renters, and moochilgas taken from them.

61. The fixing the rents without any reference to the offers of rival candidates has the advantage of discouraging intrigue, and preventing the destructive consequences to the prosperity of the Ryots, which often arise from the amount of settlements being regulated by extravagant competitions. But such a system, in order to be successful, supposes a knowledge of the comparative resources of villages, which no public servant is ever likely to possess. The average collection of a long series of years is, no doubt, the best criterion for fixing the rent; but it is not always a safe one, for the average of two villages may be the same, but the one be in a declining, and the other in an improving condition. On the present occasion, however, the not entering the rent in the sealed offers was extremely useful to Cass Shitty; for it would not have suited his purpose to have given all the villages to those who offered the full rent, and those who had done so would not have remained silent when they saw them given on lower terms. By the appointment of renters' being made to depend on selection, unconnected with the amount of rent, discussion was avoided, and Cass Shitty found it easy to reserve for himself a number of villages under the names of fictitious renters, and to give to such of the head

Potails

Potails as had been useful to him in levying private contributions, several villages in addition to those which had formerly belonged to them.

62. The amount of the settlement during the first five years was limited to Pagodas 5,50,000, and it was to be raised during the last five by an annual addition, so as to make it on the tenth year Pagodas 5,95,000. This arrangement, intended for the relief of the inhabitants and the encouragement of cultivation, was converted by Cass Shitty to his own benefit, by keeping the villages he wished to favour at a reduced rent for five years, and then, instead of dividing the increase equally upon the remaining five, or, where it could be done, throwing it wholly upon the sixth and seventh years, reserving it chiefly for the nine and tenth. It is plain that by such a distribution of the assessments, two villages, perfectly equal in their produce and in all the means of yielding the same revenue, though rated at the same amount on the tenth year, might be made to pay very unequally for the whole period of the lease; and that the one village would hence be much more valuable than the other, and the renter of the favoured village be easily induced to agree to the nuzzerana, or any extra demand. As the sum of Pagodas 45,000 was left to be distributed upon the last five years of the lease, according to the supposed circumstances of the different villages, a wide field was opened to Cass Shitty to serve his friends at the expense of the public.

63. The whole lease was a system of fraud and irregularity; many villages were too highly assessed, and those which were otherwise, paid for the moderation they experienced. The abuses of the revenue servants are so intimately connected with the settlement of the decennial lease, that they could not easily have been understood, without describing at some length the manner in which it was conducted; more particularly as it was the chief, if not the sole cause of the nuzzerana exaction.*

64. The remaining heads of embezzlement which follow the nuzzerana in the Treasury account are small in amount, and require but little explanation. They consist of a balance of cash received from the Commissariat on account of sheep, and not paid to the owners; of cash received from the same department on account of grain, and withheld in the same manner; of stoppages from the allowances for the maintenance of pagodas, and of fines and stoppages from the pay of public servants. These four items together amount to Star Pagodas 2,378 41 44. They are followed by two sums overcharged on the price of paper and the hire of bullocks for the cutcherry, making together Pagodas 358 25 58. By five small sums gained by taking various coins out of the Treasury, and replacing them by others at a different rate of exchange, amounting to Star Pagodas 1,328 11 20, and by an overcharge of Pagodas 460 on the hire of carts employed in carrying the cutcherry baggage. The sums under the different heads of embezzlements in the treasury account make altogether a total of Pagodas 2,14,010 30 40. But it will be seen hereafter that Pagodas 3,464 31 69 must be deducted from this sum on account of disbursements of pay to the tobacco servants, not known to the Treasury servants.

64. From the slightest examination of the transactions in the Treasury, it was obvious that similar abuses prevailed in the districts, and an inquiry into them therefore became indispensably requisite, in order to learn the whole extent of the evil. All peculations of Revenue servants must arise either from the Treasury or collections in the districts. Those at the Treasury there was every reason to believe had been fully disclosed, but those in the districts could not be so completely discovered without examining every individual Ryot respecting his payments of revenue and extra demands for several years past, a minute process which would have occupied a great deal too much time. All that was essential, however, could be ascertained from an examination of the Curnums' accounts in the presence of the Potails; for their accounts, even

* A curious specimen of the confidence and publicity with which the nuzzerana was imposed was found in the cutcherry at Coligall It is a paper purporting to be a list of the nuzzerana fixed on each renter by Cass Shitty when he came to make the decennial settlement in fusily 1224. It contains the signatures of the Potails opposite to the sums they were severally to pay. The whole amount is Rupees 14,032, but only Rupees 386 had been collected when Cass Shitty was suspended.

though not given in their original state, shew every article of receipt and disbursement, except what the Curnum has reserved for his own use, and in some cases what has been appropriated by the Potail to himself. An investigation of the accounts of the Curnum of every village was therefore made, and from them a general account of the collections and disbursements of every description for the last eight years was drawn up. From this account the accompanying statement of the extra collections for the same period, and their application, has been extracted, and the following short abstract is drawn from the statement.

65. The nuzzerana collection, which forms the first head in this abstract, has already been explained. The total amount is Pagodas 83,590 3 34. But of this sum Pagodas 31,343 8 35 were remitted to the Treasurer, Cass Shitty: for the remainder, the Tehsildars by whom it was received are responsible, unless where they have disbursed it by his order, for his private concerns, which is in many instances the case.

66. The second head, amounting to Pagodas 62,633 39 27, is made up of: First, Arbitrary assessments on the Ryots unconnected with their land-rent, at a certain rate, but usually according to their supposed circumstances, and exempting the higher classes from favour and the poorer from inability, and amounting to Pagodas 30,963 31 64. Secondly, Of a tax, in some districts, at a fixed rate for each balla of land, without any reference to its rent, amounting to Pagodas 4,767 41 31. Thirdly, Of exactions of land-rent from the Ryots beyond the sum entered in their pottahs, under various pretences, amounting to Pagodas 23,561 25 49. Fourthly, Of a tax collected in some villages, amounting to Pagodas 3,400 30 43, to enable a number of the poorer Potails to deposit the money which they had stipulated to pay for being continued in office by Cass Shitty.

The third head, amounting to Pagodas 19,694 43 74, is composed of collections made for defraying village festivals, religious ceremonies, and various petty charges, usually borne by the village inhabitants; but the sum is, at least, three times as much as it ought to have been.

The fourth head, amounting to Pagodas 1,829 9 4, arises from balances of money collected from the Ryots on pretence of repairing tanks and water-courses, which works were either never begun, or executed only in part, and at an expense far short of the assessment.

The

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

The fifth head, amounting to Pagodas 1,386 37 12, is the price of provisions received without payment by all the various descriptions of cutcherry servants, which was afterwards made good to the different shopkeepers and Ryots by whom the articles had been supplied, by an assessment upon the country.

The sixth head, amounting to Pagodas 2,212 1 0, is a collection from the Ryots in general, in order to replace tuccavy which had been embezzled, and falsely entered in the accounts as issued to particular Ryots.

The seventh head, amounting to Pagodas 3,877 36 6, is the value of sheep and grain delivered by the Ryots for the public service, the money received for which was retained by the revenue servants.

The eighth head, amounting to Pagodas 2,483 18 30, is composed of bribes paid by the inhabitants to the Tehsildars for concealing a part of the land-rent, and of various taxes connected with it.

The ninth head, amounting to Pagodas 47,299 29 68, is composed of land-rent and a small sum arising from sundry taxes. The whole was deducted by the Tehsildars from the rents actually agreed for by the Ryots, and applied either to their own or Cass Shitty's private use.

The tenth head, composed of gain on the exchange of coins collected in the kists; and the eleventh head, composed of the produce of the sale of unclaimed cattle, are of trifling amount, and require no particular explanation.

65. The twelfth head is made up of the profits of the village renters under the triennial and decennial leases, amounting to Pagodas 16,271 15 21, but these profits exceed this sum. They are suppressed altogether in the district of Darrapooram, in which they were considerable in some villages: in the other districts in which they are omitted, they were, it is believed very trifling. In those districts in which they are exhibited they have probably been brought forward from two causes: the first of which is, that the extra collections were in many villages insufficient to defray the nuzzerana, and other extra demands, and hence, in order to shew how they were satisfied, it was necessary to bring forward the renters' profits which were disbursed for that purpose; the second is, that the Curnums and village renters have, no doubt, frequently suppressed a part of the extra collections reserved for their own use, and in order to conceal them the better have inserted the renters' profits, as if they had been necessary to complete the sum required for the nuzzerana and other private assessments.

66. The thirteenth head, amounting to Pagodas 23,347 15 55, is composed of money borrowed by different heads of villages to pay the private demands of the revenue servants. Much of it, if not all, has no doubt been disbursed in this way, and been added to all the renters' profits, to complete the payments to Cass Shitty and his agents; but it may likewise be remarked, that a considerable part of what is here called a loan will be found to have been realized by assessments upon the Ryots.

67. The fourteenth head, amounting to Pagodas 22,945 14 37, is composed of various sums taken by the Tehsildars out of the public revenue paid to them by the heads of villages. Very little reserve or concealment was observed in this transaction. When the Potail or Curnum brought the kist of his village to the Tehsildar, a fourth, a third, or a half, according to the occasion, was set apart by the Tehsildar, and a receipt given for the remainder to the Potail, who was left to make good the deficiency by an extra assessment, or if that proved ineffectual, to report it as a balance due by poor Ryots. Nothing can afford a clearer proof than the publicity with which such proceedings were carried on, of the corruption which pervaded every gradation of the revenue servants in Coimbatore.

The last head is the produce of a tax on grass lands, paid chiefly by strangers.

The total of extra collections, under all these different heads, is ....Pagodas	3,00,156	1	15 is not in fact an extra assessment upon the inhabitants : it amounts to 16,271 15 21

The remainder...Pagodas 2,83,884 30 74
is the amount which appears from this statement to have been drawn from the country in the shape of extra assessments, and almost entirely within the last five years. It may be said that the collections for village festivals, &c. and the money borrowed by the Potails, cannot be regarded as forming any additional burden upon the inhabitants, because they were always accustomed to defray voluntarily among themselves the expense of festivals and other village ceremonies, and because the money borrowed will be repaid to the lenders. But the answer to this inference is, that the sum entered on account of village ceremonies is most probably in addition to the usual amount, and that the money entered as a loan has chiefly, if not entirely, been raised by assessments upon the inhabitants. It is also to be remembered that the Curnums' accounts, from which the statements referred to have been framed, have not been checked by comparing them in the villages with the reports of the Ryots, and that though they shew the peculations of the superior revenue servants they conceal much of their own. Of a few villages the Curnums' accounts have been compared on the spot with the declarations of the Ryots, and the annexed abstract shews how much they suppressed.

68. These villages, however, are not to be looked upon as a correct specimen of the country in general. They are extreme cases, into which the clamours of the Ryots compelled us to make a particular inquiry. Yet as there are other villages from which similar information was received, into which the want of time precluded a minute investigation, and as, from the same cause, no rigid inquiry into the extra collections of the head Potails employed as the agents of Cass Shitty has been instituted, there is ample ground to conclude that the collections of extra revenue not brought to account by the Curnums is not less than from sixty to eighty thousand pagodas. Trifling extra collections are always made by the Potails and Curnums for the village expenses, but they are seldom carried to any great extent, unless by collusion with the cutcherry servants. An inspection of the extra collections during the last nine years will show how they increased with Cass Shitty's influence. They were as follows :

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

69. It appears from the above abstract, that in fusily 1216, the year in which Cass Shitty came into office, the extra collections, which were only Pagodas 289 42 44, rose in 1222 to Pagodas 86,763 16 24.

70. Having shewn the amount of the extra collections, we shall now endeavour to explain how they were disposed of. The accompanying statement, taken principally from the Curnums' accounts, shews the detail of their appropriation. Of this statement the following is a short Abstract.

71. It will not be necessary to enter minutely into all these different heads of expenditure, because many of them are sufficiently explained by their titles. In the receipts of Cass Shitty are included the profits of the villages, ninety-six in number, which he held for himself under the names of pretended renters, and the nuzzerana collections. A part of the nuzzerana was paid directly to Cass Shitty by some of the head Potails, and the rest, as well as the rents of his villages, was remitted through the Tehsildars. The receipts of the Serishtadar, Jeeven Row, arise from the produce of villages which he was permitted to hold by Cass Shitty, and from collections for a marriage and occasional expenses. When it is considered that the receipts of this man, the principal revenue servant, were Star Pagodas 2,225 23 59, while those of Cass Shitty were Pagodas 54,483 6 49, a judgment may easily be formed of the influence which they respectively exercised. The receipts of extra revenue by the Tehsildars are the amount of what was paid to them by the Potails without knowing its subsequent distribution; but of the whole sum of Pagodas 1,04,935 14 48 the Tehsildars assert that they paid to Cass Shitty Pagodas 68,784 15 21. Their statement is probably not far from the truth; for though, from their numbers amounting to forty-four, there has not been time to examine thoroughly more than two or three of them regarding their payments to Cass Shitty, yet from a full examination of Aunaviah, the leading man among them, in the presence of Cass Shitty, there is little room to doubt the general truth of their declarations. Aunaviah was the chief agent of Cass Shitty in the extra collections, and was therefore employed in realizing them in two or three districts, and in assisting and directing the exertions of the Tehsildars in as many more. By a reference to the Statement 1, Appendix A, many Tehsildars will be be found to have been employed in two or more districts on the service of extra collection. In a few instances it was occasioned by their having been too useful to have their exertions limited to one district, but in more it arose from their being mere instruments of Cass Shitty, who were removed from district to district, in order to involve their proceedings and accounts in confusion, and to prevent peculation from being traced to its true source.

72. The receipts of the tobacco Superintendent, Sita Ram Sing, are composed of the profits of twenty-eight villages which he was allowed to hold under other names, of money extorted from Ryots accused of concealing tobacco, and of bribes for various petty services.

73. The receipts of the Judicial servants are Pagodas 865 33 60; and of the Police servants, Pagodas 2,827 29 3. Their actual receipts have undoubtedly been much more considerable; but the dread which the inhabitants in general, as well as the Curnums, entertain of their power of harassing them in various ways, deter them from complaining of their exactions. Those which are entered in this account will be found chiefly in Darrapooram, formerly the court station, and the neighbouring district of Caroor.

74. The charges for articles furnished to Europeans and their servants, and for supplies to troops, were not paid to the owners, but the value was probably, in many instances, received by the cutcherry servants and withheld: indeed, there is a balance in the Treasury account against Cass Shitty for the non-payment of supplies to troops, &c. The number of sheep taken from the inhabitants without payment by the Revenue servants, both for the public service and private use, is 12,536.

75. The disbursements from the extra collections to Potails is Pagodas 11,013 27 25. This was paid to the head Potails employed in collecting nuzzerana and other extra assessments. It is entirely independent of their receipts as village renters or for village expenses, and there is reason to believe that they have paid the greater part of it to Cass Shitty, but are unwilling to appear as informers, until they are compelled to it by being called upon to refund. The head of village expenses comprehends all the usual charges on account of festivals, religious ceremonies, charities, and a vast number of other items too minute to be described, and many of them altogether unconnected with the actual village charges. No separate assessment was made for the village expenses: they were defrayed from the mass of extra collections made for other objects. After deducting from the village extra collections the whole of the disbursements, there appears to be a balance of Pagodas 29,407 0 1 in the hands of the Potails. Some part of it may be the fair profit of their leases; the rest is what is due to Government. But great caution will be necessary, on the part of the Collector, in endeavouring to realize it, because many of the Potails have little property beyond their agricultural stock, never expected to be called upon for the balances, and most likely cannot pay them, without ruin to themselves and injury to the cultivation of the country.

76. If the amount of the village extra collections be considered, it will not be difficult to understand why, for some years past, the balances should have so much accumulated, and the revenue so greatly declined.

But even these extra collections do not comprize the whole of the private exactions from the Ryots, for they do not shew the loss sustained by the Ryots from being compelled to deliver their tobacco at a reduced price fixed by the purchaser. This loss was very considerable, and though it does not appear as a collection, it was so in fact with regard to the Ryot. Extra collections, too, invariably press heavier upon the country than an equal amount of revenue, because they are not made with the same attention to regular kists, and the convenience of the inhabitants. The whole of the extra collections in Coimbatore are, properly speaking, a portion embezzled from the regular revenue, and diminishing it in a greater degree than their own amount, by the irregular manner in which they are levied. The various denominations under which they have been collected is a mere deception of accounts. They are all, with very few exceptions, drawn from the regular revenue. They are made up of money taken out of the village kists, after collection, by the Potails and Tehsildars, of tuckavie not issued to the Ryots, of the rent of land concealed, of balances reported irrecoverable, of actual extra collections from the Ryots in one year, and making it up to him in the next by suppressing a part of his rent, and sometimes, besides all these, of deductions of a sum struck out of the village or district cultivation accounts before they are transmitted to the Collector's cutcherry.

77. It has been shown in the accounts of extra village collections and disbursements, that the sum of Pagodas 54,483 6 49 went to Cass Shitty. This sum includes his receipts both from his own, and from all other villages. Some observations upon his own seem necessary, with a view to shew how, by turning the decennial lease to his own advantage, he precluded every chance of realizing the assessment of the public revenue. He begun to take villages in fusily 1218, and held four under the triennial lease; in fusily 1221 he took fifty-six more, in 1222 he took twelve, and in 1223 he took twenty-four, in all ninety-six. The average of seven years' collections from these villages, by which the late Collector was directed to regulate the decennial lease settlement, is Pagodas 59,485 0 78, or about one-tenth of the rental of the whole province. By the acquisition of these villages he became one of the greatest landholders under the Madras Government, and with an advantage that other landholders have not, for by holding his possession in the names of different individuals, all dependent upon him, he was able, while his influence lasted, to take the profit for himself, and to make the loss, when it occurred, stand as a balance against the Ryots or the nominal renter. In some of his villages the profit was very great, in others it was moderate, and in a few there was none, and occasionally a loss. Whatever his inclination might have been, he could not venture to reduce the assessment so far as to leave him a high rate of profit in all, because he was sensible that such a reduction, joined to that which had already been made in the villages of the other Revenue servants, and his numerous agents among the head Potails, would have rendered it impossible to pay the public assessment in any one year of the lease, and might have induced an investigation which it was his business to avoid. This reason also concurred to keep his profits lower than he wished. Some of the villages which he selected had formerly yielded a much greater rent than now, and he expected to have been able to restore them to their former condition, but was disappointed in his views by the want of Ryots and the ravages of elephants; other villages of little profit were taken, in order to secure the future possession of them to new Potails, who had paid him for their appointment, and hoped, by holding their office ten years under his protection, to render it hereditary in their respective families. But Cass Shitty looked to his villages rather as a merchant than as a landholder, landholder, and hence, even where they yielded little or nothing as rent, his drawback was compensated by the benefit which accrued to him as a trader, from the increased facility which his situation as renter afforded him of monopolizing their produce.

78. Had the decennial settlement been lowered equal to the abatement made in the rents of the favoured villages of Cass Shitty and his friends, there would have been little room for any fear respecting its realization; but by attempting to keep up the full settlement authorized by the Board of Revenue for the whole province, while a considerable reduction was allowed to nearly one-fifth of all the villages, its collection was rendered impracticable. From the accounts in the Collector's cutcherry, it appears that the amount of the decennial settlement sanctioned by the Board of Revenue is,

On 1,175 villages rented, ...Pagodas	4,69,578	24	33
On 340 villages not rented,..	1,45,465	2	79

Estimated settlement of 304 villages not rented...............	1,45,465	2	79
Total......Pagodas	6,20,743	22	79

But there are many of the rented villages which cannot pay even the lease assessment of the present year, and which would fall short of the full assessment in fusily 1232, by at least Pagodas 25,000. In the villages not rented the deficiency in the estimated settlement would probably amount to Pagodas 20,000, making altogether a decrease of Pagodas 45,000. It is true that there are resources in the favoured villages to make up a considerable part of this deficiency, but these are not available under a lease; and moreover the existing deficiency would be augmented during the lease, because the over-assessed villages, from being continually pressed for rents which by their engagements they were bound to pay, but could not discharge, would decline more and more every year.

79. The accompanying statement (No. 11 A.) contains a list of Cass Shitty's own villages, and shews the amount of the collections from them of every kind, and their appropriation; but as these villages are included in the statement made from the Curnum's general account of village extra collections (No. 6 A), the same explanations which have already been given of the various heads of detail apply to both, and it will therefore be unnecessary to repeat them.

80. Some of Cass Shitty's villages were managed on his account by their Potails, who received their official allowances in land or money, and paid him the extra produce.: others were held for him by head Potails, to whom he had promised a share but gave none of the profit: others were placed under servants of his own brought from other provinces, to whom he paid a monthly allowance; and the whole were superintended by the Tehsildars of the districts in which they were situated, who received private instructions from him respecting the disposal of his share of the produce. Of his villages, ninety-one are rented and five not rented; and though he held them upon a low settlement, he never paid it up in any one year. The amount of the settlement, from fusily 1218 to 1224 inclusive is

But as a revenue servant he is to be considered as answerable, not merely for the balance of a fraudulent settlement, but for the whole profits, after deducting the village charges and the embezzlements of public servants; and the following abstract shews the amount.

By a reference to the detailed account (No. 11 A), for the particulars of the disbursements, it will be seen that the same depredations upon the revenue by every public servant in every department were committed in Cass Shitty's villages as in the rest of the province. He countenanced the exactions of the Aumildars, because he partook of them himself; but both they and the Potails collected more than he knew of, because the disorder and rapacity of which he had given the example descended through every gradation to the lowest Revenue servant.

81. In order to shew how Cass Shitty derived other advantages from his villages besides those of a mere landholder, it will be sufficient to give a short account of the manner in which his affairs were conducted in Annaumullah, one of the largest of these villages. The chief part of the produce of that village arises from the land under a large tank, the rent of which was paid in kind. Of the rice thus received, he directed the greater part to be issued to public servants, at a price from fifty to one hundred per cent. above that of the village. From 1221 to 1224 there were issued as follows:

For Tank Repairs.

To Seeneevasa Row	2,500	salgas	at 2 rupees.
Ram Row	3,900	do.	at $1\frac{3}{4}$
Seevagooroonautha Reddy	2,800	do.	at $2\frac{1}{4}$
	9,200
To Sita Ram Sing, for bullock-hire	3,100	do.	at $2\frac{1}{2}$
Public servants	7,200	do.	at $1\frac{1}{2}$
	19,500

The village price during the same period was,

In fusily ... 1221	14 anas	to 1 rupee.
1222	1 rupee	to $1\frac{2}{16}$
1223	1 do.	to $1\frac{1}{4}$
1224	15 anas.

The rice for tank repairs was given to the workmen and their families, and charged as money in part of their wages. That which Sita Ram Sing received was given to the bullock-drivers employed in the tobacco department, and charged in the public accounts as money paid. That which was issued to public servants was received by all descriptions who were too poor to pay ready money. It was repaid by instalments from their monthly pay, and though it was given in advance, he did not venture to charge them so high as the tank-diggers.

82. From what has been seen of Cass Shitty's attention to every source of private advantage to himself, it was not likely that the monopoly of sandal-wood should escape his notice. It must have been one of the first things that occurred to him as a fit object of mercantile speculation, for as early as fusily 1216, before he had acquired much influence in the country, he contrived to get the monopoly into his own hands. It had formerly been carried on at the expense of Government, but in the month of December in that year the management of it was consigned to Munnar Kistnam Shitty, who engaged to cut and deliver the sandal at certain villages near the Ghauts free of all expense, Government receiving for its share all the pieces of the best sort that should correspond with the appointed sample, and he receiving for his own use all the inferior sort in lieu of all charges and profit; and he was also to be allowed two and a quarter pagodas per candy, for transporting the sandal-wood from the depôt villages to Bhowani. Though the pottah was in the name of Munnar Shitty, it appears, from his own deposition, and the testimony of several of the people employed with him, that Cass Shitty was the real contractor, and that he was himself nothing more than a servant upon a monthly pay of eight pagodas, and did not even know of the pottah's being made out in his name until he was apprized of it by Cass Shitty.

83. The terms of the engagement by which all the sandal-wood rejected in consequence of its inferior quality became the property of the contractor, must have led to great fraud, in despite of any precaution against it; but where the contractor and rejector were in fact the same, every check upon it was removed, and the result was, what might easily have been foreseen, the rejected pieces were often as good, sometimes better, and always, from their superior number, more valuable than those given to Government

84. The sandal-wood, when prepared, was sent from the different depôts among the hills upon bullocks, and the part of it which belonged to Government was delivered to the Collector at Bhowani, and that which was reserved for the contractor was carried to store-houses which he had at Corachi upon the Caveri, about two miles above Bhowani, and in the village of Karungulpolliam in the district of Eroad, upon the same river, from whence it was sent down in boats towards the coast for sale, and some was sent across the country to Palghaut. The business of the nominal contractor was merely to superintend the cutting of the sandal, to pay the workmen, and to send it down the Ghauts. For this purpose he had a small establishment of Peons, and three accountants, who kept the accounts of the twelve depôts under one head accountant. This head accountant was Sita Ram Sing, who was found so useful an instrument, that Cass Shitty transferred him, in fusily 1221, to the more important department of tobacco. The contractor's concerns with the sandal-wood ceased as soon as it was dispatched. That part of it which was supposed to be his, was received at Corachi by Vydelinga Pilla, a servant employed by Cass Shitty, on a monthly pay of four pagodas, in carrying on his private business. This man had the sole direction of the sandal-wood, not only below but above the Ghauts, where the contractor could do nothing without his instructions, which were sometimes sent direct to him, but more frequently to the Tehsildar. His orders, as Cass Shitty's agent, were obeyed by the Tehsildar as readily as if he had been his private servant. In one of his last letters to the Tehsildar, when there was some alarm about an inquiry, he tells him that the present state of things cannot be expected to last, and reproaches him as having been encouraged by the appearance of the times to neglect his late orders. The Tehsildar, in answer, vindicates himself from the charge of having been at all governed by the appearance of the times.

85. It is not to be believed, that not only the nominal contractor but the Tehsildar would have yielded implicit obedience to the orders of an individual not holding any public situation, if they had not been pretty well satisfied that he acted for Cass Shitty, the real contractor. Every person employed in the sandal department corroborates the statement of Munnar Kitsnam Shitty, that he was a servant on eight pagodas a month, and that all the profit went to Cass Shitty. One of the head bullock-men, Chinam Naig, who was employed during the whole period of the monopoly in carrying the sandal-wood to Bhowani, deposes, that on two different occasions having gone forward to inform Vydelinga Pilla of the approach of his bullocks, he was carried by him to Cass Shitty's house, where he heard Cass Shitty direct him to deposit the Government sandal-wood in the Treasury, and to send the rejected to Corachi; and he also deposes, that he has himself carried pay for Munna Kistnam Shitty from Bhowani.

86. As

86. As no doubt remains of Cass Shitty's having been the real sandal contractor, the profit which he derived, or more properly speaking the loss which the public sustained from the transaction, ought to be charged against him. The amount, as exhibited in the accompanying statement (No. 12 A.) is supposed to be Pagodas 55,082 15 44. The documents from which this account was prepared were produced by Narniah, one of the three accountants employed at the depôts (Karkhanahs) above the Ghauts. On his being questioned respecting the sandal, soon after the arrival of Mr. Sullivan, he brought a fabricated account, evidently made for the purpose of corresponding with that which had been written under the direction of the contractor, Munnar Kitsnam Shttty. But being told that he would be held responsible if the true accounts were not produced, he went to Ardenhilly in Mysore, where the house of Putabramiah, one of the depôt accountants, was, and brought from thence an account kept of the sandal by "Putabramiah," and the other accountant "Geeria," both of whom are since dead. It is contained in a "Curtam," a kind of black book, in which the natives write their accounts in slate. It reaches to the period when the cutting of the sandal was suspended in 1222; and the account for 1224, when the cutting was renewed, was in Narniah's own possession. Narniah had himself kept accounts in paper for the whole of the first period; but in May (Chyte) 1814, Vydelinga Pilla wrote to the Tehsildar to send him to Corachi, where he was kept in restraint and his accounts demanded. He requested to be permitted to keep them for his own security, but was compelled to give them up. The Curtam account is in the hand-writing of both of the other Gomashtas, but chiefly in that of Putabramiah, who had charge of the depôt at Iggaloor, where the contractor resided and all the accounts were brought. It does not give the detail of daily transactions, but it shews the whole quantity of sandal cut and dispatched, specifying the number of pieces and maunds, and was probably drawn up from the lists given to the head bullock-men of the quantities of public and private sandal forwarded on their different parties of bullocks. It wants the account of Davaroyputnum, the smallest of the depôts, which has been supplied by means of the head bullock-men.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

87. In calculating the value of the sandal embezzled, the inferior sort is charged at three-quarters of a pagoda per maund, the average price at which some of it was sold in the neighbourhood of Bhowani, and the superior sort, corresponding with the standard sample, at one pagoda per maund. The balance due by Cass Shitty, according to this estimate, is as follows:

			Pagodas.	F.	C.
Total quantitity of superior kind of sandal	33,117 maunds.
Deduct quantity delivered to Government	$14,435\frac{14}{16}$
	$18,681\frac{2}{16}$	at 1 pagoda per maund	18,681	5	50
Total inferior sort received by the contractor	$59,556\frac{3}{4}$	at $\frac{3}{4}$ ditto	44,667	25	25
	$78,237\frac{14}{16}$	Pagodas	63,348	30	75
Deduct charges of cutting, bullock-hire, &c.			9,085	36	52
			54,262	39	23

88. The profits derived by Cass Shitty from his extensive trade, though they cannot exactly be classed either as embezzlements of revenue or exactions from the Ryots, had in fact the same operation as these would have had, both upon upon the revenue and the Ryots, from the manner in which his trade was conducted. He not only traded in all the chief products of the country, but employed all the influence of his office, and compulsion wherever it was necessary, to secure to himself as great a share of the trade as was possible. His dealings in ghee, however, excited more general discontent than in any other article, because they either interrupted or stopped altogether the business of the merchants who had always traded in it. It is probable that he carried on this trade at an earlier period than fusily 1222 (1811-12), but it was not till that year that he made use of the public servants to force the principal part of it into his own hands. An order was issued by the Collector, dated the 21st August 1812, to prevent any person who had not taken out a pottah for his soornadayum (professional or house tax) from trading in any article. A second order, dated the 6th September 1812, declares that it was not intended to restrain trade, and that it may be carried on whenever pottahs are received. It could not surely have been necessary to lay a temporary restraint on the trade of the country, in order to make the traders pay the usual professional tax. But with whatever view this measure might have been adopted, it served effectually the purposes of Cass Shitty; for as the opinion that its object was to assist his trade became pretty general, it enabled him, by raising difficulties about giving the pottahs and by stopping commodities at the custom chokies, to compel the dealers to give up to him a part of their trade for the sake of retaining the rest.

89. His designs were also favoured by a change in the tariff which took place at this time. From 1808-9 to 1812-13, the tariff by which the duty on ghee was levied had been Star Pagodas 68 30 per hundred marcals. In July 1812 it was raised to Star Pagodas 144 30, and in October to Star Pagodas 250. The present market price of the district is not more than Star Pagodas 120: the usual price is about Star Pagodas 100. It is evident that the exorbitant tariff of 250 pagodas tended to discourage the trade of the inhabitants, and to throw more of it into the hands of Cass Shitty. The increased tariff, added to their being obliged to furnish ghee to him at a low rate, left them hardly any profit; but as Cass Shitty purchased at a low compulsory price, and evaded, in a great degree, the payment of the customs (from the servants in that department having been in general appointed by himself), he could suffer no inconvenience by the tariff, that was not fully compensated by the facility which the distress of the other traders gave him, of augmenting his own monopoly.

90. Between August and October 1812, Cass Shitty sent agents to every district to purchase ghee on his own account, and he wrote at the same time to the different Tehsildars to give them all the assistance in their power. The process observed on this occasion in all the districts was nearly the same as that in Cheoor, which, according to the information given by all the principal dealers, was nearly as follows: The agents on their arrival ordered all ghee to be sealed up and not to be sold without leave, and that all that had been dispatched for Mysore should be stopped at the Bhowani or the custom chokies. The Tehsildars sent Peons with Venkut Naigue, one of the agents, to bring all the ghee merchants from the villages to the cutcherry, where he told them that they must sell only to the agents, and that if they did not they must give penalty bonds not to trade in ghee. Some agreed; others objected to those conditions: but after being kept ten days under Peons, the whole at last consented to deliver annually to Cass Shitty a certain quantity at a fixed rate. The quantity was nearly one-half the amount of their trade, and the rate was from one-fourth to one-third lower than the market price. The better to make them fulfil this compulsory engagement, the agents wrote to the heads of villages, directing them to prohibit the Ryots from selling ghee to any other dealers than those who supplied Cass Shitty.

91. Some of the merchants who had gone to Mysore to sell their ghee, and who were absent during these transactions, having on their return waited on Cass Shitty to complain of the impediments thrown in the way of their trade, were told they would be permitted to carry it on, provided they delivered him a certain quantity of ghee annually at a reduced rate, and paid him likewise one and a quarter Canteray fanam on each bullock-load of the quantity deliverable able to himself. One half fanam of this tax was to defray the expense of a silver bull which Cass Shitty meant to present to the Trinomala pagoda, the remaining three-quarters were to pay the charges of three choultries which he had ordered to be erected. The merchants found it necessary to comply with these terms, and their example was followed by all the ghee traders, and also by many of the traders in other articles. The collections on account of the bull, as far as they have been ascertained, amount to Pagodas 463 10 34. The bull himself has been attached among Cass Shitty's property by the Collector, and is now at Bhowani: and it would, perhaps, be most advisable to let him be sent to Trinomala, as the inhabitants who paid for him are desirous that this should be done.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

92. The principal market to which the ghee, when collected by the Tehsildars and agents, was sent was Calicut, where Cass Shitty had a partner, named Balsami Shitty. This man states that the whole quantity received there, from March 1813 to May 1815, was 1,562 bullock-loads, the profit on which he estimates at Rupees 34,684: that he was entitled, as partner, to one-third, and that Cass Shitty took the whole and also seized his accounts.

93. Cotton was another article in which Cass Shitty carried on a considerable trade. In a letter from the Board of Revenue, dated the 24th September 1812, the Collector was directed to encourage the cultivation of cotton, by advances to the Ryots, to enable the Commercial Resident to obtain a quantity, amounting to one thousand five hundred candies, in each of five succeeding years, on account of the investment for China. Agents were employed for this purpose, and advances were made to them amounting to Pagodas 11,657. These agents were, as usual, the Tehsildars and private Gomashtas of Cass Shitty.

94. From the letters of the late Collector to the Commercial Resident at Salem, dated 9th April and 1st June 1813, it appears that reports had been spread, that it was intended to monopolize the cotton, that the Ryots had been intimidated, and had in consequence taken only a very small advance, that the season having been unfavourable the crop had failed. As no mention is afterwards made of the investment, it was probably relinquished, from the difficulty of providing the quantity required. But this difficulty is explained by Cass Shitty having himself entered into the trade, as is obvious from his letters to Nayan Chitty, an agent whom he employed in most of his private concerns. In a letter, dated the 29th of November, he directs him to collect some advances made to the Ryots for cotton; to receive three thousand pagodas from the district Sheristadar, and advance it occasionally for cotton to the Ryots; to make the Tehsildars issue orders to the Ryots to sell their cotton to him only; and he concludes with instructions about his own villages, grain, tobacco, pepper, and ghee. In a letter to the same person, dated 29th December 1812, he desires him to take five thousand rupees from the cotton money on account of ghee; and in a letter, dated 18th August 1814, written by his son, Verasawmy Chitty, this same Nayan Chitty is directed to remit the proceeds of the cotton sale, and sell more, as the price is favourable.

95. The objections made by the Ryots seem to have arisen from the prohibition against their selling any part of their cotton without leave, and from the well-grounded apprehension of being obliged to part with it at a price below its value. The difficulties were magnified by the agents, because as they had seen from a short trial that the trade would be advantageous, they wished to convert it into a private concern, but supported by public authority, as if it were still carried on for the benefit of the Company. Of the advances, therefore, only a very small part was immediately, when collected, returned to the Treasury, and as late as the 25th October last Pagodas 7,330 12 67 were still outstanding. On that day one of the agents, named "Seenwas "Pillay," paid into the Collector's Treasury Pagodas 2,770 39 45, leaving a balance of Pagodas 4,565 18 22 to be accounted for by Cass Shitty. This balance is placed against him: because it is perfectly clear that the trade, after being shut to the Company, was kept open for him, and carried on with the public money, while he still endeavoured to impress the inhabitants with the opinion that the purchases were for Government. It is stated by a dealer, that all the cotton brought one day to the bazar of Konakapooram was stopped by the Tehsildar, and taken for Cass Shitty, at nine and a half rupees, when the price was eleven and a half rupees per load. There are letters from him to Nayan Chitty, his Gomashta, as late as the 19th October 1814, directing Government cotton to be collected; and among his private accounts there are four entries, in 1814-15, making the sum of Pagodas 949 8 2 from the sale of Government cotton.

96. The cotton advance does not appear in the public accounts as a disbursement, and there are two other sums which have been disbursed without being entered in the public accounts: both were paid to Cass Shitty. One was for lottery tickets, and amounts to Pagodas 206; the other was for the purpose of making up one hundred carts, and amounted to Pagodas 1,261 1 69. Only fifty carts were made up, and were employed by him in the carriage of sandal and other articles of private trade.

97. Cass Shitty was engaged in two indigo-works, for which the plant was supplied by the aid of the public servants. The Tehsildars looked out for land favourable to its culture, and advanced seed to the Ryot. If the crop turned out well, the produce was sent to the indigo work, and the Ryot was paid what was deemed sufficient: if it failed, the value of the seed was repaid to Cass Shitty, and the rent of the land discharged by an assessment upon the village; but the rent was also sometimes exacted from the Ryot, or left as a balance outstanding.

98. Cass Shitty also caught and sold elephants. The pits were dug by the inhabitants without receiving any thing for their labour, and the elephants were often fed at their expense; but it was sometimes made good to them, either from the revenue or extra collections of the village.

99. A quantity of salt was last year brought from Malabar and sold in Coimbatore under a supposed contract; and as no part of the proceeds were brought to the public account, there can be little doubt of Cass Shitty's having been a sharer in the profit. No contract can be traced by the Collector, or any authority given for concluding one. On the 10th of November 1814, the late Collector submitted to the Board of Revenue a proposal for supplying Coimbatore with sea salt by contract; and he mentioned, at the same time, his having received, as an experiment, twenty garce, at forty-two pagodas per garce, which having been retailed at sixteen seers the rupee, had yielded a profit of Pagodas 302 38 44; but no disbursement or receipt for this salt is to be found in any public account. On the 18th September 1815, the Board of Revenue sent instructions to the Collector respecting the proposed contract submitted by his predecessor; but, in the interval, one hundred and twenty-five garce of salt, under the rowannahs of the Collectors of Malabar and Coimbatore, had been brought into the country. By a letter from the Collector of Malabar to the Board of Revenue, it appears that this salt is part of a quantity of one hundred and thirty-nine garce delivered by him to a person supposed to be a contractor, and who has complained to him that he has received only Rupees 10,000, and that Rupees 10,448 are still due to him; but nothing is known to the Collector of Coimbatore or his official servants of any contract for salt. No contract or document respecting it exists: had there been any such, it would have been produced by the pretended contractor.

100. This one hundred and twenty-five garce of salt, which by a difference of measurement became one hundred and thirty-five garce, was lodged in the store houses of Coimbatore, and up to the 12th January last, one hundred and twenty-eight garce were sold for Rupees 25,699 $\frac{6}{16}$. Of this sum the Collector secured Rupees 10,441 $\frac{3}{61}$, on the people employed in the sale stating it to be Government property. No public account has been received of the balance; but Sita Ram Sing, the superintendent of the tobacco monopoly, directed 10,000 rupees to be paid on account of it in Malabar; and it appears from the deposition of Soobroy Chitty, the principal tobacco sorter, and the person by whom the salt was sold, that the produce, both of the salt and tobacco sales, were mixed, and issued indiscriminately by Sita Ram Sing.

101. It would be a waste of time, and would answer no purpose, to pursue Cass Shitty's trade in almost every product of the country through all its details. All that is here intended is to give a general view of its nature, and prove prove the injury which the country must have sustained from a trade carried on by such unwarrantable means. The manner in which the grain produced in his own villages was issued, at a rate nearly double its real value, to tank-diggers and bullock-men employed in the public service, has already been explained; but his trade in grain and other articles was not confined to his own villages, but reached to every part of the country, and whether managed for him by private agents or the Tehsildars, was always supported by official influence. The Tehsildars found it easy to force the Ryots to sell their produce cheap, by pushing them for payment of their rents. They sometimes advanced money from the collections in their hands to a Ryot owing a balance, received it back immediately in payment of this balance, and at the same time took a bond from him to repay the amount in grain, at a price much below that of the market.

102. From a statement delivered by "Vencatamaniah," a private agent of Cass Shitty, but appointed second Tehsildar of Caroor, to give him greater weight as a trader, it appears that he acted with several other Tehsildars in Cass Shitty's private business; that they dealt in a great variety of articles, and that on one occasion they purchased from the Ryots a quantity of oil-seed, grain, and dholl, for Rupees 4,589½, when the market price was Rupees 9,179. The trade of all his other agents was conducted upon the same principle, of uniting in one person the trader and the Tehsildar, in order the more effectually to extract a profit from the distress of the Ryot.

103. Although the trade carried on by Cass Shitty gave as much occupation to every Revenue servant as his public duties, and though it was notorious to all the inhabitants, many of whom felt the evils of it in their private concerns, yet Cass Shitty, when called upon by order of the Board of Revenue to answer some charges preferred against him last year, says in his defence, dated the 15th Agril 1815, "I resolutely deny this charge of employing the public servants "in my private business, and positively of trading at all." Notwithstanding this declaration, when he was questioned, in October last, by the Commission, relative to the nuzzerana money, in presence of Annauyah and several other Tehsildars by whom it had been remitted, he acknowledged his having received the greater part of it, but asserted that it had been derived from his own funds, which the Tehsildars had in their hands on account of his trade; and he took some credit to himself for having, as he said, sold grain to the inhabitants at a moderate rate in a time of scarcity.

104. He had two houses of trade, one at Coimbatore and the other at Bhowani; and as it was known that the disposal of large sums of the public money could only be learned from his private accounts, it became an object of importance to discover them. Those of the house at Bhowani, which contained the sandal monopoly and other transactions, have not been found; but a part of those of the house at Coimbatore, embracing only the period from February 1814 to September 1815, were secured. Even in this short period the dealings amount to above Pagodas 76,000.

In a single entry there is a sum of Pagodas 22,258 1 41, on account of trade, to Vydelinga Pilla, his Gomashta at Bhowani, who superintended the sandal and other concerns.

105. In the course of this report the extra collections from the inhabitants and the embezzlements of the public servants have been shewn: but as they are contained in a number of different statements, two statements, comprehending the whole, have been drawn up, in order to give the better general view of their amount. The second of these statements is merely an abstract of the first. The following is the amount of each of the principal heads.

	Pagodas.	F.	C.
Extra collections from the villages	3,00,156	1	15
Embezzlements in the tobacco monopoly	1,43,913	13	62
Ditto .... in tank repairs	86,903	44	34
Ditto .... in the sandal monopoly	54,696	28	33
Ditto sundry receipts from the Treasury	8,199	12	9
Star Pagodas	5,93,869	9	73

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

Among the extra collections there is a sum of Pagodas 24,968 21 52 for village expenses, of which the greater part must be remitted to the inhabitants, because these expenses are usually made good by voluntary contributions among themselves. But, on the other hand, there is little doubt that a full examination of the Ryots themselves would add seventy or eighty thousand pagodas to the present amount of extra collections.

106. With regard to the tobacco embezzlements, we are persuaded that their full extent is not yet known, and that they will be increased by further investigation. The embezzlements in tank repairs are composed of two sums; one of which, amounting to Pagodas 44,000 29 17, is charged against Cass Shitty; the other, amounting to Pagodas 42,903 15 17, is charged against the superintendents of the repairs. This last sum is the amount by which the malversation, according to the estimates of the village Curnums, exceeds that stated in the account of Narnapah, the Treasury Gomashta. But it has already been observed, that the Curnums' estimates are only, in some cases, founded upon actual accounts, and that they may, in many instances, be erroneous, either from enmity or ignorance. It is therefore probable, that an accurate investigation, on the spot, into the amount actually expended on each tank, will make a considerable reduction in the balance estimated by the Curnums; but the full amount ought to stand against the Superintendents, until it shall be proved that they are entitled to remission, either by the production of the accounts which they have hitherto concealed, or by future inquiry.

107. The manner in which the sandal account was prepared has been explained. The quantity is taken from the accounts of the Curnums employed in the department, and the value estimated according to the prices reported to have been paid for some parcels sold at Bhowani. These accounts may have entered much of the inferior sort as standard sandal-wood, and may have overrated the value; but they ought to be adopted, until they are proved erroneous by Vydelinga Pilla, the manager for Cass Shitty, returning and producing the original accounts.

108. The mode in which the extra collections and embezzlements have been distributed is so fully exhibited in the accounts themselves, that any further explanation, beyond a few general remarks, seems unnecessary. Cass Shitty, as the principal director of these malversations, has engrossed the chief share of the produce for himself, as appears from the following abstract.

	Pagodas.	F.	C.

109. Cass Shitty, when examined by the Commission on the 26th and 27th of October, respecting the embezzlements stated in the account of the Treasury Gomashta, denied having appropriated any money to his own use; but admitted that he sent from the Treasury, partly from his own money kept in a separate chest, and partly from the public chest, Pagodas 2,04,000, but asserted that this money was employed in trade, and whatever was public was replaced.

replaced. He denied all knowledge of any fraud in the tobacco monopoly or tank repairs, and of what had become of the original accounts He maintained that the payments of nuzzerana were all on account of private advances made by him for trade; that he traded in cotton, grain, ghee, oil, and other articles, and that both the advances and recoveries were frequently made by the Tehsildars. At this very time, when he was professing his ignorance of frauds in the tobacco monopoly and of the original accounts, he was employing emissaries to dissuade Anunthiah, a Gomashta in that department, from giving information, by an offer of one thousand pagodas; and of this sum Pagodas 738 21 6 were actually delivered, and have since been recovered by the Collector. One Runga Reddy, a native of the Carnatic, and security for thirteen thousand pagodas taken by Cass Shitty from the Treasury, was present when a person named Vencattasoobba came and told Cass Shitty that Anunthiah had given accounts of only thirty thousand pagodas gained by the tobacco, instead of more than a lac, and that if Cass Shitty would give him one thousand pagodas he would write no more. The great wealth which Cass Shitty had acquired from a long course of peculation, enabled him to lavish money on every person whose silence it was his interest to secure, and from his consenting to pay a thousand pagodas to a tobacco writer receiving only three pagodas monthly pay, there can remain no doubt that he employed similar means to tempt the servants in that and other departments to suppress information. Seeneevasyen, one of the superintendents of tank repairs, who after engaging to give a true account of the actual charges, has since desisted, on pretence of ignorance, as well as several others of the late Revenue servants, have unquestionably been amply rewarded.

110. While Cass Shitty was in office, his private dealings were so intermixed with the affairs of revenue that it was difficult to separate them. Only a few confidential Tehsildars and private agents understood them: and in order to increase the difficulty, and conceal them the more effectually, the other Tehsildars were rapidly changed from district to district, or dismissed. Such a system could not be conducted without a constant correspondence between him and the Tehsildars; and, accordingly, there is reason to believe that more orders were written to them on his private than on the public affairs. They were so numerous, that he found it advisable to direct the Tehsildars to return his letters at the end of every month; and in cases of neglect, in this point, he threatened them with dismission. An authority so unlimited furnished him with the means of concealing or fabricating accounts at discretion; and since his suspension he has endeavoured, by bribery, to accomplish the same end, and most probably is still actively pursuing the same course.

111. We have now stated the extra collections and embezzlements, of all kinds, by the servants of the late Collector, as far as we have been able to ascertain them, from the information of the inhabitants and such documents as have fallen into our hands. The system by which the public servants were converted into private agents, and the public money every where employed in trade, involved the revenue accounts in so much confusion, that very little could be learned from them; and by the frequent dismissal or removal of Tehsildars from one district to another, the disorder was so much increased, that at last all the various extra collections, the balances of former years, and the receipts of current revenue, were mixed in one mass, and disbursements made from it without distinction under whatever head the demand was most pressing. Hence it is impossible to discover, without examining the Ryots themselves, what part of the balances reported outstanding are actually due by them; but there is reason to believe that it is very trifling, and that the rest has been collected and disbursed by the Potails and Tehsildars for private objects.

112. The revenue might, undoubtedly, in every year since the termination of the triennial lease, have equalled the Board of Revenue's estimate of Pagodas 5,50,000. Neither the drought, though considerable, nor the fires, nor the epidemic, assigned as causes of its fall, had any material share in keeping it down for so long a period as four years. None of the seasons were very bad, and some were ordinary ones; the fires were frequent, but not more so than sometimes occurs in other districts in dry seasons; the epidemic was partial, tial, and not more fatal than it often is in every district so extensive as Coimbatore. The returns of the casualties were not confined to those of the epidemic, but included all deaths from whatever cause, and formed, in fact, a complete bill of mortality. The number of deaths is stated at 22,451 in sixteen months, which in a population of 600,000 souls is no very unusual mortality.

113. The real causes of the decline of the revenue were the rigid exaction of the settlement in the last year of the triennial lease, from many of the poorer Ryots; the combination, in 1221 and 1222, to keep down the decennial lease by diminishing the cultivation, the parties and dissentions in villages occasioned by removing the Potails and selling their offices to others, the partiality in distributing the assessment of villages, the numerous private exactions and the singular and violent manner in which they were often levied. These exactions have been heavy, and of larger amount than is yet known. They will probably be found, whenever there is time to institute an inquiry respecting them among the Ryots, to exceed, by sixty or eighty thousand pagodas, the sum brought forward in the Curnum's account, No 8, Appendix A. It is true that, in many cases, the Ryots who paid them were allowed an abatement of rent in the ensuing year, but this seldom compensated for the inconvenience and loss with which the immediate exaction was frequently attended. But after making every allowance for such compensation, there is abundant reason to believe that at least one-third of all the Ryots in the province have paid private assessments, exclusive of their full rent, without any equivalent remission. The village Toties have suffered even more than the Ryots: those belonging to the northern division when paid in money seldom receive one-half, and since the order in 1809 for restoring to them their old service lands in lieu of pay, they have in general received nothing, for their pay has been stopped, and in place of their old land waste has been assigned to them. The restoration of their old service lands will reduce the revenue by a sum nearly equal to their whole rent; but no consideration of this kind ought to have any weight, in preventing so valuable a class of men from being reinstated in their hereditary possessions.

114. Besides the causes already noticed, the ravages of elephants and other wild animals have tended to diminish the revenue. In the district of Sattiamungul, land which yielded a revenue of above thirteen thousand pagodas when the country came under the Company's Government, is now lying waste. Elephants are now numerous in places where they were never seen before that period This arises from the great establishment formerly kept up for catching them for the service of the Mysoor army having been discontinued, from the numerous garrisons of Peons who repressed their inroads having been disbanded, and from the disarming the inhabitants as a measure of police.

115. Another cause from which the revenue has suffered, was the mode adopted in making up the decrease occasioned by lowering the survey assessment on the dry lands of the southern division of the province in fusly 1216. In that year the land under cultivation was 51,931 ballas, assessed at Pagodas 87,234: the assessment was reduced to Pagodas 54,902. In consequence of this reduction, the cultivation of 1217 is stated to have increased to Ballas 1,23,470, or Pagodas 1,17,079; and in 1218 to Ballas 1,36,563, or Pagodas 1,27,846.

116. The ordinary effect of a reduction of assessment is not all at once to produce a great increase of cultivation, but rather, in the first instance, to encourage the Ryots to bestow more pains on the cultivation of the land already under the plough, and then, from the means which they derive from more abundant crops, gradually to extend their cultivation. It is not to be imagined that any reduction of the assessment could, in a single year, increase the cultivation from 51,931 to 1,23,470 ballas. Had the land been given to the Ryots rent-free, they could not have found within the seasons either stock or labour to make such an extensive addition to their cultivation. The true explanation of this apparent increase, as given by the Ryots themselves, is, that when the assessment was lowered they were obliged to take waste to make up the deficiency, and to pay the full rent for that part of their own land which they kept for pasture, and which, by the custom of the country, paid only one-third or one fourth of the standard. Very little of this new land was cultivated the first year, except by some of the more substantial Ryots, and even they did not bring all that they occupied into cultivation for some years. Much of the rest never was cultivated, and as the rent was exacted from the Ryots, it has acted upon them rather as an increased than reduced assessment, and as they must be permitted to throw up this land, it will occasion some temporary diminution of revenue.

117. On the whole, the country is in a worse state than it was eight years ago; but the decay of its resources is not so great, as appears from the Revenue accounts of the last five years, nor such as a few years of attention may not restore. It is not at all surprising that it should have suffered, when it is considered how long it was under the controul of Cass Shitty. In 1219 his influence was complete. No person but himself and Gopaulliah, the moonshee, and a writer, were permitted to interfere in business: this exclusion extended even to the Serishtadar. Every appointment and removal was through Cass Shitty: he received money from every public servant, and peculated from every possible source; he traded in every thing where profit could be got, by employing authority and abusing confidence: he regarded the country as his shop, and its produce as destined for the benefit of his trade. This trade was carried on with the public money, through the agency of the public servants, and more letters seem to have been written by the Tehsildars about his private concerns than about the revenue. He was not satisfied with using the public servants merely to aid his own trade, but employed them to stop the trade of others; he was himself the principal contractor and dealer, under various names, in every article; and he has not done more mischief by his own peculations, than by instigating those of every Revenue servant in the country, far beyond what they ever thought of, and by rendering universal the practice of concealing and falsifying accounts.

118. Abuses so extensive, and requiring so many agents to carry them on, could not long remain undiscovered: they have, in fact, been perfectly well known for some years, and spoken of with very little reserve among the inhabitants. They were stated, both to the late Collector and to Government, by petition; but their very extravagance, then being so much beyond all ordinary transactions of the same nature, might have been the cause of their not being credited.

119. Arnachellum Moodely, a writer in the late Collector's cutcherry, in an address to him dated the 16th May 1810, states, that he had already informed him that Cass Shitty had committed embezzlements to the amount of about a lac of pagodas. It appears from an extract of the proceedings of the zillah court of Darrapooram, dated the 26th May 1810, that a petition had been presented by the Government vakeel, praying that Arnachellum Moodely and Cass Shitty might be summoned, and summary inquiry made into the charges of embezzlement, but that the court did not think they had any authority to make the summary inquiry demanded. At the time when this charge was made Cass Shitty had taken from the Treasury above Pagodas 20,002 8 41 for his own use.

120. In the proceedings of the zillah court of Coimbatore, dated 11th November 1813, a copy of a petition presented by Timmul Pilla, a native of that province, against Cass Shitty, is ordered to be transmitted to the Collector. This petition states distinctly every head of abuse which then existed: the exactions for lowering the settlement for the decennial lease, the embezzlements from the Treasury, from the sandal monopoly, from Cass Shitty's own villages, and profits from trade in ghee and other articles, and estimates the whole of these different heads at Pagodas 4,26,000.

121. It cannot be supposed that the sums specified are accurate, but they are as much so as could be expected without access to accounts: and the manner in which these frauds were carried on is so distinctly described, that had the slightest investigation been made at the time, the whole must have come to light. A petition containing nearly the same details by one "Samy "Chitty," and dated the 27th January 1814, was presented to the Governor in Council, Lieutenant General Abercromby, and soon after Timmul Pilla proceeded to Madras, and delivered to Government a petition, stating the amount of Cass Shitty's malversations at Pagodas 5,30,000: The increase of the sum in this petition, beyond that in his former one, arises from the embezzlements having been carried on during a longer period, but it still falls short of the truth.

122. The Board of Revenue gave repeated instructions to the Collector to inquire and report upon the subject of their petitions, and in their letter of the 30th May 1814 they express their desire that "he should hold out to the people his "anxiety to sift the conduct of each of the servants accused." This inquiry was, however, prevented by the bad health of the Collector, and by the discovery that the charges against Cass Shitty had been fabricated and presented by the instigation of a cabal of the zillah court servants; and as these servants were soon after brought to trial, by order of Government, for a conspiracy, the Collector deemed it proper to suspend all inquiry into the conduct of Cass Shitty, until it should be proved by the trial in court, whether the charges brought against him were the work of a conspiracy or not. The trial established the fact of its existence: but after all it was nothing more than a conspiracy to make men tell the truth. The court servants were at variance with those of the revenue, and as they saw that the Ryots were too timid to complain of the evils which they suffered, they had recourse to indirect means to promote their disclosure.

123. An examination of Tirmul Pilla, and of some inhabitants who accompanied him, induced the Board of Revenue to recommend an inquiry into the matter of his petition, and as he has been the principal, if not the sole instrument, in bringing forward to public notice the malversations of the Revenue servants in Coimbatore, we beg leave to recommend his being remunerated for his persevering exertions. Natives who, from whatever motive, undertake the task of exhibiting well-founded charges against the Revenue servants of a Collector for exactions and embezzlements, ought, even upon the principle of economy, to be amply rewarded, because such charges will never be received from the Ryots themselves.

124. It is well known that the great body of the Ryots will submit to extra assessments as long as they can pay them, rather than seek redress from the courts. The average rent of each individual is not ten pagodas, and it is easier for any one of them to pay five pagodas, or fifty per cent. more, than to leave his house and neglect his fields, in order to attend a court of justice. There cannot be a stronger proof in support of this observation than the occurrences in Coimbatore for some years past, where, though at least thirty thousand Ryots have paid extra assessments, and numbers been compelled to part with their sheep and cattle without any compensation, very few complaints have been preferred to the zillah court, though the Judge is acknowledged to be a most active and zealous public servant; and yet, in the space of a few months, the present Collector has received from the same Ryots some thousands of complaints.

125. When grievances become general, and are not attended to by the Collector, the Ryots are accustomed to quit their villages and remain assembled in large bodies during the day; but these assemblages, or "cootums" as they are called, are perfectly harmless; their only object is to shew that they feel themselves injured and want redress, and this is their ancient mode of making a general remonstrance. One of these assemblages took place in the year 1812, and was dispersed by the acting magistrate. Some of the police servants were found to have instigated it; but unless there had been real ground for complaint, their instigations would, most likely, have been unsuccessful, for the Ryots scarcely ever assemble except when pressed by some evil, such as general over-assessment or ill usage. When the "cootum" assemblage fails in its object, the Ryots usually have recourse to some public servant out of place, like Tirmul Pillah, whom they depute to represent their grievances to higher authority, and maintain, during his absence, by subscription.

126. When it is considered that the extra collections in Coimbatore have been going on for several years, that they have been paid by twenty-five or thirty thousand of the inhabitants, and that of all this number probably not twenty have ever sought redress from the courts, it is impossible to resist resist the conclusion, that our institutions are inefficient, and that the same abuses, to a greater or less extent, must prevail in every province under this Government.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

127. It is in vain to say that the courts are open, when the conduct of the Ryots, in not applying to them, shews that they regard them as shut. No argument to the contrary can have any weight, when opposed by the general feeling of the people. The opinion that the Ryots can be protected by the courts seems to be founded in a want of attention to their circumstances and their character. It has already been observed, that they will rather submit to injustice than seek redress from our tribunals. This is owing partly to the expense that must be incurred, but the same thing would happen were there no expense at all. The loss of time, and their habits, so little adapted to the waiting on legal forms, would keep them away. But even if, in every instance of extra assessment, the Ryots were to complain, the Judge could afford so little redress, compared with the magnitude of the mischief, that it would hardly prove any check to it, for in less time than he could get through one case, a hundred new ones might be provided for him. The decision of a cause necessarily requires time, but in one day the greater part of the Ryots of a village or a district may be compelled to pay an extra assessment by the order of a renter or a Tehsildar. If a Ryot complain and gain his suit, the renter pays the cost, and three times the amount of the illegal exactions; but this does not affect him, he makes the village pay his damages, and the family of the complainant, perhaps, a larger share than the rest.

128. The idea that these oppressions can be diminished by the courts might have some foundation, if the state of society in Indian villages in any way resembled that which is found among the nations of Europe, or if the Ryot would, like the farmer of England, resist any demand beyond his fair rent. But this is so far from being the character of the Ryot, that though he sometimes clamours, he seldom resists exaction, but goes on paying one extra tax after another, till he has nothing more to give. His submission is the effect of long habit, and arose at first from the authority exercised over him by the head of the village, and has more recently been confirmed by his perceiving how insignificant the power of the courts to protect him is, in comparison with that of the renter or Revenue servant to injure him.

129. In villages where the Ryots are substantial and nearly equal in circumstances, or where the population is composed principally of Bramins or Mahomedans, extra collections are less frequent; but notwithstanding these exceptions, the description just now given is applicable to the condition of the Ryots in nearly the whole of the territories under the Madras Government.

130. The renter of a village or the Tehsildar of a district may levy impost upon impost from the Ryots, reduce them to poverty, and diminish the revenue. There is no power in the state that can prevent him. If he does not more frequently avail himself of the means in his hands to oppress the Ryots, it is not in consequence of the operation of our laws, but of causes entirely unconnected with them. He is restrained by the fear of eventually ruining his own fortune by the impoverishment of the Ryots, by motives of humanity, and sometimes by a regard for his character.

131. Previous to the introduction of the Judicial code, the Ryots were not left entirely to the mercy of the personal character of their immediate superior: the Collector had authority to inquire into all undue exactions without waiting for complaints, and to collect and repay the amount to each individual, without any other process than a short verbal examination. This is the way in which all native governments endeavour to hinder extra collections, and it is the only one by which they can be kept within bounds, under our own.

132. If such authority were vested in the Collector, it is evident that he could afford to redress the Ryots at once; that he could in one day, when the inhabitants of a village were assembled, and the Curnum was present with his accounts, settle all claims respecting over-assessment, and that instead of every Ryot who demanded justice being obliged to enter a suit, it would only be necessary for the renter or proprietor to bring a suit against the Collector, if he had been made to refund unjustly. It is not likely that a Collector would often be found to enter into a troublesome investigation, in order to cause money to be refunded to Ryots who had no just claim to it. But even if the case did sometimes occur, a renter or proprietor of an estate is much better able to seek redress in the courts against the Collector, than the Ryot is against him; and the business of justice is comprehended in one suit preferred by the renter, instead of one or two hundred by the Ryots.

133. Instead, however, of giving to the Collector this power, by which alone the Ryots can be secured in their properties, we open to them courts to which they will not go; and in addition to placing them in such a situation as to exclude them from redress, we have increased the facility of oppressing them by the servant Regulation. When the Collector could dismiss his servants at discretion, he was not always able to restrain their abuses. But instant dismissal, the only check he had upon them, is taken away by this Regulation. He may suspend them, it is true; but he cannot do more, without the sanction of the Board of Revenue. Their influence among the Ryots, and their means of committing malversations, have grown up in proportion as their removal from employments has been rendered more difficult; and as their pay has been lessened within these few years, their temptations to dishonesty are augmented while they are fixed firmer in office.

134. The only effectual remedies for these disorders are to increase the pay of the higher classes of native Revenue servants, to repeal the servant Regulation as far as it regards the Revenue department, and to empower the Collector to investigate and determine all cases of extra collection and embezzlement, and to recover the amount by summary process.

135. The prohibition of distraint, without the permission of the Collector, as recommended by the Honourable Court of Directors, will go a great way in securing the Ryots and under-farmers from unjust demands. But as undue exactions can often be carried to a great length without having recourse to distraint, it is obvious that, in order to prevent them, a more ample jurisdiction must be given to the Collector.

136. The present system, as exemplified in the transactions in Coimbatore, renders the oppression of the inhabitants, and the embezzlement of the public revenue so easy, that unless it is considerably modified, it must gradually waste the resources of the state. It is true, that a fertile country enjoying uninterrupted peace may long resist the pressure of many unfavourable circumstances, without decline; but it would be unreasonable to expect that it could ever make any general and material progress in improvement, while the great body of the Ryots, on whom its prosperity depends, and from whom all our revenue is drawn, is virtually out of the protection of the law.

137. It was not our intention to have taken any notice of the customs, because an investigation of the abuses in them could not have been made, without interrupting more important matters, and occupying more time than all our other inquiries. It was also foreseen, that as all the principal servants of the department had absconded with their accounts, the investigation could only proceed at intervals, according as the accounts or servants might be found, or as traders now absent might return and be examined as to the duties they had paid; and it was therefore deemed most advisable to leave the inquiry to be pursued at leisure by the Collector.

138. During a period of a few days, however, that we remained at Colliagal, waiting while the papers connected with this report were copying, a short examination was made of the management of the customs in that district, and the result proved, as was expected, that abuses prevailed in as great a degree in that as in the other branches of revenue. Cass Shitty followed the same plan for concealing the custom accounts as had been observed with regard to those of the tobacco monopoly and tank repairs. He removed them from the controul of the Tehsildars of districts and placed them under a separate department, at the head of which was a Tehsildar of customs, who resided with him at the Collector's cutcherry, and was governed in every thing by his orders.

139. He appointed the servants to every chokie or station in the country. They were usually strangers from the Carnatic, and after they had answered his purpose purpose for a few months they were dismissed, with a view to hinder any connected information from being obtained by future inquiry. Some of them, who were more immediately connected with himself, were suffered to remain longer, and among these was Sunjevee Shitty the husband of his wife's sister.

Report from Commissioners in Coimbatore, 26 Feb. 1816.

140. This man was appointed, in February 1812, to the management of one of the three custom chokies in Colliagal, and in September 1813 the whole were placed under him. He absconded with his accounts in September last, but had previously embezzled the following sums.

	Pagodas.	F.	C.
Customs of bazars and villages privately rented	512	3	34
Taxes on betel gardens collected, Pagodas 288; embezzled	204	0	0
From customs on cloth, by concealing the produce of all the finer sorts	719	31	0
Taxes on the looms of Pariars not entered in the accounts	857	6	34
Receipts from the private renters of seven bye-roads	411	19	18
Extra collections at the Talwaddee chokie, at the rate of three-quarters of a rupee on each bullock-load of ghee, and one rupee on each bullock-load of cloth	1,714	12	68
Extra collections on account of Cass Shitty's silver bull intended to be given to the pagoda at Trinomala	463	10	34
Bribe from the oil-dealers for remitting the tax on oil-seed	37	35	65
Pagodas	5,019	29	13

141. It appears that at the chokies of Hunnoor and the Cusbah an extra duty was levied of half a rupee on each bullock-load of ghee. The amount cannot be ascertained until the Collector returns to Bhowani and examines the rowannahs (or passes); but it is supposed that it will not be less than Pagodas 2,000. The whole of Sunjevee Shitty's embezzlements, therefore, from one chokie, for a period of two years and five months, and from the other two for a period of two years, will amount to about Pagodas 7,000; and as the Government receipts from the same chokies, for the whole time of four years, have been only Pagodas 8,022 11 75, his receipts in equal times have been greater than those of Government.

142. There is too much reason to believe that the frauds in all the chokies throughout the collectorate have been nearly in the same proportion, and that the malversations which have been shewn to have been committed in every other department have also prevailed to a great extent in that of the Dewestan or Pagoda establishment. But as many of the accounts have been destroyed or concealed, and as many of the servants employed are absent, some months at least must elapse before the Collector can possibly procure a tolerably accurate account of the embezzlements in the customs and the Dewestan.

143. It is not, however, only to these, but to all other heads of embezzlement, that the Collectors inquiries must still for a considerable time be directed. Much yet remains to be ascertained in the tank repairs, in the tobacco monopoly, and in the extra collections.

144. A full investigation of the tank repairs will, we have no doubt, prove that though Cass Shitty did not venture, previous to fusily 1218, to take openly in the Treasury for his private use the money destined for that object, he yet received the greater part of it privately from the Superintendants of Repairs to whom it was issued. A tedious examination must also be gone through of all the suspended Tehsildars and other Revenue servants, in the presence of the Curnums and Potails, in order to discover what portion of the extra collections they have respectively received; and when it is recollected, that in addition to all this, the whole of the revenue management has long exhibited a scene of the most perfect confusion, another year, at least, must pass, before it can be expected that any thing like order can be re-established.

EXTRACT FORT ST. GEORGE REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,

The 13th September 1816.

The President records the following minute:

President's Minute 12 Sep 1816.

I have to express my regret, that various important and intricate subjects which have lately been before Government, and have engaged a great portion of my time and attention, have prevented me from bringing sooner under the particular consideration of the Board the report which was received from the Commission appointed to investigate the system of fraud and mismanagement, that has produced such injurious consequences in the district of Coimbatore.

The Commission have not given any opinion, nor examined the extent to which the late Collector of Coimbatore (Mr. William Garrow) has been implicated in the corruption of his servant, Cass Shitty, further than by negligence in the controul of the department, or through inability arising from the effects of long protracted indisposition, which finally proved fatal. The investigation of this part of the subject, however, appears to me to be highly important, not only to the justification of the character of Mr. Garrow, if he was innocent, but also to the honour and best interests of the service.

The report of the Commission has been transmitted to the Board of Revenue, in order that they might be enabled to adopt the measures necessary towards checking the abuses which prevailed; and I now propose that, previous to any further proceedings on the part of Government, that Board be called upon to furnish, for our information, their observations upon the report of the Commissioners, and their opinion respecting the measures best calculated to promote the ends of justice, to recover the property which may have been embezzled, and to secure the interests of the Company.

Fort St. George, (Signed) H. ELLIOT,
12th Sept. 1816. Ect Council.

Approved and ordered accordingly.

Ordered, in consequence, That the following letter be dispatched to the Board of Revenue.

To the President and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

Letter to Board of Revenue, 13 Sep. 1816.

The report received from the Commission appointed to investigate the system of fraud and mismanagement, which has produced such injurious consequences in the district of Coimbatore, was communicated for your information, under date the 10th May last. From it you will have perceived that the Commission have not given any opinion, nor gone into any examination, as to the extent to which the late Collector of Coimbatore, Mr. William Garrow, has been implicated in the corruption of his servant, Cass Shitty, further than by negligence in the control of the department, or through inability, arising from long protracted indisposition, which finally proved fatal. The investigation of this part of the subject, however, appears to the Governor in Council to be highly important, not only to the justification of the character of Mr. Garrow, if he were innocent, but also to the honour and best interests of the service. With this view you will furnish your observations on the report of the Commission, and your opinion respecting the measures best calculated to promote the ends of justice, to recover the property which may have been embezzled, and to secure the interests of the Company.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Fort St George, (Signed) D. HILL,
13th September 1816. Secretary to Government.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to FORT ST. GEORGE,

Dated the 22d May 1818.

Letter from, dated 5th January 1816. (Par. 144 to 149.) Refer to proceedings connected with the discovery of extensive abuses in the district of Coimbatore.

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 22 May 1818.

Par. 85. We have perused, with the deepest concern, the proceedings referred to in these paragraphs, as well as the report (transmitted in your subsequent letter of the 26th September 1816) of the Special Commission, consisting of Colonel Thomas Munro and Mr. John Sullivan, which you very properly appointed, in September 1815, to examine into the state of the district of Coimbatore.

86. The report of the Commissioners, bearing date the 26th of February 1816, discloses a scene of malversation, fraud, and embezzlement, which, we trust, stands unparalleled in the annals of British India. As that document, however, was not referred by you to the Board of Revenue until the 12th September 1816, a period of no less than six months after it had been submitted to you, and as we have not even yet received the report which you then required that Board to furnish, containing the result of their investigation as to what extent the late Collector of Coimbatore may have been implicated in the corruption of his servant Causey Chitty, together with their opinion respecting the measures best calculated to promote the ends of justice, to recover the property which may have been embezzled, and to secure the interests of the Company, we shall, though not without much reluctance, postpone our observations upon the proceedings connected with these painful transactions, until that report, which we have expected for some time past, shall arrive. We are the more especially led to adopt this course, because there are some parts of the proceedings of the Board, connected with the frauds in Coimbatore, which seem to stand much in need of explanation, and because we cannot doubt that the Board will itself feel the necessity of anticipating a formal requisition from us to that effect.

87. We cannot, however, defer calling your particular attention to the sentiments contained in paragraphs 124 to 136 of the valuable and important report of the Commissioners, respecting the inefficiency of your present Regulations for the prevention and detection of abuses, and for the protection of our native subjects. This position, unfortunately, does not rest exclusively upon the scenes of fraud, corruption and oppression, which are exhibited in the report of the Coimbatore Commissioners. We have recently had under our review, in the Judicial Department, the flagrant acts of extortion which have been perpetrated by the servants of the zillah court in the district of Canara; and the following extract from the letter which was addressed to you by the Board of Revenue, on the 11th of December 1815, clearly shows that the evil has not been confined to one or two provinces, but that it is extensively prevalent throughout the territories subject to your Government. "It has, of late, "too frequently been our unpleasant duty to bring to the notice of the Right "Honourable the Governor in Council numerous instances of extensive em- "bezzlements, repeated malversations, and fraudulent combinations, on the "part of the native servants employed in the administration of the various "branches of the revenue entrusted to our management; and it is with deep "regret we confess, that there are not many districts under the presidency of "Fort St. George which have not, within these few years past, afforded the "most lamentable proofs of the prevalence of abuses in this department of our "native agency. The late bold and extensive embezzlements in the provinces "of Coimbatore and Malabar, the considerable frauds on the cash chests at "Malabar, Masulipatam, and Guntoor, the general and organized system of "corruption in the southern division of Arcot, the abuses at Nellore and Gun- "toor in the salt department, and at Coimbatore and Cuddapah in the customs, "and the corrupt practices of two successive head native servants in the Jag- "hire, not to enumerate the many inferior abuses which are daily brought to "our notice, too amply prove that extensive abuses are practised by the native "servants in every branch of the revenue department, and that the arrange- "ments at present in force are totally inefficient for the prevention and punish- "ment of these grave offences, no less prejudicial in their consequences to the "revenues

Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 22 May 1818.

"revenues of the state, than productive of the most serious injury to the "morals of the people."

88. The notoriety of these abuses induced your Revenue Board, so far back as the 22d October 1813, to refer, for the consideration and report of the several Collectors, the outline of a new Regulation for the detection and punishment of frauds committed by the native revenue servants of Government, and those connected with them. The reports of the Collectors, pursuant to that reference, were transmitted to the Board in the end of 1813, and the beginning of the following year. The Regulation, however, was not submitted to you by the Board of Revenue until December 1815. In March 1816, it was sent by you to the Sudder Adawlut for revision, and it does not appear to have been promulgated in January 1817, the date of your last general dispatch.

89. Considering the urgent necessity which unquestionably existed for applying a remedy to an evil, confessed to be so fatally prevalent, and which affected the character and the revenues of Government no less than the security of the people and the resources of the country, it is with no small concern we find that, from causes which yet remain unexplained, a period of more than three years should have elapsed, and that legislative measures for its suppression are still only in preparation.

90. The Coimbatore Commissioners have declared their opinion, that "the only effectual remedies for these disorders are, to increase the pay of the "higher classes of native Revenue servants; to repeal the servant Regulation, "as far as it regards the Revenue department; and to empower the Collector "to investigate and determine all cases of extra-collection and embezzlement, "and to recover the amount by summary process.

91. We observe, from paragraphs 123 and 124 of your letter in this department, dated the 10th January 1817, that your attention has been drawn by the Board of Revenue* to the means of more effectually securing and rewarding the fidelity of your native servants, by the establishment of seminaries for their education, by increasing the allowances of Sheristadars, by conferring honorary distinctions and shotriums on Revenue servants of distinguished merit, by incorporating a pension fund for superannuated servants with the present fund for the families of servants deceased, and by allowing a certain commission to the native managers in the salt and sayer departments, on the amount of their collections.

92. The prevention of crime must undoubtedly be regarded by every humane and enlightened Government as an object much more desirable than its detection and punishment; and we approve the policy of stimulating men to an upright discharge of their duty by adequate pay, by the hope of reward, and by liberally remunerating those who have been distinguished by faithful and zealous exertion in the public service. We are sensible, moreover, that, under our Government, few offices of considerable emolument are open to the natives.

93. The establishment of seminaries for the education of natives, particularly Bramins, as public servants, with the view of improving their moral principles, and attaching them to Government, is a measure which we agree with you in thinking well worthy of a trial on a limited scale, so that no permanent expense shall be entailed upon the Government in the event of its failure; and we sincerely regret that the lamented death of Mr. Ross (with whom the suggestion originated, and to whose valuable services the records of your Government bear ample testimony) should have defeated your intention of causing an experiment of its practical effects to be made under his superintendence. We trust, however, that the matter will not be allowed to drop, and we look forward with interest to the result of the reference which you have made to the College Board upon the subject.

94. We know not how far it may be practicable to find natives of character and education in the different districts, capable and willing to undertake the office of instructing young men in the principles of morals, and in various branches branches of useful knowlege; but if it should, upon inquiry, be found that the establishment of seminaries would be facilitated by annexing shotriums to them in aid of the teachers, we should not, considering the importance of the object in view, be averse to the appropriation of small grants of rent-free land for that purpose. A few grants of this description would not, we apprehend, be felt as a very serious burthen upon the revenues of the country, whilst the funds arising from them, in addition to a moderate fee from the pupils, might operate as an inducement with persons of respectability to devote themselves to the instruction of such as might be disposed to avail themselves of it. It will not, however, be advisable to make any permanent endowment of this sort in the first instance; and even should the suggestion appear, upon trial, to be worthy of larger experiment, suitable precautions must be taken to prevent these establishments from becoming sinecures, and thus degenerating into useless incumbrances. Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 22 May 1818.

95. Respecting the allowances to Sheristadars, which you have sanctioned on an increased scale, ascending from Star Pagodas 80 to Star Pagodas 200, and graduated according to their length of service, the former scale having risen from Star Pagodas 60 to Star Pagodas 125 per mensem, we cannot help remarking, that the highest rate of allowance on the Bengal establishment to a Sheristadar is one hundred, and of a Tehsildar two hundred and fifty rupees per mensem.

96. It is easy to believe, that where there are strong temptations to fraud, and particularly where the probable gain from a breach of trust is great, the most liberal allowances will, in the absence of moral principle and rigid controul, prove but a feeble check upon its commission. The largest salary, for example, would have little influence in restraining the cupidity of a man like Causey Chitty, who (according to the report of the Commissioners) was suffered to plunder a single district of six lacs of pagodas in the course of seven years; or the common custom-house officer at a petty chokey in Coimbatore, who (according to the report of the Board of Revenue) carried to the account of Government only nineteen pagodas out of four hundred and twenty, which he had levied as customs; or another person of a similar description in Cuddapah, who is stated (on the same authority) to have oftener than once defrauded the Government of nearly three hundred pagodas per diem. We are at the same time perfectly aware, that temptation may be expected to operate much more powerfully upon a person who is barely possessed of the legitimate means of obtaining a scanty subsistence, than it will upon one more fortunately situated; and we think that the inadequate payment of those who have any trust reposed in them tends to destroy the principle of honesty, and to tempt to the pursuit of illicit gain. In fixing, however, the emoluments of public officers, regard should be had, not only to what the state can afford to pay, but also to the wants and habits of those employed in its service. An allowance which would be inadequate to the maintenance of an European, may be amply sufficient, not merely for the subsistence, but for the comfort of a native of India. The wants of the latter are few, and easily supplied; and though the native officers, in whom important trusts are vested, should be enabled to support themselves and families in comfort and respectability, and should also have the means of laying up property, yet with reference to their frequently improvident habits, we consider it at least as desirable that some provision should be made for them when they retire from active life, and for their families after their decease.

97. These are our sentiments, generally, upon the subject; and as we presume that you have graduated the proposed remuneration to Sheristadars on as moderate a scale as was consistent with the laudable object you had in view, we shall not withhold our assent to this part of the arrangement, subject however to a certain modification. We think, considering the importance of this subject, that your proposition should not have been carried into effect without having been first submitted to us for our sanction; and we must add, that if it shall afterwards appear to be attended with a greater expense than you have led us to anticipate, we shall probably deem it necessary to direct you to reconsider it. The increase of charge which may be occasioned by it you will report for our information. The modification which we prescribe is, that the Sheristadars, who are now divided into five distinct classes, shall not, at the expiration of a certain certain term of service, succeed, as matter of course, to the next higher rate of allowance, but that their succession shall depend entirely upon the testimonials of the Collectors as to their official conduct; and in cases where these testimonials do not prove perfectly satisfactory, that promotion shall be stopped. We likewise direct, that in no case a shotrium be granted until our permission be previously obtained; and that when any recommendation is submitted to us, it shall be accompanied with a particular report of the services rendered by the person on whom it may be proposed to confer this special mark of favour, and with ample testimonies to his character and good conduct, as well as with an accurate statement of the value of the land, and the deduction in the jumma which may be recommended in favour of the claimant. We, of course, intend that the shotriums should be, in all cases, limited to one, two, or three lives, at the most; and care must be taken that they be resumed at the expiration of the original terms of the grants.

98. With respect to grants of honorary distinction to head native servants of distinguished merit, we think that the suggestion deserves further consideration. In 1801, a circular letter was addressed by the Governor-General to the Judges and Magistrates under the presidency of Fort William, accompanied with a list of queries, of which the following was one: "Are you of opinion "that it would contribute to strengthen the attachment of the natives to the "British Government in India, were that Government to declare itself to be the "sole source of honour within its territories, and confer titles and other marks "of distinction on its native subjects." In looking over the answers which were returned to this question, we find that, with two or three exceptions, they were decidedly favourable to the measures therein proposed. We are not prepared to give a decided opinion upon the subject, but we think it advisable that you should collect the sentiments of your judicial and revenue functionaries, both as to the estimation in which marks of honour, if conferred by the British Government, are likely to be held by the native community, and the sort of distinction which would be most acceptable to their feelings.

99. The incorporation of a pension fund for superannuated servants with the present fund for the families of servants deceased, appears to us a very desirable measure: but as this proposal has been referred to the Committee for managing the present native pension fund, we shall defer making any further observation upon it, until we are put in possession of their report.

100. To the proposition of the Revenue Board for allowing a certain commission to the native managers in the Salt and Sayer departments on the amount of their collections, we cannot assent, on account of the objections we feel to that novel mode of remunerating native servants. We perfectly agree with you, that the end in view will be answered by "bringing the salt and sayer "collections, as much as possible, under the observation of some head native "servant, with an allowance adequate to his responsibility."

101. There is one point upon which we most decidedly differ in opinion, both with you and the Board of Revenue, viz. that all vacancies in the superior situations in the Revenue department shall be supplied from among the persons already employed in that department. Where there is a competition of claims between strangers and persons actually employed in the Revenue department for the higher situations in that line of the service, and where the candidates are supposed to be of equal merit, we have no hesitation in saying that preference should be given to those already employed. But we are satisfied that we should ill consult the public interests, were we to limit, by regulation, the number of those eligible to offices of trust, to exclude competition for employment, and, in fact, to grant a monopoly of an important branch of the service to one particular class: we positively direct, therefore, if any rule to this effect shall have been laid down by you, that it be immediately rescinded.

102. You will also have perceived, from our late dispatches in the Revenue and Judicial departments, that we are by no means prepared to concur in the sentiments expressed in the twenty-ninth paragraph of the report of your Board of Revenue, respecting the advantages which have been derived, or which may result from the restrictive provisions of Regulation I. of 1809, even under the modifications which were applied to them by Regulation V. of 1811. "The "evils

"evils arising from a contrary system," the Board observe, "appear to have "led to the promulgation of the first-mentioned Regulation." The Board should, at all events, have stated what those evils were, and whether they were to be compared, in point either of magnitude or frequency, with those which have unhappily prevailed since the provisions of Regulation XII. of 1802, and II. of 1803, vesting Judges and Collectors with the power of appointing and removing their native servants, were repealed. We have in vain searched the records of your Government for any grounds of that repeal, other than those alleged in the preamble to Regulation I. of 1809, where it is made to rest, not on the evils which had arisen from a contrary system, but purely upon the assumption, that benefit would result from multiplying checks upon the removal of the native servants from the offices to which they are appointed. We know, on the other hand, that since these checks were imposed, "the department of "native agency under your Government has," to quote the words of your Revenue Board, "been disgraced by the most artful intrigues, corrupt compacts, "daring embezzlements, hardy frauds, and shameless perjuries." We know, also, that the feelings of independence, which the native servants have acquired, have made them indifferent to the approbation, and, in cases of detected villainy, has led them to set the authority of their immediate superiors at defiance; we therefore repeat the instructions which were conveyed to you in our Judicial dispatch, dated 25th March 1818. Revenue Letter to Fort St. George, 22 May 1818.

103. The last point to which we would draw your attention, is one to which the Coimbatore Commissioners most justly attach great importance, and which they have illustrated by striking facts and powerful arguments, viz. empowering Collectors to investigate and determine all cases of extra collection and embezzlement, and to recover the amount by summary process.

104. In paragraphs 68 to 81 of our Judicial dispatch to Bengal (a copy of which has been transmitted to you), we stated the reasons why we were disposed to concur with the Government-General, as to the expediency of employing Collectors, and those engaged in that line of the service, in the settlement of disputes, respecting land-rent, between Zemindars and their under-tenants, and between the latter and their Ryots, and respecting complaints of undue exactions on the part of the two last description of persons. Since that dispatch was written, we have received advices from Bengal, by which it appears, much to our satisfaction, that the Government of Fort William has issued instructions for the re-establishment of Mal Adawluts, and that measures are actually in train for that purpose. The proposed constitution of this office has not yet been brought before us, but from the avowed sentiments of that Government, as well as of our most able and experienced servants both revenue and judicial, we have no doubt whatever that it will embrace the object which the Coimbatore Commission had in view in the concluding part of their report. Indeed, if Collectors are to have the power (which is now acknowledged, on all hands, in Bengal, to be indispensable) of granting redress to Ryots, in cases of over-exaction on the part of Zemindars and their under-renters, we see no good reason why the power should be withheld from them, of taking cognizance of complaints for undue exactions on the part of their official servants: we feel no hesitation, therefore, in directing you, without any delay, to frame a Regulation in conformity with the sentiments which we have just expressed.

EXTRACT PROCEEDINGS of the BOARD of REVENUE,
The 29th December 1817.

To the Chief Secretary to Government.

SIR:

With reference to the letter from Government of the 13th September 1816, I am directed by the President and Members of the Board of Revenue to submit, for the consideration and orders of the Right Honourable the Governor in Council, the enclosed extract from their proceedings, under this day's date, on the report of the Commissioners in Coimbatore. Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
(Signed) A. D. CAMPBELL,
Secretary.

Fort St. George,
29th December 1817.

Extract from the Proceedings of the Board of Revenue, under date the 29th December 1817.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

Read again the letter from the Secretary to Government in the Revenue Department, under date the 13th September 1816.

Par. 1. The Board of Revenue, under date the 29th of June, the 4th, 18th, 21st, 28th, and 30th September 1815, and the 7th March, 11th April, and 11th July 1816, addressed various letters to the Government, on the subject of the complaints preferred against the late Mr. William Garrow, Collector in Coimbatore, the cash-keeper, Cass Shitty, and others of his public native servants. To this communication the Board did not receive any immediate reply; but, on the 10th of May 1816, a printed copy of the report of the Coimbatore Commission was transmitted by Government, for the information of the Board; and more recently, viz. on the 13th September 1816, in consequence of the Commission appointed to investigate the abuses alleged to have been committed in Coimbatore " not having given any opinion, nor gone " into any examination, as to the extent to which the late Collector of Coim- " batore, Mr. William Garrow, has been implicated in the corruption of his " servant Cass Shitty, further than by negligence in the control of the de- " partment, or through inability, arising from protracted indisposition, which " finally proved fatal." The Board were required to state, first, " the extent " to which the late Collector, Mr. William Garrow, had been implicated in the " corruption of his servant, Cass Shitty;" and secondly, with reference to the report of the Commission, to submit their " opinion respecting the " measures best calculated to promote the ends of justice, to recover the pro- " perty which may have been embezzled, and to secure the interests of the " Company."

2. With respect to the first branch of the subject, viz. the degree in which Mr. William Garrow may have been implicated in the corruption of Cass Shitty, the Board remark, that in an early stage of the proceedings they considered it to be their duty to inquire into the point. In their letter to Mr. Sullivan, under date the 18th September 1815 (of which a copy was transmitted to Government on the 21st of that month, containing instructions for Mr. Sullivan on taking charge of the Coimbatore district), the Board adverted particularly to a letter which had been discovered to have been written by Cass Shitty to one of the Tehsildars, in which he ordered the Tehsildar to write to him only " on the private business of the gentleman;" and in directing Mr. Sullivan's attention to this letter, the Board stated that they could not, consistently with their public duty, pass over a passage of such a nature, tending to implicate the late Collector in the improper transactions of Cass Shitty, considering, as they did, the explanation was due no less to public justice than to the memory of the deceased. They accordingly desired that Annaviah (the Tehsildar written to by Cass Shitty), and any other acquainted with these transactions, should be strictly interrogated on this point. " If," the Board observe, " the late Mr. William Garrow was ignorant of the mal-practices of his servants, " it is due to his memory that the fact should be established; if otherwise, itis " both your duty and that of the Board to ascertain the fact." In a subsequent letter addressed to Mr. Sullivan,* under date the 28th September 1815, was a passage to the following effect: " It is also of consequence, that the " accusations affecting the late Collector, which the Board remark are repeated " in the confession of the Sheristadar, should be thoroughly sifted. All this " can be affected only by a detailed examination of the persons, first duly sworn " to speak the truth, who paid, collected, and conveyed the extra-collections " in question to the public servants." This inquiry should be commenced as soon as possible, and should be conducted by your assistant, until further orders of Government shall be received.

3. It does not appear that any reply was made by Mr. Sullivan to the last-mentioned orders of the Board, probably because the Board's functions, as far as the inquiry went, were superseded by the orders of Government of the 29th September 1815:† but Mr. Sullivan, in a letter dated on that day (in answer answer to the Board's preceding instructions of the 18th September) observed, "I have gone through the ungracious duty which the Board devolved upon "me, by interrogating the Tehsildar of Parendore The Board will be happy "to see, from the answers to the two questions which I put to him, that no "stain can attach to Mr. Garrow's memory. I know that no integrity or vigi- "lance is sufficient to shelter a Collector from the calumnies of his servants. "I feel convinced, that most of Mr. Garrow's were urged, by every motive "that can influence the human mind, to implicate his name, as much as might "be possible, in their own infamous transactions, and that Mr. Garrow's "friends were necessarily deprived of those means which he, if alive, would "have used, to demonstrate the falsehood of the charges." Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

* End of paragraph 7.

† The Commissioners began their inquiries on the 20th October 1815, under instructions from Government of the 29th September 1815.

4. It is to be regretted that Mr. Sullivan did not enter more fully into this branch of the investigation; and that when his inquiries, as Collector, were superseded by those of the Commission (of which he was soon afterwards nominated a member), a point which the Government have justly considered as no less important to the justification of Mr. William Garrow's conduct, if he were innocent, than to the honour and best interests of the service, should have been either neglected or entirely overlooked. This is the more extraordinary, as the Board had enjoined the Collector to sift the matter "thoroughly:" a duty which ought to have been executed, either by him, after the Commission had closed, or by the Commission during its continuance.

5. The examinations taken at the Board of the persons deputed to complain, must have shewn the Commissioners that the Board considered it an essential part of the inquiry to ascertain the guilt or innocence of the Collector.

6. It was unquestionably the intention of the Board, that this material point in an inquiry of the nature of that carried on in Coimbatore should not have been passed over, and it is obvious that the execution of the orders by the Collector, at the time, would have been attended with less difficulty than the execution of the orders of Government at present by the Board, with no other materials before them than such as are to be gathered from an examination of the report of the Commissioners.

7. This subject will be resumed in the subsequent part of these proceedings.

8. The Commissioners commence their report by dividing the embezzlements in Coimbatore into two kinds: "the embezzlements in the Treasury," and the abuses committed in the districts.

9. In paragraph 105 of their report, the Commission sum up the "extra col- "lections from the inhabitants" and "the embezzlements of the public ser- "vants," and give the "following as the amount of each of the principal "heads."

12. Having given this abstract view of the general result of the Commissioner's report, the Board proceed to examine separately each head of embezzlement, affording in the first instance a few general observations on the manner in which the evidence appears to have been procured or taken by the Commissioners.

13. With regard to the embezzlements in the Treasury, to the extent of Pagodas 2,14,010 30 40, as shewn above, it is remarked by the Commissioners, that Mr. Sullivan took charge of the district on the 12th September 1815, and in less than a " month substantiated" all the embezzlements in the Treasury, " and that therefore nothing remained to be done on this head but to examine " a few additional witnesses, respecting the truth of the statements which had " been given in." They then proceed, from paragraph 14 to paragraph 64 B* of their report, to explain the nature and amount of the embezzlements in that department, for the whole of which, with the exception of a small sum of Pagodas 2,493 35 62 on account of tank repairs, they consider Cass Shitty, the late cash-keeper, to be answerable, and debit him accordingly with the amount.

14. The extra collections and embezzlements in the districts, which are stated by the Commissioners at Pagodas 3,79,858 24 33, had not, at this time, been investigated by the Collectors. The whole of the Tehsildars, however, had been suspended, and new ones appointed by that officer; and the Commissioners immediately deputed from five to ten new temporary servants, termed Gomashtas, such as are usually employed in keeping accounts, to assist these new Tehsildars " in making out the ryotwar accounts of regular and unau- " thorized collections." Two separate new and temporary Gomashtas were also sent to each of these new Tehsildars, for the exclusive purpose of preparing accounts connected with the tobacco department; and " one or two " Gomashtas" only were sent " to particular villages, where there was reason " to believe that the extra collections had been unusually heavy, in order to " take the account of them from the Ryots themselves on the spot." This having been done, the Gomashtas' accounts of the three talooks only, viz. Andore,

* Two paragraphs are numbered 64 in the report.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

Andore, Parundory, and Coimbatore, were "examined immediately" by the Commissioners; the rest were left to be examined by the newly-appointed Tehsildars. The Commissioners further add, that though "the accounts "were what are called Ryotwar, they were not checked by comparing them "on the spot, in the villages, with the reports of the Ryots," as it was thought that, without this, "enough could be learned to answer all the objects of the "Commission."

15. The Board are not, perhaps, correctly informed respecting the precise object of the Commission; but if the recovery of "money embezzled" or the restoration of "extra collections" to the persons from whom they were exacted were amongst those objects (and from the proceedings instituted against Cass Shitty this would appear to have been the case), it was certainly necessary that they should prove the correctness of the accounts on which they proceeded, and even ascertain all individual payments. But, in the opinion of the Commissioners, the investigation would have run to an inconvenient length, had they superintended personally the accounts of every district. By the arrangements they adopted, "it was intended that the accounts of all the "districts should be ready nearly at the same time, and at so early a date as "would afford leisure to the Commission to reserve and correct them when "they might be found defective."

16. With regard to the district embezzlements, the Board are unable to discover that the accounts taken were ever verified, except in a few particular instances, and to a very confined extent. The nature of the examination of the accounts of the three districts named above, "immediately by the Commis-"sioners," is not explained, and it is doubtful whether the individuals who paid the money were called before the Commissioners for examination vivâ-voce. The depositions of a few inhabitants and Curnums only are given, in the appendix to the report, on the subject of "extra collections."

17. The manner in which the accounts of the extra collections were compiled is described by the Commissioners in paragraphs 6, 7, 8, and 9. In the last-mentioned paragraph they state that "the Curnums and heads of villages "of each district were assembled at the district cutcherry. The accounts of "the Collections were drawn up from the Curnums' accounts, and the informa-"tion of heads of villages and of principal Ryots, who, in almost every "village, gave in statements of extra assessments. While these accounts were "preparing, and the inquiries suggested by them were going forward, separate "investigations relative to the tobacco monopoly, and the restriction laid on "the trade of ghee and other articles by Cass Shitty, were at the same "time carried on by the Commission."

18. In this stage of the proceedings, it is natural to remark that the Commissioners, in paragraph 67, "desire to be remembered, that the Curnums' "accounts, from which the statements referred to have been framed, have not "been checked, by comparing them in the villages with the reports of the "Ryots, and that though they shew the peculations of the superior Revenue "servants, they (the Curnums) conceal much of their own." The Board wish it also to be borne in mind, that the accounts were compiled by temporary servants, employed at a distance from the Commissioners, under the newly-appointed Tehsildars. These servants must at least be considered to have had an interest in proving misconduct on the part of their predecessors, then under suspension only; and though the accounts, thus prepared, were examined "immediately by the Commissioners" for three talooks, the nature of the examination is not stated, but the accounts taken in the manner described above have nevertheless been assumed as sufficiently correct to answer "all "the objects of the Commission" for the whole province.

19. The process above described in making out the accounts, applies principally to the district embezzlements and extra collections; but the Board will have occasion to shew, that the process in making out the huzzoor accounts was not very dissimilar.

20. The Board proceed to the separate consideration of each distinct head of embezzlement; and first to that in the tank department, to the aggregate amount of Pagodas 86,903 44 34.

22. " The particulars of tank embezzlement," say the Commissioners, " cannot at present be known, in consequence, as is stated, of the destruction " of the original accounts, and the death, sickness, or flight of the principal " agents employed." They observe, however, that Narnapah, the Treasury Gomashta, " was so completely master of the subject, as to be able, with the " help of the public accounts and some memorandums of his own, to shew not " only the whole amount embezzled in the repairs, but that of each year, and " the particular works to which it was falsely charged." But in paragraph 21, the Commission observe, " that though the particulars of tank embezzlements " cannot at present be known, the gross sums, amounting to Pagodas " 43,894 19 79 have been ascertained, by means of Narnapah, the Treasury " Gomashta." The Board conclude, that this explanation is meant to be confined to the embezzlements in the Treasury.

23. The account thus prepared, however, by Narnapah, is stated by the Commissioners to have been sworn to by Appajee Row, " the deputy Trea- " surer."* This, if correctly reported, is a novel mode of proceeding. Appajee might be called on to give in an account on oath; but it is not usual to require a man to swear to an account prepared by another person. Some information is also given by Dhurmaroy Pillay and Strenevassa Row. The former person wrote the original, and assisted in framing false accounts of one division, and if bad health had not prevented him, had undertaken to " draw " out " an account shewing the particulars of the embezzlements, although no accounts were then in his possession.

24. This is the substance of the evidence from which the Commissioners conclude an embezzlement to have taken place in the Treasury of Pagodas 46,494 19 79; and it is upon this evidence, with the addition of what is contained in three letters of Cass Shitty, † that the Collector thought himself justified in holding that person answerable for a portion thereof to the amount of Pagodas 44,000 29 17, and seizing and selling his property in satisfaction of the demand.

25. The first evidence respecting the tank repair embezzlements,‡ it appears, was contained in a memorandum given to the Collector on the 21st September 1815, drawn up by Narnapah, huzzoor Gomashta, employed in the Treasury, in which it was stated that Cass Shitty had taken 42,150 pagodas.§ On the 23d of that month, Narnapah, Appajee Row, Dhurmaroy Pillay, and Strene-vassa vassa Row, gave further declarations on this subject. Narnapah at this time declares, that he " gave credit for 42,150 pagodas from the repair-money in " Cass Shitty's private accounts;" and he adds, " this is all I know." Appajee Row, on oath, merely confirms this statement. Strenevassa Row deposes, that Cass Shitty told him " that Mr. William Garrow had ordered " him to write more money in the accounts than the actual charges in the " talooks," and that accordingly 26,000 pagodas more than the actual expenditure was charged in the accounts. Dhurmaroy Pillay states, that a sum of 45,000 odd pagodas " was entered in the account more than the actual " charges, and that the sum was taken by Cass Shitty." He adds, " I " wrote all the particulars of these accounts." The Commissioners in their report observe, that " the original accounts of both divisions passed through " the hands of Dhurmaroy Pillay, who states that he delivered them to Sarangapani Pillay, after fabricating new ones, with a sum of 45,000 pagodas added " to the actual expenditure;" but they do not point out a very particular circumstance in this man's evidence, viz. that after charging Cass Shitty with this embezzlement, he adds a postscript to his deposition as follows:* " I wrote my deposition that Cass Shitty took 45,000 and odd pagodas. " The following are the particulars of this. The accounts of the actual charges " in the talooks were sent to Sarangapani Pillay: he gave me these accounts, " and ordered me to add 45,000 and odd pagodas more than the actual ex- " penses. Agreeable to his order, I wrote fresh accounts and gave them " to Sarangapani Pillay. Cass Shitty was superintendent of the repairs, and " I think, therefore, that he must have received the amount."

26. There is little doubt that considerable abuses were committed in the tank department in Coimbatore, during the period under notice. In the opinion of the Board, however, it would have been more desirable that the best legal evidence against the actual perpetrators of the frauds, and of the amount of the embezzlements received by each delinquent, should have been obtained, than that the report should be confined to a general statement of embezzlements, on evidence so defectively taken and arranged, as that procured from Narnapah and Appajee Row.

27. The Commissioners themselves, indeed, seem to have been aware of the objectionable nature of the evidence of these persons, for it is offered by them rather as the only evidence they could procure, than as satisfactory proof. The destruction of the original accounts obliged them, they say, " to be satis- " fied with the short abstract of tank repair embezzlements entered in the " Treasury statement."

28. The Statement No. 3, Appendix A. professes to be a detailed " state- " ment, shewing the amount of advances issued from the Treasury for the " repairs of tanks and watercourses, and the amount actually expended on " that account from fusily 1216 to 1224, and the amount of embezzlement " made therefrom by Cass Shitty."

29. The abstract is as follows:

Amount of repayments made from the sum of advances received by Cass Shitty from the Treasury	42,150	0	0
Remainder sent to Madras with a remittance	4,344	19	79

30. That the sum charged in this account is not, in the opinion of the Commissioners, the amount actually defrauded, is clear, for it makes the embezzlement only Pagodas 46,494 19 79, whereas the total embezzlement assumed is Pagodas 86,903 44 34. This account, therefore, is meant to shew what is called the "Treasury embezzlement" only.

31. Narnapah and Appajee Row, who gave evidence on the subject of the tank embezzlement in the huzzoor Treasury, were at the time under suspension from the service, and it may be questioned whether they could speak without some bias. Narnapah, who acknowledges himself at once the chief agent in Cass Shitty's alleged frauds, and who is the principal evidence respecting them, has been rewarded for the information he has given, not only by being restored to office, but by an addition of three pagodas per mensem to his pay.* Appajee Row is still under suspension, or is in fact virtually dismissed. Neither of them confess having derived any advantage from their participation in Cass Shitty's criminality.

32. The true accounts being destroyed, or at least not procurable, the Board think that Dhurmaroy Pillay, through whose hands they are stated to have passed, was the evidence chiefly to be relied on. But though he, at first, acknowledged the frauds which had previously been alleged by the others, he has since recanted in a petition to the Board,† and declared that his evidence was taken under personal restraint; nor is it to be overlooked, that even at the time that he gave his declaration, he added a postscript, explaining that he suspected Cass Shitty by inference only, and that Sarungapani Pillay was the person who instigated him to make fraudulent entries.

33. With respect to the three others, on whose evidence the Commissioners have chiefly relied, it is to be observed, that they all avow themselves parties to the fraud, and that, on this account alone, their evidence is to be received with some caution. Narnapah was a Treasury Gomashta, and though he lived in Cass Shitty's house, and is stated to have been confidentially entrusted by him, yet he declares that all the accounts were taken from him. Notwithstanding this, he undertakes from "some memorandums of his own," with the help of the public accounts, to make out "not only the whole amount embezzled in the repairs, but that of each year, and the particular works to which it was falsely charged." The precise coincidence between the evidence of this man and that of Appajee Row is also remarkable: their depositions of the 23d September are in substance, and almost verbatim, the same. This may likewise be said of the important parts of their declarations of the 3d October; and it may be added, that whoever took the examination on that occasion, caused the declaration of Narnapah to be read over to Appajee Row, before his (Appajee Row's) examination was began; and though twenty-one days apparently intervened between Narnapah's third and written declaration of the 23d October (No. 4), and Appajee's of the 14th November (No. 5);‡ the one, so far as regards the material sums, seems a counterpart of the other, somewhat differently arranged.§ That part of Narnapah's deposition which relates relates to the embezzlement in the advances for repairs is as follows: "From "fusily 1217 up to fusily 1224, Pagodas 1,21,641 8 34 was charged in the "public accounts for the repairs, of which sum Marummut Kistna Moodely, "Seenevasa Row, Sarungapany Pillay, and Ram Row, received from the "Treasury and from the Tehsildars at the talooks to the amount of Pagodas "79,471 13 34. The remaining, Pagodas 42,150, and of the sundry repairs "to the amount of Pagodas 2,000, added with the amount of deposits for re-"pairs, being Pagodas 2,344 19 79, makes a total embezzlement from the "repair money of Pagodas 46,494 19 76. Out of this sum, agreeably to Cass "Shitty's order, Pagodas 42,150 was carried to the credit of the Treasury, as "a set off against the advances, and the remaining, Pagodas 4,344 19 79, was "remitted in Star Pagodas to Matroudoss Saucar to Madras, along with the "remittance."

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

34. The evidence of Shenevassa Row (No. 12), dated 23d September 1815, goes to prove that Cass Shitty represented to the witness that the late Collector had ordered him to charge more money for tank repairs than was actually expended, and that this was done to the extent, in six years, of 26,000 pagodas. The declaration of this man,* however, added to that of Narnapah and Appajee Row, with the letter of Cass Shitty (from No. 1 to 9 inclusive in the appendix C), must be admitted as proof that Cass Shitty interfered in the affairs of the tank department, and was a party to frauds therein; but the evidence there exhibited, it is feared, is not sufficiently conclusive to admit of any precise sum being recovered by legal process from Cass Shitty and the other delinquents. All the information on these points is derived from the depositions of Narnapah, Appajee Row, and Shenevassa Row.

35. From the nature of the huzzoor embezzlements in the tank repairs, it must be admitted that the people employed in the Treasury were the only persons who could give any certain information regarding them.

36. If the money charged for tank repairs had been all actually sent to the districts, but not expended there, and returned to Cass Shitty, it might have been traced to him in various ways; but, in the present case, only part of the money is alleged to have been sent to the districts, and the remainder is stated to have been transferred direct from the Treasury to the Shitty's private cash-chest: the Treasury servants were, therefore, the only persons who could have any knowledge of these last sums. They state, that it was easy to distinguish the sums actually sent to the districts from those transferred to Cass

 Shitty's

* In a petition in English, but signed by Shenevassa Row, dated 22d February 1816, sent to the Board, this man states "In the fusily 1225, Mr. John Sullivan succeeded vice Mr. Garrow, "deceased. I was then without employment, in my own house, confined owing to the severe ill-"ness: and when I am in a state of insensibility, Mr. J. Sullivan have sent his huzzoor Deloyets, "and carried me forcibly to this place. There, in presence of moosady's (native servants of the "cutcherry), belonging to Colonel Munro, and Peons, having threatened and distressed me much, "very much, and took my signature in a paper."

If the petitioner is correct in his assertion regarding the date of the deposition and the date of the signing, they must have been done at different times. The petitioner further adds: "Mr. "Sullivan had imprisoned Cass Shitty on account of maramit business. If Mr Sullivan had "committed Cass Shitty to the jail upon regular authority of the accounts, it is altogether un-"necessary for him to demand from me an account from a new head, after Cass Shitty prosecuted "him in the appeal court."

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

Shitty's private chest: because, when the former were entered in the public accounts, the works for which they were intended were specified, but the latter were entered simply as "advances for repairs." Narnapah and Appajee Row have made oath to the money being taken from the Treasury by the Shitty's orders, and to more being charged for repairs than was actually expended; and Durmaroy Pillay and Shenevassa Row have also deposed to the latter point. Paupy Shitty, the Treasury Shroff, has likewise made oath to the payments to the Shitty from the Treasury. But while it is thus admitted that the Treasury servants were the only witnesses that could give evidence respecting the huzzoor embezzlements, it may be questioned whether the best evidence they could give was obtained, whether the manner in which it was taken will not in some degree discredit it, and whether it will be considered as conclusive evidence in a court of justice.

37. With regard to the further sum of Pagodas 40,494 19 76, entered by the Commissioners in their accounts as embezzled in the district out of the money remitted from the Treasury for tank repairs, the Board cannot find any other evidence of its correctness than the estimates of the Curnums of the amount actually expended in each village. The amount charged as district embezzlements of repairs, is the difference between the amount issued from the Collector's Treasury and from the Treasuries of the Tehsildars, on account of repairs, and what the village Curnums, who never saw the accounts, compute to have been expended. The Commissioners themselves admit, that this computation of the Curnums "is not, in its present state, to be much relied "upon;" that it is "only in some cases founded on actual accounts," and perhaps "in many instances" erroneous, "from enmity or ignorance:" and they estimate, that this estimate of the Curnums may be erroneous by 10,000 or 15,000 pagodas. Notwithstanding this, they urge "that the full amount "should stand against the Superintendents, until it shall be proved that they are entitled to remission."

38. Regarding the sum charged in the Collectors' accounts as advances from the Treasury for tank repairs, there can be no doubt: the question is respecting the amount actually expended in the districts. Narnapah gives accounts of the appropriation of the huzzoor embezzlements: the Curnums estimate the amount of the actual expenditure from which the amount embezzled is taken; and the Commissioners, adopting both, and having already accused Cass Shitty of embezzling the sum entered in Narnapah's statement, charge the Superintendents with the difference between what the Curnums estimate has been laid at, and the amount of the total expenditure charged after deducting the sum set down against Cass Shitty, viz.

43. And the embezzlement in the district being charged at Pagodas 40,409 24 35, the amount is more than the half of the whole sum remitted to the districts to be disbursed for repairs of tanks, &c.

44. If the inference is allowed, that no fraud was committed in the talooks in fusily 1227, or if committed not to a great extent, since the huzzoor servants and Cass Shitty did not participate in any, the result would be as follows:

		S Pagodas	F.	C.

A sum scarcely exceeding Pagodas 1,000 per annum.

45. The Curnums' accounts (referred to in Statement No. 5, Appendix A) do not shew the amount for each year for which they give their "estimates" of the amount actually disbursed in repairs: but, in support of the Curnums' estimates, the Commission observe, "even if there had been a disposition to "disburse large sums for the repairs, labourers could not be found;" and they give an instance of an embezzlement in fusily 1217 (paragraph 28) of 1,429 pagodas out of the sum of 1,800 pagodas in one village. If the Curnum who kept this account gave a true account in this instance, frauds may be estimated for fusily 1217: but a charge of embezzlement of more than seven-ninths of the whole sums requires to be supported by other proof than a Curnum's account. The sum sent for one work may have been expended for another work, and the Curnum gave probably the disbursement only, not the receipt: that may have been taken from Narnapah's account of money remitted to the district for separate works. The Curnum is not asked to whom the difference went; nor is an explanation given of so extraordinary a peculation where accounts were kept by public officers.

46. It also appears, from a comparison of the public accounts with those made out under the Commission, that although the total is correct, the sums do not agree for each year. There must, therefore, have been a transfer of sums estimated in one year to a second year. The correspondence of the Board, referred to in the margin, will indeed establish this fact.*

47. The result of the Board's examination of this first head of embezzlement is:

1st. That it can scarcely admit of doubt, that frauds to a great extent were committed in Coimbatore, in the disbursements for the repairs of tanks.

2d. That the precise sum embezzled in the Treasury under this head, if Narnapah's evidence, confirmed by Appajee Row, is to be credited, is proved, proved, and an embezzlement to the extent of Pagodas 42,150 is brought home to Cass Shitty on this evidence: but, in the opinion of the Board, it is very questionable whether this will be considered conclusive evidence in a court of justice.

* Letter to Mr. W. Garrow, 9th, in Dy. Consultations, 12th November 1810; from ditto, 15th, in Consultations, 18th March 1811; to ditto, 27th, in Dy. Consultations, 28th September 1812.

3d. That great doubts are entertained by the Board of the correctness of the Curnums' "estimates," from which the second branch of embezzlements is deduced by the Commission, and that, therefore, there is, in their opinion, presumption only of embezzlements in the districts, to the extent of Pagodas 40,491 17 76.

4th. That the evidence obtained by the Commissioners will not justify, in the opinion of the Board, a civil prosecution being commenced against any person, not hitherto proceeded against for embezzlements in tank repairs.

5th. That no part of the evidence goes in the least to implicate the late Mr. William Garrow in the corruption of the Treasurer, Cass Shitty, in the embezzlement in the disbursements for repairs of tanks.

Tobacco Embezzlements.

48. The next item of embezzlement is the large sum of Pagodas 1,43,913 13 62 in the tobacco department, of which Pagodas 1,36,261 40 50 is stated to have been appropriated by Cass Shitty.*

49. For evidence of this fraud the Commissioners refer to that part of the Appendix to their Report which is marked from Nos. 14 to 29B, and from Nos. 8 to 22C.

50. The information respecting this fraud was given by Narnapah, at first, in a memorandum on the 21st September, and in a second declaration of the 3d October 1815. Then follows the examination of various persons, regarding the preparation of false receipts; next that of Anuntiah, the tobacco Roysum; subsequently various declarations of the 15th November. and the 9th, 11th, and 12th December; and the whole closes with a second representation from the tobacco Roysum, Anuntiah, dated the 8th February 1816. In addition to this, is given a number of letters, chiefly by Cass Shitty, in the Appendix C, from

* See Report, from paragraph 30 at 54 inclusive.—See Statements Nos. 4, 6, and 7, Appendix A.—See depositions from Nos. 14 to 24, Appendix B. These appear to be written declarations: they are, however, signed by the parties.—No. 25, Appendix B, is a verbal deposition: it is signed by the "deponent"—Nos. 26, 27, 28, and 29, are vivâ voce examinations of people who gave false receipts, at the instigation of Cass Shitty and Seetaram Sing.

In the abstract at the foot of the account No. 6, Appendix A, drawn out by the Commissioners, the embezzlement is stated as follows:

	Star Pags.	F.	C.	Star Pags.	F.	C.

The whole amount charged, from fusily 1220 to 1224 inclusive, being five years, in the public accounts on account of tobacco, is stated to be Star Pagodas 2,64,486 13 38, and this sum agrees with a statement received by the Board from the Accountant-General's office.

The account received from the Accountant-General shews a recovery of advances to the extent of Star Pagodas 1,97,370 8 82, and a balance on the 12th July 1815 of Star Pagodas 67,116 5 66, making Star Pagodas 2,64,486 13 38.

The remittances to Malabar in tobacco, for which the Collector there gave Mr. William Garrow credit, from fusily 1220 to 1224, and up to August of fusily 1225, amounted to Pagodas 1,88,115 3 33, and the collections by the Collector of Malabar during that period were Pagodas 4,17,866 22 3, from Nos. 8 to 22 inclusive. The substance of this evidence it may be proper briefly to recapitulate.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

51. On the 3d October, Narnapah states, on oath, "that Pagodas 1,08,850 "out of 1,30,000 pagodas, charged in the account in the name of Sitaram "Sing for the purchase of tobacco," was credited to the Treasury, on account of advances taken from it by Cass Shitty: in other words, that it was appropriated by that person. And Appajee Row and Paupy Shitty, the Shroff, support this statement, by declaring, on oath, that credit was given for some money on this account, though they do not recollect the amount without a reference to the accounts. On the 23d October, Narnapah states, on oath, that the tobacco embezzlements by Cass Shitty were as follows:

	St. Pagodas	F.	C.
In purchasing tobacco	12,0,925	27	11
In sibbendy	8,877	31	69
In godown repairs	1,813	44	44
	1,31,617	13	44

And Appajee Row, who did not at first recollect the amount, confirms, on the 14th of November, each specific item of this statement. The examinations on the 16th of October go to prove that various persons confess having, by Cass Shitty's orders, given to them in person signed receipts, purporting to have sold tobacco to Government, and to have received payment for the same, when, in fact, they neither sold the tobacco, nor were ever paid for it. On the 24th October, the Roysum, Anuntiah, deposes on oath, that "the total "amount of false receipts was Pagodas 39,765 26 21. This amount was "made up in the accounts by Sitaram Sing, according to Cass Shitty's "order." He also deposes, that he "was made acquainted with the circum- "stances above stated, having been employed as Roysum under Sitaram Sing, "and having written part of the false receipts." Of the depositions given on the 15th November, No. 21, Tappacolum Soobaroy Shitty, sorter of tobacco, states, that Cass Shitty directed the deponent not to give up certain tobacco accounts in his possession, as, if he gave up these accounts, he (Cass Shitty) "should fall into trouble:" that there was "a general custom to receive the first "sort of tobacco from the inhabitants and to pay them for the third and fourth "sort:" that when the witness objected to this, Sitaram Sing threatened to discharge him; and that on his acquainting Cass Shitty with this, that person told him "to obey Sitaram Sing's orders." He also states, "that in "three years, more than one thousand candies of tobacco were gained in "weight." No. 25, by Nayana Shitty, private trader to Cass Shitty, of the same date, deposes, that having been sent for by Cass Shitty to Bhowani, to get his private accounts from him, he went to the house of Sitaram Sing, who informed him that a proposal for Palany tobacco had been given in the name of the witness; and that though the witness never either supplied the tobacco or was paid for it, he consented, at Sitaram Sing's request, to sign four receipts for 16,100 pagodas for tobacco, in fusily 1222, and five receipts for fusily 1223, to the amount of Pagodas 15,575. Of the depositions dated in December, not one makes mention of the name of Cass Shitty. They are all given by the sorters or Commissioners for the sale of tobacco, and detail frauds committed by themselves, by order, as they state, of Sitaram Sing, consisting chiefly of the purchase of a superior sort of tobacco at a rate fixed for an inferior sort, of short weight, of overcharge of bullock hire, and of retailing the fourth sort of sirkar tobacco to the inhabitants at the price of the first sort; the profits arising from which sources they affirm to have been paid to Sitaram Sing or his agents. The second deposition of Anuntiah, the tobacco Roysum, dated in February 1816,* after recapitulating these abuses, and explaining

* In Mr. Sullivan's letter of the 15th March 1816 is a translation of Anuntiah's first deposition on oath, dated 21st September 1815. In this deposition he states, that it was the practice for Sitaram Sing to send his receipts for money to Cass Shitty, who sent some and retained some, and told Sitaram Sing to make up the full amount in his accounts; that Sitaram Sing, upon asking him how he must make up the account, was directed to make it up in the accounts of carriage-hire, in the price of tobacco purchased from the inhabitants, and in expenses; and that Cass Shitty took 18,000 pagodas from 39,000 pagodas ordered for the advance of tobacco for the year bhava (1814).

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

explaining that letters were written from the huzzoor, communicating the entries in the Treasury accounts, and requiring the talookwar accounts and receipts to be made to correspond therewith, adds: "a small part of the sum "overcharged in the account, as above stated, was sent to Sitaram Sing by "means of the Tehsildars, and the remainder retained in the Treasury for the "use of Cass Shitty;" and it concludes by observing, that "the quantity "of tobacco gained by means of false weight was carried to the accounts as "tobacco purchased from the inhabitants, to make the quantity for which false "receipts had been obtained from the inhabitants, and also to make up the "difference between five hundred and fifty-four Candies of the article actually "purchased in the Madura country, and two thousand four hundred candies "entered as purchased in the accounts."

52. Of the correspondence in the Appendix C, No. 10 is a letter from Tagappa Chitty, deputy treasurer to Sitaram Sing, informing him that 20,000 pagodas had been inserted in the account as advanced to the Ryots for cultivating tobacco for fusily 1223, and desiring him to make a similar entry in his accounts; also requesting information respecting a sum of 1,000 pagodas entered in Sita Ram Sing's account, in order that the Treasury account might be made to correspond. No. 11 is a letter to the same person from Appajee Row, the witness against Cass Shitty, of whom particular notice has already been made, informing him that 13,000 pagodas had been charged for the purchase of tobacco in the accounts for the month of January, and calling for the district accounts. No. 12 is a letter from one Tehsildar to another, regarding the equalization of their accounts. No. 13 is a letter from Sitaram Sing, quoted in the thirty-eighth paragraph of the Commissioners' report, which fully explains the system of short payment, short weight, and false accounts prescribed by him: but in none of these letters is mention made of Cass Shitty by name. No. 14 to 22 inclusive, are letters written by Cass Shitty to various persons, all evincing that he actively interfered in the affairs of the tobacco department.

53. A review of this evidence sufficiently demonstrates that systematic abuses existed in the tobacco department. The letter of Sitaram Sing, directing short weight, short prices, and false accounts, the confession of the sorters of tobacco, and of the persons who signed false receipts, that these frauds were actually practised by them, render this unquestionable. That the extent of these frauds must also have been very great may be safely admitted, from the mere circumstance of the actual average charge for delivering tobacco for three years at Ponany having amounted to Pagodas 21 42 14, while it has since been contracted for at Pagodas 12 22 40 per candy.*

54. Respecting the amount of the tobacco embezzlements, two separate and distinct accounts are given by the Commissioners. The first is taken from that framed by Narnapah and Appajee Row; the second from the sorters' accounts "discovered by degrees.†" They are in substance as follows:

55. Of this total, Star Pagodas 1,36,261 40 56 is charged to Cass Shitty, at the foot of Statement 6, Appendix A, as explained in paragraph — of these proceedings.

56. The difference between the Sorters' accounts and the Treasury accounts is stated by the Commissioners (paragraph 42) to be owing, on one side, to an actual payment to the servants, and on the other, to an overcharge on the carriage of tobacco to Ponnany, neither of which were known to the Treasury Gomashtas.

57 In paragraph 43, the Commissioners state that the sum of Pagodas 1,43,913 13 62 comprehends the amount of the embezzlement, so far as it can be ascertained from the accounts of the tobacco servants; but it does not shew the illegal profit of the retailers, which the Commissioners did not think it necessary to inquire into.

58. The account drawn out by Narnapah of the embezzlements in the tobacco monopoly, though "sworn to by Appajee Row," who is throughout the echo of all his statements, if it be received as perfectly correct under the examinations given relative to this man's evidence in the tank department, will go to establish the precise amount of the embezzlement at the huzzoor Treasury. But Appajee's evidence, on the 3d October, went to prove that he could not state, without reference to the accounts, the sum for which credit was given on account of tobacco: yet, on the 14th November, he delivers in a most specific account of the tobacco embezzlements, agreeing in every item with that of Narnapah. In the tank departments, with the exception of the Curnums' estimates, there were no other accounts procurable than those of Narnapah, and therefore his were adopted; but, in the tobacco department, the Sorters' accounts seem to have been preferred by the Commissioners, and accordingly it is chiefly on them that they found their opinion respecting the amount of these frauds.

59. It is to be regretted, however, that a more satisfactory account was not given, how and where the Sorters' accounts were obtained, and how the Sorters could be called on to swear to the truth of accounts, which the Commissioners observe (in paragraph 10) were frequently mutilated, although enough were got to exhibit a complete view of the complicated system of fraud which prevailed in every branch of the monopoly. The accounts could, therefore, be only partially sworn to as being correct; or if they have been sworn to in the gross, the evidence is not strengthened by such an oath.

60. The Sorters are, by the Commissioners themselves, described as "the "most useful agents in carrying on the frauds of the monopoly:" and, from the nature of the abuses practised, which consisted chiefly of short measurement and short price, it is evident that, whether instigated by others or not, it was they who actually committed the greater part of these frauds. Accounts, therefore, coming from them, and implicating others in the tobacco embezzlements, ought to have been well authenticated, before they were adopted as genuine. It is true, that the Sorters have been sworn to the truth of the accounts in question; but as they confess themselves to have been the immediate agents agents of the alleged frauds, it is easy to suppose that, if granted an indemnity, they would not be backward to accuse others in order to exculpate themselves; and when, in addition to this, it is known that the accounts were discovered by degrees only, and in all probability by the newly appointed servants, some evidence, in addition to that of the Sorters, would be considered necessary in a court of justice to render their testimony valid.

61. So far as a judgment can be formed from the papers in the Appendix to the Commissioners' Report, it would appear that the Sorters' accounts shew the extent only of the embezzlements; and in the depositions of these people they all state the frauds to have originated with Sitaram Sing, although evidently countenanced by Cass Shitty. That false receipts were fabricated there can be no doubt; but Cass Shitty has been tried and acquitted of "causing and "procuring receipts to be fabricated with a view to cheat the Government in "the transactions of the tobacco monopoly," and therefore it is the evidence of Narnapah and Appajee alone, corroborated, to a certain extent, by that of the tobacco Roysum, Anuntiah, that tends to implicate Cass Shitty.

62. The Board have already detailed their reasons for considering the evidence of Narnapah and Appajee as legally inconclusive. Anuntiah, in his first declaration, merely affirmed that the abuses practised by Sitaram Sing were according to Cass Shitty's order; and, in his second, he asserted that the greater part of the tobacco embezzlements was retained in the Treasury for the use of Cass Shitty. This, however, seems mere hearsay evidence; for Anuntiah was a tobacco Roysum under Sitaram Sing, and whatever he may have known of the detail of the tobacco abuses, must of himself have been totally unacquainted with the transactions in the Treasury. Indeed, his information on this point was not given until February 1816, and might therefore easily have been taken from that of Narnapah, given in the month of October preceding.

63. The Board have already stated, that whatever cause for suspicion there may be against Cass Shitty, the proof of his having appropriated any precise sum of the total embezzlements on the tobacco monopoly rests on the evidence of Narnapah and Appajee Row. The Commissioners charge him with embezzling Pagodas 1,27,065 18 52, in a sort of abstract, apparently of their own, at the bottom of the Sorters' account, No. 6: but so far as the Board can judge, this abstract does not seem supported by the account itself. The addition to this sum of Pagodas 9,196 21 78 is justified, apparently, on the ground that it was paid to different people by order of Cass Shitty and Sitaram Sing conjointly: yet, in the body of the Commissioners' report, the latter person exclusively is mentioned as responsible for it; and it is impossible to reconcile the statement of the Commissioners, that Pagodas 7,651 18 12 only are due by Sitaram Sing and the other servants, when in the body of their report they expressly state, that the Sorters' accounts hold Sitaram Sing responsible, not only for the sum of Pagodas 9,196 21 78 before mentioned, but for a further balance to the amount of Pagodas 27,714 2 53 also.

64. If evidence were procurable against Cass Shitty, the Board, throughout their correspondence with the Collector in Coimbatore, urged the expediency of making an example of him; but they also strongly and repeatedly cautioned the Collector against proceeding on defective evidence, and they apprehend that in the tobacco department the evidence obtained by the Commissioners will be found defective and objectionable when brought into a court of justice.

65. The guilt of the retailers of tobacco, of the Sorters, and of the persons who signed false accounts, is manifest by their own confessions; and that the Commissioners must have considered the Sorters and retailers responsible for these frauds, is also proved by their entering an actual recovery from them of Pagodas 1,788 16 27* on this account. But it is not explained why these persons were held answerable for so small a sum, when nearly the whole of the tobacco embezzlements might, with equal justice, have been charged against them. Until guilt was established against the alleged instigators of these frauds, the professed agents therein should not have been entirely absolved from punishment. The Board, in their letter to the Collector of the 28th September

* From Sorters and retailers.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

September 1815, expressly forbid him to hold out, "even to those who may "come forward with the most ample information, any hopes of impunity. We "are resolved," said they, "that, so far as the law will authorize it, all who "have been engaged in the nefarious practices that for some time past have "prevailed in Coimbatore, shall suffer more or less in proportion to their "guilt:" and they directed the Collector "strenuously to urge, in the name "of the Board, that a full and ample confession of the past, and, so far as "may be practicable, a restitution of undue receipts, are the only means left "to secure the parties from the utmost severity of the law."

66. When Cass Shitty was acquitted by the circuit court of causing receipts to be fabricated with the view of cheating the Government, the Collector explained to the Board,* that it would be a breach of public faith to proceed against the actual fabricators of these papers, for that it was impossible to get at information concerning the frauds which had been committed in the tobacco department, except through the medium of those persons who had been his agents in carrying them on; and that they were, in consequence, given to understand, that such as should make full disclosures of what they knew of the frauds might expect to be leniently dwelt with. Nothing could be more at variance with the instructions of the Board than such a course of proceeding: but the Commissioners, by whom it was adopted, were independent of their authority, and the Board's instructions to the Collector were thus rendered nugatory.

67. A criminal charge for a conspiracy to defraud Government might have been instituted against all the parties, and evidence given of particular sums defrauded. The Governor in Council will, the Board conclude, be disposed to consider, that this would have been a preferable course to have pursued, to granting an entire indemnity to the professed agents in the crime.

68. The Commissioners do not appear to have taken any measures to ascertain whether Mr. William Garrow knew of the abuses going on in the conduct of the tobacco monopoly, or participated in the frauds. The name of Mr. William Garrow is not mentioned by any of the persons whose evidence is referred to by the Commissioners. It is but justice, therefore, to Mr. William Garrow to state, that the Commissioners have furnished no evidence that he knew of the improper proceedings they have detailed Extra Collections.

69. The Board now come to the third head of embezzlement, viz. Pagodas 3,00,156 1 15, on account of extra collections, of which Pagodas 31,343 8 35 are stated to have been embezzled in the Treasury, and Pagodas 2,68,812 36 60 in the districts, and for which Cass Shitty is held answerable for Pagodas 87,162 6 16 only, and the late Tehsildars and others for Pagodas 2,12,993 13 79.

70. The various items of which these extra collections are composed, and the appropriation thereof, as charged by the Commissioners, will be found stated in the following account current.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

71. Respecting the amount of these embezzlements generally, the Board beg leave to refer to the former part of their present proceedings, in which they have entered into some explanation of the mode in which the accounts of the district embezzlements were obtained. It will thence be perceived, that the information of the Commissioners, regarding the extent of these extra collections, is founded not upon original accounts, but on accounts compiled by new and temporary servants, under the immediate direction of the newly appointed Tehsildars, whose confirmation in office depended upon abuses being proved against their predecessors; and accordingly we find, that the appropriation of the greater portion of these alleged extra collections is charged, not against Cass Shitty, but against the late Tehsildars.

72. The Board are quite at a loss to understand how the Curnums' accounts could shew the appropriation of these sums as stated by the Commissioners. The only examination or deposition of a Curnum inserted in the Appendix, gives no such accounts. It is true, that the Potails are stated to have given an account of part of the collections and appropriations. They could know this in some cases, or guess it in others; but the Curnums, in most cases, must have been entirely ignorant of what became of the money after it was collected, or at any rate could only write down what the Potail might tell them to write.

73. Although the total of collections in paragragh 64, under this head, is stated at Pagodas 3,00,156 1 15, and the disbursements, in paragraph 70, is made to correspond with that sum, there is an error, in paragraph 70, in the addition, of no less than Pagodas 32,610 13 11. The sum debited to Tehsildars in this abstract is only Pagodas 1,04,935 14 48. In the detailed account current, entered in paragraph 70, it amounts to Pagodas 1,37,612 (as taken from No. 9, Appendix A). But whether the sum should be 1,00,000 pagodas or 1,40,000 pagodas, it is clear that the new Tehsildars and new Gomashtas drew out the accounts against the former Tehsildars and former servants in their absence; for it will be observed, that the whole of these servants were suspended on the 1st of October, and that of the few examined, or more properly of the few who gave declarations to the Commissioners, none are called on or enter into any defence of the charges exhibited against them in these accounts. Yet some Tehsildars are debited with large sums; for instance, Annaviah, with 16,869 pagodas, and another, Aununtastana Pillay, with 15,528 pagodas.

74. There are some items, however, entered in these accounts, which it is a misuse of terms to class as embezzlements, or to denominate extra collections. These are the following:

	Pagodas.	F.	C.
No. 3. Extra collections for village expenses	19,694	43	74
No. 12. Profit of the village renters	16,271	15	21
No. 13. Money borrowed by ditto, to pay rent and extra demand	23,347	15	55

75. The first of these items is the amount of "collections made for defraying "village festivals, religious ceremonies, and various petty charges, usually "borne by the village inhabitants." This, in fact, in every village, in every district throughout the Peninsula, is the fund of the township, whence all the joint expenses of the village community are defrayed; but, in the opinion of the Commissioners, it was in Coimbatore "at least three times as much as it ought "to have been."

76. The reasons of the Commissioners for the admission of the second of these items will be best given in their own words. The first is, "that the extra "collections were in many villages insufficient to defray the nuzzerana and "other extra demands; and hence, in order to shew how they were satisfied, "it was necessary to bring forward the renters' profits, which were disbursed "for that purpose." The second is, that the Curnums and village renters "have, no doubt, frequently suppressed a part of the extra collections reserved "for their own use, and, in order to conceal them the better, have inserted "the

"the renters' profits, as if they had been necessary to complete the sum "required for the nuzzerana and other private assessments." Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

77. The third item "is composed of money borrowed by different heads of "villages, to pay the private demands of the revenue servants."

78. The Board confess themselves utterly at a loss to account for the insertion of the renters' profits as an extra collection, for the Commissioners themselves, in the sixty-seventh paragraph of their report, after having thus included it, proceed to deduct it, because, to use their own words, it "is "not, in fact, an extra assessment upon the inhabitants."

79. The Commissioners, however, justify the insertion of the two other items, anticipating the obvious objection, that it may be said that the collections "for village festival, &c." and the money "borrowed by the Potails, "cannot be regarded as forming any additional burden upon the inhabitants, "because they are always accustomed to defray voluntarily, among themselves, "the expense of festivals and other village ceremonies, and because the money "borrowed will be repaid to the lenders." They proceed to state, that the "answer to this inference is, that the sum entered on account of village ceremonies is most probably in addition to the usual amount, and that the "money entered as a loan has chiefly, if not entirely, been raised by assess-"ment upon the inhabitants." But the Board can find nothing in the Appendix to the report to justify any such conclusion.

80. The Commissioners assert, that the sum charged for the support of the village temples and festivals is at least "three times as much as it ought to "have been;" but they have not even attempted to shew that it has been greater than usual, and though they surmise it to be probable that the money in question was otherwise appropriated, this surmise is unsupported.

81. The accounts obtained by the Commissioners represent the last sum of Pagodas 23,347 15 55 to be a loan, liable to repayment; but a part only of this statement is adopted as correct. The Commissioners, without any other evidence than surmise, after stating the mere probability that "a considerable "part of what is here called a loan will be found to have been realized by "assessment upon the Ryots," in the very next paragraph assume, "that "the money entered as a loan has chiefly, if not entirely, been raised by assess-"ments on the inhabitants."

82. The Board are induced to believe, from the manner in which the accounts have been drawn out, that the amount of the nuzzerana, and other sums entered in the accounts as the appropriation of the extra collections, have been greatly exaggerated, by the new and interested servants who superintended the compilation of the district accounts, and that this is perhaps the reason why "the extra collections were in many villages insufficient to defray "the nuzzerana," and why the grama khurch, or village funds, the renters' profits, and the money borrowed by them, have all been included in the accounts, in order to shew how these alleged extra demands were satisfied.

83. That extra collections have been made there can be no doubt, and that the renters have paid considerable sums of money seems also probable, but not evident, at least not shewn. But these sums were paid to secure equivalent advantages, and however great may have been the rapacity of the public servants, it is difficult to believe that, to satisfy it, the renters would have parted not only with all their profits, but also with money borrowed for the purpose.

84. A few very short explanations only are afforded by the Commissioners respecting the other items composing the total of the embezzlements, and no further evidence is given of these abuses, with the exception of the principal item of Pagodas 83,590 3 34, on account of nuzzerana.

Nuzzerana.

85. The Board, for the reasons already before adverted to, question the correctness of this amount, as well as that of the other items composing the grand total of Pagodas 300,156 1 15; although they entertain no doubt that extra collections, to a considerable extent, have been made on this account. The

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

The evidence relating to the nuzzerana will be found in the Appendix to the Commissioner's report, from No. 30 to 66 B, and No. 23 to 25 C.

86. The first information regarding the nuzzerana seems to have been given by the late Serishtadar, Jevun Row, who on the 14th September 1815, after observing that Annaviah, the Tehsildar of Parundory, was authorized by the Collector to explain to the people Mr. Garrow's proclamation regarding the decennial lease, goes on to state, that "Annaviah" assembled those who delivered the proposals in another place, and bargained with them to pay a nuzzer to the gentleman of twenty-five, thirty, or forty, for every hundred, and a rupee for every chuckrum. Cass Shitty went and advised him of this from time to time, "and gave the contract to the people who paid the largest sum. I heard "of this, but do not know the particulars." Annaviah, the person here alluded to, being asked by the Commissioners on what account the nuzzerana collections were made in fusily 1223, confirms this evidence by declaring that "Cass "Shitty desired him to tell the villagers that the gentleman had been ten "years in this district, without obtaining any benefit from it: that he likewise "intended to settle a ten years' rent, and afterwards to go home: that they "would have no more trouble with the Sirkar, and therefore that they must "pay him something; likewise that the average bareez had been increased in "their talooks, which he (Cass Shitty) had reduced. The deponent spoke "with the villagers, and they consented to pay the nuzzer."

87. This man's evidence also goes to prove the delivery, by himself, to Cass Shitty, of part of the extra collections thus made. "They gave him (deponent) the money: he took it in, and gave it to Cass Shitty." He also deposes, that he paid of the nuzzerana 10,500 rupees to the son of Vydelinga Pillay, Cass Shitty's Gomashta, and 10,500 rupees to Vydelinga Pillay, according to Cass Shitty's orders. Another Tehsildar (No. 31), says, "deponent "paid 4,000 rupees at different times to Vydelinga Pillay, according to Cass "Shitty's orders; also, by Cass Shitty's orders, 8,100 rupees was remitted to "Annaviah (the previous witness), and 1,500 rupees were remitted to Cass "Shitty in charge of Coimbatore talook." Peon Chinnana Naik, a Tehsildar (No. 32), deposes, that of 7,980 rupees extra collections made during three years, "6,750 was paid to Cass Shitty." A Tehsildar (No. 33), deposes, that of rupees 5,294 collected in fusily 1223, at the rate of half a fanam per chuckrum, he by order of Cass Shitty paid 5,000 rupees to a ghee-merchant, and took his receipt for it; that 7,000 rupees were collected in fusily 1224, at one fanam per chuckrum, and were paid by Cass Shitty's order, and entered in the accounts.

88. Tehsildar No. 34 deposes, that along with the nuzzer-money collected in fusilies 1221 and 1222, he sent to Cass Shitty rupees 1,650 taken out of the collections, and entered, by Cass Shitty's directions, in the accounts as due by dead and deserted. That the total extra collections in three years were Star Sic orig. Pagodas 10,715 22 40, of which Rupees 1,015, and Pagodas 8,055 21 60, were remitted to the Treasury of the huzzoor.

89. Tehsildar No. 35 deposes, that he paid Rupees 5,294, and some other sums from the extra collections, on account of drafts made upon him by Cass Shitty.

90. Tehsildar No. 36 deposes, that of Rupees 11,723¼, collected for nuzzerana, and Rupees 3,155¼, collected from concealed cultivation, in fusilies 1221 and 22, Rupees 13,300 was paid to Cass Shitty or by his order.

91. Tehsildar No. 38 deposes, that from the money collected for nuzzer, he paid some sums to Cass Shitty, and others to different persons by his orders.

92. Tehsildar No. 39 deposes, that of Rupees 16,499$\frac{7}{16}$ collected for nuzzerana, he paid by Cass Shitty's orders Rupees 16,496¼ to Vedelinga Pillay and others; that he has Cass Shitty's order for the different sums, and the receipts of the people who received the money.

93. Tehsildar No. 40 deposes, that of 10,200 rupees, collected for nuzzerana, he paid 9,070 rupees to Cass Shitty, and by his orders. A Tehsildar (No. 41) states, that the extra collections in fusily 1222 were Rupees 11,880, out out of which he remitted to Cass Shitty 10,300 rupees with the talook "Irsall." Abundant evidence to the same effect is contained in the other papers of Appendix B. before mentioned; and in the Appendix C. there are three letters from Cass Shitty himself, in the first of which he desires one of the Tehsildars "to remit the whole nuzzer-money belonging to the (dhori) without delay, to "the care of Appajee-Row in the huzzoor;" and in the second and third he writes to other Tehsildars as follows: "you requested to know where to "forward the amount of the gentleman's own money collected now in your "own possession; you are to remit the whole money remaining with you to "the treasury." You desire to know where to remit the amount collected on account of the gentleman; you are to send it to the treasury with the collections.*

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

94. From this evidence respecting the nuzzerana, it seems clearly established, that large extra collections were made by the different Tehsildars, at the desire of Cass Shitty, or his agents, and that Cass Shitty, both verbally and in writing, declared this nuzzerana to be for the use of the Collector. It is further established, that a considerable portion of the money thus collected was paid to Cass Shitty, and the actual appropriation of part of it is thus brought directly home to him; but it does not appear that the precise amount which he received has been accurately ascertained by evidence, although he is debited in the accounts with two different sums.

95. The Board observe, that on the faith of the statements prepared by the Sic orig. new servants, stated, but not shewn to have been "taken principally from the Curnums' accounts," Cass Shitty is charged by the Commissioners, in the seventieth paragraph of their report, as answerable for extra collections to the extent of Pagodas 54,483 6 49: that, in the following paragraph, they explain this sum to comprise not only the nuzzerana received by him, but "the profits "of the villages, ninety-six in number, which he held for himself under the "name of pretended renters;" and finally, that in the accounts 14 and 15 in the Appendix A, and in paragraph 108 of the Commissioners' report, Cass Shitty is charged with Pagodas 87,162 6 16 for extra "village collections."†

96. The Board have in vain endeavoured to reconcile these contradictory statements. They have no hesitation, however, in recording their opinion, that the accounts prepared by the new servants are not safe data on which to found legal proceedings against Cass Shitty, even supposing him to be legally responsible for the amount of the nuzzerana, and for the other extra collections made for his use. There can be no doubt that his profits as a renter of villages, like his profits as a merchant, were highly incompatible with his situation as a public servant; but, in the opinion of the Board, he might be held answerable to the Government as well for the latter as for the former. Both might equally be urged as charges against him in his public capacity of treasurer, to prove him an unfit person for office; but the Board do not think that a court of justice would admit of the recovery of the one, more than of that of the other. On the discovery that the villages in question were collusively rented, the Collector acted rightly in resuming them, but the Board apprehend that the evil is not to be remedied reprospectively.

97. The Commissioners, in the seventy-first paragraph of their report, observe, that of the extra collections, to the amount of Pagodas 104,935 14 43, for which the late Tehsildars are charged as responsible, they assert, "that "they paid to Cass Shitty Pagodas 68,784 15 20:" but the Commissioners "immediately explain, that of these persons, to the number of forty-four, "there has not been time to examine thoroughly more than two or three of "them,

* In this letter Cass Shitty desires that the whole nuzzer money may be remitted to the care of Appajee Row; and Appajee Row, in his deposition of the 21st September 1815, of which a translation was sent in Mr. Sullivan's letter of the 15th March 1816, states, that "from fusily 1221 to "1222 was remitted with the Sirkar collection, as nuzzerana, the sum of thirty thousand Star Pa-"godas: after shroffing, the said sum of money was put into Cass Shitty's own chest, as per his "order" Paupy Chitty, the huzzoor shroff, in his deposition, says he sorted the nuzzerana received from the talooks, and kept it in Cass Shitty's own cash chest, but that he does not know the amount

† Although the Commissioners have debited Cass Shitty, in the 105th paragraph and the account 14 and 15 Appendix A with Pagodas 87,162 6 16, as money received from extra collections, they debit him in the abstract of paragraph 70 with Pagodas 54,483 6 49; but, as already stated, there is an error in the total of this abstract, of Pagodas 32,610 13 11.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

"them, regarding their payments to Cass Shitty." The Board are of opinion, that Cass Shitty should be held responsible for such part of the extra collections only as these Tehsildars, or other valid witnesses, can prove to have reached his hands.

98. The late Mr. William Garrow's name is brought forward by Cass Shitty, in his correspondence respecting the nuzzeranah, and he appears to have made the Tehsildars and others believe that the demand he made under this head was for the benefit of his master. His assertion alone can never be admitted as implicating Mr. William Garrow, and it will be seen that he appropriated part of this nuzzerana to his private trade in tobacco, even before it was remitted to the huzzoor, and that no other evidence, not even that of Narnapah or Appajee Row, confirms the assertion of Cass Shitty.

Sandal-wood Embezzlements.

99. The next item of embezzlement noticed by the Commissioners is Pagodas 54,696 28 33, on account of sandal-wood, the whole of which is charged against Cass Shitty.

100. The late Collector, in a letter to the Board, under date the 15th June 1811, after taking a review of the produce derived from the sandal forests in Coimbatore, stated, that with the view of preventing a great increase to the establishment entertained on this account, he had, on the conclusion of fusily 1216, appointed a person of the "name of Manar Chitty to cut down the "wood, he having the small branches, saw-dust, and otherwise indifferent "parts of the tree, for the expense he should be at in keeping up a sibbendy, "and cutting the same free of all expenses whatever to the Sirkar." He adds, "that to ascertain whether the out-turn of his engagement would be so advan-"tageous as to render it expedient to retract it in the second year, the whole "quantity of branches, saw-dust, &c. were taken an account of by the revenue "servants," and that his profits, from fusily 1217 to 1219 inclusive, were ascertained to be Candies 142¼, or about Rupees 428.

101. But according to the statement of the Commissioners it appears, that the contractor, Manar Chitty, declares himself to have been a mere paid agent of Cass Shitty, who "was the principal in the business," and that this man, together with Sita Ram Sing, who was appointed by Cass Shitty to assist him, "used to reject the sample pieces if there was a difference of only two "inches, and they collected these pieces among the rejected pieces. In the "rejected pieces there would be only one-fourth of pieces quite below the "sample, and the remainder was composed of pieces one or two inches less "than the sample." It is also added, "that the pieces thus rejected were, "by Cass Shitty's orders, conveyed to his own private godowns."

102. In the opinion of the Board, it is clearly proved that Cass Shitty was the real contractor: but this of itself, though highly irregular and improper in a public servant, will not, it is feared, render him amenable to any other punishment than loss of office, unless the contract can have been proved to have been infringed. It is evident that every advantage was taken of the terms of the contract, and that the contractor accordingly appropriated to himself all pieces that were "one or two inches less than the sample;" but it would be difficult to shew that his profits from this source were contrary to an agreement expressly, though perhaps imprudently, authorizing him to take "the "rejected pieces of wood." The Commissioners, therefore, have rather exposed the imprudence of the contract than established the responsibility of the contractor; for the Board can discover no evidence to support their assertion, "that the rejected pieces were often as good, and sometimes better," than those given to Government.

103. Supposing, however, that the responsibility of Cass Shitty for his profits from this source could by any means be established, it seems doubtful whether they ever amounted to Pagodas 54,696 28 33, as shewn in the Statement No. 12, in the Appendix A. "The documents from which this account "was prepared were produced by Narniah, one of the three accountants em-"ployed at the depôts. On his being questioned respecting the sandal, soon "after the arrival of Mr. Sullivan, he brought what the Commissioners term a "fabricated account," apparently for no other reason than that it corresponded "with

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

"with that which had been written under the direction of the contractor, "Manar Chitty; but being told," add the Commissioners, "that he would be "held responsible if the true accounts were not produced, he went to Arden-"hully in Mysore, where the house of Putabramiah, one of the depôt ac-"countants, was, and brought from thence an account kept of the sandal by "Putabramiah and the other accountant Geriah, both of whom are since dead. "It is contained in a 'curtain,' a kind of black book in which the natives "write their accounts on slate." Now, though this man states that the account in question is in the hand-writing of these two persons, which is familiar to him, and that, so far as he can recollect, it corresponds with his own accounts, which he affirms were taken from him by Videlinga Pillay, the Gomashta of Cass Shitty, yet when he adds, what the Commissioners have not noticed in the body of their report, that "I don't know where they kept the "particulars of their accounts, but I now give information of the account "according to their abstract," it occurs to the Board that this account also may be fabricated. He presented, in the first instance, an account which the Commissioners would not accept: he is then threatened with being himself made responsible for these frauds, and to relieve himself from this rather serious responsibility he goes to Mysore, and returns, not with the original detailed accounts of his deceased brethren, for he knows not where they kept them, but with an abstract of theirs, of which no mention seems to have been made when he set out upon his journey. The Board, without further evidence than is before them, cannot persuade themselves that this document is authentic. The Commissioners themselves, indeed, allow that "these accounts may have "entered much of the inferior sort as standard sandal-wood, and may have "over-rated the value," yet they urge, with what consistency or propriety it is for the Government to judge, "that they ought to be adopted until they "are proved erroneous."

Sundries.

104. The only remaining embezzlement is Pagodas 8,199 12 9, under the head of sundries, of which Pagodas 5,555 33 are stated to have been embezzled in the Treasury, and Pagodas 3,643 23 47 in the districts. The whole is charged against Cass Shitty.

105. The particulars of this embezzlement are given by the Commissioners in the one hundred and eighth paragraph of their report, as follows:

	St. Pags	F.	C.
Cotton	4,565	18	22
Bandies	1,251	1	69
Lottery tickets	206	—	—
Paper	145	32	12
Carriage of money	212	38	46
Gain on exchange	1,328	11	20
Carriage of cutcherry accounts	490	—	—
Pagodas	8,199	12	9

"The three first of these sums are stated not to appear in the public accounts "as a disbursement." The first is the difference between the amount disbursed and repaid into the Treasury of advances which the Collector was authorized to make to the Ryots, for the cultivation of cotton, by the letter noted in the margin.* It is charged against Cass Shitty, "because it is perfectly clear "that the trade, after being shut to the Company, was kept open for him, "and carried on with the public money, while he endeavoured to impress the "inhabitants with the opinion that the purchases were for Government." It seems established, that Cass Shitty appropriated part of the money intended for advances for cotton to his own private trade in cotton and ghee; but the grounds upon which he is held answerable for this particular sum are not fully stated.

106. The two next items are stated both to have been paid to Cass Shitty without being entered in the public accounts; the one was for lottery-tickets, the other for making one hundred carts, of which only fifty were made, and these were employed in private trade. The two following items form together the sum of Pagodas 358 25 58, noticed also in the eighteenth paragraph of the Commissioners' report, and stated to have been "overcharged on the price of "paper and the hire of bullocks for the cutcherry." The two last items are likewise mentioned in the same part of the report: the former is stated to have been "gained by taking various coins out of the treasury, and replacing "them by others at a different rate of exchange; and the latter is explained to "have been overcharged on the hire of carts employed in carrying the cut-"cherry baggage." But the Commissioners have not given any information regarding the grounds upon which these several sums are charged against Cass Shitty, and the Board, therefore, can offer no opinion on the justice of making him answerable for the same.

107. The Board do not find that the Commissioners have included, in the general abstract which they have given of all the embezzlements, the sum of Pagodas 2,378 41 44, which, in the eighteenth paragraph of their report, is stated to have been embezzled by Cass Shitty, "in the price of sheep and "grain supplied to the Commissariat."

108. Cass Shitty, the late Treasurer, several years before the death of the late Collector, Mr. William Garrow, appears to have obtained great ascendancy, and to have been, in fact, the manager of the whole district. He superseded the head native servant, Jevun Row, in the duties of his office, and his orders to the Tehsildars, frequently accompanied with threats of dismissal or of other punishment, were received with awe, and obeyed implicitly.

109. That he availed himself of this ascendancy there seems to be no doubt, as he has himself admitted that he carried on a very extensive trade, and that he, for this purpose, sent from the Treasury the sum of Pagodas 204,000, partly from his own money and partly from the public chest.* He has likewise confessed, that his commerce was conducted by means of the public native servants; and although he denied any knowledge of frauds in the tobacco monopoly, it appears, from the depositions No. 78, 79, and 80, Appendix B, that he was at that time employing persons to dissuade Anuntiah, a gomashta in that department, from giving information, by an offer of one thousand pagodas.

110. There are also sufficient grounds for suspecting, and even believing this man of having been the chief instigation of most of the abuses that have taken place in Coimbatore; but the Board have already stated the grounds of their apprehension, that the evidence obtained by the Commissioners is not such as would enable legal proceedings to be maintained against him with success. Such proceedings, however, having been commenced by Mr. Sullivan, on his responsibility as Collector, and the Government having authorized the prosecution instituted by Cass Shitty, on account of these proceedings being defended as as a public suit, it is hoped that the present acting Collector, Mr. Thackeray, in communication with Mr. Forbes, who defends the suit on behalf of Government, will be able to adduce further and better evidence than that afforded by the Commissioners, and thereby bring the delinquent to condign punishment. To effect this, every assistance has been, and will continue to be given by the Board.

111. In regard to the late Collector, Mr. William Garrow, the Board, in obedience to the orders of Government, that they should state the extent "to which he has been implicated in the corruption of his servant Cass "Shitty," have under each head remarked, that no evidence existed of any participation in the frauds, or of a knowledge of them by that officer. It is true, that Strenevassa Row deposes that Cass Shitty told him that, in the tank department "Mr. Garrow had ordered him to write more money in the ac-"counts than the actual charges in the districts;" and there is abundant evidence to shew, that the nuzzerana was positively declared by Cass Shitty to be for the use of the Collector. Annaviah deposes, that Cass Shitty instructed him "to tell the villagers that the gentleman had been ten years in the district "without obtaining any benefit from it; that he likewise intended to settle a "ten years' rent, and afterwards go home, and therefore that they must pay "him something:" and Cass Shitty, in his letters to the Tehsildars respecting the the money collected on this account, expressly terms it "the nuzzer money "belonging to the dhori," or gentleman, the money collected on account of the "gentleman," and "the gentleman's own money." There is, consequently, reason to think that it was generally believed by the people who paid this money, that it was intended for Mr. William Garrow.

* He states, however, that all the public money was replaced.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

112. It does not, however, follow, that this was really the case: on the contrary, the more natural conclusion is that the name of Mr. Garrow was used by Cass Shitty merely to cover his own corrupt views, and in order the more easily to induce the people to contribute to the extra assessments imposed for his own use. Part of these corrupt receipts were appropriated by Cass Shitty to his commercial pursuits before they reached the Treasury, notwithstanding he had stated that the levy of this money was for the use of the gentleman.

113. Against this conclusion there are only two circumstances that have come to the knowledge of the Board: the first is the assertion of Jevun Row, the late Sheristadar, that when Annaviah assembled and bargained with those who gave in proposals for the decennial lease "to pay a nuzzer to the gentle-"man, Cass Shitty went and advised him of this from time to time;" the other is the statement contained in the sixtieth paragraph of the Commissioners' report, that when the Board, on the 2d August 1813, stopped all proceedings in the decennial lease, and consequently materially impeded the further progress of extra collections, Cass Shitty, to induce the modifications of these orders, "summoned the Serishtadar, and directed him to make out a state-"ment immediately," shewing that six hundred and four villages had already been actually settled on a decennial lease, and that Mr. Garrow, in a letter to the Board of the 10th September 1813, transmitted the statement so prepared, and represented to the Board that the six hundred and four villages had already been leased out, whereas, in fact, such statement was false, as the lease did not commence until six months afterwards, in March 1814, nor was a single village given away until the 23d April 1814.

114. The assertions of Jevun Row, if true, would undoubtedly implicate the character of Mr. William Garrow; but it does not seem deserving of the least attention. Jevun Row himself declares, that it is mere hearsay evidence. "I heard of this," says he, "but do not know the particulars;" and though nothing is more probable than that Cass Shitty would endeavour to strengthen the belief he had inculcated, of the nuzzerana being for Mr. William Garrow's use, by pretending to communicate with him respecting it, there is not a tittle of evidence to shew that he ever actually did so.

115. Into the other circumstance before-mentioned the Board have not deemed it necessary to examine minutely, because the death of the Collector has deprived them of the aid of the explanations which he might have afforded.

116. The Commissioners admit, that a proclamation was published by Mr. Garrow, notifying, as they say, "that it was intended to make a decennial "lease of the country, from 1223 to 1232 inclusive; that the rent of the vil-"lages had already been determined upon, and exhorting the inhabitants to "increase their cultivation as much as possible."

117. The words of the advertisement, as given by them, are as follow:

118. "Translation of an advertisement published by William Garrow, Esq. "Collector of Coimbatore and Daraapooram, lying north and south of the "Noiel and the Ghauts, for the information of the Monigars and the inha-"bitants, and all other people in general in the district of Coimbatore, dated "10th June 1813.

119. "Having determined to rent the villages upon a decennial lease, from "the year stremoga of fusily 1223, up to the end of the year chittrabaunoo of "fusily 1232, the villages will be rented out according to a bereez already "fixed, but not upon the bereez of the Razeenamahs to be received from the "Ryots for this year; therefore the Monigars and head inhabitants of the vil-"lages should use their best endeavours to extend their cultivation, and be "ready for renting the villages at the time fixed."

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

120. It will thus be observed, that the inhabitants were distinctly assured, in June 1813, that the villages would be rented, not only on a bereez already fixed, but that they would be rented upon the bereez of the Razeenamahs to be received from the Ryots for that year; "therefore the Monigars and head "inhabitants should use their best endeavours to extend their cultivation, and "be ready for renting their villages at the time fixed."

121. The date of this advertisement is but twenty-one days before the close of fusily 1222, and therefore the rent to be made was to commence from fusily 1223, or July 1813. But the Commissioners state, that on the receipt of the Board's orders of the 2d August 1813, the lease had not yet even been begun; and add, that the lease stated on the 10th September 1813 to have been extended to six hundred and four villages, was not begun till March 1814, nor the first villages given away till the 23d April.

122. In order clearly to understand this part of the question, it will be best to quote Mr. William Garrow's letter of the 10th September 1813.

"I would sooner have replied to your Board's orders of the 2d ultimo, had "I not been engaged in bringing into a more compact state the accounts "which must necessarily accompany the present address.

"In pursuance of your Board's orders in the minute of the 11th March "last, I considered it my duty to commence, as soon as possible, the settle-"ment of the two divisions on a decennial, and ultimately a permanent lease.

"The talooks and villages, as they presented themselves the most prepared "for the settlement, were the objects of immediate inquiry, and the result was "the settlement of the accounts of the talooks mentioned in the margin,* "embracing six hundred and four villages.

"I had previously† proclaimed your Board's intention of introducing the "new system, in order that the persons who were to come forward as renters "might be encouraged to the extension of their cultivation, under the assurance "of your Board's decided wish that the ryotwarry system should cease imme-"diately that it was practicable.

"Since the receipt of your Board's letter I have inquired into the state "of the cultivation of the district, and find that, on the assurance held out to "them, the head inhabitants have laid out a considerable sum of money in "advances for the improvement of different villages.

"It is, therefore, with no small degreee of diffidence, that I now address "your Board as to how I shall act.

"The talooks mentioned in the enclosed Statement A have been, to all "intents and purposes, settled upon the assurance of the lease, and money "has been laid out in consequence by the head inhabitants.

"I know of no way of avoiding the engagements now formed, unless it be "done by your Board and Government, should it be deemed justifiable to "annul them as being still subject to the approval of superior authority. If "so, an advertisement to this effect, direct from your Board, will, I presume, "be absolutely necessary, to prevent the confidence of the inhabitants being "shaken in the Collector, as to any future engagements which he may wish "to enter into with them.

"The accounts now forwarded require no particular remark for the present: "they exhibit a rent-roll of the villages already settled, and the Statement B "exhibits the plan upon which each has been settled. Until the receipt of "some decisive orders for annulling or confirming the settlement made, I "shall abstain from any communication of the subject of this reference to the "persons who are interested in the settlement; but I request it may be speedy, "as the season is advancing, and no small discontent may be occasioned should "the engagements be annulled at a late period.

"In the meantime, it would only be occupying your Board's attention unnecessarily to enter into any detail of the accounts, until the subject be brought before you in a complete state."

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

123. The Board beg leave to submit to Government, whether the case is not correctly put by Mr. William Garrow. In paragraph 3 he distinctly reports the "settlement of the accounts" of the talooks named, embracing six hundred and four villages. In paragraph 4 he refers to his proclamation of June 1813; and in paragraph 7 he declares that the talooks mentioned have been, to all intents and purposes, "settled upon the assurances of the lease." In paragraph 8 he states, that the lease is subject to the approval of superior authority; and when, in paragraph 9, he refers to the accounts exhibiting a rent-roll of the villages already settled, the Board submit whether more can be meant than is implied from paragraph 3 to paragraph 7 inclusive, viz. that the amount of the revenue of each village has been fixed, and the faith of Government for the lease pledged generally to the people, but that no village had yet been actually settled, further than upon the "assurances of the lease." This, it is true, was not the exact interpretation given to the Collector's letter by the Board, in their address to Government of the 16th September 1816; but, on a further consideration of it, they think that it may fairly admit of this meaning. It is probable, that the Board's letter to Government led the Commissioners to conclude that Mr. Garrow had really and distinctly reported the actual renting of six hundred and four villages.

124. The proclamation issued in December 1813 (see 66, Appendix B), although issued after the sanction of Government had been received to continue the lease, agrees in substance with that issued in June. It states the amount of the rent to have been already fixed, and that the produce of the current year would not be inquired into; and this is repeated, under a supposition that the proclamation of June had not been generally understood. It then proceeds to notify, that the Collector intended to commence his circuit in January 1814, to lease the respective villages for ten years; the people therefore were to use their efforts to increase the cultivation, and to be in readiness to make proposals; and all who might wish to rent the villages were desired to be careful to present their proposals, as it was intended that all the respectable cultivators and head inhabitants, as well as the substantial Ryots of good character, should be included in the rent of their respective villages.

125. On the whole, therefore, although from the great and undue influence that Cass Shitty exercised in the province, a presumption may be admitted that the accounts which Mr. William Garrow submitted with his letter of the 10th September 1813 may have been fabricated, to promote the views imputed to Cass Shitty, by the Commission, in paragraphs 59 and 60 of their report, there does not seem to be just cause to charge the late Mr. William Garrow with having made a false report to the Board. That gentleman relied on the pledge given in his proclamation of June 1813; and under that pledge, and the preparation of the accounts, he declared that the villages in question had, to all "intents and purposes, been settled upon the assurance of the lease" It should be recollected, that he had, in June 1813, declared that "the bereez "was already fixed;" and when a bereez is fixed, little more remains to be done than to receive the assent of the parties. Accordingly, in December 1813, he proclaimed that he would commence his circuit to "lease the respective villages," and receive the proposals of all who might wish to rent. The proceedings of the late Mr. William Garrow, so far as they thus appear in this transaction, do not, therefore, seem open to the blame that may be inferred from the Commissioners report.

126. The Commissioners, in closing their report, after descanting on the great extent and notoriety of the abuses in Coimbatore, and stating that though twenty or thirty thousand inhabitants of that province have been paying extra collections for several years, probably not twenty have sought redress from the courts, proceed to impugn the efficiency of our institution, by observing that we open to the people courts to which they will not go, and that the Ryots are "virtually out of the protection of the law;" and finally, to urge that "the "only effectual remedies for these disorders are to increase the pay of the "higher classes of native revenue servants, to repeal the servant Regulation

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

"as far as it regards the revenue department, and to empower the Collector "to investigate and determine all cases of extra collection and embezzlement, "and to recover the amount by summary process."

127. The Board have no hesitation in recording their opinion, that if complaints were not made to the Courts respecting the abuses in Coimbatore, it is to be attributed to very different causes than the inefficiency of these tribunals.

128. The report of the Commissioners, although it elucidates the abuses practised in Coimbatore, does not shew that the people themselves have suffered any great oppression. In the tank department, it was the Government only that sustained any injury; in the tobacco department, the Ryot is stated often to have sold his tobacco at a rate lower than that to which, under the orders of the Board, he would have been entitled. But the head Assistant Collector, Mr. Whish, who has long resided in the district, and whose local knowledge of the effects of the tobacco monopoly must consequently be superior to that of the Commissioners, asserts positively, that though the Ryot did not perhaps obtain his full dues, he did not lose by the arrangement. "On "the establishment of the tobacco monopoly," says he,* "it was considered "necessary to fix the prices at something above the current value, in order to "insure the cultivator from the ill effects which must otherwise have been ex- "perienced from a limited number of purchasers, and they, in consequence, "cultivated tobacco to as great an extent, and with as much confidence, as if the "market had been entirely open." The conclusion from this is irresistible, that whatever the Government may have lost by paying high prices, the Ryots generally obtained the fair value of their tobacco by some means or other. In point of fact, the corruption and frauds of the servants of Government were generally participated in by the Ryots: by the heads of villages certainly, if not by all the Ryots.

129. Though the Government also lost by the reduction of their revenue, in consequence of the extra collections made in the country, the Commissioners themselves have shewn, that even on their own statement of these collections, which the Board consider unauthenticated accounts, the Ryots did not materially suffer, for they prove that these collections during nine years exceeded what they ought to have paid as revenue by only Pagodas 45,000, or about five thousand pagodas per annum for the whole district.

130. In the opinion of the Board of Revenue, it is the Government, rather than the Ryots, that have suffered from the abuses in Coimbatore. Instead of proving the inefficiency of our institutions for the administration of justice, the report of the Commissioners goes exclusively to establish the want of sufficient controul in the superintending revenue authorities. It is to the supineness of the Collector, and to the corruption of his servants, that all the abuses are attributable; and while the Board are willing to hope that no negligence or want of attention to the interests of Government can be imputed to them, as the utmost vigilance at the presidency could never have detected the abuses in Coimbatore, still the want of an efficient controul and systematic local superintendence is so strongly evinced in every part of the Commissioners' report, that they beg leave earnestly to recommend to the most serious consideration of Government their former proposal, that one of their members should always be employed on deputation in the provinces.

131. In conclusion, some opinion may be expected from the Board on the several recommendations of the Commissioners.

132. With respect to the first, regarding an increase in the pay of the superior native revenue servants, the Board beg leave to state, that the scale of allowances lately sanctioned for servants of this description† appears to them sufficiently liberal, and will, it is hoped, answer the intended purpose of better securing their fidelity.

133. In regard to the repeal of the present servant Regulations, the report of the Commissioners themselves is, in the opinion of the Board, conclusive against it. The whole of the irregularities in Coimbatore may be traced to the

* Letter from Mr. Whish, dated the 18th March 1817.
† From Government, under date the 22d March 1818.

the influence which Cass Shitty exercised over the inferior servants, originating in his being allowed to place and displace them at pleasure; in short, to the neglect of those very rules for the security of those servants which the Commissioners recommend for abolition.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

134. The Board are of opinion, that the report of the Commissioners contains abundant arguments in favour of even a stricter adherence to the rules contained in the servant Regulations. This has often, especially of late, been inculcated by the Board; but the arbitrary authority formerly exercised by the Collectors has rendered it difficult to reconcile them to restrictions of this description, however wholesome.

135. On this subject, the Board beg leave most particularly to refer to the correspondence noted in the margin,* in which the utility of the servant Regulations is discussed, and to observe, that while the present Regulations enable a Collector to dismiss a servant for misconduct, on evidence even short of full judicial proof, they render the revenue officers the servants of the public, not those of the Collector; they guard the honest and deserving from the hasty, and often capricious dismissals formerly so frequent; and, if adhered to, would prevent inferior servants, of even a supine Collector, from becoming dependent on his corrupt Sheristadar or treasurer. Mr. Sullivan has given many of the late servants implicated in the Coimbatore abuses highly respectable characters, and the Board feel satisfied, that a want of confidence in the strict adherence to the servant Regulations alone induced their acquiescence therein. But the whole number (being upwards of sixty, whose pay exceeded ten rupees) were suspended by the Collector, and the suspension of all is recommended to be confirmed, both by Mr. Sullivan and by Mr. Thackeray, notwithstanding their various degrees of guilt, and that the inquiry prescribed by the Regulations has not been gone into.†

136. With reference to the last communication of the Commissioners, that Collectors should be empowered "to investigate and determine all cases of "extra collection and embezzlement, and to recover the amount by summary "process," the Board beg leave to observe, that so far back as the 11th December 1815, they submitted to Government the draft of a Regulation "for "empowering Collectors, in certain cases, to institute a regular inquiry into "the conduct of the native revenue servants and Curnums, who are or have "been employed in the district under their charge, or into the conduct of the "relations, servants, agents, or dependents of such persons, with a view to the "prompt recovery of all public money embezzled, and all money or other "valuable considerations, all bribes, nuzzerana or other extra collections, not "authorized by the Regulations, unduly accepted, taken, or exacted by such "persons, for fraudulent or corrupt purposes, in any way injurious to the settlement, collection, or appropriation of the public revenue; for rescinding "Regulation XXXIII. 1802, and providing for the more adequate punishment "of embezzlement or misappropriation of the public money, the withholding, "concealing, or injuriously destroying public papers, accounts, or records, the "forgery or fraudulent alteration of revenue papers, accounts, or records, and "bribery, exaction, or fraud, injurious to the settlement, collection, or appro- "priation of the public revenue, on the part of native revenue officers and "Curnums, their relations, servants, agents, dependents, or others, and for "preventing native revenue officers from being concerned in trade."

137. The Board again beg leave respectfully to recommend the early promulgation of the proposed law. The long period during which it has been under the consideration of the Sudder Adawlut may perhaps enable that court to improve its provisions; but to delay longer its enactment, is to expose the revenue to further depredations, such as those so fully detailed in the Commissioners' report.

Proceedings of Board of Revenue, 29 Dec. 1817.

138. The Board of Revenue, in the examination into which they have found themselves compelled to go of the report from the Commissioners in Coimbatore, have had the orders of Government chiefly in view, which directed them to report on the means "best calculated to promote the ends of justice, to "recover the property which may have been embezzled, and to secure the "interests of the Company." They are quite disposed to admit, that the inquiry, as conducted by the Commissioners, and the evidence obtained by them, would, in former times, have been considered sufficient to warrant the recovery from the servants and others of the sums made out against them by an examination of district accounts, and even, perhaps, to justify the recommendation of the Commissioners, that the onus of proving that the money had not been received or appropriated by them should lie on the accused.* But since courts of justice have been established, all classes of persons, including revenue servants, are placed under their protection, and to compel a refund of money without legal evidence of its receipt, or evidence that public money had been misappropriated, would involve the Government in vexatious law-suits and serious responsibility. It is in this point, in particular, that the Board are of opinion, that the proceedings of the Commissioners are defective and inconclusive. They furnish, no doubt, abundant revenue evidence of fraud, embezzlement, and corruption; but on the subject of the amount of the frauds, embezzlements, and corruption of those who are legally answerable for these acts, of those who are entitled to recover, and of the evidence on which to proceed, the Board conclude that the Governor in Council will concur with them in opinion, that the report of the Commissioners does not contain satisfactory information.

Mr. SULLIVAN'S OBSERVATIONS.

To the Chief Secretary to Government, Fort St. George.

Letter from Mr. Sullivan to Government.

SIR:

The Board or Revenue having furnished me with a copy of their minutes on the report made to Government by the Commission appointed to inquire into the affairs of Coimbatore, in which censures are passed on the proceedings of the Commission, I have thought it my duty, as a member of that Commission, to explain some passages in the report, which have been misunderstood in the minutes, and I request you will do me the honour to lay the enclosed paper of remarks before the Right Honourable the Governor in Council.

2. It was not my intention to have troubled Government on this subject, until after a decision had been passed by the court at Trichinopoly on the suit now pending before it: but as there appears no prospect of the trial being brought to a speedy conclusion, I have considered it right to submit these explanations without further delay.

3. It is proper also to state, that the greater part of them were seen and approved by Colonel Munro, previous to his embarkation for Europe.

I have, &c.

Coimbatore,
2d March 1819.

Remarks on the Proceedings of the Board of Revenue, under date the 29th December 1817, upon the Report submitted to Government by the Commission appointed to inquire into the affairs of Coimbatore.

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

Paragraph 1 to 7, relative to the question "whether Mr. Garrow was "or was not implicated in the peculations of his servants." The Board of opinion, that the Commission should have stated their sentiments upon this subject.

1. The Commission did not consider themselves at liberty to give an opinion upon this subject. Sufficient evidence did not appear before the Commissioners to warrant them in pronouncing decidedly that Mr. Garrow was implicated in the abuses of his servants: at the same time it appeared to the Commissioners, that so many and such great abuses could not have gone on for such a length of time undetected, without a degree of negligence, at least, on the part of Mr. Garrow, which was highly censurable. The Commissioners, however, forbore to state that as their opinion, as Mr. Garrow was not alive to answer for his conduct. That which appeared to the Commission strong presumptive proof against Mr. Garrow, might have received quite a different colouring from his explanations. On the whole, therefore, it is hoped that Government will be satisfied that the Commissioners acted with discretion, in omitting all mention of the late Collector's name in their report, except in cases where his own correspondence brought brought facts to light, which enabled the Commissioners to draw unerring conclusions.

Par. 8 to 12 recapitulate the several items of embezzlement, and their appropriations, as stated by the proceedings of the Commission, require no remark.

Par. 14 to 19. Strictures on the mode adopted by the Commission for obtaining the accounts of extra collections.

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

2. Having stated that "the accounts given in by the Commission were not checked, by comparing them on the spot with the reports of the Ryots," the Board proceed to say, that they were not perhaps correctly informed of the precise objects of the Commission; but if the recovery of money embezzled, or the restoration of extra collections to the persons from whom they were exacted, were amongst those objects (and from the proceedings instituted against Cass Shitty this would appear to have been the case), it was certainly necessary that they should prove the correctness of the accounts on which they proceeded, and even ascertain all individual payments. And, in the following paragraph, the Board say, the nature of the examination of the three districts taken immediately by the Commissioners is not explained, and it is doubtful whether the individuals who paid the money were called before the Commissioners for examination. The depositions of a few inhabitants and Curnums only are given, in the appendix to the report, on the subject of the extra collections.

3. The remarks to be made upon these paragraphs are, that the proceedings against Cass Shitty were instituted by the Collector under the orders of the Board of Revenue: that the Commissioners had no power to commence legal proceedings, either against Cass Shitty or against any other person, for the recovery of the money: that no power is vested, either with the Commission, the Collector, or with any extra judicial tribunal, for the restoration to the Ryots of extra collections: that nothing short of a decree of a court of justice is necessary before Ryots can recover money illegally taken from them, either by public servants or others. A reference to the instructions of Government to the Commission would have shewn the Board the objects for which it was appointed. The Board would have seen, that these objects embraced a general inquiry into the state of the province of Coimbatore in all its branches, and that, under these instructions, it was absolutely impossible for the Commission to have entered into those minute details which the Board have stated were absolutely necessary to establish the conclusions drawn by the Commission in their report.

Instead of "a few depositions from the inhabitants and Curnums being only "given on the subject of extra collections," as the Board have asserted, depositions from all the Tehsildars, many of the Sheristadars, and a number of the Gomashtas, were taken.

4. The depositions of these persons was the groundwork of the proceedings of the Commission on this head of their inquiry. The fact of extra collections having been made to a large amount, in every part of the district, for a series of years, was established beyond a doubt, by the evidence of the parties employed in making them, and by the actual receipt of a sum of money in the treasury on that account.

5. This evidence being strengthened by the principal Monigars and Curnums, and many of the Ryots, the only question for consideration was the best mode of ascertaining the sum collected. The amount given in by the public servants and by the Monigars and Curnums could not be relied on, because both these parties were implicated in the peculations. The Tehsildars readily deposed to the sums which they had paid to Cass Shitty, and the Monigars to what they had paid to the district servants, but both one and the other were silent as to the sums they had respectively misappropriated. A further inquiry, therefore, became necessary; and it appeared to the Commission that the only way in which such an inquiry could be carried on with any prospect of success, was the deputation of persons conversant in revenue business, to get from the Curnums accounts of the receipts and disbursements of some of the talooks for a period of ten years, whilst a similar inquiry should be carried on in other talooks, under the immediate superintendence of the Commission.

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

6. The Commissioners could not, consistently with the other duties which they had to perform, personally superintend the inquiry in all the districts; it became necessary, therefore, to entrust a part of it to native agents.

7. The old servants could not be employed in that duty; neither could they be permitted to remain in office, whilst the inquiry was carried on, for all the influence belonging to their office would have been exerted, and exerted effectually, to frustrate the inquiry. Neither Ryots or village servants would have ventured to give information of the frauds which had been carried on, so long as the old servants continued in authority: recourse was therefore had to persons unconnected with the district. It is a mistake, however, to suppose, as the Board have stated, that all the old servants were dismissed, or that the persons who drew out the accounts had a direct interest in fixing guilt on the old servants. Most of the Tehsildars and Sheristadars were removed; but a majority of the Gomashtas sent to draw out the accounts of extra collections were temporary servants, whose employment was to cease when their work was completed.

8. These accounts were translations from the original accounts given in by the Curnums. They were taken in the only way in which revenue accounts are ever taken, viz. from the Curnums in person, by Gomashtas employed for the purpose. They are just as much to be depended upon, therefore, as the Curnums' annual accounts of the revenue, which are taken in the same manner. Some parts are true and some are false, but, in the main, they are good. The probability is, that the Curnums and Monigars either saddled the Tehsildars and Sheristadars with many sums which they embezzled themselves; or that they gave true accounts against those persons, and made no mention, or a very slight one, of their own peculations.

9. It has been said, that the accounts should have been verified upon oath, and by an examination vivâ voce of the Ryots before the Commission.

10. How far the authenticity of the accounts was likely to be established by the oath of the Curnums is a matter of opinion. The Commission were not of opinion that oaths would have had that effect. But, in some cases, the accounts were verified, both by the oath of the Curnums and by a personal examination of the Ryots. The result of this examination was given in the appendix of the report, which the Board have overlooked: it went to prove, that the collections had been of much greater magnitude than the Curnums' account shewed them to me.

11. To talk of examining more than one hundred thousand Ryots about their payments for eight or ten years, is to talk without consideration, and without reflecting both upon the nature of revenue accounts and of the character and disposition of the Ryots. Not one Ryot, perhaps, in one hundred, can state distinctly the exact amount of his payments made in any one year, without reference to his receipts; and their receipts the Monigars and Curnums withhold from them when they can, particularly if money has been exacted from them beyond the amount entered in their pottahs The Curnums are the only people who can speak positively upon this subject, and if their accounts are unworthy of credit in this instance, they are so in others. The fact of extra collections having been made was already established. For the particulars and amount of them, recourse was had to the Curnums. More accurate accounts might, perhaps, have been obtained in some instances, if the Curnums had been confronted with the old revenue servants. Sums written off to the revenue servants might have been proved against the Curnums themselves. The Curnums had certainly no interest in making the amount of extra collections in the accounts larger than they really were. To ascertain the amount correctly was of greater importance at the time, than to ascertain its appropriation. Indeed, to prove payments of this kind is next to impossible, as they are generally made in the absence of witnesses. The assertions of the Monigar or Curnum would, therefore, have been opposed to that of the Tehsildar. Mutual recrimination would have been the consequence of confronting the Curnums with the old servants, much valuable time would have been consumed, and after all no fact of consequence perhaps established.

The

Par. 22. Strictures on the proceedings adopted by the Commission for ascertaining the amount of embezzlement from the repair department.

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

The twenty-second paragraph of the Board's proceedings commences with the following quotation from the Commissioners' report. "The particulars of the tank embezzlements," say the Commissioners, "cannot at present be known, in consequence, as is stated, of the destruction of the original accounts, and the death, sickness, or flight of the principal agents employed." They observe, however, that "Narnapah, the Treasury Gomashta, was so completely master of the subject, as to be able, with the help of public accounts and some memorandums of his own, to shew not only the whole amount embezzled in the repairs, but that of each year, and the particular work to which it was falsely charged." But, in paragraph twenty-one, the Commission observe, that though the "particulars of tank embezzlements cannot at present be known, the gross sums, amounting to Pagodas 43,894, have been ascertained by means of Narnapah, the Treasury Gomashta. The Board conclude, that this explanation is meant to be confined to the embezzlement of the Treasury."

13. The Commissioners, after stating, in paragraph 20, that the true accounts of the repairs had been destroyed, or concealed so effectually that not a single one had been discovered, proceed in paragraph 21 as follows:

"But though the particulars of the tank embezzlements cannot at present be known, the gross sums, amounting to Pagodas 43,894, have been ascertained, by means of Narnapah, the Treasury Gomashta, who besides acting in his official capacity under the Treasurer, Cass Shitty, was also employed by him in keeping his private accounts. Narnapah, therefore, knew every sum that was transferred to Cass Shitty's private accounts, and the particular head of that account to which it was carried. He was ordered, in November 1814, by Cass Shitty, to come from the Treasury at Bhovany to Coimbatore, and to bring with him the accounts of the tanks, and of all Cass Shitty's private concerns. He lived in Cass Shitty's house till May 1815, and was, during all that time, engaged in arranging and settling his accounts, and when finished Cass Shitty took the whole from him. He was so completely master of the subject, however, as to be able, with the help of the public accounts and some memorandums of his own, to shew not only the whole amount embezzled in the repairs, but that of each year, and the particular works to which it was falsely charged."

14. The meaning of the Commission, in the expressions which have been pointed at by the Board, appear here to be sufficiently evident. The particulars of the embezzlements actually committed in the tank department could not be known, because the accounts of them had been destroyed, or were not forthcoming. But the particulars of the embezzlements made from that fund immediately by Cass Shitty were known from the evidence of the person who had been a principal agent in making them; of the person who had kept both Cass Shitty's public and private accounts, and who, in consequence, was able to state with accuracy the exact amount of money issued from the Treasury for repairs, the exact amount remitted to the different talooks on that account, and the exact amount embezzled by Cass Shitty. He had also opportunities of knowing the particular works of which overcharges were made in the accounts fabricated at the huzzoor, although he could not give information of the embezzlements made in the talooks. He did not pretend to account for the whole sum of money which passed into the hands of the Superintendents of repairs from the general Treasury, but merely for that portion of it which went through his hands into the coffers of Cass Shitty.

15. There appears, therefore, nothing irreconcilable in the expressions used by the Commissioners, viz. that the particulars of the embezzlement made in the tank department were not known, although the particulars of the embezzlements made from that department by Cass Shitty were accurately ascertained by the evidence of Narnapah.

Par. 23 relates to the accounts given in by Narnapah, and states that it was an extraordinary proceeding to require Appajee Row to

16. The Commission had stated before, that Appajee Row and Narnapah were the two principal persons employed by Cass Shitty in the Treasury: that they were his public public Gomashtas and private agents, and as such intimately acquainted with all his concerns: that they had been called to Coimbatore some time in the year 1814, for the purpose of making a settlement of these accounts, which settlement they accordingly made and delivered the accounts to Cass Shitty. It was from memory, therefore, alone, or from memorandums which the parties might be in possession of, that an account of Cass Shitty's embezzlement could be known. Narnapah undertook to draw out such an account, and Appajee Row swore that, to the best of his belief and knowledge, it was a true account. There was nothing extraordinary in requiring one man to swear to the truth of an account drawn out by another person, when the account related to transactions in which both parties had been equally and at the same time engaged. The orders for advances from the Treasury and repayments to it were from Cass Shitty, through Appajee Row, to Narnapah. They were both equally involved in the transactions: what one did, the other knew, and vicè versâ. Appajee Row would not have undertaken to draw out such an account, because he had no wish to give information against Cass Shitty. Narnapah wished to reveal every thing he knew, and having first deposed to the part Appajee Row had played in the transactions, he drew out the account, which was submitted to the inspection of Appajee Row, who verified it upon oath, except in a few particulars of inferior importance.

...r to an account drawn up by Narnapah. States that the information given by Dhurmaroy Pillay and Seenevassa Row was unimportant.

17. Appajee Row would not have spoken at all, if Narnapah's evidence had not involved him in a way that he could not extricate himself from. He was an unwilling witness, and therefore his testimony is the more to be relied upon. Perhaps in the report too much is said of Narnapah's memory, and too little of his documents. The Commissioners were aware that he possessed documents sufficient to render it unnecessary to trust solely to memory in any instance; but they were found, upon examination by one of the principal servants of the cutcherry, to be so much intermixed with notes and memorandums, as to be unintelligible to any but the compiler himself. It is probable, also, that Appajee Row was equally well provided with written evidence, though he did not choose to acknowledge it. It seldom happens that persons of this description, who are employed in frauds, omit to keep an account of them: this they do as a protection to themselves.

18. The information given both by Dhurmaroy Pillay and by Seenevassa Row was decisive and important. Dhurmaroy Pillay deposed, that "he was employed as an accountant in the repair department for seven years: that the sum estimated for repairs in those years was Star Pagodas 1,12,851, which sum was charged as expended in the accounts: that the actual expenditure was only Star Pagodas 67,000, and that an overcharge was made in the account for 45,000 and odd pagodas; and that he, the deponent, wrote all the particulars of those accounts." Seenevassa Row deposed, "that he was employed as a superintendent of the repairs for six years: that Cass Shitty told deponent that Mr. Garrow had ordered more money to be written in the accounts than was expended: that deponent told this to Dhurmaroy Pillay, the accountant: that the accounts were written accordingly, and given to huzzoor Sumpretty Laurungapauny Pillay by Cass Shitty's order: that deponent recollects that 26,000 pagodas more than the expenditure was charged in the accounts in one division."

Narnapah swore, that he had given credit in Cass Shitty's private accounts for 42,000 pagodas received from the repair money, from fusly 1217 to fusily 1224.

Appajee Row swore, that he recollected credit was given for 42,100 pagodas from the repair money.

19. Here, therefore, we have the testimony of two of Cass Shitty's private agents, that they gave him credit in account for a large sum embezzled from the repairs in certain years; and we have the testimony of two of the principal persons employed in the repair department, that large embezzlements were made in that department, in certain years, by Cass Shitty, by charging in the accounts a much larger sum than was expended, which accounts were written by the deponents themselves.

20. Having

Par. 29. The first evidence respecting the tank repair embezzlements, it appears, was contained in a memorandum given to the Collector, on the 21st September 1815, drawn up by Narnapah, Huzzoor Gomashta employed in the Treasury, in which it was stated that Cass Shitty had taken 42,150 pagodas on the 23d of that month. Narnapah, Appajee Row, Dhurmaroy Pillay, and Seenevassa Row, gave further declarations on this subject Narnapah at this time declares, that he gave credit for 42,150 pagodas from the repair money in Cass Shitty's private accounts; and he adds, "this is all I know." Appajee Row on oath merely confirms this statement. Seencvassa Row deposes, that Cass Shitty told him that Mr. W. Garrow had ordered him to write more money in the accounts than the actual charges in the talooks, and that accordingly 26 000 pagodas more than the actual expenditure was charged in the accounts. Dhurmaroy Pillay states, that a sum of 45,000 and odd pagodas was entered in the account more than the actual charges, and that the sum was taken by Cass Shitty. He adds, "I wrote all the particulars of these "accounts." The Commissioners in their report observe, that the original accounts of both divisions passed through the hand of Dhurmaroy Pillay, who states that "he "delivered them to Saurungapauny "Pillay, after fabricating new ones "with a sum of 45,000 pagodas "added to the actual expenditure;" but they do not point out a very particular circumstance in this man's evidence, viz. that after charging Cass Shitty with this embezzlement, he adds a postscript to his deposition as follows · "I wrote my deposi- "tion that Cass Shitty took 45,000 "and odd pagodas. The following "are the particulars of this. The "accounts of the actual charges in "the talooks were sent to Saurunga- "pauny Pillay: he gave me these "accounts, and ordered me to add "45,000 and odd pagodas more "than the actual expenses. Agree- "able to his order I wrote fresh "accounts and gave them to Sau- "rungapauny Pillay. Cass Shitty "was Superintendent of the repairs, "and I think, therefore, that he "must have received the amount."

26. There is little doubt that considerable abuses were committed in the tank department in Coimbatore, during the period under notice. In the opinion of the Board, however, it would have been more desirable that the best legal evidence against the actual perpetrators of the frauds, and of the amount of the embezzlements received by each delinquent, should have been obtained, than that the report should be confined to a general statement of embezzlements, on evidence so defectively taken and arranged as that procured from Narnapah and Appajee Row.

20. Having no accounts to speak from, the witnesses did not pretend to enter into the particulars of the embezzlements; but they all swore pointedly to the fact, and confessed that they had been Cass Shitty's instruments in committing it.

21. The evidence, therefore, against Cass Shitty was as complete as it could possibly be in the absence of the accounts, and fully warranted the Collector in resorting to extreme measures against Cass Shitty, fruitless attempts having been previously made to obtain possession of the accounts from Saurungapauny Pillay, the person into whose possession they had been delivered by Dhurmaroy Pillay.

22. With regard to the postscript to Dhurmaroy Pillay's deposition, to which the Board attach particular importance, it is to be remarked that the only persons who did know, or could know, that Cass Shitty had made away with the money, were Narnapah and Appajee Row, the Treasury Gomashtas, and his private agents. They, under his orders, had embezzled the money, and they positively swore that they had done so. Their evidence went immediately to convict Cass Shitty. Dhurmaroy Pillay's evidence was merely corroborative of theirs. They swore to the embezzlement of the money by Cass Shitty as a fact within their own knowledge: Dhurmaroy Pillay swore that he had the strongest reason for believing that Cass Shitty had taken it. This postscript, therefore, did not appear to the Commission to need remark, and it remained unnoticed.

23. The actual perpetrator of the fraud was Cass Shitty. His agents were two of the Treasury Gomashtas, two or three of the superintendents of the repairs, and two of the accountants of the department stationed at the huzzoor. The substance of evidence given by four of the seven of these agents has been stated in the preceding paragraphs. One of the huzzoor accountants, Saurungapauny Pillay, was sent to jail for refusing to give up the accounts, and the other two superintendents were either dead or absent from the district.

24. To examine people in detail upon a question of accounts, when accounts were not forthcoming to refer to, appeared to the Commissioners quite useless. But before the Board of Revenue pronounced judgment so decidedly against the proceedings of the Commission, it would have been well if they had informed themselves accurately of the real nature of the transaction, and whether the production of accounts was at all necessary to substantiate the embezzlements against Cass Shitty.

25. Cass Shitty's transactions with the Treasury, as explained at length in the Commissioners' report, were extremely simple. When money was advanced from the Treasury for the repairs or for the tobacco monopoly, it was deposited in a separate chest in the cutcherry, a portion of it was appropriated for the public service, and the remainder to replace the advances which Cass Shitty had received from the Treasury for his private trade. The money never passed out of the cutcherry. The same persons who took it from the public Treasury deposited it in the separate chest, and they again took it from the separate chest and deposited it in the public Treasury. It was through the hands of these persons alone that the money passed: passed: they gave Cass Shitty credit for it in his private accounts, of which they were the keepers; they alone were privy to the commission of the fraud by Cass Shitty: their direct testimony, therefore, in so simple a transaction, was abundantly sufficient, in the absence of accounts, to prove the fraud against Cass Shitty.

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

26. If the money had ever gone from the cutcherry, or had passed through numerous channels and returned in a circuitous route to Cass Shitty, it would have been infinitely more difficult to have traced the fraud to him, and more evidence than what was given would have been necessary, before extreme measures were resorted to against him.

27. The Commissioners themselves, indeed, seem to have been aware of the objectionable nature of the evidence of these persons, for it is offered by them rather as the only evidence they could procure, than as satisfactory proof. The destruction of the original accounts obliged them (they say) to be satisfied with the short abstract of tank repair embezzlement entered in the Treasury statement.

27. The Commission never considered this evidence to be in the least degree objectionable: so much the contrary, that they were always of opinion that the evidence of the parties concerned with Cass Shitty in the frauds was the very best that could be obtained against him. They were obliged to be content with the short account of the tank repair embezzlements entered in the Treasury statement, because they could not contain more detailed accounts. They wished, if possible, to have ascertained the whole amount embezzled, instead of that part of it only which was traced home to Cass Shitty. This they could not do without accounts. The amount has not been to this day ascertained, nor will it ever be, as those accounts were destroyed.

31 States that Narnapah and Appajee Row being under suspension when examined by the Commissioners, it must be presumed they were under some bias when they gave their evidence, and that Narnapah has been rewarded for the evidence he gave, by being restored to his situation with an increase of pay.

28. Narnapah was never suspended from the service, neither was Appajee Row suspended when he first gave his evidence; the Board are incorrect, therefore, in stating that Narnapah was restored to the service as a reward for the evidence which he gave: neither was he bribed by the Collector to give his evidence by an increase being made to his pay.

29. When the whole establishment of the district was revised in fusily 1225 (many months after the proceedings of the Commission were closed), Narnapah, with sixteen other servants, was recommended to the Board for an increase of his pay from seven to ten pagodas. The importance of the situation he filled required that it should be put upon a more respectable footing, with regard to pay, than it had been before.

30. Narnapah was not suspended from the service, because he had evinced a disposition, from the commencement, to assist the Commissioners in their inquiries. If he had not come forward with his evidence, it is doubtful whether the extent of Cass Shitty's delinquencies would have been discovered to this day.

31. Appajee Row, on the contrary, withheld his testimony, until he was forced to give it by the deposition of Narnapah, which revealed fully the part he had played in the transactions. It was impossible for him to deny this, supported as it was by a mass of unimpeachable testimony. But when he did speak, it was with reluctance, and not with any view of furthering the objects of the inquiry.

32. All the servants of the cutcherry had been informed, under the orders of the Board, that the only atonement they could make for their misconduct would be to make an unreserved disclosure of the transactions in which they had been engaged, or which had come to their knowledge, and that those servants who withheld information would be considered and treated as infinitely more culpable than those who revealed it: Narnapah was therefore protected and encouraged, and Appajee Row punished.

Par. 32. States their opinion, that Dhurmaroy Pillay should be considered as the chief evidence upon the Maramut embezzlement: that he gave his evidence under restraint, and has since recanted it, in a petition to the Board.

33. It has clearly been shewn, that Narnapah and Appajee Row were the principal agents of Cass Shitty in embezzling the Maramut money: that they, in fact, or at least the people employed with them in the Treasury, were the only persons who knew that he had appropriated the money to his own use. Dhurmaroy Pillay knew only of the falsification cation of the accounts, and had reason to think that they were falsified for the advantage of the person who controlled the Maramut department. He swore to Cass Shitty being that person. If the embezzlements had been made immediately by the servants of the Maramut department, Dhurmaroy Pillay and Saurangapany Pillay would, no doubt, have been the principal evidences; but as they were made directly from the Treasury, and by the Treasury Gomashtas, the evidence of these Gomashtas was the strongest testimony that could be produced to the fact. That Dhurmaroy Pillay, who was a tool of Cass Shitty's, knew that he had embezzled the money, there can be no doubt; but the office he filled, and the business upon which he was employed, did not oblige him to know it. Cass Shitty, he says, desired him to make the overcharge in the accounts, he naturally concluded, therefore, that Cass Shitty took the money; but Narnapah and Appajee Row paid the money themselves from the Maramut funds into the treasury, on account of the debts due to it by Cass Shitty.

34. Dhurmaroy Pillay was not under restraint when he gave his evidence. He was put under restraint afterwards, from an apprehension that he was about to make his escape, and his presence with the Commissioners was deemed absolutely necessary. With regard to his recantation, it may be remarked that Cass Shitty was not idle, during the time that the inquiries were going on, in tampering with witnesses. If the Board had referred to the Collector's correspondence, it would have reminded them that, on the very day in which Cass Shitty was sent to jail, he was discovered in offering a bribe of one thousand pagodas to prevent a material witness from disclosing his transactions in the tobacco monopoly. The money for that purpose was actually paid, and seized upon by the Collector. Cass Shitty had the means of bribing the whole cutcherry. Instead of one man's foreswearing himself, therefore, it is surprising that any one of the witnesses have been found honest enough to abide by the testimony they gave before the Commission.

33. With respect to the three others, on whose evidence the Commissioners have chiefly relied, it is to be observed, that they all avow themselves parties to the fraud, and that, on this account alone, their evidence is to be received with some caution Narnapah was a Treasury Gomashtas, and though he lived in Cass Shitty's house, and is stated to have been confidentially entrusted by him, yet he declares that all the accounts were taken from him. Notwithstanding this, he undertakes from "some memorandums of his own," with the help of the public accounts, to make out "not only the whole amount embezzled in the repairs, but that "of each year, and the particular "works to which it was falsely "charged" The precise coincidence between the evidence of this man and that of Appajee Row is also remarkable. Their depositions of the 22d September are in substance and almost verbatim the same. This may likewise be said of the important parts of their declarations of the 3d October, and it may be added, that whoever took the examination on that occasion, caused the declaration of Narnapah to be read over to Appajee Row, before his (Appajee Row's) examination was began; and though twenty-one days apparently intervened between Narnapah's third and written declaration of the 23d October (No. 4), and Appajee's of the 14th November (No. 5), the one, so far as regards the material sums, seems a counterpart of the other, somewhat differently arranged.

35. No objection is made in courts of law to king's evidence; on the contrary, the evidence of accomplices in crime is considered, in some cases, as the strongest that can be produced. Such was the evidence of Narnapah and Appajee Row: they, and they only, knew all the particulars of the frauds. Without their testimony, it was impossible to have substantiated a single charge against Cass Shitty. His private accounts would not, of themselves, have been sufficient, neither would the evidence of the Maramut servants, because, as has been so often stated, the actual embezzlement was committed in the Treasury, then under the charge of Cass Shitty, by the Gomashtas who were his private agents. The reasoning of the Board, therefore, upon this evidence is untenable. The only way in which Cass Shitty has attempted to shake this evidence has been by declaring that the Commissioners and the Gomashtas were in a conspiracy against him. Government must judge of the probability of such a charge.

36. The memorandums from which Narnapah drew out the accounts of embezzlement contained all the items received by Cass Shitty from the Treasury, with the account particulars of the repayments made to it on Cass Shitty's account from the Maramut and tobacco funds. The regular accounts of these transactions he had delivered to Cass Shitty, but the memorandum remained with himself. With respect to the extraordinary coincidence which the Board remark to exist between the evidence of Appajee Row and Narnapah, it has already been stated, that the latter was an unwilling witness. It was necessary to shew him, that the Commission well knew how deeply he had been engaged in the transactions, and that it was useless for him to deny it: the information, therefore, given by Narnapah was made known to him, and he was desired to weigh

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

That part of Narnapah's deposition which relates to the embezzlement in the advances for repairs is as follows: "From fusily 1217 up to fusily "1224, Pagodas 1,21,641 8 34 "was charged in the public accounts "for the repairs, of which sum "Maramut Kistna Moodily, Sune-"vasso Row, Saurungapany Pillay, "and Ram Row received from the "Treasury and from the Tehsildars "at the talooks to the amount of "Pagodas 79,471 13 34. The re-"maining Pagodas 42,150. and of "the sundry repairs, to the amount "of Pagodas 2,000, added with the "amount of deposits for repairs, "being Pagodas 2,344 19 79. makes "a total embezzlement from the re-"pair money of Pag. 46,494 19 76. "Out of this sum, agreeably to Cass "Shitty's orders, Pagodas 42,150 "was carried to the credit of the "Treasury, as a set-off against the "advances, and the remaining "Pagodas 4,344 19 79, was remit-"ted in Star Pagodas to Matrondoss "Soucar to Madras, along with "the remittance.

weigh well the consequences which would attend his perjuring himself in points so notorious. The same questions were then put to him as had been put to Narnapah, and their answers pretty nearly corresponded.

37. There was nothing extraordinary in this, as both persons had been employed in precisely the same duties, and the questions were for the most part general ones. It was natural to suppose, that both parties would have retained a pretty accurate recollection of the total amount of sums paid and received by Cass Shitty. It is only to the totals that the two witnesses speak, and in them there is just that difference which might be supposed to arise when two persons undertook to speak from memory on a question of figures.

38. After reasoning in the preceding paragraph against the evidence of the Treasury Gomashtas, and asserting that the evidence of Dhurmaroy Pillay should be considered as of the first importance to the case, and then having endeavoured to shew that this man's evidence was worth little or nothing, the Board, in the thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth paragraphs of their proceedings, arrive at this conclusion: "From the nature of the huzzoor embezzle-"ments in the tank department, it must be admitted, that the people employed "in the Treasury were the only persons who could give any certain information "regarding them: that, as only part of the money advanced for repairs is alleged "to have been sent to the districts, and the remainder is stated to have been "transferred direct from the Treasury to Cass Shitty's private chest, the "Treasury servants were the only persons who could have any knowledge of "these last sums."

39. The Commissioners professed to have proved upon Cass Shitty the embezzlements committed by him from the repair department in the Treasury, and they regretted that the destruction of the accounts prevented them from tracing the whole amount, and the particulars of the amount embezzled in the district If the distinction between the Treasury embezzlement and the district embezzlements had been kept in mind, the strictures of the Board, with these observations upon them, would have been unnecessary. The object of the Commission was to discover the truth in the shortest possible way, and not to prepare evidence for a court of justice.

(Par. 36 to 48) Remarks on the reasons given by the Commission for charging a sum of Pagodas 40,494, estimated by the village Curnums to have been embezzled in the districts, upon the Maramut Superintendents.

40. The deposition of Narnapah, dated the 23d October 1815, shews that out of Pagodas 1,21,641 advanced from the Treasury for repairs, Pagodas 79,471 was paid to the different superintendents and servants of the Maramut department. As there was good reason to believe, from the estimates given in by the Curnums, that the works done in the district did not amount to half that sum, and as no accounts were forthcoming, it was reasonable to make the superintendants answerable for the amount, until they should come forward and prove the actual expenditure of it on the public account. There was no other way of ascertaining the work actually done, than through the medium of the Curnums and Monigars. These persons, though forbid to interfere with the repairs, could easily tell whether any repairs at all had been made in their district, and whether works really executed cost ten or one thousand pagodas.

41. The Commission did not give the Curnum's estimate as an accurate account of the repairs, but only as the best that could be had, and they left the onus of proving its inaccuracy upon the superintendents, against whom no proceedings were had for the recovery of the money. The Board, in concluding this branch of their proceedings, state "that the embezzlements from the "Treasury of the Maramut money appear to be proved against Cass Shitty, "and that there is presumptive evidence only of the embezzlements in the "district." The Commissioners drew precisely these conclusions, and no others, from the evidence which came before them.

42. In

(Par. 48 to 58.) Recapitulate the heads of evidence given in the Commissioners' reports of embezzlements made in the transactions of the tobacco monopoly. Require no remarks.

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

42. In paragraph 58, the Board remark, "that Appajee Row's evidence, on the 3d October, went to prove, "that he could not state, without reference to the accounts, the sum for which credit was given on account "of tobacco: yet, on the 14th November, he delivers in a "most specific account of the tobacco embezzlements, agreeing in every item "with that of Narnapah."

43. It has already been stated, that Appajee Row was an unwilling witness. He disclosed as little as he could help. He would not have spoken at all, if Narnapah had not, in a manner, forced him by his disclosure. Narnapah had accounts or memorandums, and from these memorandums Appajee Row refreshed his memory. He could not speak from accounts when he gave his depositions on the 3d October: he spoke from accounts when he gave his deposition on the 14th November. The apparent contradiction in his evidence admits, therefore, of an easy explanation.

(59 to 62.) Suggests doubts of the accuracy of the accounts given in by the tobacco sorters, as they were mutilated, and could only be partially sworn to.

44. Cass Shitty had taken precautions to prevent a disclosure of his frauds by the destruction of accounts. He had instructed the tobacco sorters, who were of his own cast, to destroy their accounts, and they had partially obeyed him. But enough of them remained to enable the sorters, when called upon, to draw out tolerably accurate accounts of the tobacco transactions; and to these accounts, drawn out by themselves, they swore, and not to the mutilated accounts. If the entire accounts had been forthcoming, there would have been no occasion for this proceeding, but in the absence of them it was necessary that the Commission should get the best evidence that was procurable, and it appeared that the sorters were the best able to supply the deficiencies of their own accounts. But their accounts were not taken to prove the embezzlements against Cass Shitty: the remark of the Board, therefore, "that as "the immediate agents of the alleged frauds, it is easy to suppose that, if "granted an indemnity, they would not be backward to accuse others, in "order to exculpate themselves," is of no weight. Their testimony was of service only, as it went to prove the extent of the embezzlements in the tobacco monopoly: the evidence against Cass Shitty was complete without it.

(63.) Points out what the Board consider contradictions between the sum charged against Cass Shitty and Sitaram Sing, in the accounts and in the body of the report.

45. The seeming contradiction pointed out in these paragraphs arises from the Board confounding the accounts given by the Treasury Gomashtas of the tobacco embezzlements, without the accounts given in by the tobacco sorters. The sum charged against Cass Shitty by the Treasury Gomashtas was Star Pagodas 1,31,617: the sum charged against him by the sorters was Star Pagodas 1,27,055. This difference was occasioned by an actual payment having been made to the tobacco servants, of which the sorters were aware and the Gomashtas were ignorant, and this difference is so explained in the report. The total embezzlement, according to the sorters' accounts, was Star Pagodas 1,58,264, of which Star Pagodas 1,09,234 arose from false weights, false sorting, gain from the pay of servants, from the building of godowns, and from overcharges of bullock-hire, leaving a balance of Star Pagodas 49,029 to be accounted for by Sitaram Sing, the manager, of which Star Pagodas 12,119 was stated to be due by the Ryots. This left a balance of Star Pagodas 36,910 upon Sitaram Sing; and of this sum Star Pagodas 9,196 was said to have been paid by orders of Sitaram Sing and Cass Shitty, to private agents of the latter, which left a balance against Sitaram Sing of Star Pagodas 27,714. He had accounted, as has been stated above, for Star Pagodas 1,09,234, and if the inquiries had not been commenced upon, he would, in a similar way, have accounted for the remaining sum of Star Pagodas 49,029 25 38.

46. The abstract given at the foot of the account No. 6 was merely intended to shew the appropriation of the amount embezzled according to the sorters' accounts, that is, Star Pagodas 1,27,065 18 52 by Cass Shitty; Star Pagodas 9,196 paid to Cass Shitty's agents, by order of Sitaram Sing, and therefore due by Cass Shitty; and Star Pagodas 7,651 not taken by Cass Shitty, and therefore to be accounted for by Sitaram Sing.

47. The

47. The sorters' accounts, as quoted in the forty-second paragraph of the Commissioners' report, made the balance due by Sitaram Sing amount to Star Pagodas 27,741, because the sorters were not aware that the greater part of it had been paid to Cass Shitty.

48. The seeming contradictions, therefore, are easily reconciled, and the actual balance due by Sitaram Sing is Star Pagodas 7,651, which supposes that Cass Shitty is answerable for the sums sworn to against him by the Treasury Gomashtas.

49. It is again necessary to state, that the Treasury Gomashtas gave the strongest and most pointed evidence of the embezzlement committed by Cass Shitty in the tobacco department. No other persons could give evidence upon it, as the embezzlement was strictly a Treasury one. The money passed through their hands only, and never went from the cutcherry. The embezzlement being proved, it was desirable to ascertain the manner in which those concerned in making it had contrived to misappropriate so large a sum of money undetected. For this object, recourse was had to the tobacco sorters, who drew out an account, shewing the exact quantity of tobacco purchased, and the price it cost, the cost of its transport to Malabar, the amount paid to the tobacco establishment, and for building the godowns. This account was compared, in all its particulars, with the English account, and the difference between them ascertained. It was not from this account, or from any evidence given by the sorters, that Cass Shitty was charged with the embezzlement. The small sum received from the retailers had nothing to do with the Treasury embezzlement: it was due by them for tobacco they had received from the Government godowns, and for which they had not accounted. Having detected the real perpetrator of the frauds, therefore, in the person of Cass Shitty, it would have been highly unjust to have saddled his peculations upon the sorters. We are ignorant, to this moment, why Cass Shitty was acquitted of the charge preferred against him of fabricating false receipts. The evidence to the fact transmitted by the Collector to the Board is as pointed as evidence can be, and has never been contradicted.

50. With regard to the impunity held out to the servants who turned informers, it is necessary again to repeat, that without their evidence it would have been impossible to have ascertained a single fact. The accounts had been for the most part destroyed; and even if they had been forthcoming, they would have been unintelligible, without explanation from the people who framed them: to have held out, therefore, threats to all parties, would have been at once to defeat inquiry. The object of the Commissioners was to ascertain the real perpetrators of the frauds, and to deal leniently by those who were forced either to become parties to them or to lose their service. Abundant evidence was before the Commission, to prove that Cass Shitty exercised uncontrolled influence over the cutcherry, and appointed and dismissed servants at his pleasure. If the measures pointed out by the Board had been literally followed, the Commissioners would have met with insuperable difficulties in performing the duties entrusted to them, and Government would, to this day, have been left in ignorance of many important particulars.

51. Having concluded their animadversions upon the Maramut and tobacco subjects, the Board recur again, in the seventieth paragraph, to the extra collections "The "information," (64.) If evidence were procurable against Cass Shitty, the Board throughout their correspondence with the Collector in Coimbatore urged the expediency of making an example of him; but they also strongly and repeatedly cautioned the Collector against proceeding on defective evidence, and they apprehend that in the tobacco department the evidence obtained by the Commissioners will be found defective and objectionable, when brought into a court of justice.

(65.) The guilt of the retailers of tobacco, of the sorters, and of the persons who signed false accounts, is manifest by their own confessions; and that the Commissioners must have considered the sorters and retailers responsible for these frauds is also proved, by their entering an actual recovery from them of Pagodas 1,788 16 27, on this account; but it is not explained why these persons were held answerable for so small a sum, when nearly the whole of the tobacco embezzlements might, with equal justice, have been charged against them. Until guilt was established against the alleged instigators of these frauds, the agents therein should not have been entirely absolved from punishment. The Board, in their letter to the Collector of the 28th September 1815, expressly forbid him to hold out, "even to those who may come forward with the most ample information, any hopes of impunity. "We are resolved," said they, "that, so far as the law will authorize it, all who have been engaged in the nefarious practices that for some time past have prevailed in Coimbatore, shall suffer more or less, in proportion to their guilt:" and they directed the Collector "strenuously to urge, in the name of the Board, that a full and ample confession of the past, and, so far as may be practicable, a restitution of undue receipts, are the only means left to secure the parties from the utmost severity of the law."

(66.) When Cass Shitty was acquitted by the circuit court of causing receipts to be fabricated with the view of cheating the Government, the Collector explained to the Board that it would be a breach of public faith to proceed against the actual fabricators of these papers, for that it was "impossible to get at information concerning the frauds which had been committed in the tobacco department, except through the medium of those persons who had been his agents

" in carrying them on," and that " they were in consequence given " to understand, that such as should " make full disclosures of what they " knew of the frauds might expect " to be lenfently dealt with." Nothing could be more at variance with the instructions of the Board than such a course of proceeding; but the Commissioners, by whom it was adopted, were independent of their authority, and the Board's instructions to the Collector were thus rendered nugatory.

" information," they say, " of the Commissioners, regarding the extent of the extra collections, is not founded upon original accounts, but on accounts compiled by " new and temporary servants, under the immediate direction of the newly appointed Tehsildars, whose confirmation in office depended upon abuses being proved " against their predecessors; and accordingly we find, " that the appropriation of the greater part of these alleged " extra collections is charged not against Cass Shitty, but " against the late Tehsildars."

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

52. It has already been stated, that the accounts were accounts of the receipts and disbursements of the district for ten years, taken from the Curnums by native revenue servants, and translated by them from Tamul into Hindostanee. They were not drawn up under the orders of the new Tehsildars, but by an establishment sent expressly for the purpose. There are no other accounts of the receipts and disbursements in the villages besides those kept by the Curnums, and the annual revenue accounts may with as much propriety be called the accounts of the revenue servants, as those accounts be called the accounts of the temporary servants. In both cases, the accounts were dictated by the Curnums to the Gomashtas, whose only business it is to write, arrange, and translate them.

The conformation of the new Tehsildars did in no degree depend upon their proving abuses against their predecessors, because these abuses had already been proved by the declarations, upon oath, of all the old servants to the Collector, that they had made extra collections to a considerable amount, and for a series of years, at the instance of Cass Shitty.

53. So flagrant a dereliction of duty as this, subjected them at once to the penalty of dismissal: the new Tehsildars, therefore, were firmly seated in their places, before the accounts were commenced upon.

The Commissioners were aware, that the Curnums and Monigars would conceal, as far as they could, their own peculations. This they would do, either by leaving them out of the accounts altogether, only charging them upon the Tehsildars, in the same way that the Tehsildars would charge as much as they could upon Cass Shitty and the huzzoor servants.

54. With regard to the appropriations, it should be remarked, that until the latter years of Cass Shitty's reign he had no opportunity of interfering with the land revenue. Until fusily 1221 the country was leased out: he began to take a little then, and he took more in the succeeding years, and in fusilies 1223 and 1224 he had, through the agency of the Tehsildar, made a regular bargain in the country for the payment of a " nuzzerana." If the whole of this had been realized, it would have amounted to a very large sum. How much of it was actually collected does not appear. He had received of it from thirty to forty thousand pagodas, when the inquiries were commenced upon. For peculating in the land revenue the Tehsildars had much better opportunities than Cass Shitty: they began sooner to collect, and probably collected twice as much for themselves as they did for him. The Board profess to find a difficulty in comprehending how the Curnums' accounts could shew the appropriation of these sums, as stated by the Commissioners, but they have not pointed out where the difficulty lay. The Curnums keep regular accounts current of their villages: when the Tehsildar, therefore, ordered them, or settled with them to pay a nuzzerana for the use of Cass Shitty, the amount so paid would appear in their accounts as paid to Cass Shitty. If a sum beyond the regular revenue was paid to the Tehsildars, it would be set down to the account of the Tehsildars: the rest of the money would be set down to the kists.

55. That the money was actually paid to Cass Shitty, the Curnums did not know; but that it was collected for his use, and in his name, they were aware. The Board have entirely overlooked the depositions given by the Tehsildars and Sheristadars upon the subject of extra collections, and have throughout their proceedings incorrectly stated, that the depositions and accounts of the Curnums and Monigars was the only evidence of the fact. They swore that they had made extra collections. The Curnums gave in the account, and it was utterly impossible to verify their accounts by a vivâ-voce examination of perhaps one hundred thousand Ryots.

56. The error in figures, noticed in the seventy-third paragraph of the Board's proceedings, is to be explained thus. The amount taken from the extra collections by the Tehsildars, according to the Curnums' accounts, was Star Pagodas. 1,37,612 14 17, of which sum it was proved that Star Pagodas 32,678 44 17 had been paid into the Treasury at Coimbatore on account of Cass Shitty. This left Star Pagodas 1,04,933 14 50 upon the Tehsildars. The sum debited against Cass Shitty by the Curnums, and entered in their accounts, was Star Pagodas 54,483 6 49: to this the sum of Star Pagodas 32,678 44 17 ought to have been added in the Commissioners' report, when they were detailing the appropriation of the extra collections; but as that sum had been entered against Cass Shitty in another account, it was from an oversight omitted in the body of the report. It has already been stated, that the accounts were the Curnums' accounts and not the new servants, which is answer sufficient to the reasoning in the latter part of this paragraph.

57. The Board say, "that few of the old servants were examined." Every Tehsildar in the district was examined upon oath by the Collector, and their depositions, with the depositions of five of the Sheristadars, were given in the appendix to the report, as well as the depositions of many of the principal Monigars and Curnums.

74. There are some items, however, entered in these accounts, which it is a misuse of terms to class as embezzlements or to denominate extra collections, such as village expenses, &c.

58. Every collection made in a village which does not form part of the regular Government revenue, is called in the accounts an "extra collection." Such were those pointed out by the Board: they were not called embezzlements. Embezzlements can only be made from the public revenue. The nuzzerana levied for Cass Shitty was not, properly speaking, an embezzlement, but a present from the country to Cass Shitty Exactions made from the Ryots are not embezzlements, but in the accounts they must always appear under the head of extra collections. The nature of these payments is fully explained in the report.

59. The Board profess themselves "at a loss to know how the renters' profits came to be introduced into the accounts of extra collections." The reason is obvious. The Curnums' accounts professed to shew the receipts and disbursements of every description in their respective villages; they included, therefore, the total sum paid by the Ryots to the renters. Of this, the amount of the rent of the village was entered as regular revenue, and what remained was classed as an extra collection, though deducted from the accounts by the Commissioners, as it was not an extra assessment upon the inhabitants. If the renters' profits had been omitted, the accounts would not have shewn the total receipts of the district. There were two heads in the account; the regular collection on account of sircar revenue, and the extra collection: the renters' profits were necessarily classed under the last head. But in stating the amount of the real extra collections made from the Ryots, the Commissioners expressly deducted from the account both the sum entered under the head of village expenses and the renters' profits.

(Par. 79, 80, and 81.) The Board can find nothing in the report to justify the conclusion drawn by the Commissioners, viz that "the money collected for village expenses "was three times larger than it "ought to have been; that the sum "entered in that head was most "probably in addition to the usual "amount levied for that purpose; "and that the money entered as a "loan has been chiefly, if not entirely, raised by assessments upon "the inhabitants." They consider the surmise unsupported.

(80.) "The Commissioners, without any other evidence than surmise, after stating the mere pro-

60. The Commissioners drew this conclusion, because the sum was immoderately large for the ordinary expenses of the villages, and because it is a common practice to enter extra assessments under the head of collections for village expenses. The object, both of the Monigars and Curnums, was to conceal their own peculations, and this was the simplest way of doing it.

61. The words of the Commissioners, in the sixty-sixth paragraph of their report, are as follow: "But it may "likewise be remarked, that a considerable portion of what "is here called a loan will be found to have been realized "by assessments upon the Ryots;" and, in the next paragraph, they go on to say: "It may be said that the collection for village festivals, &c., and the money borrowed

by

"bability, that a considerable part "of what is here called a loan will "be found to have been realized by "assessment upon the Ryots," in the very next paragraph assume, "that it has chiefly, if not entirely, "been raised in that way."

"by Potails, cannot be regarded as forming any additional "burthen upon the inhabitants, because they were always "accustomed to defray voluntarily among themselves "the expense of festivals and other village ceremonies, "and because the money borrowed will be repaid to the "lenders."

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

"But the answer to this inference is, that the sum entered on account of "village ceremonies is most probably in addition to the usual amount, and "that the money entered as a loan has chiefly, if not entirely, been raised by "assessment upon the inhabitants."

62. In the first paragraph the Commissioners consider it probable that a considerable part, and in the next they consider it probable that the chief, perhaps the whole of the loan, was raised by extra assessment upon the Ryots. If the wording of the last paragraph was obscure, it might have been interpreted by the preceding one. It is evident that the one does not contradict the other.

(82.) The Board believe, from the way in which the accounts were drawn out, that the amount of extra collections, and their appropriations, have been much exaggerated.

63. It has already been shewn, that the Board have utterly misconceived the way in which the accounts were drawn out, and that the new servants having, by the acknowledged delinquency of their predecessors, been firmly seated in their situations before the accounts were compiled, had not that direct interest which is supposed in fabricating or in exaggerating them, even if they had possessed the power of doing so. The servants who drew out the accounts formed a temporary establishment, distinct from the ordinary one, and who were in fact discharged when they had completed their duty.

64. It has already been stated, that in some cases the Curnums' accounts were checked and compared by a personal examination of the Ryots, and that in all such cases the extra collections were found very considerably to exceed the amount given in by the Curnums. The Commissioners, in the sixty-seventh paragraph, gave a statement of six villages which had been examined in this manner. This statement the Board have passed by unnoticed. There is a positive proof, therefore, that the extra collections, instead of being exaggerated, were under-rated.

(83.) The Board admit, that extra collections were made, but that it has not been shewn that the renters paid considerable sums of money. If they did, they paid to secure equivalent advantages, and the extra collections were repaid in the same manner.

65. As all the huzzoor servants, all the Tehsildars, some of the Sheristadars, and many of the Monigars, Curnums, and Ryots, swore that extra collections were made, and as a considerable sum was received into the Treasury for Cass Shitty on that account, there can be no great difficulty in believing that the fact was so. There is the same testimony also, to the payment of a large sum of money by the renters. The nuzzerana to Cass Shitty was paid by the holders of the decennial lease. The inducements held out to the persons who paid the nuzzerana, were a preference over others in the lease, and a confirmation in their monigarship: threats of dismissal were held out to those who refused payment. It is probable that the Monigars and head Ryots derived equivalent advantages from their payments, but there is no proof of the fact, and it is more than probable that they collected double of what they paid from the poorer Ryots, who received no advantages at all. This is not proved, but the accounts of the six villages before-mentioned make it very credible.

(Par. 85 to 98.) The Board question the correctness of the amount of the nuzzerana collected, because the accounts were drawn out by the new servants. The principal evidence about the nuzzerana is recapitulated.

66. The mode in which the accounts were drawn out having already been fully explained, these paragraphs require no remark.

67. The Board having concluded their animadversions on the report of the Commission with regard to the nuzzerana, proceed to comment on that part of the report which relates to the sandal-wood embezzlements.

68. Having stated, in the hundredth paragraph of their proceedings, that Munnar Shitty had been publicly appointed contractor for the sandal-wood by the late Collector, they go on, in the next paragraph, to say: "But according "to the statement of the Commissioners it appears that the Contractor declares "himself

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 9 March 1819.

"himself to have been a mere paid agent of Cass Shitty's, who was the prin-"cipal in the business." If any doubt was entertained of the statement of the Commissioners being true, it might have been resolved, by a reference to the deposition on oath given by Munnar Chitty himself, which formed a number in the appendix.

(102.) The Board consider it clearly proved, that Cass Shitty was the real contractor, but think that he cannot be subject to any punishment, unless the contract can be proved to have been infringed. Consider it difficult to shew that his profits from this source were contrary to an agreement. Can discover no evidence to support the Commissioners' assertion, "that the rejected pieces were often as good, and sometimes better" than those given to Government.

69. The Government entered into a contract for the sandal-wood with Munnar Kistnama Chitty, not with Cass Shitty. As Cass Shitty is proved to have been the contractor, the engagement was fraudulent on the face of it. Cass Shitty had no right whatever to take away one log of sandal-wood, and all his profits from this source were contrary to the agreement entered into by Government with Munnar Kistnama Chitty.

70. Chinapah Naigue, the bullock-maistry, who was employed in carrying the sandal-wood, swears, "that if "there was a difference only of one or two inches from "the sample, the pieces were rejected. Out of all the pieces that were re-"jected, not above one-third differed from the sample."

71. He also deposes "that he went two or three times along with Vydelinga "Pillay to Cass Shitty's house. When he went there to report about the san-"dal-wood pieces, he heard Cass Shitty give orders that the sample pieces "should be delivered to the Treasury and the rejected pieces to the godowns. "Deponent was paid his hire by the people of the Treasury about ten times; "afterwards Vydelinga Pillay paid the hire for both the sample and rejected "pieces, by order of Cass Shitty. Last year (1224) Vydelinga Pillay informed "deponent, that he was ordered by Cass Shitty to deliver both sample "and rejected pieces at the godowns; Deponent accordingly delivered one "hundred and ten maunds of sample pieces along with the rejected pieces at "Cass Shitty's godown. The hire was paid for sometimes from the Treasury, "at the rate of four three-eighths, five and five-eighths rupees per candy, and "afterwards paid Vydelinga Pillay by Cass Shitty's order."

72. Here then there is positive evidence, that two-thirds of the rejected pieces were as good as those given to Government. There is no positive proof that they were better; but as the contractor and rejector were in fact the same person, and as there was no check upon his proceedings, there is good reason for believing that they were so. It is the loss which the public sustained from Cass Shitty's transaction in the sandal-wood department, and not the profits he made upon them, which are charged against him.

(103.) Supposing, however, that the responsibility of Cass Shitty for his profits from this source could by any means be established, it seems doubtful whether they amounted to Pagodas 54,696 28 33, as shewn in the Statement No. 12 in the Appendix A. The documents from which the account was framed, the Board think, was a frabrication imposed upon the Commissioners.

73. The witness, Naraniah, deposed, that "he had "been employed to keep the accounts of the sandal-wood "department for nine years, and that Puttaubey Ramiah "and Gherry Jyen were accountants in the same depart-"ment: that he had been compelled to give up his own "set of accounts to Vydelinga Pillay: that upon searching "he had found an abstract of the sandal-wood account in "the house of a servant of Puttabey Ramiah deceased, "which from the knowledge of the hand-writing of Put-"tabey and Gherry Jyen, and from his having written a corresponding set of "accounts, he believed to have been written by them, but he could not find "the particulars of those accounts."

It is only reasonable to suppose, that these particular accounts were taken from Puttabey Ramiah and Gherry Jyen, when the deponent was forced to surrender his own set to Vydelinga Pillay. The fact could not be ascertained, as those two persons were dead. If Naraniah had wished to impose upon the Commissioners with false accounts, the probability is that he would have drawn out a detailed account of the transactions in his own name, instead of contenting himself with an old abstract account of two persons who were dead.

The document he produced was scrupulously examined by the Commissioners and by natives, and pronounced by them to be authentic.

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

74. The contract is by the evidence of the bullock-maistry proved to have been infringed. Cass Shitty took two thirds of the wood, which according to the terms of the agreement belonged to the Sirkar: there is no difficulty, therefore, in proving, (as the Board assert) "that his profits from this source "were contrary to an agreement expressly authorizing him to take the rejected "pieces of sandal-wood." He took twice as many of the sample pieces as he gave to the sirkar, and as the contract was not concluded with him he had no right to take any. These facts, of themselves, go a great way to prove the authenticity of the account given in by Naraniah. Not a shadow of evidence has been produced to shew that it was a fabrication: "The surmise, therefore, "which occurred to the Board, that this account may also have been fabri-"cated," does not appear entitled to much consideration.

75. As Cass Shitty had fraudulently obtained the contract, and as it had been proved by evidence, which the Board have passed over, that he had embezzled two-thirds of the wood that belonged to the Government, and that his Gomashta had forcibly possessed himself, by order of his master, of the original particular accounts, both of Munnar Kistnama Chitty and of Naraniah the accountant, and as the authenticity of the abstract account had been sworn to by a competent witness, it is hoped that Government will see "the propriety "and consistency of the Commissioners' opinion, that it should be adopted "until it shall be proved to be erroneous."

(111 to 127.) Relate to that part of the Commissioners' report which mentions the proceedings of the late Collector on orders received from the Board of Revenue to report the progress made in forming a decennial lease of the district.

76. After quoting parts of the late Collector's letters to the Board of Revenue, and noticing the proclamation issued by him to apprize the inhabitants that it was intended to rent out the country for ten years, the Board infer, that when the late Collector reported to them "that six hundred "and four villages were, to all intents and purposes, set-"tled upon the assurances of the lease," he meant nothing more than "that the amount of the revenue of each village had been fixed, "and the faith of Government for the lease pledged generally to the people, "but that no village had been actually settled further or than upon the as-"surances of the lease."

77. The direct answer to this inference is, that the accounts of those villages were not settled until after the orders of the Board for suspending the formation of the lease were received, as will be seen on reference to the deposition of the Huzzoor Gomashta Rama Raw; and a little attention to the facts of the case will shew, that the inference is, in other respects, utterly untenable.

78. On the 10th June 1813, the late Collector apprized the inhabitants, by proclamation, that it was his intention to rent out the country, for ten years; "according to a revenue already fixed, but not upon the agreements to be "received from the Ryots of this year." He desired, therefore, the Monigars and Ryots should use their best endeavours to extend their cultivation, and be ready for renting their villages at the time fixed.

79. The reasons for exhorting the Ryots to extend their cultivation, and for warning them that the lease would not be fixed upon the agreements for rent received in the existing year, are sufficiently obvious. If the Ryots had suspected that the lease was to have been regulated with reference to the cultivation of the year, they would have exerted themselves to depress the cultivation. They were told, in the proclamation, that a bareez had been fixed for the decennial lease; but what that bareez was, whether it was to be more or less than the cultivation of the existing year, they were not told. If the year was an unfavourable one, it would probably be more; if a very good one, less. The object of the proclamation, therefore, was to warn the Ryots that they might be losers if they depressed the cultivation, and gainers if they advanced it.

80. If the Ryots had received an assurance that the rents of their villages were fixed at a certain sum, and had been told what that sum was, and had been instigated to increase their cultivation, upon a pledge that whatever they could make their lands yield beyond the stated amount should be for their own benefit, it is obvious that such assurances would have had the effect of inducing the landholders to carry the cultivation to the greatest possible extent, and to lay out money for the purpose. It is obvious, also, that the violation of such assurances must have been a gross breach of faith, which could not fail to shake the confidence of the inhabitants in the Collector, and which might reasonably have justified him in requiring, that higher authority than his own should be employed in annulling the engagements which he stated himself to have formed. Then, indeed, the country might with propriety be said to have been, "to "all intents and purposes, settled upon the assurance of the lease."

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

81. But what was the fact? Really, that the inhabitants knew nothing whatever of the terms upon which their villages were to be settled, except that they were to have no reference whatever to the cultivation of the existing year. "The talooks mentioned in the enclosed Statement A," says Mr. Garrow, in his letter to the Board, "have been, to all intents and purposes, settled upon "the assurances of the lease, and money has been laid out in consequence by "the head inhabitants.

"I know of no way of avoiding the engagement now formed, unless it be "done by your Board and by Government, should it be deemed justifiable to "annul them as being still subject to the approval of superior authority. If "so, an advertisement to this effect direct from your Board will, I presume, "be absolutely necessary, to prevent the confidence of the inhabitants being "shaken in the Collector, as to any future engagements which he may wish to "enter into with them."

82. The late Collector here plainly says, not that the accounts of the talooks, but that the talooks themselves, have been, to all intents and purposes, settled upon the assurances of the lease: that he has actually entered into engagements with the inhabitants, and that money has been laid out in consequence of those engagements: that the engagements were subject to the approval of superior authority; and that so sacred were they, that the intervention of that authority was necessary, before the engagements could be safely voided. As the Collector here makes a distinction between these talooks and the other parts of the district, and as no assurance whatever had been given to the inhabitants of these talooks, besides the assurance given in the Collector's proclamation to the inhabitants in general, viz. that it was intended to lease the country upon a fixed bareez, it is obvious, if the Board have correctly interpreted the Collector's letter, that the engagements, of which he speaks so positively as subsisting between him and the inhabitants of these talooks, must have had reference solely to the accounts prepared in the cutcherry. Mr. Garrow must have meant, that it required the intervention of superior authority to cancel these accounts (if it should be deemed justifiable to annul them at all), as they were subject to the approval of superior authority.

83. It was the terms of the lease, when actually formed, that were subject to the approval of superior authority. The general assurance given by the Collector that a lease was to be framed, required no such sanction; neither did a set of accounts framed in the cutcherry. These talooks were just as much, to all intents and purposes, settled upon the assurances of the lease, as the rest of the district was: precisely the same engagements had been entered into with the one as with the other, and both had received the same inducement to expend money in increasing their cultivation. With regard to this expenditure of money, it is to be observed that it must all have taken place in less than three months, as the Collector's first proclamation is dated on the 13th of June, and his letter to the Board the 10th of September 1813.

84. In a further part of his letter the Collector goes on to say: "The "accounts now forwarded exhibit a rent-roll of the villages already settled, and the Statement B exhibits the plan upon which each has been settled. Until the receipt of some decisive orders for annulling or confirming the settlement made, I shall abstain from any communication of the subject of this reference to the persons who are entrusted in this settlement; but I request it may be speedy, as the season is advancing, and no small discontent may be occasioned, should the engagements be annulled at a late period."

85. It is hardly necessary to comment upon a text in itself so plain. The Collector could not possibly be requiring orders for annulling or confirming a settlement of accounts made in his cutcherry.

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

86. He clearly speaks of engagements actually entered into, which required either to be annulled or confirmed by superior authority; of engagements, which if annulled at a late period would create discontent. This discontent could not have been created by the cancelling of the accounts, of which the inhabitants knew nothing: nor is it possible, by any ingenuity, to torture the expression of engagements formed and settlements made, into a meaning that more assurances had been given by the Collector that he intended to make such engagements.

87. It is to be presumed, from what has been stated, that the real interpretation of the Collector's letter is that which is given of it in the Commissioners' report; that when the Collector said "that certain talooks were, to all intents "and purposes, settled upon the assurance of the lease," he meant that they were, to all intents and purposes, so settled, and not merely that the accounts of them had been settled: that when he said he had entered into engagements with the inhabitants, which, if it was thought justifiable to cancel at all, could only be voided by an authority superior to his own, he really meant, that he had entered into such engagements, and not merely that he had given them an assurance that it was intended to enter into such engagements. In conclusion of this part of the subject, it is to be observed, that the Board, when the Collector's letter was first submitted to them, understood the letter, and acted upon it, in this its plain and obvious sense, and that they did not think of putting the extraordinary interpretation contained in their proceedings upon so plain a text, until they found that their own opinions were in unison with those of the Commission.

(128.) The report of the Commissioners, although it elucidates the abuses practised in Coimbatore, does not show that the people themselves have suffered any great oppression. In the tank department it was the Government only that sustained any injury in the tobacco department. The Ryot is stated often to have sold his tobacco at a rate lower than that to which, under the orders of the Board, he would have been entitled; but the head Assistant Collector, Mr. Whish, who has long resided in the district, and whose local knowledge of the effects of the tobacco monopoly must consequently be superior to that of the Commissioners, asserts positively, that though the Ryot did not perhaps obtain his full dues, he did not lose by the arrangement. "On the establishment of the tobacco monopoly," says he, "it was considered necessary to fix the prices "at something above the current "value, in order to ensure the cultivators from the ill effects which "must otherwise have been experienced from a limited number of "purchasers, and they in consequence cultivated tobacco to as great an extent, and with as much confidence, as if the market had been entirely open." The conclusion from this is irresistible, that whatever the Government may have lost by paying high prices, the Ryots generally obtained the fair value of their tobacco by some means or other. In point of fact, the corruption and frauds of the servants of Government were generally participated in by the Ryots; by the heads of villages certainly, if not by all the Ryots.

88. After reciting a passage from the Commissioners' report, relative to the inefficiency of the courts for the protection of the Ryots, the Board in this paragraph state it to be their opinion, that the abuses which existed in Coimbatore are to be attributed to very different causes than the inefficiency of those tribunals.

"It does not appear," say the Board, "that the people have suffered any great oppression. In the tank department it was the Government only that sustained any "injury."

89. The Commission, in the one hundred and thirteenth paragraph of their report, state as one cause for the decline of the revenue in Coimbatore, "the numerous private "vate exactions, and the irregular and violent manner in "which they were often levied. These exactions have "been heavy, and more than is yet known, and they will "probably be found, whenever there is time to institute "an inquiry respecting them among the Ryots, to exceed "by sixty or eighty thousand pagodas the sum brought "forward in the Curnums' accounts. It is true, that in "many cases the Ryots who paid them were allowed an "abatement of rent in the ensuing year, but this seldom "compensated for the inconvenience and loss with which "the immediate exaction was frequently attended. But, "after making every allowance for such compensation, "there is abundant reason to believe that at least one-"third of all the Ryots in the province have paid private "assessments inclusive of the full rent, without any equi-"valent remission."

90. Such appeared to the Commission to be the real state of the case, and they formed their opinion after much anxious inquiry, and a careful examination of the evidence before them. Their opportunities of procuring correct information were highly favourable, and they did not neglect them. The opinion which they gave is fully supported by the evidence submitted with their report. The Board have opposed to this opinion an assertion, unsupported either by reasoning or evidence, that the people in Coimbatore have not suffered any great oppression.

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

91. If undefined exactions, made with rigour from a third, at least, of the inhabitants of an extensive province for a series of years is not a grievous oppression, it is hard to say what is: and in considering this part of the subject, it should be carefully remembered, that these exactions were not put a stop to by any proceeding of a court, or by any existing institution. The extension of Cass Shitty's influence was the real cause of their cessation. He would have continued to exact as long as he had power to do so, and the country could afford to pay him. The Ryots had complained to the Board of Revenue, and had complained in vain: to the courts they would not go. It is not the practice of the Ryots to do so. The reason for this is best known to themselves. If they found their advantage in it, they would probably have resorted to them, when attempts were first made to take from them more than their dues.

92. With regard to the abuses in the tank department, a little attention to the subject would have shewn that grievous oppressions were practised, in the first place, upon the tank-diggers, either by not paying them at all, or by paying them in grain issued at a high rate of exchange instead of money. These were the direct oppressions: the indirect ones were, that the Ryots were made to pay full rent for their lands, which were to be cultivated through the means of works either not repaired at all, or inefficiently repaired. The losses they sustained from these causes are too obvious to be insisted upon.

93. The opinion given by Mr. Whish, and pressed by the Board into their service, was given nearly two years after the Commission closed their report. It was an opinion in favour of supplying the tobacco monopoly immediately by the officers of Government rather than by contract. Mr. Whish was reasoning upon the use, not the abuse, of that system: it was the abuse of the system that the Commissioners condemned. He pointed out what it was when under his own superintendence, not as it existed under Cass Shitty's. He never intended to advocate a monopoly in preference to a free trade; and when the Commission was sitting, he had as little practical knowledge of the subject as the Commissioners themselves.

94. The oppressions heaped upon the Ryots by the abuses practised in the tobacco department are fully and clearly detailed in the report. A liberal price was fixed to be given to them, but which they seldom or ever got. The larger the price fixed by the Circar, the greater the opportunity of plunder to Cass Shitty. They were cheated constantly, both in the quantity and quality of the article taken from them: false weights were used, and for a candy of the first and second sorts of tobacco they were paid for half a candy of the third and fourth sorts. These, and many other abuses, are detailed in the report, and proved by a body of unimpeachable testimony given in the appendix.

95. The Board have not once noticed Cass Shitty's private letters. These, of themselves, form a strong body of testimony, and give a stamp of truth to the parol evidence of the Treasury Gomashtas and others, which it is impossible to get over.

96. The untimely publication of these minutes has had a most injurious effect upon the public interests, which are now at stake in the court at Trichinopoly. Every line penned by the Board on this subject is made known to the parties in attendance there. A mere whisper that so high an authority as the Board of Revenue had advocated the cause of Cass Shitty, was enough to fix the minds of many witnesses, who were before sufficiently reluctant to speak the truth against him.

97. If the publication was ill-timed, it was also uncalled for. The Board were desired to state their opinion, whether Mr. Garrow was implicated in the frauds of his servants, and to point out the best means of recovering the property that had been embezzled. A very few lines would have enabled the Board to obey the first instruction; and as the Board have admitted that the Treasury embezzlements are proved against Cass Shitty, and as the whole of the evidence was then before the Government, the Board might have spared their animadversions on the proceedings of the Commission, until the interests of Government were out of jeopardy.

98. No

Mr. Sullivan's Observations, 2 March 1819.

98. No good purpose whatever could result, from imputing to gentlemen employed on a public duty of no ordinary difficulty, such unworthy practices as those of extorting evidence from some by confining their persons, and of bribing others to give evidence by increasing their pay. The professed object, indeed, of the Board's performance, is to point out where the evidence in the report is defective: but it is to be feared, that this was, in fact, to put a sword into the hands of an antagonist; for it is as much the interest of the plaintiff to know the weak points of the cause, as it is of the defendant.

99. These explanations will, it is hoped, satisfy Government, in opposition to the opinion expressed by the Board, that the people in Coimbatore were most grievously oppressed; that the report of the Commission contains satisfactory information on the frauds and embezzlements committed in Coimbatore, and that the charges of credulity, negligence, and incapacity, in which the proceedings of the Board virtually involve the Commissioners, have no foundation whatever.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE, Dated 31*st January* 1818.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 31 Jan. 1818.

Par. 164. On the recommendation of the Board of Revenue we have given directions for printing,* for the use of the service at large, a paper by Mr. Ellis, Collector of Madras, containing his replies to the queries respecting meerassy tenure, contained in the letter alluded to in the thirty-second paragraph of a dispatch addressed by this Government to your Honourable Court, under date the 12th August 1814. The Board of Revenue have expressed a very favourable opinion with regard to the correctness and general value of the information afforded by Mr. Ellis in this paper. We transmit twelve printed copies of it to your Honourable Court.

REPLIES to Seventeen QUESTIONS proposed by the Government of Fort St. George, relative to MEERASSY RIGHT, by Mr. F. W. ELLIS, Collector of Madras.

INTRODUCTION.

Introduction to Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

In consequence of the letter addressed by the Government to the Board of Revenue, under date the 2d August 1814,† the Board ordered a copy of it to be sent to the Collector of Madras among others, directing his particular attention to the seventeen first questions. The replies to these questions were accordingly submitted to the Board, under date the 30th May 1816. The following extracts are from the letter which accompanied them.

Par. 3. "The replies now transmitted are confined to the first seventeen "questions, which relate to mírási right; most of the rest regard the decen- "nial settlement, which, according to your Secretary's letter, I am not "required to answer. On some of these, however, I might have given an "opinion: but I have considered it preferable to confine myself entirely to "the questions which relate to the landed tenures of the country, respecting "which all persons conversant with the southern provinces under this Govern- "ment must have been enabled to obtain information, more or less accurate "in proportion to the diligence of their enquiries.

4. "In addition to the replies furnished by myself, I beg leave, also, to "lay before the Board another set prepared by Bomaconta Sancaráya Bráhman, "late Sheristadar of this cutcherry, and now the English head-master of the "College

Introduction to Mr. Ellis's Meerasy Paper.

" College of Fort St. George.* The original of this is written in Tamil, " because to that tongue belong all the technical terms and peculiar expressions " used to denote the various incidents belonging to mírási tenures: the " translation has been made by me, and I have added to it the explanatory " notes which will be found in the margin. The two sets of replies have not " been written in communication: when they agree, therefore, they corroborate " each other; when they differ, if it be as to facts, the superior authority must " be allowed to the native: for the facts respecting mírási and its privileges " are not matter of speculation, they are known to every inhabitant of the " country where they exist, who are brought up in the habitual exercise or " observation of them: the terms which express them they have received from " the lips of their mothers, they have formed the prattle of their infancy, and " they remain indelible in their minds and on their tongues. Moreover, " Sancaráya having served for thirty years in various situations in the Revenue " and Judicial departments, both in the northern and southern provinces under " this presidency, has had a greater opportunity of making himself acquainted " with the subject on which he writes, than usually falls to the lot either of " Europeans or natives, from which his superior acquirements have enabled " him to derive peculiar advantage.

5. " In submitting these papers to the Board, I am aware that they contain " a mere outline of the various incidents which connect themselves with the " consideration of mírási right, and, indeed, the general nature of the ques- " tions must necessarily render the replies general also. The subject, however, " is of the first importance, and well worthy of a more careful investigation " than it has ever yet received; for though information, to a certain extent, " will be found on record respecting it, this has been furnished at distant " periods, is scattered, therefore, through many volumes, and is accessible " to those only who are enabled, by particular knowledge of the records in " which it is contained, to refer to it. Were this embodied with such addi- " tions as general and local inquiry would obtain without much difficulty, the " whole might be digested into a regular treatise on the landed tenures preva- " lent in the several provinces under this presidency, from which the service, " the junior part of it especially, might derive considerable advantage, and " of which the multifarious subjects cannot be embraced by mere official " reports."

This address and its enclosures were forwarded to Government by the Board of Revenue, under date the 17th April, and the receipt of them acknowledged on the 9th September 1817. Of these letters the following are extracts.

Par. 2. " In soliciting the attention of the Right Honourable the Governor " in Council to the enclosures in this letter, it is due to Mr. Ellis to record " the high sense the Board entertain of their merits. The difficult and intri- " cate subject of meerassy right has been discussed in these papers with much " ability and learning, and the information they contain is, in the opinion of " the Board, generally so correct and important, that they beg leave to recom- " mend that the enclosures to Mr. Ellis's letter be printed, for the use of the " service at large.

Par. 2. " The Governor in Council has observed with much satisfaction the " opinion expressed by you, with regard to the correctness and general value " of the information submitted to you by Mr. Ellis, Collector of Madras, " on the subject of meerassa tenure, and agreeably to your opinion, desires " that the papers in which that information is contained may be printed for the " use of the service at large."

Government, also, at the instance of the Board of Revenue, were subsequently pleased to approve the printing of the compilation attached to these papers, under the title of the Additional Appendix, and the publication of the sketch of the country known to the natives by the name of Tondamandalam, prefixed to the first Appendix, the geographical part of which has been prepared under the directions of the officer in charge of the Survey department.

* Bomaconta Sancara Sástri, the name by which this Bráhman was latterly known, resigned his situation in the College, and was restored to that of Sheristadar in the huzzúr cutcherry of Madras, on the 1st October 1816, on the salary of that office being increased, and is since deceased.

Introduction to Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

In this map the original boundaries of the ancient Tamil province of Tondamandalam have been laid down with sufficient correctness; but the situation assigned to some of the cottams is doubtful, and hereafter, perhaps, when statistical and antiquarian research shall be more frequent and more methodically conducted, may be found to be erroneous. Mr. Barnard, who conducted the original survey of the jaghire in the year 1770, has not noticed this ancient division of the country into cottams and nádus; but they are incidently referred to, and the number of each stated, in Mr. Place's report of the 6th June 1799.

To the people, however, these divisions, in detail at least, are still well known, and, as frequently instanced in the following pages, are always referred to in deeds drawn up according to the old form; it would be easy, therefore, by inquiry on the spot, to ascertain, if not the precise boundary, the relative situation and general extent, not only of every cottam, but of every nádu, throughout that part of the province which remains in possession of the original Tamil settlers, and they may, possibly, be traced, even in those parts from which they have been expelled by the encroachments of their Telugu and Cannadiya neighbours.

The two Appendices require little explanation, additional to that afforded by their contents. In the first, which consists of various documents in the native languages, collected from different parts of Southern India, some widely distant from the others, most of the incidents connected with mírási are noticed, and frequent allusions made to the systems of finance and general government, which prevailed in the Hindu states anteriorly to the Mahommedan conquest. These it has been endeavoured to illustrate by the notes attached to the translations. Each document being accompanied by its own gloss, repetition will, consequently, be found to occur frequently in these notes: this has been intentionally preferred to the references which would otherwise have been constantly necessary.

The additional Appendix contains, in abstract, the principal information on the records of the Board of Revenue, relative to mírási right, and other documents tending to elucidate the general subject in English. To these occasional remarks have been attached, wherever particular allusions or general facts have appeared to require further explanation.

REPLIES to QUESTIONS.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper

Par. 1. PREVIOUSLY to replying to these questions, it is necessary to define the meaning of the term meerassy (mírási), and to state the acceptations in which it is intended to be used.

2. The word mirás,* originally signifying inheritance, is in southern India employed as a general term to designate a variety of rights, differing in nature and degree, but all more or less connected with the proprietary possession, or usufruct, of the soil, or of its produce.

3. That right to the hereditary possession, or, as some consider it, to the occupation of land, differing locally in mode, but always the same in essence, universally known by the people, and generally allowed by Government in all the provinces under this presidency,† the Northern Circars and the Ceded Districts excepted, is called mirás. The mányams, lands free of tax, and méreis, fees at various rates, received in kind from the general produce, and other privileges of the Cániyátchicár, Cavelcár, Carnam, Panjangan, Taleiyári, Vetti, carpenter, iron-smith, washerman, &c. &c., officers and servants attached to each village, is called mirás; the right of the Ulcudi-páyacári or permanent permanent cultivator, to the hereditary usufruct of the land, is called mirás;* so is the right to the Circar share of the produce of land held by special grant under the various denominations of servamányam, ardhamányam, stótryam, candicam, enâm, mocassah, &c. &c.; and so, also, in fine, is any office, privilege, or emolument descending hereditarily.

* The word is Arabic, but like other revenue terms is derived to the languages of India through the Persian, whence the final i or y, representing the izáfet with which it is often written in Tamil, taking the idiomatic termination of that tongue, it becomes mírásu.

† Generally speaking, mírási right in land prevails wherever the Tamil language is spoken, and all terms expressive of this right and its incidents belong to this language. This specification does not exclude the provinces now called Malabar and Canara, for Malayálma, the dialect of the former, and Tuluva, the dialect of the latter (for Canarese is not the native tongue of this country, but of the conquerors or colonists of it), are immediate derivatives from the same source as the modern Tamil.

Mr. Ellis's Meerasy Paper.

4. Mírási in land and the mirási of the village officers† differs considerably in every district. In the tract of the country known to the natives by the name of Tonda-mandalam, extending from the limits of Nellore nearly to the Colleroon, and embracing the two divisions of Arcot and the jaghire, landed mírási is marked by distinctions no where else known, the proprietary Mírásidars‡ holding a certain extent of land free of all assessment, and being entitled to receive fees, under the various denominations of cuppatam, cánimerei,|| cálpadi, cálvásem, &c., from the gross produce of all taxable lands, and tunduváram, a portion of the produce, or, as called in Sanscrit, swámibhógam, the landlord's right, from all land cultivated by Páyacaris, or persons not Mírásidars. This species of mírási is divided into two kinds: pasung-carei, where the whole lands of the village are held jointly, and either cultivated in common, or divided yearly or at some other fixed period, according to established custom, among the proprietors; arudi-carei, where the lands are held in severalty, and subject, consequently, to no periodical distribution.

5. In the provinces known to the natives by the compound term Shózha-Shéra-Pándiyam, including all the country to the south of the Colleroon, and some districts immediately to the north of that river,§ the cániyátchi, cuppatam, and other privileges enjoyed by the Mírásidar of Tondei, are unknown. The whole of the lands, with the exception of the official mányams, are Várapet,¶ or taxable, and though instances occur of Pasung-carei, or joint proprietary, they are more frequently held in arudi-carei, severalty; often in what is called eca-bhogam, where the whole village is the sole property of an individual.

6. In

* The Pareiyer, Paller, and Palli serfs claim mirás in the incidents of their villainage; and it is generally allowed to them and their descendants, on proving their former residence in the village, however long they may have been absent from it. The two first of these are mostly the slaves of the Vellâler, and the latter the vassals of the Bráhman Mírásidars.

† In the Sircars the Choudri, Mocuddim, or chief Reddi, has usually an extent of land allowed him rent-free; but as the office is held at the pleasure of the Zemindar, and such land transferred from incumbent to incumbent, it differs essentially from the Cániyátchi-mányam. So, it would appear, does the mányam held by the Pattèls in the Ceded Districts; for these may be resumed in case of what is considered default by the Sircar officers, though it would also appear that in such case the office and mányam is usually given to a relation of the family. I have used the word appear, because it may perhaps be ultimately found that these mányams are really mírási, in which case the anomaly will exist of cániyátchi-mírási without mírási in the várapet lands.

‡ Cánipátchi-mányan, from this circumstance, the Mírásidars, known in other provinces by the names of Cánicárer, Careicárer, Janmacárer, &c. are in this called Cániyátchicárer. The original Cániyátchicárs of Tondei were of that tribe of Vellâlers, agriculturists, called Tuluva Vellâlers, but now Cániyátchi is held by Bráhmans, Reddis, Pullis, Shánars, and others Where, however, the Cániyátchi has thus passed from the original holders, it frequently happens that the present owners do not enjoy the cániyátchi-mányam, and often also none of the other Swantantrams, possessing only a property in the várapet lands.

|| This fee is received by the labourers of the Mírásidars, whether slaves or hired servants; but this in its effect is the same as if paid to the Mírásidars themselves. Méreis of all descriptions are received in three ways: in the straw before threshing, in grain before measuring, from the Government share after division. Certain fees, the swatantra-dittam, are always received in grain, and generally the Carnam and Cávelcár have a fee from the Government share; but, in other respects, the custom varies in every village, the same officer sometimes receiving a mérei once only, sometimes twice, and sometimes thrice.

§ Though here included in one general notice, each of these countries, which for ages formed separate kingdoms, have their own particular usages with respect to landed tenures; nay, the usages of one nâdu (district) in either of them will frequently differ from those of the neighbouring one; these, however, are local differences, with which it would be useful to be acquainted, but which modify, do not alter, the mírási right common to them all.

¶ The term várapet, from váram field produce or a share of it, (whence uda-váram, the whole produce, mèl-váram the share of the Government, cudi-váram the share of the cultivator), and pettu, an adjunct used in similar compounds, from pettel to take, signifies properly land from which the revenue is received in kind, in contradistinction to tírvapet, land on which a fixed money rent is paid. It is used here, however, and in other places, in opposition to mányam, to designate land paying revenue, as originally all land was várapet, the tírveis, money rents, having been introduced in modern times.

 In Tanjore this tenure is commonly known by the Hybrid term pala-bhógam. Individuals frequently hold land in severalty in many villages, and sometimes many villages in sole property

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

6. In the three southern provinces of the tract called by the natives Malayálam, the coast of Malabar, there are no villages, and consequently no rights of any kind in common. Each family of Nayers reside apart on their own estate, and hold their jenmam right free of all participation or controul, and formerly free of all rent, the share which the law gives the sovereign in the produce of land having been commuted for military service, each nádu,* or district, being assessed at so many armed náyers, instead of so many measures of grain, or so many veray fanams.

7. This was also the condition of the fourth or northern division of Malayàlam, Tulu-nádu, now called Canara, before the foundation of the Vidyanagara, or, as corruptly called, the Bijannugar empire, in which this district was, by force or agreement, included. A general assessment was then introduced, grounded on the share allowed by law to the sovereign in landed produce, one-sixth; this has since, by successive additions, been considerably increased, but does not appear to have operated any considerable alteration in landed tenures, which, divested of all community of right, like those of Malabar, are nearly the same as those which obtain in the arudi-carei villages to the south of the Colleroon. There appears, however, in practice to exist this essential difference, that though the mortgage, assignment, and temporary or permanent lease of meerassy land are known in the districts of Tanjore, Madura, and Coimbatore, they are not generally prevalent, the actual cultivation of the lands being more or less in the hands of the Meerassidars, by whom the Circar revenue is paid. On the contrary, subordinate tenures of all kinds are very common in Canara, and in many districts of Malabar the possession of the land has passed from the proprietary Jenmacàr to under-tenants of various descriptions, who render him a Swámibhógam,† or acknowledgment of superiority, pay the government rent, and enjoy all remaining profits.

8. Official meerassy‡ varies in different provinces in an equal degree with landed meerassy, and it prevails frequently where the latter is unknown. The carnica meerassy,§ the hereditary right to the mányams,|| méreis, and other privileges attached to the office Gràma-carnam, or village accountant, exists throughout the northern Sircars, the province described by its native name Tondei, the Ceded Districts, and Canara, where a person holding it is known by the Canarese appellation shánabhóga. In the provinces to the south of Colleroon, and in Malabàr, carnica meerassy does not exist. Again the gráma-cável meerassy, belonging to the village watcher or police officer, exists in the districts to the north and south of the Colleroon, from the borders of Nellore to the extremity of Tinnevelly; the mén-cável meerassy, enjoyed by the district watcher until its abolition by Government, existed latterly only to the south of that river.¶ The meerassy of the inferior officers of police exists, not only in the provinces above-mentioned, but throughout the Circars and Ceded Districts; and, co-extensive with this, is the meerassy of the various village servants, from the Panjágen,

* The céral'-otpati states the established levy to which each nádu was liable.

† In some mortgage tenures this acknowledgment is not given, though the right of superiority still exists, the whole profits from the land being absorbed by the interest of the sum borrowed.

‡ The emoluments of all official meerassy consist of a certain extent of mányam or rent-free lands, generally in proportion to the extent and value of the village, and of a mérei, or fixed per-centage of the produce of all várapet land under cultivation. The whole of the official mányams of the village are called terapadi-mányams, recorded rent-free land, in contradistinction to the sunnud or dumbala-manyams (enáums), given in latter times to various persons, and on various accounts, by special grant.

§ Mányams are not always attached to this meerassy; méreis, or similar privileges, always are; these in the Circars are called Shelega.

|| The Náttu or Sthla-Carnam, district accountant, an officer of the ancient Hindu system, was superseded during the Mahommedan Governments by the Canongo and Désh-pándi, and has now, I believe, every where ceased to exist.

¶ Tondamàn, and other méncávelcars to the south of the river, claimed meerassy in Udeiyapáleiyam, Ariyalùr and other districts to the north of it, included in the limits of the ancient Shózha-mandalam. Instances of the existence of this right occur also in Tonda-mandalam The Cárvéti Rájà (Bomráz) claims it over part of the Jagír, and his claim, I believe, was allowed during the Nabob's government

 I have mentioned two that frequently occur in the list of village servants. They are accounted twelve, but the number and denominations vary in every district: the carpenter, ironsmith, washerman, and potmaker, will be found, I believe, in every list, seldom now the bard and schoolmaster; the latter more frequently in Agrahárams than in Súdra villages.

Panjágen, the astronomer, who casts nativities and expounds the almanac, to the Vettiyen, who sweeps the village choultry and cutcherry, if there be one, keeps the threshing-floor in order, and performs various other minor services.* In Malabar there is no official meerassy; in Canara none but that of the shánabhóga.

9. In every district wherein landed or official meerassy is established, the former, whether held jointly or severally, whether the land be cultivated generally by the Meerassidars or by under-tenants, is without restriction heritable and transferable; the latter, moreover, is always heritable, and in a limited degree transferable.† In all cases, the property, right, or privilege which is not heritable is not meerassy, but meerassy may exist without being transferable.

10. According to the ancient divisions of the country, still well known to the people, the home-farm villages of Madras consisted of eight magánams lying in the Náyaru Nádu, dependent on the Puzhel Côttam, a district of Tonda-mandalam, a province, during the last Hindu government that existed in this part of India, of the Chandragiri Râjyam: in Tonda-mandalam, the Cániyátchi-meerassy,‡ as it may appropriately be called, distinguished by the rent-free lands held by the Meerassidars, and the fees and other privileges received by them, has, as already shewn, always existed;|| to this, therefore, the following replies will, unless otherwise stated, be confined. At present, a part only of the villages of the home-farm is attached to the Madras collectorate; the minuter illustrations necessary for the better understanding of the following observations can, therefore, only be taken from these.

First Question.

"How has meerassy right hitherto been recognized and respected where Meerassidars were not the renters?"

9 T Answer.

* What I have here said with respect to the prevalence of the different kinds of official meerassy in different districts may not be exactly correct, though I believe it approaches the truth of what is stated as to landed meerassy I have less doubt. I have intentionally omitted any particular mention of the meerassy pertaining to servamányams, sótriyams, enäms, &c., for having originated chiefly in modern times, they differ essentially from the ancient meerassy of the country, and have, therefore, no immediate connection with these questions, though, in a regular treatise on the landed tenures of this part of India, a careful explanation of them would be indispensable.

† See reply to the twelfth question.

‡ As it is of importance that the signification of this word should be distinctly defined, I will first state it from the works of the R. J. C. Beschi, who wrote before the final conquest of the country by the Moguls, and whose authority as a Tamil lexicographer is undeniable, and afterwards endeavour, also, to fix its precise meaning by etymological deduction.

In Beschi's Dictionary of the high Tamil, the first member of the compound is explained, "property," and the second "dominion, power." In his Tamil Latin Dictionary the first thus · "2° id ad quod jus habemus hereditarium, sic 'qui habet hujusmodi jus;' in hoc sensu additur etiam 'qui habet tale jus.'" And the second member thus: "'quod fere semper unitur alii subst.,' sic 'cániyátchi' dominium ex jure hereditatis." Cáni is derived from the root see, mark, and signifies literally that which is seen, marked, or recognized, and secondarily hereditary property; from âl, rule, govern; whence, also, án, one who governs himself, a man (vir), a male generally, is a verbal in a reciprocating or reflective sense, and means, therefore, self-rule, freedom from all restraint, manhood, independence, &c. Cániyátchi, as thus deduced, signifies, therefore, that which is held in free and hereditary property, which is in fact the meaning assigned it by Beschi, as he uses the word "dominion" in the sense of the jurists.—"Dominium est plena in rem potestas" If Beschi, therefore, be not entirely mistaken with respect to this word, and the deduction from the radicals by which it is here supported wholly erroneous, Cániyátchi (Meerassy) can never, as some would make it, mean the mere usufructuary occupation of the soil. Usufruct is thus defined in the Institutes.—'Usufructus est jus alienis rebus utendi fruendi, salva rerum substantia. Est autem jus in corpore, quo sublato et ipsum tolli necesse est.' (Vide Inst. Imp. lib. iii. tit iv). As we proceed, every incident connected with meerassy will shew that it is not the use and enjoyment of a thing, the right to which vests in another, and of the substance of which the Meerassidar cannot dispose; and, on the contrary, that it is a thing over which he possesses full power, and his right to which continues to subsist even when the thing itself has bodily passed from him. Still less, as it has been argued (Minutes of Government of 8th January 1796), can it be merely "a preference of cultivation derived from hereditary residence;" for in this case even the substituted dominion the usufructuary holds over the usufruct while in his possession could not exist, nor could there be any criterion of right with respect to it, for how is any judgment to be formed of a vague and indefinite preference? But if the question at all depends on the meaning of words, or, as it may otherwise be stated, if the definition of the thing is to be deduced from the term describing it, all further argument on this point is futile, for it is clear that which signifies dominion or full power over land, cannot also mean a preference in the cultivation of it, however derived.

|| The right, if original establishment give ground for right, has always existed, but in some parts of this tract the practice has certainly ceased. See the Introduction to the Appendix.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

Answer.

Meerassy (mírási) right has always existed in the villages within the boundaries of the supreme court from which the revenue is paid to the Madras cutcherry, and it still continues to exist; for though the lands were divided among the individual Meerassidars, when what may be considered a permanent settlement was made with them by Sámi Naic and Mr. Ogilvie, in 1802-3, and one of the grand features by which meerassy is distinguished in this part of India, the holding by joint shares under the pangu-málei * register was obliterated, yet the certificates then issued confirmed to them every right they had previously

Second Question.

" Does meerassy right extend to waste land?"

Answer.

Meerassy right, wherever it exists, extends certainly to waste land†; but then the right is limited by the nature of the waste. The extent, entered in the terapadi accounts under the head of sheycál-carambu, or cultivable waste, they hold as they do the general várapet, or taxable lands of the village, and may cultivate it whenever their means permit, or rent it to paracudis; but in the anádi-carambu, or immemorial waste, though they possess the exclusive right of cutting firewood, working quarries, &c. they have no right of cultivation, much less can they claim any to break up common used for pasturage, or to cut down productive trees, as palmira, cocoa-nut trees, &c. In the terapadi accounts the lands are distributed according to their several descriptions, ‡ either waste or cultivated, and the Meerassidars must enjoy them as thus entered. On the nattam they must build their houses, and no where else, they cannot cultivate or appropriate it to any other purpose; in the perumbóc they have no right to fill up tanks, stop watercourses, or obstruct roads; and so in other descriptions of land.|| Meerassy right is confined to the use of these as they exist: no alteration can be made with respect to them by the Meerassidars; I mean that they have no inherent right to do so. With the consent of the Circar any beneficial change in the appropriation of lands may take place, and a correspondent alteration must be made in the terapadi accounts. Thus, if part of the anádi-carambu lands be reclaimed, or a road in the perumbóc be stopped up and cultivated, the extent must be transferred from this head to that of várapet.

Third Question.

" Is meerassy right forfeited for ever when cultivation is for a single season " discontinued?"

Answer.

* The pangu-málei-canaccu, which may be considered the second part of the general village register, states the number of careis, or fixed shares into which the whole meerassy is divided; the proportions possessed by each Meerassidar; the lands held by ulcudis; all mutations of these; and the actual distribution, in detail, of the cultivable lands, mányam or várapet, for the current year, among every description of cultivator, Meerassidar, Ulcudi, or Paracudi.

† See the various documents in the Appendix, by which it will be observed that the waste, as well as the cultivated lands, are invariably transferred by them.

‡ Teram, sort, kind; it is used technically, to denote the general heads under which the whole superficies of the village lands is arranged; idu, a term of the same general import, is employed to denote the quality of the soil, as mudel idu, land of the first quality, &c. Terapadi-canaccu, therefore, is the first part of the general village register, recording the extent and description of the several kinds of land of which the whole is composed: the distribution of them, as stated in the preceding note, is shewn by the pangu-málei.

|| The general descriptions into which land is distributed by the terapadi accounts are, perumbócu, including generally the nattam, on which the village stands, the paracheri inhabited by the pareiyers and chackiliers, Pagodas and all other buildings, rivers, tanks, large and small watercourses, and all other waters, roads, and burning places. Tarisu, of two kinds, Seycal-carambu, cultivable waste; and anádi-carambu, immemorial waste. Tóppu, orchards and groves of productive trees. Tóttacál, gardens, plantations of betel-vines, &c. Mányams, of two kinds; terapadi-mányam, rent-free lands held under the village register, and sunned or dumbála-mányam, rent-free lands held by special grant. Várapet, of two kinds, nanjey, wet land, and Punjey, dry field.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

Answer.

Meerassy right is not forfeited by the discontinuance of cultivation for a single year, or any longer period, during the life of the Meerassidar, his son, or his grandson; it would become forfeitable, that is, the claimant could not regain it, if it had passed into the possession of another, by the Hindu law,* after the third generation, or after the lapse of the period of memory, determined to be one hundred years. If, however, by the word "forfeited"† it be intended to ask, whether, by omitting to cultivate, the Meerassidar renders his lands liable to confiscation by Government, it may be answered, that by the implied compact under which these lands and the various meerassy privileges are held, he is bound to cultivate his full proportion of the várapet lands, according to the share he holds in the village, and the wilful neglect or refusal to do so is a breach of this contract, necessarily entitling the state to provide for the maintenance of its revenues by other means; but I do not think that, either in strict right, or according to the general practice of the country, the permanent forfeiture of meerassy would ensue from discontinuing merely the cultivation, either for one or any determinate number of years. If a Meerassidar be so reduced in circumstances as not to be able to bring under cultivation his share of the várapet, or if he should have abandoned agriculture for other pursuits, it is incumbent on him to provide for its culture, by granting to Páyacaris such terms as will induce them to bestow on it the advantages of their stock and labour: if he do not do this, the state has then a right to employ Páyacaris, either for the current year, or for a fixed, not an indefinite, number of years, and perhaps to resume his mírási swantantrams, in proportion to the extent of land he has neglected to cultivate. The latter, however, though the justice of it might not be questioned, would be considered a harsh measure, and should not be resorted to, except in cases of extreme contumacy. If, after the admission of a Páyacari into a village by the Meerassidars, or after he has been established in it by the Government, he and his descendants be allowed to continue in the uninterrupted occupancy of the lands they hold until the fourth generation, or until the lapse of a century, they become the legal proprietors, and by the practice of the country are Uzhavadei Ulcudigal,‡ owners by length of occupancy; for custom so far modifies the law in this respect, that no duration of possession can constitute one whose ancestor was originally a stranger, a meerassy proprietor:‖ the owner by occupancy retains permanent possession of the land and

* The following quotation from the Mátrica of the Vivahára Cándam of the Mitacshara, the principal legal authority in southern India, corroborates the statement here made: "Text XXXII. 'Acquisition is preferable to enjoyment, except by direct ancestral descent.' Extract from the commentary on this text. 'Except by direct ancestral descent.'—Descent from three direct ancestors, namely, the father, and the rest is termed direct ancestral descent.—'Except by direct ancestral 'descent;' this is also intended to point out the period of memory. In explaining this the commentator quotes the following text from Cáttyáyanah: 'Enjoyment of land within the period of 'memory with acquisition will be valid, beyond the period of memory, on account of the recollection not extending to it (acquisition), regular descent for three generations'—He proceeds, 'Period of memory,' a period of one hundred years; for the Sruti (Védam) says, 'Man endures one hundred years.'

† To whatever extent the state may be entitled to proceed in case of a breach of the compact to cultivate on the part of the Meerassidar, whether it be limited as here stated, or whether the right of resumption be absolute, there are instances of interference with meerassy right which cannot, on any principle, be justified. Admitting the meerassy to be forfeited for refusing to cultivate, it certainly is not by the refusal of the Meerassidars to take their village in rent; when, therefore, in 1796, the Government of that time, supporting the recommendation of the Collector in the jaghire, and rejecting that of the Board of Revenue, decided, "that if the inhabitants of Tremashy persist in "declining to take their villages upon the beriz, with the badernavees (deductions) from the "customary shares of the inhabitants proposed by the Collector, he be authorized to transfer the "meerassy preference of that village to whosoever of the inhabitants of the jaghire may be willing "to take it under that assessment." (See Consultation of the 8th January 1796). This decision was felt by all acquainted with the subject, notwithstanding the various reasons adduced to support it, to be founded on erroneous principles, and subversive of the just rights of the people; rights fixed when the system of renting the Government share of the produce was unknown, and when, consequently, no such obligation as is here implied could have been imposed on the Meerassidar.

‡ The length of time necessary to constitute a Páyacari an Ulcudi, will, I have no doubt, be found to vary considerably in different places. There is no general rule; and, except where a particular custom is shewn to exist, the precepts of the law must, therefore, in this, as in other cases, apply.

‖ The reason of this is clear. The origin of meerassy is from the first settlement of the country, when the rights and its incidents were established, and none but the descendants of the first possessors or their presumptive assigns can hold meerassy. New meerassy may be created by competent authority where it does not exist; power only can alter the conditions of the old.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

and enjoys its produce, but he has no claim to any mírási privileges. When the settlement above noticed was formed with the Meerassidars, there were in some of the Madras villages spots of waste land for which they refused to take certificates, which have been since considered the property of Government; but this is a case in which the Meerassidar, on the option offered of taking the várapet lands on a fixed money payment, or not, preferred resigning them, retaining all his other privileges; and he cannot, therefore, be said to have forfeited them from neglecting to cultivate.

Fourth Question.

" Where meerassy right exists, has it always been respected by the officers " of Government in framing the jummabundy ?"

Answer.

In the villages of Madras meerassy right has always been respected by the public officers; for being under the immediate eye of Government, injustice, whenever attempted, must have been liable to instant detection, and would of course be promptly corrected. To answer the question generally is perhaps exceeding the strict bound within which I ought to confine myself; but every person, conversant with the Revenue department, must be acquainted with many instances in which the officers of Government have not respected the right of the Meerassidars. He must know that they have often been set aside from ignorance of their existence, or inattention to their extent, and often, also, to avoid any real or fancied inconveniences, to which, from the views of the moment, they may have given, or appear to have given, origin. Another, and perhaps more frequent reason for disregarding this, which from every cons ider ation of justice and policy ought to be an inviolable right of the people, is its incompatibility with the interests of the native servants of Government, to which fixed rights and known demands must ever be inimical.

Fifth Question.

" If not respected by the officers of Government, has it nevertheless been " respected by the people themselves ?"

Answer.

I can only answer this question generally. I have known instances in which, when, in forming revenue settlements, the rights or customs of the inhabitants have been disregarded, they have corrected the error by agreements among themselves. There is a strong feeling of justice existing among all ranks of the native population, in every question regarding the possession of land,* which, generally speaking, will prevent any direct violation of established rights and customs; and I have little doubt, therefore, but that the Paracudis, and other inferior cultivators, would in many cases continue to respect meerassy right, where it had not been respected by the officers of Government. It is within my knowledge, that in certain districts, where the entire of the várapet lands have passed from the Meerassidars, and are now cultivated by Paracudis under the Government renters, that the Meerassidars have retained possession of their manyams, and, I believe, for I have not sufficient information to assert it, their méreis and other privileges. It is, I understand, in contemplation to form a a general ryotwári settlement. The tendency of this measure would be to destroy the samudáyem,† or joint proprietary, by dividing the várapet lands among the Meerassidars, who would become renters of the Circar revenue in proportion to the share they held in the village. But such effect, it is probable, would not take place: no division would be made, except in the books of the cutcherry, which did not accord with the prescriptive usage of the village, and unless compulsory measures were adopted to prevent it, in those in which the

* This perhaps is only a modification of the veneration felt for hereditary rank and right in general; but the assertion may appear contradictory to fact, and no doubt many facts might be adduced to contradict it. I mean it to apply only to the sober disposition of the people, uninfluenced by particular passions, which sweep indiscriminately before them all the better feelings of human nature.

† This Sanscrit term, generally equivalent to the Tamil pasung-carei, is used specially to designate lands not included in any carei, and held, therefore, in common. Such lands are to be found both in pasung-carei and arudi-carei villages: there are still some in St. Thomé, which Sami Naic left undivided.

the pasung-carei tenure prevails, the land would continue to be changed periodically by lot, without reference to the Sircar rent-roll.

Sixth Question.

"In how many villages of the district does meerassy right exist?"

Answer.

There are within the collectorate of Madras fifteen villages,* in each of which meerassy right has always obtained, but it is not in all of the same kind: of these,† eleven villages were originally held in pasung-carei tenure, and under a regular pangu-málei register; the village of Mayilápùr (St. Thomé) is in arudi-carei tenure, and has never, within the memory of man, possessed a regular pangu-málei This, no doubt, has arisen from the town of St. Thomé having, from an early period, been a settlement of the Portuguese, who, by purchase and other means, appear to have gradually effected an alteration in the customary tenure, though they did not oust the proprietors, similar to that operated in the other villages by the issue of certificates. The small village of Nedumbari was held by the family of the Cávilcár of Madras in ecabhógam tenure,‡ but having been resumed with the other privileges of that officer by Mr. Place in 1796, and rented to the inhabitants of Perambùr, the meerassy is now claimed by them

Seventh Question.

"In how many villages is there no meerassy right?"

Answer.

There are no villages within the Madras collectorate in which meerassy does not exist, or has not existed ‖

Eighth Question.

"How many Meerassidars are there in the district?"

Answer.

The number of Meerassidar families in each village within the collectorate of Madras is shewn in the following statement, taken partly from Mr. Place's terapadi accounts for fusilies 1201, 1202, and 1203, and partly from the village accounts, to which I have added the shares into which the several villages were divided by the original pangu-málei, the distribution of them among the actual Meerassidars, the total value of the meerassy, and, with reference to the fourteenth question, the value of the highest, lowest, and average meerassy, as deduced from these data.§

† The villages of Irungunám and Attapollam, the first to the west, the second to the north, constitute jointly the greater proportion of the site of the town of Madras. Triplicane, in which no meerassy has existed for time immemorial, is an appanage, and the adjacent village, Pudupác, a srótriyam to the pagodas at these places; the whole produce consists of quit-rent and ready money collections. Chintádripet is not reckoned among the ancient villages of Madras. it was established and given in srótriyam to the pagoda by the English Government.

‡ The mélváram, also, was enjoyed by them, so that, in fact, it was held as servamányam by this family. It is entered as a srótriyam in Mr. Place's accounts

‖ In the provinces in which meerassy prevails, villages are found, which by the extinction of this right are held by ulcudi-páyacáris, who cannot transfer the land, and do not enjoy the usual sotantrams The distinction between these and meerassy villages in the district of Tinnevelly is particularly stated in Mr. Lushington's Report, dated 29th December 1800. (See paragraph 96.)

§ Many alienations had taken place in most of the villages entered in this statement: in Tondiyárpett less than in any of the rest, previously to fusily 1204, or 1795, the last year to which Mr Place's accounts extend; the values, therefore, herein entered, are those of the meerassy remaining at that period in the possession of the original Meerassidars

Ninth Question.

" How many cultivators are there ?"

Answer.

The number of inhabitants, as entered in Mr. Place's terapadi statements, for the years aforementioned, were in each village as follows:*

The number of actual cultivators is not given, and perhaps could not be ascertained. At present circumstances are so changed, that there are few, if any, inferior cultivators resident in the Madras villages. What remains of the village lands, not converted into gardens, is cultivated by hired labourers, sometimes engaged in one place and sometimes in another, and frequently more profitably employed as Coolies.

Tenth Question.

" What is the average annual value of meerassy right in proportion to the " produce?"

Eleventh

* The number of inhabitants assigned by these statements to the Madras villages, is probably confined to the site of the nattam, as, if it were intended to include the entire population within the bounds of the villages, it must be much more considerable Nearly the whole extent of Irungunam, Attapollam, and Triplicane, being covered with houses, the site of the ancient attam could not be distinguished, and for these, therefore, the population is not stated.

Eleventh Question.

" What is the average annual value of meerassy right in proportion to the " Revenue?"

Answer.

The following Abstract is taken from Mr. Place's terapadi statement of four maganams of the home farms, which include most of the villages now under this collectorate, and will shew the annual value of the meerassy right, including under this term the caniyátchi mányam, méreis, and the inhabitants' share of the total váram, in proportion to the produce and to the revenue at the period this account was prepared. The permanent settlement since made being chiefly founded on the results of Mr. Place's management, the present value of meerassy in these districts remains probably the same as here shewn.

* The principal item of the sum here deducted from the inhabitants, and added to the Government share is the váratundu, a deduction of ten per cent. from the customary váram of those who received sixty per cent. (Paracudis chiefly),

These results, it will be observed, apply only to the case of meerassy land cultivated by the meerassidar. What the meerassy share is,* after deducting the charges for labour, seed, &c. when the land is held by paracudis, the statement from which this abstract is taken affords no data for calculating, nor could it be supplied by any information within my reach.

Twelfth Question.

" Is meerassy right ever sold?"

Answer.

Par. 1. I shall be particular in my reply to this question, as it is one of essential importance to the state and the people; and as I have reason to believe that the right of the latter to transfer landed property has never been duly considered, the opinions of some giving it by far too great a latitude, those of others placing it under restrictions which tend to annihilate it, I shall briefly examine; first, the general law with respect to the transfer of landed property, as laid down in those treatises within my immediate reach, which are considered authorities in this part of India; and next, the special practice, which has obtained in the districts in the vicinity of the presidency, with respect to the transfer of meerassy right. In corroboration of the opinions expressed on the latter subject, I have made a collection of the various kinds of deeds, bonds, conveyances, and agreements in use, in any manner connected with the incidents of ownership in land, a translation of which will be found in the accompanying Appendix. These documents, the peculiarities of which I have endeavoured to explain by a series of notes, will be found, also, to support and elucidate all that is stated in this paper on the subject of meerassy in general; indeed, documents of this nature are the best proofs of the existence of rights which are not always supported by positive law,† as it is impossible that deeds, conveying, limiting, extending, or transferring such rights, should in any country be in common use, unless the rights themselves were well known and generally recognized. The authenticity of all the documents translated it would be presumptuous in me to maintain, though I believe that this quality may be attributed to the greater number of them; but considering the purposes for which they are here used, absolute authenticity is not necessary to them. They are produced, not to prove the fact but the thing; not to prove the sale or mortgage of a property, but to prove that a property exists to be sold or mortgaged: and this is established as completely by a forged as a true deed, for chiefly), and of five per cent from the váram of those who received fifty five per cent (Brahmans chiefly). The villeitundu is a charge made on such inhabitants as had sold their grain by contract, being the difference between such contract price and the average retail price of the place These deductions, under the general name of " Budernavees," were made only in the two first years (fuslies 1222 and 1223) to which the accounts, whence this abstract is taken, extend

* This involves a question of considerable importance, which, did I possess the means, might properly be discussed here. As far as I am aware, the productive value of land in this part of India, affected as it is by ever-varying incidents, has never been investigated on correct principles, and consequently little is known respecting it, for though it is loosely stated, that, to render land valuable property, the Circar rent must not exceed thirty-three per cent of the gross produce, it does not appear on what data this calculation is founded, while it is certain that in many parts of Southern India land is valuable property, though the Circar rent has not, for a long period past, fallen short of fifty per cent In some manavári lands, watered solely from the heavens, thirty-three per cent would, on an average of years, leave nothing to the cultivator, much less a surplus to the landlord, while in some áttupáchel, watered from rivers, and éri-pachel lands, watered from large tanks, seventy-five per cent, if the cultivation be free, would leave both a proprietor's income and a labourer's maintenance Land which does this must be valuable, but it may not be saleable Sale is not the criterion of value, for it is governed by considerations altogether distinct from the mere productive value of land.

† After diligent search, I cannot find in any work on Hindu law, text book, or commentary, any positive precept or injunction conferring on any description of persons property in land, though the existence of such property under a variety of terms, and for a variety of purposes, is alluded to in every page. The fact is, that the thing existed in India when the lawgivers of the country wrote, and it was evidently superfluous for them to prescribe what they found fully established: in treating, therefore, of inheritance and partition, they do not think it necessary previously to explain the nature of the landed property, but say generally,—Yajnyavalcya " Over land acquired by " the grandfather, the father and son have equal dominion.' Again, vrihaspati: " Of property " acquired by the grandfather, whether moveable or immoveable (land, &c) equal shares are " ordained for the father and son " And again, vyása " A father and his sons shall have equal " shares of a house or of land, which has descended from ancestors." See also what follows in the reply to this question, respecting the sale of land and the several rights attached to the enjoyment of it.

for the forger will be careful to insert in it nothing that can destroy its verisimilitude, he will labour to give it every appearance of correctness, and scrupulously avoid every thing contrary to established form. Nothing, therefore, short of proving the whole of the documents contained in the Appendix spurious, can invalidate their evidence on the several points of meerassy right which they embrace.

GENERAL LAW.

2. It must be premised, that by law all sales of land, or other immoveable property, must be made in the form of gifts. Thus, in the vijnyánéswaryam, in commenting on the text which defines the description of persons without whose consent the gift, sale, of immoveable property cannot be made, the author quotes the following text: " There is no sale in immoveable property; " it may be mortgaged by consent." And he adds, as the final explanation of this and the preceding text: " Thus when sale is made, the sale of immoveable property must be made with gold and water, in the form of a gift: this is the meaning." In this doctrine the Saraswati-vilása coincides.

3. When, therefore, the word give is used in speaking of immoveable property, it includes sell. Thus, also, in Mr. Colebrook's Digest, page 108, Vol. II., it is said " give, having a secondary sense, without losing its literal meaning, comprehends sale, and the like."

4. Under the title Dattápradânicam, subtraction of what has been given, both of the vijnyânéswaryam and of the saraswati-vilása, among the sixteen persons who cannot give, and by consequence cannot sell, are enumerated the following in a quotation from Nárada: " By an infant, an idiot, one not " independent, a drunkard, a madman, the gift of land is no gift" (i. e. not valid. These words precede this quotation and are here understood.)

In explanation of the term " aswatantra," one not independent, the following additional quotation is made from Nárada. " Those who are not inde- " pendent are the whole of the people; but the Lord of the Earth is independent. " Disciples, also, are said not to be independent; but independence belongs " to the teacher. Women and sons are not independent, nor slaves, nor other " members of a family. The master of the family himself is not independent, " as respects that which has regularly descended from ancestors."

5. It follows, therefore, that as property which has descended from ancestors cannot be given, or, which is the same thing, sold by the master of the family without the consent of his children; as women, sons, slaves, and others, dependents of a family, cannot dispose of any property without the consent of the master of it, so, also, the people cannot alienate land without the consent of the lord of it.

6. This doctrine is further illustrated and is found in the Tercapanchananiyam,* as will appear by the following extracts from Colebrooke's translation. In page 115, vol. ii, the two preceding verses of Nárada are quoted with others; and in explaining what is intended by the terms dependent, the commentator says (page 116) " all subjects residing with the king's assent on " land owned by him are occupied in the acquisition of wealth: with his assent " they may possess land, and if it be seized by another, the king shall compel " him to restore it; therefore it is proper that they should make gifts or sales " with his assent."

7. The words underscored in the translation are in the original " Ráj'ánuma- " tàvéva tat swámicáyàm b,humau :" the last of which, rendered by " land " owned by him," the king, might be translated, " land under his dominion ;" for the words " Rajáswamica b,húmi" may have either of these acceptations, or, to speak more correctly, are equivalent; for, according to this author, as will be presently seen, there is a double property in land, so that the king owns, jointly with the cultivator, all land over which he has dominion.

8. This

* Though this work cannot be received as authority in southern India on any disputed point, the doctrine it follows belonging to a school of law very different from that which is here prevalent, yet on points not disputed it has equal weight with any other modern compilation. In considering this subject, I have referred chiefly to it, because, being easily accessible, the correctness of my statements may be readily verified.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

8. This is under the title "Unalienable property,"* subordinate to the general title, "Subtraction of what has been given.†" In the subordinate title, "On void gifts,"‡ reference is made to the same or similar texts, and the doctrine above stated confirmed. Thus, in page 189, Vol. II, it is said: "All "subjects are dependent (XV, 2.) Land, or the like, given by subjects, with "the king's consent, is a valid gift; so, if a corrody be granted by a wealthy "man, the gift of it, with his assent, is valid."

9. The commentary, then, proceeds to explain the law with respect to other dependent persons, namely, pupils, sons, slaves, and the like; the gifts or sales of all dependents, without the consent of the persons their superiors, are considered equally invalid (see pages 190 and 191, vol. ii.).

10. Again, in page 161, vol. ii, part the first, under the title of alienable property, &c. subordinate to the general title above noticed, the legal mode of conveying lands is thus declared: "Land is conveyed by six formalities, by "the assent of townsmen, of kindred, of neighbours, and of heirs, and by the "delivery of gold and water."

The commencement of the commentary on this text is: "Literally 'of the "town' meaning the rational inhabitants of the place. 'Kindred,' persons "who might eventually be entitled to the heritage after the giver's male issue, "namely, daughters sons and the rest. 'The lord,' the king, or his substi- "tute, or any king's officer employed for the purpose, &c. &c. By 'lord' is "meant the king; his assent is required, because subjects are dependent "(XV. 2.—this reference is to the text above quoted). In a gift of land, "the assent of him by whose will it is held, and by whose favour the encroach- "ments of others is prevented, is indeed proper," &c. (See the whole.)

11. The original of the text above translated "Land is conveyed," &c. is as follows: "Gramas swájnyati sámanta dáyad'anumaténa cha hiranyódaca "danéna shab,hir gach, hati médini." Here it will be observed, that the third of the six descriptions of persons, required to be present to render valid the conveyance of land, is "samanta," which word Mr. Colebrooke in translating the text has rendered "neighbours," one of the senses it bears, while in the commentary he has twice rendered the same term by the word "lord," the meaning given to it by the author, who explains it by the corresponding term "king," and which in this text it undoubtedly bears, for the repetition of a word signifying neighbour after "town or townsmen" has been mentioned, would be manifest tautology.§

12. The law, as thus stated from the Saraswati-vilásam and the Jagganátha Panchánaniyam, which makes the consent of the king necessary to the legal conveyance of landed property, is corroborated by other codes. The proprietary right of the subject is probably better defined in the province of Malayala, or Malabar, than in any part of India. Various modes of transferring land by lease, mortgage, assignment, &c. by which the right of the original proprietor passes on by degrees to the lessee, mortgagee, or assignee, until it is at length confirmed to them in full property, are in constant practice, and the form and substance of the several deeds fixed by immutable rule. The final deed, by which the proprietary right is conclusively transferred from the Jenmacar, or hereditary proprietor, is called atti-péray-nir. In the Vyevehára-samudram, a law treatise written in Malayala verse, the principles of which are professedly derived from the text book of Nárada, though the details are founded on the practice of the country, is the following verse, stating the incidents necessary to give validity to the deed atty-péráy-nír: "When one takes from another "the Jenmam (proprietary right) by the water of obligation, the prescribed law "is, that according to an excellent rule, there should be six persons present, "namely, people of pure cast, relations, a son, the scribe of the king, and peo- "ple connected with the parties: unless these here mentioned are present, no "portion of land must be bought."

13. The consent, or at least the knowledge of the king, is here clearly necessary to give validity to the final conveyance of land in the province of Malabar;

* Adéyam. † Dattápradánicam. ‡ Adattam.

§ The Dherma 'Sastram being considered a divine revelation, the commentators never allow that tautology can be inferable; when it is undeniably shewn the passage is rejected as spurious.

Malabar; and as the same rights, though not so clearly defined, prevail in this part of India, it must be inferred that it is necessary here also. Inference, however, is not necessary when facts can be adduced, and a reference to the deeds by which lands are customarily transferred, all evidently founded on the precepts of the law, both in form and substance, will shew that this is actually the case. Thus in the regular cráya-sásana, given when land is sold without reservation, the act is formally stated to have been performed in the presence of the prince, or the officers of the prince, mannaler, and of the people, maneicolaver. The following quotation from a craya-sasana, passed by Anudarayappa Mudelyàr, for three-sixteenths of the village of Sirudeiùr, to Vencatachela Chettiyàr, in the year of Salwahana 1704, or A. D. 1780, will establish what is here stated: "The price having been settled at thirty-eight star pagodas, in "the current coin of the day, in the presence of the rulers of the land, man- "naler, and the householders, maneicolaver,* I have, for these thirty-eight "pagodas, written and given this bill of sale for my three-sixteenths share of the "village of Sirudeiyùr, the superiorities and privileges thereto appertaining."

14. The reason of the consent of the king being necessary to the legal conveyance of immoveable property is founded, according to what precedes, on the inherent dependence of the subject. There is another light, however, in which the question may be considered, arising from the nature of landed property; for land admits of being enjoyed by more than one person at a time, and may, therefore, be possessed at the same time by the king and by the cultivator, by each according to his specific rights.

15. Under the title of "sale without ownership,"† commencing in page 460, vol. i, the author of the Jaggánatha Panchánaniyam demonstrates that this joint right of the king and subject does actually exist. The argument is supported by a variety of texts, and the conclusion drawn at page 472, Vol I, is expressed in Mr. Colebrooke's translation in the following words: "Is the earth unowned if the king have no property in it? If it be alleged "that the soil is not unowned, since the subject has property by occupancy, "it is asked, cannot the king occupy land? The king may also have property "in the land by occupancy: therefore the right, both of the king and the sub- "ject, in the soil, is proved upon the concurrent opinions of Chandreswara, "Sri Chrishna, Tercálancára, and many other authors.

"Property must be discriminated by occupancy: thus if another invade the "land occupied by subjects, the king opposes him, and the land is occupied "by subjects, with the king's consent," &c. (See the passage).

"The subject's property in the soil is weaker than the king's, for the subject "is weaker than the king; but it is founded on the reason of the law and on "settled usage: therefore the land ought not to be sold by the king to "another," &c. (See the passage).

On the concluding words of the last sentence it may be observed, that as the property of the king in the soil is here declared to be stronger, and that of the subject weaker, if the king cannot sell the land, à fortiori, the subject cannot. But from what follows it is evident, that though neither can dispose of the whole property, either may of his right in it; the king, from his inherent independence, without the consent of the subject; the subject from his inherent dependence, with the consent of the king.

16. The joint property of the king and the cultivator in the soil is again adverted to in commencing the title "partition of patrimony,"‡ where Jagganátha Tercapanchánana enters into a disquisition on the nature of property in general, and the investiture of it by heritage in the relations of the deceased owner. (See the whole passage, from page 502 to 520, vol. ii, Colebrooke's Digest.) He ends with the following example and conclusion, as to the existence of concurrent property in the same thing. "When a principality is sold, "the prince has property entitling him to receive revenue; but the property "of the occupant, entitling him to enjoy the produce of the land, subsists in "full force. When the produce is sold by the occupant, the purchaser ac- "quires

* This terms includes the Meerassidars and all the resident inhabitants of the village.

† Aswami-vicrayam. ‡ Dáya-bhága.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

"quires a right to enjoy it, but the king retains his title to receive revenue. "Hence, he who cultivates land for which he pays revenue to the king, and "who enjoys the produce obtained from that land, is acknowledged to possess "property as cultivator of the soil; if he sell the land, the purchaser acquires "similar property, in right of which he enjoys the produce after paying revenue "to the king. The cultivator is not destitute of ownership; for that would "not be consistent with practice. Consequently various concurrent rights to "one and the same thing being admitted, it must be established, that property "is an impediment to other property of the same nature." This has been also stated by 'Sri Chrishna Tercálancára, in these words: "for those two "concurrent rights of the same nature are incompatible."

The meaning is, that there cannot be two concurrent rights of the same kind, but there may be two concurrent rights of a different kind. The rights of two princes in the same territory cannot concur, nor can the rights of two cultivators in the same extent of soil; but the right of the prince being of a different kind from that of the cultivator, may be, and is, concurrent with the right of the cultivator in the same land.

17 From what has been said in the preceding paragraphs, the conclusion is, that by the old law, though land might be temporarily transferred by mortgage, or permanently by gift, it could not be sold; that, according to the interpretation by the commentators of the ancient text, the sale of it is allowed, the word "dánam," donation, being construed to signify any act of divestiture; and that, from the right of superiority inherent in the king, and the concurrent ownership which he has in all lands cultivated by his subjects, the sale cannot be made without his consent, implied or direct.

18. This is the settled law of the case. I shall proceed to shew the practice prevalent with respect to the sale of meerassy* in the districts adjacent to this presidency.

Special Practice.

19. Meerassy right has been always, and is saleable in the villages of Madras; but in those held in pasung-carei, or samudayem, joint proprietary, the land, strictly speaking, is not transferable. But it is the indivisible right the meerassidar possesses to a share in the mányams and méreis, to the cultivation of várapet, to the enjoyment of the nattam and back yards, the wastes, roads, wells, watercourses, &c. within the precincts of the village, that he can transfer by sale, gift, or mortgage. For example, if a village be divided into sixteen shares, and an individual hold half a share, he is entitled to one-thirty-second part of the annual produce of the cániyátchi-mányams and méreis. Of the total productive várapet lands he must provide for the cultivation of one thirty-second part, and participates to that extent in the total profits from them. One thirty-second part is his share, also, in all advantages derived from forests, wastes, and water; and, in fine, he has an interest equal to one thirty-second part in all profits belonging to the village, tangible or intangible, and it is this interest,† and this only, that he can transfer. The person to whom he transfers it becomes, on the formal completion of the act, a meerassidar of the village, and assumes the station in the community the transferer has vacated. It has been shewn, that by law landed property, and all rights connected with it, that is meerassy, can only be transferred by written deed, accompanied by certain prescribed formalities, tending to give the act general publicity, and with the consent

* The Sanscrit term st,hávaram, which occurs in the foregoing quotations, literally immoveable property, agreeing with the expression used by our lawyers, real property, and contradistinguished to the term jangamam, moveable or personal property, would seem to have essentially the same meaning as the word Mírási, and to include all inherited property.

† The eight incidents of ownership in land are stated in the following verse.

consent of six stated descriptions of persons;* accordingly it appears from the old bills of sale drawn in the villages of Madras, which always transfer a share, shares, or part of a share, never a particular spot of ground, that the requisitions of the law were satisfied by putting up to auction the meerassy right to be transferred. This proceeding enabled all persons concerned to maintain the rights given them by the law, and when observed, was sufficient to legalize the transfer. In case of private sale, however, the consent, implied or direct, of the six descriptions of persons whom the law considers as interested ought to be obtained, before any transfer of landed property can be made. By the custom of the country, the bill of sale must be drawn by the Curnum of the village; it must be witnessed by two or more creditable persons, and countersigned by all, or at least by the principal Meerassidars; it must state the exact share transferred (or, when land and not right is sold, the boundaries towards the four cardinal points, sometimes, also, it shews the measurement and produce); it must contain a distinct date, and the name of the reigning prince,† and one or more of his predecessors; the persons of the transferrer and transferree must be clearly designated by the insertion of their father's name, their caste, tribe, and place of residence; and the transfer must be regularly recorded by entry of the new Meerassidar's name in the pangu-málei register. It is not here meant to deny that a particular spot of ground in a samudáya village may be transferred to a stranger without conveying to him meerassy right, but when done it must be by the consent of all the Meerassidars, and with the permission of the Sircar. Such transfers have frequently taken place in latter times, and have become customary in the villages of Madras, but the right is not inherent in the Meerassidar. When ground is sold independently of meerassy it must be várapet, or waste land. Mányam land, whether belonging to the Meerassidars or the village officers, and lands entered in the terrapadi under the head of nattam and perumbóc, are in no case transferable by direct sale; they may, however, be transferred indirectly by exchange: for example, if it be intended to dispose of a part of the cániyátchi, or inhabitants, mányam, its extent, produce, and value is ascertained, and a portion of the várapet land equivalent to it is assigned to the holder of the mányam, who receives the price agreed on from the purchaser, and the latter becomes answerable for the Circar revenue payable on the várapet land thus converted into mányam. The deed under which this exchange is effected is called parivertanei-chíttu, deed of conversion, and is in very common use at Madras; for though certificates free of quit rent have been issued for many of the mányam and nattam lands of the villages of Madras, by which they have become transferrable property, the people themselves are averse to a direct and absolute transfer of such land. It is also to be observed, that though the lands constituting official mányams are not transferrable by direct sale, gift, &c., official meerassy is. I am not aware that there exists any instance of such transfer of cável meerassy, but many instances might be adduced, and some will be found in the Appendix, in which the curnum meerassy and the meerassy of the village servants, of the Panjágen, ironsmith, carpenter, &c have been so transferred. Such transfers are, however, not common, and I should doubt whether they would be complete without the direct consent of the Sircar first obtained, especially as regards the Curnum, as the public interests require that this office should be filled by a competent person

Thirteenth Question.

" How many years purchase of its annual value is meerassy right generally " sold for?"

Answer.

Local circumstances have continued to increase the value of land in the vicinity of Madras so greatly, that to state the prices now given could lead to no judgment of the value of meerasy generally or particularly; but a reference to sales made in former times may enable an opinion, more or less correct, to be formed on the subject. From an old bill of sale, passed by Peria Mudeli, Meerassidar of Tondiyárpett, to Tiyágapa Mudeli, it appears that a moiety of one of the ten shares (careis) into which the village was divided, or one-twentieth of the whole, was sold by auction, in A. D 1726, for fifty pagodas. The soil of this village is mostly salt and sandy, and being capable, consequently of little agricultural improvement, their productive value must have always remained stationary; moreover, not being calculated for the formation of gardens, the greater part, if not the whole, continued unalienated from the date of this bill of sale, until the formation of Sámi Naic's settlement. On reference to Mr. Place's terapadi statement for fusilies 1202, 1203, and 1204, it appears that the average share of the inhabitants of the total produce of tondiyárpet in the last of these years was worth Star Pagodas 414 19 53, one-twentieth of which is Star Pagodas 20 32 39; the sale above-mentioned, therefore, was, according to this calculation, effected at about two and a half years' purchase. From another bill of sale passed nearly at the same time, (in A. D. 1722) by Arjuna Mudeli, for one-third of a carei, or of a tenth share of the same village, it appears that the price paid was exactly the same as for the half share sold by Peria Mudeli, Pagodas 50, which acccording to the total value of the meerassy produce, deduced as above, was nearly at the rate of four years' purchase. The productive value of meerassy must be compounded of the value of mányams, méreis, and other privileges, the extent and nature of the soil of the várapet lands, advantages of irrigation, and the share customarily taken by the inhabitants, each of which varies in a greater or less degree in every village: but it must be observed, that, generally speaking, the last circumstance, which is regulated by the others, has a more direct influence than any of them on the profits of agriculture, and consequently on the value of meerassy in villages, for where the mányams, &c. are large, or where the várapet land is extensive and of a good soil, or where water is abundant and irrigation easy, the share of the inhabitants is lower than where the reverse of these is the case: this tends to equalize profits and to counterbalance natural and artificial advantages. It is evident, from what is here stated, that the produce and rate of the inhabitant's share being given, the productive value of the meerassy of any village must in ordinary cases be known. The considerations which govern purchase value are very different, however, from those on which productive value are founded. Purchase of land is only one of the many modes of vesting capital, and the purchaser, looking only to the ultimate profit, takes no account of subordinate circumstances, of the quality of the land, or the rate of taxation on it; as, if an equal income be afforded, it must be the same to him whether it be derived from ten canis of good and lightly taxed land, or from a hundred canis of bad and highly taxed land. Purchase value is compounded of productive value, the value of money ascertained by the rate of interest generally prevalent, scrutiny of tenure, and certainty of produce. Of these, productive value and the rate of interest must be the foundation of every calculation, the other two are incidental.* In a country where, as in India, the legal rate of interest is twelve per cent., that is, where a certain income of one hundred and twenty can be secured by the loan of one thousand pagodas, it is clear, that a person will not invest this sum in property, the income from which is liable, from any cause, to fluctuation or hazard, without obtaining a higher rate of interest, and consequently a greater income to cover the risk; in other words, he will not buy land at eight and one-third years' purchase. The meerassy right may, in many districts, under the existing laws and our increasing knowledge, be now considered a stable tenure; but the purchaser will long be directed by appearances rather than realities, and by a remembrance of past insecurity rather than by a reliance on present security. Produce and its value in this part of India depends so mainly on season and on incidents so various and recurring, that, except from lands watered by rivers, or from those on which more than the ordinary labour of agriculture is bestowed, as gardens and grounds watered by wells, it

* Incidental as regards the calculation only; for, in fact, security is the principal thing considered in the investment of money In England, during war, when large sums are annually borrowed, and the national credit is in consequence comparatively impaired, the security of land is preferred to that of the funds and the value of it rises, during peace, when no money is borrowed, and the national credit is exposed to no danger, the security of the funds is preferred and the value of land falls.

it must be considered, in both its kinds, wet and dry, as more uncertain than in other climates. These circumstances considered, I think that, at most, landed security must here be reckoned at one-third less value * than money security, which will reduce the value of meerassy right in common lands to about five and a half years' purchase.† The sales above noticed in Tondiyárpet were both made at rates within this, and I am of opinion that it will be generally found that hitherto sales of meerassy have been rather below than above it.

Fourteenth Question.

" What is the greatest, the least, and the average annual value of the " meerassy of one Meerassidar?"

Answer.

The extent of the meerassy lands in the villages of Madras has been so much reduced by repeated alienations, that to state the greatest, least, and average value of the land now remaining with one Meerassidar would afford no answer to this question When the sale, of which I have made mention in the preceding answer, took place, the village of Tondiyárpet was divided into ten carees or shares, of which five shares, or one-half, valued according to the total valuation before stated, at Star Pagodas 207 9 65, were jointly held by Muttayapa and Perei-tombi Topa Mudeli: two shares, or one-fifth, valued at Star Pagodas 82 39 74, were held by Varadapa Mudeli; one share, or one-tenth, valued at Star Pagodas 41 19 77, was held by Ayama Mudeli; one of the same value by Viranen, and another by Peria Mudeli The average annual meerassy of one Meerassidar was, therefore, in this village Star Pagodas 25 40 48, though, as above shewn, the actual division was very unequal. The average annual value of meerassy in the four magánams of the home-farm villages, when the terapadi accounts were taken by Mr. Place, in fusilies 1202, 1203, and 1204, will be shewn by the following Statement.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

Fifteenth Question.

"Do Meerassidars attach any other besides a pecuniary value to their "meerassy ?"

Answer.

Exclusive of all pecuniary consideration the Meerassidars attach a high value to their meerassy. The receipt of the swámi-bhógam, or tunduváram, &c.* from the Paracudis and others are real superiorities, the possession of which must be grateful to human vanity, which must, also, be flattered by the lead they take in the festivals and all other concerns of the people, and the precedence which is always readily allowed them. The possession of meerassy is evidence, also, of the antiquity of family, and it confers considerable personal credit, the security of a Meerassidar being more readily taken than that of any other person.

Sixteenth Question.

"Where there is no meerassy right, is there any other tie by which particular "individuals are attached to particular fields, and what is it?"

Answer.

There is no tie by which individuals are attached to particular fields in the villages of Madras distinct from meerassy, but there are tenures subordinate to it, some permanent and others not, by which they are so attached. The foreign or corrupt term páyacárі† is used to designate persons who cultivate land of which they do not possess the meerassy. These are of two descriptions, Ulcudis, or fixed cultivators, and Paracudis, or strange cultivators. The latter have no pretensions to meerassy or any other property. If established in the village by the Circar, they have only the right of cultivation from year to year, unless cowle have been given to them, or they have entered into agreements (udenpadicai) with the Meerassidar for a longer period, after which all right of continuance ceases: they are, therefore, either tenants at will, or tenants under special agreements. In either case they pay the Circar share, and should render the tunduváram, or landlord's dues, to the Meerassidar; the produce of their fields, also, in common with all the várapet lands of the village, is liable to annual deductions on account of cuppatam and cáni-mérei, fees to the Meerassidars, and sundry méreis, cálvásem, and other fees to the several village officers and servants. The Ulcudi, on the contrary, holds his lands in a subordinate species of meerassy, and possesses them, not in absolute, but in definite property; for though he cannot transfer them by sale, gift, mortgage, or otherwise, yet he cannot be removed from them, and they descend, like the cániyátchi-meerassy of the village, to his posterity. He pays the Circar revenue, the tunduváram, often no more than a peppercorn, and all dues rendered by the Meerassidars and Paracudis, but he receives none. The right of the Ulcudi has been compared by competent authority (Mr. Place) to copyhold, and of all the several modes of holding land prevalent in Southern India, it is, indeed, the only one that bears any striking resemblance to the tenures of England. The Ulcudi-Páyacáris have in many places, by gradual encroachment, succeeded in placing themselves in possession of the whole várapet of the village, and not unfrequently in usurping the meerassy right. There is a remarkable instance within the limits of Madras of complete usurpation, in which the Grámani Páyacáris of the village of Tondiyárpet, after the continued contention of half a century, have established themselves in possession of the whole meerassy, though, under a decision of the Supreme Court, their right has been negatived, and they are liable to ejectment on further process. Some of the lands in the village of St. Thomé, held in arudi carei or severalty, are in the actual possession of Ulcudis, while the meerassy right in them is claimed by the representatives of the former Meerassidars. An instance lately occurred, in which an attempt was made to oust the Ulcudis, in consequence of a bill of sale executed by the sheriff, by the connivance of the claimant of the meerassy; as such sale, however, would only convey the superiorities, namely, the tunduváram, cáni-mérei,

* A variety of small fees in kind and money are paid to the Meerassidars, both by the cultivating and resident inhabitants of their villages.

† This term is said to be derived from the Persian words "pay the foot, and karidun, to labour, or kesht-car kurden, to cultivate;" the proper Tamil term is payercudi or payercaren, from payer, cultivation, and cudi, an inhabitant, caren, a person; from the latter of which it is probably corrupted.

cáni-mérei, calpadi, &c., and not the land, I resisted the attempts of the purchasers to disturb the actual tenants, and shall maintain them in possession until the case be decided by law. Besides the tenure of the permanent and temporary Páyacári, there are others by which lands are held of the Meerassidars, jointly or severally, under mortgages and assignments of various descriptions, some of which are and some are not in common use. To enter into a particular description of these, though not a difficult task, as the inquirer would readily obtain information on the subject through various channels, is foreign to the general nature of the questions to which I am replying; I shall, however, advert to a mode of holding, formerly very common within the limits of Madras, and which has in some instances been specifically recognized and confined in the grants of Government. I allude to that singular conversion of property by which a Meerassidar in an arudi-carei village* makes over the possession, right of transfer, and all other meerassy privileges, to a stranger, and constitutes himself a permanent Páyacári, by retaining the right of cultivation and the customary share of the produce. Ground† is frequently assigned in this mode for the formation of gardens, and the assignee pays the Government revenue, but neither tunduváram or méreis. In this case the privilege of pre-emption vests in the Meerassidar, and if the occupant abandon the ground, he resumes in full his original right.‡

9 Z Seventeenth

* In pasung-carei villages, also, if by the consent of all the Meerassidars.

† An extent of ground within the village of St. Thomé, originally granted to Mr. Fallowfield, is held in this manner; the right of the Meerassidar to the cultivation of it being recognized and confirmed in the grant.

‡ No distinction having been made, on the introduction of the permanent settlement into the jaghire, in which the rights of meerassy have always prevailed, between the pottahs to be given by the Mutahdars to the several descriptions of landholders, whether Meerassidars, Ulcudis, Paracudis, or others, the provisions of Regulation XXX, 1802, have, in this district, from the contending pretensions of the several parties interested, become almost nugatory. The Mutahdars, whose wish it has been to rid themselves, as much as possible, of the inconveniency of the meerassy claims, have carefully avoided giving any instrument tending to confirm them, while the Meerassidars with equal pertinacity have refused to enter into any engagement that appeared to compromise them, and have regarded with extreme jealousy pottahs given to any description of Páyacáris, as involving an infringement of their indefeasible rights. By Section 10 of this Regulation, power is given generally to "proprietors" (thereby meaning Zemindars, Mutahdars, and others receiving the Circar dues) "and farmers of land," "to grant the lands of" "under farmers or Ryots," refusing "to exchange mutual engagements in writing," "to other persons;" an enactment which would seem to place the Meerassidar at the mercy of the Mutahdar, though this has not been actually the result, as it has not been considered in practice to entitle the latter to any exertion of authority incompatible with the law and custom of the country. This, there can be no doubt, is the legal construction; for as the legislature in England have confirmed to the natives of India the administration of their own laws, and as Clause first, Section 16, of Regulation III, 1802, expressly declares that "In all suits regarding succession, inheritance, marriage and caste, and all religious usages "and institutions, the Hindoo laws, with regard to Hindoos, are to be considered as the general "rules by which the Judges are to form their decisions," no enactment can be construed as affecting the rights of cániyatchi or meerassy (inheritance), connected as they are with the general law and established usages of the country, unless they are therein expressly noticed and deliberately abolished. All the authority, therefore, which, under this interpretation of the law, the Mutahdar can exercise over any under-tenant or Ryot holding his land in meerassy tenure, who may refuse to exchange written agreements, must be confined to granting the land to Páyacáris for the current season, and this act can extend to the várapet land only, no power being given to the Mutahdar over the mányams, méreis, or any other meerassy privileges. At the expiration of any season within the period limited by law, as already explained, the Meerassidar would be entitled to recover possession of the land of which he had been thus deprived, on consenting to exchange written agreements, and to conform to the general provisions of the Regulation. In adapting, in A.D. 1802, the Regulations which had been framed for the provinces under the Government of Bengal, to those under Madras, the laws, customs, and religion of which differ from each other in many respects as much as those of any two kingdoms in Europe, sufficient attention was not paid to the peculiar institutions of the latter. This defect, the remedy for which, however, the Regulations themselves provide, whether proceeding from erroneous views respecting these institutions, or from a want of that knowledge which further inquiry and a more extended acquaintance with the local languages have enabled the service to obtain, is no doubt to be lamented, but its effects in practice have not been so mischievous as some have anticipated. The inference drawn, for example, by a writer, whose authority is always entitled to respect, and whose opinions have had, as they deserved, great weight, that the Regulations tend to destroy the proprietary right invested in the Meerassidar, the Pottah Regulation especially, by giving an undue preponderance to the newly created right of the Mutahdar (see page 174, chap. v. of Colonel Wilks's Historical Sketches of the South of India) is not supported by the result, and the proof of this is afforded by the fact, that the meerassy property of the jaghire, maintained by various decisions of the courts acting under these Regulations, continue, after the lapse of fifteen years from their introduction, in the hands of the original holders.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

Seventeenth Question.

"Where there is no meerassy right, has it been usual for the Ryots to remove from one village and from one part of a village to another part, and has their removal depended on their own choice or on that of the Collector?"

Answer.

The Paracudi-Páyacári may quit his lands, if there be no agreement, at the nd of the year, or otherwise at the end of his term, and take others in the ame or another village. If an Ulcudi-Páyacári quit his land, he loses by the ct his meerassy (hereditary right of occupancy), and the land reverts to the Cániyátchi Meerassidars. Lands held by mortgage or in assignment must be aluable, and it is not probable, therefore, that they are ever abandoned.

(Signed) F. W. ELLIS,
Collector of Madras.

Translation of Answers to the Questions enclosed in Mr. Secretary Hill's Letter to the Board of Revenue, dated 2d August 1814 by B. Sancaraya, late Sheristadar to the Collector of Madras.

First Question.

"How has meerassy right hitherto been recognized and respected, where "Meerassidars were not the renters?"

Answer.

The well-informed say, that when Tonda-mandalam* was first settled, the meerassy, known by the name of cániyátchi,† was conferred on the inhabitants, to establish in them proprietary right,‡ and that from that time they have continued uninterruptedly to enjoy it. Whatever person, not a Meerassidar, takes in farm meerassy land of this description, must employ the Meerassidars in the cultivation of it, and cannot cause it to be cultivated by Páyacáris.§ It is customary, however, when the Meerassidars are not able to carry on the cultivation, to employ either the Ulcudis§ belonging to the village, or Paracudis;§ but when this is done, the sótantrams,|| and tunduváram¶ are rendered to the meerassy inhabitants from the lands so cultivated, according to their respective shares. Within the limits of Madras the practice here stated has always existed with respect to cultivated lands on which no houses are erected; but since so great a number of houses have been built, and roads and gardens formed, the receipt of a monthly or yearly rent has become usual. On this account, and from

* The boundaries of Tonda-mandalam are generally stated to have been from the northern Pennar to the southern river of that name, now called the Gúdelam (the river of Cuddalore), and from the sea to Nandi-Droog; these, however, were not the original boundaries.

† Cániyátchi, in its general sense, is the native term for which the foreign word meerassy has in latter times been substituted. In the districts to which these answers more particularly apply, it is restricted to mean the mányams, cuppatams, and other special privileges of the Meerassidar, considered as the symbol of their proprietary right in the soil.

‡ In the original Uzhavadei, which agrees with meerassy or cániyátchi, used as a general term, as a person may say indifferently, "I hold meerassy, or cániyátchi, or uzhavadei, in such a village."

§ Under the general term Páyacári, as used in revenue proceedings, but more properly Payercudi, are included the two descriptions of free cultivators, denominated Ulcudi-Páyacáris, cultivators inhabiting the village, who by long residence have established a right to reside in it, and to cultivate a certain portion of its lands, rendering the superiorities to the Meerassidars; and Paracudi-Páyacáris, foreign cultivators, who have established no such right, but are liable to be removed at the end of the year for which they have engaged.

|| Sótantram (properly swatantram, Sanscrit, from swa, own, and tantram, will) is a general term, which includes all the meerassy privileges; but it has, in different places, different acceptations. In Tonda-mandalam, connected with the word dittam, it means especially certain fees received by the Meerassidars in the straw before threshing, and differs in this respect from the cuppatam and mérei, as these are taken after the grain is threshed.

¶ From tundu, a piece cut off, a bit, portion, and váram, fixed share of the produce, as taken either by the Circar or the Meerassidar. This term is often used synonimously with the Sanscrit word swami-bhógam, the portion enjoyed by the Lord; but there is a practical distinction, tunduváram being a certain per centage of the cudiváram, fixed by custom or agreement, rendered by the Páyacáris from the produce of all lands cultivated by them to the Meerassidars, sometimes in grain, sometimes in money, and swami-bhógam being the rent paid for land held in farm from the Meerassidar for a fixed period.

from the issue of certificates for land, the right of cániyátchi has been obliterated; however, in some arable lands, and in such only, the meerassy still continues to the Meerassidar, according to ancient custom.

Second Question.

"Does meerassy right extend to waste land?"

Answer.

As waste lands are included in the gráma-taram,* all such lands have been considered to appertain exclusively to the Meerassidars. All lands comprehended under the terms nattam,† eri,‡ perambócu,§ and tarisu,|| if the village be held in joint shares have always been enjoyed in joint shares; or, if not held in joint shares, then in severalty, according to the pangu-málei¶ accounts. Sometimes, however, when the Circar is desirous to give to any one in serva-mányam tenure, either the whole of a meerassy village, or the waste lands, or any extent of ground within the limits of the village, the value of the proprietary right therein is paid to the Meerassidars, and the land becomes serva-mányam. If the proprietary right be not so purchased, then the holder of the mányam is entitled only to the mél-váram;†† if the Meerassidar should refuse the price offered, his consent must be obtained or an exchange made for other ground. This has been practised in the Shózha country, in the villages of Nedamangalam and Callanei, and many others. Thus, also, as the inhabitants hold meerassy in waste lands entered in the tarapadi accounts, if hills are found within the tract to which these extend, the Meerassidars must be considered to be entitled to cániyátchi in them. In this manner, I understand, meerassy in hilly or rocky ground is vested in the Meerassidars of the two villages of Pallavaram and Adeiyalachéri, in zillah Chingleput, and in some others besides. Moreover, in all dána patrams‡‡ and pangu-vicraya-chittus,§§ the terms used to signify the rights conveyed are jala,|||| taru,¶¶ páshána, nidi,††† nicshépam;‡‡‡ among which páshánam signifies a hill or rock, and this appears to establish the meerassy right in such grounds. While, however, there is, as has thus been explained, a right of property to the inhabitants as respects their meerassy, yet as this right is founded chiefly on possession, a paramount right to the territory§§§ over which his dominion extends appears to vest in the prince; if, therefore, the Meerassidar fail to cultivate, and loss thence accrues to the state, the Circar enjoys and exercises the right to cause the lands to be cultivated, and to issue cowles for that purpose.

|| Tarisu of two kinds; anádi-carambu, immemorial waste, and sheycál-carambu, cultivable waste

¶ This is a register kept by the village accountant, shewing the shares held by each Meerassidar, and recording all changes of property.

 Serva-mányam signifies land entirely free, of which both the mél-váram (the Government share), and the cudi-váram (the inhabitants' share) is enjoyed by the holder of the mányam. This tenure can only be lawfully created by the joint act of the prince and the people. Ardha-mányam is land half free, of which the holder enjoys only the mél-váram: it is created by the prince only. The confounding of these tenures under the general foreign term "enám" has in latter times been the cause of great uncertainty and long continued disputes

†† And, in this case, the tenure is not serva, or entire, but ardha, or half mányam. The latter term is applied as above stated, when the whole or any part of the mélváram is alienated by the Circar, and differs from srotryam, in as much as the latter term is only properly used when the gift is made to Brámans skilled in the Sriti or Védam, whereas mányams, literally honorary gifts, may be conferred on any caste or under any circumstances.

‡‡ Deed of gift.

§§ Bill of sale of a share of meerassy.

¶¶ Taru, trees and all vegetable productions.

 Páshánam, hills, rocks, stones, ores and all mines and minerals.

††† Nidi, hidden treasures.

‡‡‡ Nicshépam, deposits of valuables, known or unknown.

§§§ In the original, the word thus rendered according to its actual meaning in the sentence is bhúmi, lower down, to designate the extent held by the Meerassidar, the word nilam is used, and so in all native writings the two terms are idiomatically distinguished; bhúmi, the earth, being used in speaking of the rights of the prince, and nilam, the soil, when speaking of those of the cultivator.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

Third Question.

" Is meerassy right forfeited for ever when cultivation is for a single season " discontinued ?"

Answer.

The meerassy right is not forfeited to the Circar from the circumstance of the Meerassidar having failed to cultivate for a year; but in case the inhabitant absents himself from his meerassy lands for a long period, neither cultivates nor rents them, and in other respects acts with determined opposition to the interests of the state, it has become customary for the Circar to select a person to enjoy the meerassy, and to confirm him in possession by cowle. Frequent instances of this took place during Mr. Place's time in Chingleput, and in Tanjore the Rájà has transferred by sasunam* villages to others not Meerassidars.

Fourth Question.

" Where meerassy right exists, has it always been respected by the officers " of Government in framing the jummabundy ?"

Answer.

When the Circar is desirous of renting the várapet† lands, and the Meerassidar refuses to take them at a reasonable rate, he may be passed over, and the farm given to another person; but, in this case, the renter must conduct the cultivation through the means of the Meerassidar, and must allow him the established váram.‡ To act contrary to this, to oust the Meerassidar and give his meerassy to another merely for refusing to rent, would be an instance of extreme injustice. Sometimes, however, when the Meerassidar owes a considerable balance to the Circar, which he is not able to liquidate; for the purpose of realizing this demand, and to prevent the entire destruction of his family, it is customary for the Circar to sequester his meerassy, to conduct the cultivation by an agent, and until the balance is cleared off to sell the amount of the tundu-váram,§ cuppatam, &c. receivable by him. If the Circar do not think proper to act thus, they may call on the other shareholders of the village to pay the balance by the defaulting Meerassidar, and to allow them to execute for his share a sabhacraya sásanam.|| This custom is said to have existed, and was so observed in former times.

Note. Sancaraya has framed his reply to to this question according to his conception of what is just, and to the practice which he has known to obtain when the rights of the people have been really respected: but I have good reason to believe that in districts where village rents have been formed, Meerassidars have been deprived of their meerassy for refusing to rent their villages. and the strange renter allowed to dispose, at his own pleasure, of at least the whole of the várapet lands.

Fifth Question.

" If not respected by the officers of Government, has it nevertheless been " respected by the people themselves ?"

Answer.

When meerassy lands are rented to a stranger, the grama-mányam,¶ cuppatam, and other méries, and the tundu-váram, are the right of the Meerassidar; the

* A written deed of any kind.

† All the cultivable lands of the village excepting mányams; the produce of which, after deducting the sótantram, cuppatams, and méreis payable to the Cániyátchicárs, Curnams, Cavilcárs, and other Meerassidars, is divided in fixed proportions between the Circar and Ryots.

‡ The total annual produce of the cultivated lands of a village is called uda-váram; the share received by Government, after the deductions above noticed, is the mél-váram; and that allowed to the cultivator is the cudi-váram, which is now generally commuted for a money payment.

§ A per centage on the uda-váram or total produce, varying in every village, but fixed in each, received by the Meerassidar in kind from all cultivated lands.

|| In this case, the whole of the Meerassidars of the village assemble and execute a joint deed, divesting the defaulter of his share in the meerassy, and investing it, according to their several proportions, in themselves. It does not appear to be necessary for the person whose share is thus tranferred, to be a party to the deed.

¶ Otherwise cániyátchi-mányam, a certain extent of land held rent free by the Meerassidars in each village.

 Fees receivable in grain, at various rates, from the total produce, by the Curnam, Cávilcár, Talcyai, capenter, washerman, Vettiyán, and other village officers and servants.

the renter has no claim whatever to them. When a Meerassidar has been guilty of any great default, though it may be competent for the Circar to oust him and to deliver the land to his Páyacari to cultivate, such Páyacari is not entitled to dispose of it by sale or otherwise, nor to receive the sótantrams. If the extent of land be found to be greater on measurement than that entered in the tarapadi accounts, the meerassy inhabitants ought to divide the excess according to their shares, and to be answerable to the Circar for the difference. If the meerassy be resumed by the Circar, the meerassy privileges are nevertheless continued.

Sixth Question.

" In how many villages of the district does meerassy right exist?"

Answer.

Meerassy right exist chiefly in the zillah of Chingleput, in the country of Shózhen or Tanjore, in the province of Arcot, and generally in all the southern districts; and here the inhabitants enjoy the privilege of transferring it by gift, sale, or otherwise. In some villages the Meerassidar has passed to Ulcudis subordinate to him, the deed called uzhavadei-cániyacátchi-sásanum,* after which the Meerassidar cannot remove him, or place any other person in his stead; but such Ulcudi is still bound to acknowledge the superiority of the Meerassidar, and so also the other Ulcudis who have not obtained the deed here mentioned, though they cannot be removed from their villages as mere Paracudis may.

Seventh Question.

" In how many villages is there no meerassy right?"

Answer.

In the Northern Circars, and other provinces subordinate to this presidency, the inhabitants are not entitled to meerassy right: but in many instances they have continued to cultivate their villages, to enjoy the profit, and sustain the loss, from generation to generation, and to pay the revenue to the Circar for a hundred, two hundred, or three hundred years. Though, therefore, they may not possess that peculiar proprietary right in the soil called cániyátchi, and hold no village mányams or other privileges, yet, as according to some authorities, ownership in land is established by an occupancy of twenty years' duration, and according to others after the lapse of one hundred years, it is for consideration whether a right very nearly resembling the meerassy enjoyed by the people of Tonda-mandalam and Shózha-mandalam is not possessed by the Cadim inhabitants of this description. Certainly by law they cannot be judged to have no ownership in the soil. But, supposing it not now to exist, if the Circar would be pleased to confer proprietary caniyátchi on the Cadim inhabitants of the districts where it does not exist, it would increase their credit and respectability, while, if at any time the revenue should fall in arrear, they would be enabled to discharge it by raising money on the mortgage of their landed property; moreover, it would effectually prevent their deserting their villages, and by attaching them to their lands, must produce an increase of cultivation, while no loss whatever would result to the Circar from the measure.

Eighth Question.

" How many Meerassidars are there in the district?"

Answer.

In the large villages within the limits of Madras there are about twenty Meerassidars, and in the smaller from five to ten. In many of these villages, however, the families of some of the original Meerassidars have become extinct, and their shares have been divided among the remaining meerassy inhabitants.

Ninth Question.

" How many cultivators are there?"

* This may be rendered, a deed of permanent and hereditary property.

Answer.

In the large villages, including Meerassidars, Ulcudis, and Páyacáris, there may be from twenty to one hundred and forty cultivating inhabitants, and in small not more than five or six; always, of course, in proportion to the cultivable lands. In the villages held by the Velláler or Agamudeiyàr they possess a certain number of slaves. Each plough at work requires one man, and when the number of slaves, therefore, is not sufficient for the whole cultivation, hired labourers are employed. In Agrahárams held by Brahmans there are few slaves, and hired labourers are principally employed; in some agrahâram villages there are no slaves.

Tenth Question.

" What is the average annual value of meerassy right in proportion to the " produce?"

Eleventh Question.

" What is the average annual value of meerassy right in proportion to the " revenue?"

See the Collector's answer to the preceding questions.

Twelfth Question.

" Is meerassy right ever sold?"

Answer.

If the Meerassidars wish to sell the meerassy enjoyed by them they may do so, or they may mortgage it, or transfer it by gift, and this custom, with the knowledge of the Circar, has continued until the present day. In the districts adjacent to the presidency and in the southern countries, the inhabitants hold their villages in two modes, in arudi-carei and pasung-carei. When each family enjoys a distinct portion of ground in perpetuity, that tenure is called arudi-carei.* When after the expiration of seven, ten, or twelve years, or such period as may customarily be established in each village, the whole of the inhabitants assemble, draw lots, and, according to them, make a mutual interchange of the lands they have cultivated, this is called pasung-carei. By what means soever he comes into possession, whether by gift, sale, or otherwise, each person in an arudi-carei village is exclusively entitled to the nanjey,† punjey,‡ toppu,§ wells and other waters belonging to his share. In the pasung-carei villages each person is entitled only to a certain share of the produce, excepting in the nattam, of all nanjey, punjey, and other lands assigned to him when the general re-division took place, and formerly meerassy of this description could only be transferred to persons belonging to the same village, not to strangers; but the contrary has now become the custom.

Thirteenth Question.

" How many years purchase of its annual value is meerassy right generally " sold for?"

Answer.

When meerassy is sold, the capability of irrigation, the quality of the soil, the gráma-manyam, the back yards,‖ the cuppatam, the number of páyacaris, and the váram allowed, must be considered. If these be superior, the value will be high, if inferior, low; and it will, of course, also be decreased, if the necessities of the Meerassidar, who is obliged to sell, be pressing, so that no fixed rate can be stated. It may, however, be observed, that in the villages within the limits of Madras, lands which formerly sold at seven pagodas a cáni, will now produce from one hundred to five hundred, and that meerassy is sold in the zillah of Chingleput, at rates varying from two to ten pagodas a cáni.

Fourteenth

* The first of these terms means final or decisive distribution; the second, fair distribution. Their application is sufficiently explained in the text.

† Wet land, from nan, wet, and chey, cultivation. ‡ Dry land, from pun, inferior, and chey.

§ Groves, orchards, and wood-lands of all descriptions.

‖ Pezhacadei, a small portion of ground immediately adjoining to the dwelling of the Meerassidar, held rent-free, used as a yard or kitchen garden; it is included in the nattam, and like all lands under that head is not transferable, unless the whole meerassy be sold.

Mr. Ellis's Meerassy Paper.

Fourteenth Question.

" What is the greatest, the least, and the average annual value of the " meerass of one Meerassidar?"

For an answer to this question, see the statements accompanying, and the Collector's replies.

Fifteenth Question.

" Do Meerassidars attach any other besides a pecuniary value to their " meerass?"

Answer.

Whatever estate a man may possess in money, in the countries above-mentioned, the holding meerassy is always considered as more honourable by the people. The Meerassidar looks on himself as entitled to direct the affairs of the village, to stand forward on all occasions when the affairs of the Circar are in discussion, and to receive any tasrif* given by it, and the pre-eminence thus claimed is allowed him by others.

Sixteenth Question.

" Where there is no meerassy right, is there any other tie by which parti- " cular individuals are attached to particular fields, and what is it?"

Answer.

In villages in which no meerassy right exists, if the cultivation be carried on by Páyacaris they divide the village and the Circar lands under the orders of the Circar, according to the number of ploughs they possess, and receive, as cudi-váram, whatever share is stated in the cowle given to them. When these Páyacaris inhabitants take the land in rent, they pay the rent to the Circar, in proportion to the extent that each of them actually holds; but such Páyacaris are not entitled to dispose of the land by sale, &c., nor do they enjoy any mányam lands, or receive either cuppatam and other méreis, or tundu-váram,

Seventeenth Question.

" Where there is no meerassy right, has it been usual for the Ryots to remove " from one village and from one part of a village to another, and has their " removal depended on their own choice, or on that of the Collector?"

Answer.

In places where meerassy does not exist, if the inhabitants are desirous of quitting their village and proceeding to another, they must settle with the Circar all claims on them on account of balances, and may then depart. If the villages to which a Páyacari proceeds be not held in meerassy tenure, the order of the Circar only is necessary to establish him in it; if it be a meerassy village, he must cultivate under the meerassy inhabitants.

The 30th September 1817.

READ the following letter from the First Commissioner:

To the Chief Secretary to Government.

SIR:

1. As it appeared, from the report of the local authorities of Malabar, from the period of its cession to the British Government, that both its ancient institutions and the manners of its inhabitants differed widely from those which generally prevailed over the peninsula of India, and as the late Regulations vesting certain powers in the heads of villages were founded in the general usages of India, it was natural to suppose, that if any material objection occurred to their introduction, it would be found in Malabar. I therefore thought it advisable to proceed to that province from Coimbatore, in order that I might have an opportunity of examining on the spot, whether the Regulations could in every point be introduced with advantage to the country, or if not, what alterations of them would be requisite for that purpose.

2. My stay in Malabar was only a month. I read, during that time, every document that could throw any light on the former and present state of the country; but I thought it better to trust to verbal communications with the natives in forming my opinion, more particularly as none of these records entered into the details of village administration, which I wished to investigate, or indeed treated of the subject at all. The substance of the present report is, therefore, an abstract of the information which I received from those Nairs and other natives, who seemed to me to be the best informed with regard to the ancient usages and internal government of Malabar.

3. The voluminous reports which have been written on that province contain such full accounts of the government of its former Rajahs, of the sources from whence they drew their revenues, and of the tenures by which their subjects held their lands, that it would be useless to add any thing to them. It will, however, be necessary to say a few words upon these heads, in order that the present system of village administration, and the changes which it is proposed to make, may be the more easily comprehended.

4. In the year 1766, when Hyder first invaded Malabar, the country was divided among a number of petty Rajahs, of whom the Zemorin was by far the most powerful. They were frequently engaged in war with each other, which they carried on by means of an armed population, as all lands, excepting those set apart for religious purposes, were held by military tenure. The land-owners were exempted from the payment of rent, and every little subdivision of territory, instead of being called a district of so many thousand pagodas, was called one of so many thousand men. The country was divided into villages and districts, each under its military chief, whose duty it was when summoned to the field, to join the Rajah with his stipulated number of followers. The common men while on service received a monthly pay of from two to three rupees: the chiefs were paid at a higher rate, proportioned to their rank.

5. As the military followers of the Zamorin alone were estimated to amount to forty thousand, as a considerable part of them were often called out on service, and as a large body remained always as a little standing army or guards near his person, it is evident that, in order to defray the expense of these men, as well as of his civil establishments, he must have had a large revenue drawn, if not from the land, from some other sources. The principal of these sources were as follows, and were common to all the Malabar Rajahs.

1. Extensive domains,
2. Customs and licenses.
3. Escheats of Hindoo estates without heirs.
4. Fines where no heir, for leave to adopt, as usually one-third of the property.

5. Fines

Col. Munro's Report on Malabar, 4 July 1817.

5. Fines from the estates of all Mapellas deceased, usually from one-twentieth to one-fifth of the value.

6. Fines from younger brothers on succeeding the elder in the sister's house.

7. Fines for offences, and heavy fees on law-suits.

8. All cattle having particular marks.

6. Though denied by the landholders in general, it is asserted by some of them, that besides the above heads of revenue, the Rajah levied, in money or kind, a land-tax from all lands, excepting those of Bramins and pagodas, equal to about one-fifth of the produce. There is reason to believe, that if this tax was not regularly collected every year, contributions were occasionally imposed upon the landholders to at least an equal amount; but even independent of such contributions, the revenue from other sources was ample, and must have pressed as much upon the inhabitants as the revenues of Canara, including the land-rent, did upon the inhabitants of that province, and must have been productive of more individual oppression in its realization. But whether a regular land revenue was ever under the Rajahs assessed on Malabar, or not, that province was in the earliest times, whether for the greater facility of realizing the different articles of revenue, or of calling out the military force, or for whatever other purpose, divided, like the other provinces of India, into districts and villages, the limits of which, but more especially of the villages, remain unchanged to this day. The districts and villages were under hereditary chiefs, whose duties, making allowance for the military nature of the Government, did not essentially differ from those of the district and village potails of other countries.

7. The village in Malabar was called the Desim, the term by which it is still most commonly known. The head man was called the Desway, or the Jelmiwar, according as he enjoyed the whole or only a part of the rights which were supposed necessary to the constituting the complete chief of the desim. These rights were as follow:

1. The ambulpuddi, or the direction of the religious ceremonies of the village pagoda.

2. The ooraimah, or the management of the pagoda lands and servants.

3. The desmi, or the controul of marriages and all village ceremonies, none of which could be performed without his leave.

4. Disadeput, or the general superintendence of all affairs of the desim or village.

When the head of the village possessed all these rights he was the Desway; when he wanted the ambulpuddi and ooraimah, but had the other two, he was the Jelmiwar of the village. These rights, where they existed, could not be separated If sold, they were sold together; but they seem occasionally to have been sold or transferred in shares to two or more persons. The direction of the civil, religious, and military affairs of the village were always vested in the same person. Where there was no pagoda there could be no Desway, but only a Jelmiwar, at the head of the village: but a Desway having three or four villages, and in one only a pagoda, was Desway of that one, and by virtue of it he was called the Desway of the other villages. The Jelmiwar had in his own village all the authority of the Desway; but not having the honours supposed to be attached to the supremacy of the pagoda, his office was not considered as so respectable. The rights of the head of the desim, whether Desway or Jelmiwar, were held in such veneration, that it was regarded as disgraceful to sell them. These rights, together with the landed property of the village, were originally obtained from the Numbaari Bramins, who were the ancient proprietors of the whole country, and though the Desway might have been compelled to alienate the greater part, or even the whole of his lands, he seldom ever parted with them, because as long as he retained them he was still the head of the village, and respected as such. Hence it sometimes happened that the Desway had no land; and where the whole landed property had passed into the hands of Mapillas, that he did not even reside in the village village of which he was the head, but still preserving his rights, retired to live in a neighbouring one inhabited by Nairs.

Col. Munro's Report on Malabar, 4 July 1817.

8. The Desways, as has been already observed, were at one time the sole proprietors of the lands of their respective villages. Some had one, and some two or more villages. There was a Desway to every village, except where the village was the private property of the chief of the district, called the Naurwalli, or of the Rajah, when the rights of the head of the village belonged to the Naurwalli or Rajah; but in most of the villages which the Rajahs had acquired the property of by purchase, the old Desways still retained their office. Where there was no Desway, the Rajah employed an officer, called the Prowurtikar, as the manager of one or more villages, according to their size.

9. The Desway had the direction of all the affairs of the village; all orders regarding them were sent to him to be carried into effect. Where there was no regular land-rent he could not have much employment as a revenue officer, but he assisted in the collection of occasional contributions, as well as of fines, forfeitures, and other dues of Government. He was the military chief of the village, and marched at the head of its quota, when ordered to the field, and he had the direction of the police and the power of deciding petty suits. In police and judicial matters he was aided by two or three respectable inhabitants, who were called Pramanis.

10. There were usually from one to five or six Pramanis to a desim or village, but in some villages none. They had no regular appointment, nor were they hereditary. They were of all the superior castes, Namblooris, Nairs, Tiars, Shitties, and Mapellas, but chiefly Nairs. Any respectable man in the village who was considered as more intelligent than his neighbours, and who was on that account resorted to by the inhabitants for the adjustment of their little differences, gradually acquired among them the title of Pramani. The plaintiff, in the first instance, generally applied to the Pramani, who assembled the other Pramanis of the village if there were any, or if not he sent for those of the neighbouring villages, who always came as he in his turn attended their summonses. Those who were called were such as both parties had previously agreed their suit should be decided by. No writing was employed in the proceedings; a kurrarnamah founded upon the decision was all that was necessary. The Pramanis, where no opposition was made, acted of themselves without any reference to the Desway. If the defendant refused to attend, they applied to the Desway, who sent for the defendant, directed the Pramanis to try the cause in his own presence, and decided upon their report. If the parties required it, he associated two or three of the inhabitants with the Pramanis to form the court or punchayet. His authority was so much respected, that the defendant scarcely ever refused to attend his summons, or to abide by his decision, but when this happened the Desway applied to the Naurwai, the chief of the Naur or district, who ordered the parties to attend and settled the cause himself, by means of the Desway and Pramanis of the original village, or of those of any other village within his jurisdiction, who were most agreeable to the parties. Where a village had no Pramani, the inhabitants carried their complaints to any neighbouring village in which there was one.

11. In cases of theft complaint was made to the Pramani, who informed the Desway, and both together investigated the matter and reported to the Naurwai. If the thief was taken they carried him to the Naurwai. If it was the first offence, the punishment was fine and restoration of the stolen property; if the third, severe punishment or death: if the offender absconded, he was outlawed.

12. The Desway and the Pramani received fees in all suits determined by them. The amount was not fixed; but when the parties could pay the fees, the rates were to the Desway one rupee, to the Pramani half a rupee, and to the witnesses four, two, or one anna per day, according to their rank; but the whole never exceeded ten per cent. of the claim. Where the parties were poor, not more than a fourth or a fifth of the usual rate was taken. Some of the more respectable Pramanis were enabled by their fees to keep two or three servants for the purpose of summoning parties and witnesses, &c. The fees were not paid by the party who lost the cause, but in equal shares by both parties.

Colonel Munro's Report on Malabar, 4 July 1817.

13. The Desway, besides fees on the settlement of suits, derived some other advantages from his situation. He received yearly from the owners of gardens the produce of one plantain tree, ten cocoa-nuts, one jack, one cluster of soopari or betel-nut, and from all Ryots the value of four to eight annas in ghee or sugar, and a poll-tax of eight annas from carpenters, smiths, and washermen.

14. The Desway had no village Curnum: the nature of the revenue did not require an officer of that kind. The accounts of the collections were kept by district servants employed by the Narwar, or acting immediately under the Rajah. The few revenue accounts which were requisite for the Desway's information were kept either by himself or by a servant of his own. He had none of the inferior village servants, such as Peons, Totties, and Talliars, so common in the other provinces: such servants were rendered unnecessary, by the condition of the land-owners making it easy for the district servants to collect such occasional contributions as were required from them along with the other articles of thepublic revenue, and still more by the military nature of the tenures, and of the Government placing every man in the village under the orders of the Desway, and at his disposal, either for revenue or police duties. He of course usually employed the lower classes, but no individual, even of the higher, ever hesitated in performing whatever services he commanded. None of them sat in his presence without leave, and he was obeyed rather as the chief of a clan than the head of a village.

15. The office next above the Desway, and placed between him and the Rajah, was the Naurwai, or the chief of the nour or district. He was a kind of district Desway, for he enjoyed nearly the same powers and privileges in the district as the Desway in the village. He claimed to hold his office by a tenure as ancient as that of any of the present Rajahs, and to have derived it from the Namboori Bramins, or from the same former conqueror from whom they derived their rights. He was sometimes the Desway of every village in his district, and sometimes of only one or two, the rest being held by separate Desways, or by the Rajah as part of his domains.

16. The Naurwai had a small share of almost every branch of the Rajah's revenue. He had customs at an inferior rate, all fines under four rupees, the property of all persons on his own lands dying without heirs not exceeding thirty rupees, and on the lands of others when it did not exceed fifteen rupees, and a variety of other dues which it would be tedious to enumerate. He was the chief police and judicial officer of the district, and in these capacities he had a share of all confiscations of the property of offenders, and of the fees of all suits brought before him.

17. The Naurwai collected the ordinary and extra revenue, and in this duty he was assisted by one, two, or more accountants, called Putwollis, according to the extent of his district. The Putwolli was the district Putwari or Curnum. He kept all accounts of the collections and records of the transfer of land. He was paid by the Naurwai an allowance of three or four rupees monthly: from the customs he received a fee of half or a quarter of a rupee for every bond or other deed which he wrote for the inhabitants; and he had service land, rent free, yielding from fifty to eighty purrahs of rice, which had been granted by the Naurwai. His office was hereditary, and was coeval with that of theN aurwai, who appointed him when he received his own.

18. The Naurwai was the military chief of his district, and was bound to attend the Rajah in the field, or march wherever he was directed, with all the fighting men of his district, under the Desways or heads of their respective villages. It was also his duty, in times of peace, to assemble the Nairs of his district every two or three years, in order to exhibit, in the presence of the Rajah, a mock, or rather real fight, with the Nairs of another district; for these combats never terminated without the loss of a few lives. The Naurwai paid for the funeral of each Nair slain eight to sixteen rupees, and to each Nair wounded sixteen to three hundred rupees, according to his rank and the nature of the wound. These combats, it is said, were instituted with the view ofkeeping up the martial spirit of the Nairs. It may easily be conceived that the Naurwai, with such followers at his command, was sometimes tempted to rebel; rebel; but even when reduced, though he was himself punished, his office and estate were not confiscated, but went to his heirs.

Col. Munro's Report on Malabar, 4 July 1817.

19. The Rajah, as has already been noticed, besides his revenue from the customs, licences, and other fluctuating sources, was the possessor of extensive domains. Of some villages he was the sole owner of the lands and also of the Desway rights; of others he was the proprietor of part or the whole of the lands, while the Desway rights were still retained by the original landlord. The revenues of the Rajah's own villages were collected by temporary officers appointed by him. All appeals from the decisions of Naurwais and Desways were decided by a court or punchayet, in his presence or in that of his minister. The office of minister was, in some of the rajahships, claimed as the hereditary right of particular Naurwais, and though the Rajah might appoint another person to discharge the duty, the title remained with the Naurwai.

20. The system of internal administration, of which an outline has been given above, was that which prevailed throughout Malabar, when that province was invaded by Hyder Ally in 1766. But as the country could never be reduced to complete subjection while it existed, it was destroyed and another substituted in its room, resembling, as nearly as the circumstances of the country then permitted, that which was established in the other provinces of his dominions; and though wars, in other quarters, compelled him to leave some of the inferior Rajahs as his agents in the management of their territories, what he left undone was completed by his son Tippoo Sultan, who expelled them all. The military tenures were abolished, regular land rent, founded on inspection, though not on actual survey, was imposed on the country, the administration of its affairs was entrusted to Soubahdars, and Fouzdars sent from Seringapatam instead of Rajahs, and the Nairs were overawed by a large body of troops from Mysore stationed among them.

21. In the course of this invasion, and the frequent insurrections which succeeded it, most of the Naurwais were killed or put to death, and the rest either fled or remained in concealment until the province was ceded to the Company. Many of the Desways or heads of villages, who were the next class of military chiefs, also perished during these disturbances, and the rest remained in their villages, either concealed or neglected. They did not abandon their country, because they were not of sufficient consequence to make their residence in their villages be thought dangerous to the state. It was no part of the policy of the Mysore Government to employ a race of permanent district officers, and the place of the Naurwais was therefore not supplied; but fixed or hereditary heads of villages was an essential branch of its system, and provision was therefore made to fill up the vacancies occasioned by the removal of the Desways.

22. As the arrangement then made remains with hardly any alteration until this day, it may be proper to enter into some explanation regarding it. After Hyder's second conquest of Malabar, Birke Shenwas Row, who was left by him in charge of the province in 1775-6, and who made the assessment of the land on which the present one is founded, made a new division of the country for the more easy realization of the revenue. Small villages, yielding a revenue of only ten, twenty, or fifty pagodas, when lying contiguous were joined together, so as to make a sum of two hundred pagodas, and the whole were called a terrah, which took the name of the principal village. When a village paid two hundred pagodas it continued single, except when a small adjacent one was added to it because it could not be conveniently joined to any other. From forty to eighty terrahs were formed into a naur or district. To each terrah a Parputti and Menwa, or Curnum, was appointed, and to each district a Tehsildar and two Sheristadars. In each village or desim it was ascertained who were the leading men, exclusive of the former Desways, and one of them was appointed head of the village and was called the Mookyest, the title by which he is still every where distinguished. There was no order from Hyder either for the appointment or exclusion of such of the Desways as remained; but as they had long been accustomed, as military chiefs, to implicit obedience from the inhabitants, it was not deemed safe to employ them.

23. One, two, or three Mookyests were appointed to a village according to its size, or one only to two or three small villages. The first duty of the Mookyest was to inspire confidence in the new Government, and to invite back to their villages the Nairs who adhered to the fugitive Rajahs. He assisted in estimating the produce of land and trees on which the survey assessment was fixed. He attended the Parputti in collecting the revenue, but did not touch it himself. In all cases where any difficulty occurred in its realization, whether from the poverty of the Ryot, loss of crop, or whatever other cause, his opinion was taken and generally followed. He assisted at all sales for arrears; he made all requisitions for the use of travellers and troops; he directed the police, seized offenders, and sent them to the Parputti. All orders from the Parputti, concerning the affairs of the village, were addressed to him.

Mookyest

24. The Mookyest for the discharge of these duties had no avowed allowance or remission of rent: his sole advantage was delay in paying his rent, by which he was enabled to keep his produce and sell it when dear; and as his services were useful to the revenue officers, his rent, or a part of it, was often carried to the head of irrecoverable balances. He was removable at pleasure, but usually remained in office during life. On his death or removal, any fit person, either of his own or any other family, was appointed. In filling up these vacancies, many of the Desways, who were originally excluded, were gradually restored to the management of their villages, so that before the end of the Mysore Government, a considerable portion of them were acting as Mookyests. The Mookyest had no village servants under him: he required none, because the subordination introduced by the military tenures still remaining, every person in the village was ready at his call to execute any order he might issue.

25. Under the Company's Government, the Mookyest continues on the same footing as he was under that of Mysore. He does not regularly attend the Parpatti, who makes the collections, but he always does whenever any difficulty is apprehended, and he performs all other village duties, and since the institution of the courts of judicature he attends at all sales of distrained property, and certifies all summonses for witnesses not present. He is removable at pleasure; but the son, when qualified, usually succeeds the father. He has no official allowance of any kind; but there can be no doubt that his situation enables him to delay the payment of his rent until late in the season, when it is more convenient for him to discharge it. This trifling advantage, but much more the honour attached to public office, in Malabar particularly, where it is in some degree hereditary, renders the situation of Mookyest desirable to every landholder. The Mookyest has no Peon or other village servant to assist: his orders are cheerfully executed and obeyed by every inhabitant as in former times, but as this authority is founded solely on ancient custom, the exercise of it might expose him to some danger if a complaint were preferred to the Court. He is not made so useful as he ought to be. He has but little intercourse with the European authorities: his situation is too uncertain, and he is left too dependent on the voluntary services of the inhabitants for the discharge of his duty.

26. The business of the village can never be properly conducted by the Parputti, because his jurisdiction is too extensive, and he is liable to constant removal. During the Mysore Government, he had only one village when the revenue exceeded two hundred pagodas; he could, therefore, enter into all the details necessary in the management of a village; and had he been selected from among the inhabitants, and his office made permanent, he would have answered all the purposes of a Potail. He has now from ten to twenty villages, with one or two Menwas to write the accounts of them. He is more properly an assistant of the Tehsildar than a village servant. It sometimes happens that when he is dismissed for malpractices, his successor cannot find his accounts, as they have either been destroyed by accident or concealed, and the loss cannot be supplied, as the revenue establishments of Malabar are too meagre to admit of copies being kept at the cutcherry of the Tehsildar or Collector.

27. The village establishment is so inadequate to the object of its institution, that it requires a complete revision; under the Malabar Rajahs, their village system was well enough adapted to the end of their military government; under the Mysore Government, there was neither time nor tranquillity sufficient to complete a new one; but whatever we have of useful was then introduced: the terror of our arms and the progress of time have rather retrograded than advanced in those arrangements which are most essential. The approach made by the Mysore Government to a village establishment in the appointment of village Parputtis, has since been rendered of no avail, by reducing the number of those officers, and converting them into a subordinate district establishment. We have a superior district establishment under Tehsildars, or Sheristadars as they are called in Malabar, and a huzzoor or provincial one under the Collector, in both of which the head native servants are too poorly paid to expect much good from them, and with all these establishments we have no means of obtaining and preserving correct detailed village accounts. The double district establishment without a village one serves only to widen the distance between the Collector and the landholders, and to place every thing respecting their real condition out of his sight. There is no ryotwar province in which he has so little communication with them, and none perhaps in which he ought to have so much. There is none in which the overthrow of the native Government has been more felt by the people: revenue on a higher, and establishments, as far as they are concerned, on a lower scale than formerly, cannot be satisfactory to any class.

 sufficient

28. A native Government is upheld by many powerful interests, which are almost unknown under ours. By large civil establishments, composed of the most intelligent men of the country, with means of acquiring wealth which we cannot afford to allow; by a numerous race of Zemindars and Enamdars, whose estates descend unbroken, in the manner of entails, to their posterity, but which we either resume or suffer to dwindle away by subdivision among the heirs; by Potails and Curnums of villages, having service lands and fees, and where either of these is wanting a remission in their own or the village rent, always beyond any allowance they receive from us; and by a large body, consisting of privileged Bramins and Mussulmans and a few favoured Ryots in each village holding their lands at a rate below the usual standard, which our more rigid system denies. We hold out nothing to encourage any class beyond the lower ones, which will always follow the impulse given by their superiors. Our Government rests almost entirely upon the single point of military power: there is no native one which rests so exclusively upon it. Where there is no village establishment, we have no hold upon the people, no means of acting upon them, none of establishing confidence. Our situation, as foreigners, renders a regular village establishment more important to us than to a native Government: our inexperience, and our ignorance of the circumstances of the people, make it more necessary for us to seek the aid of regular establishments to direct the internal affairs of the country, and our security requires that we should have a body of head men of villages interested in supporting our dominion.

29. This reasoning is probably more applicable to Malabar than to any other province; I would therefore propose to render the principal officers of the huzzoor and district cutcherries more respectable by increased allowances, and to introduce a regular village establishment. Military service having been superseded by fixed land rents, the village system ought, as much as possible, to be assimilated to that of other districts.

30. Had the Desways remained after Hyder's conquest of the country, as before, in charge of their respective villages, they would have been the natural and proper heads of them, and had they been well treated and attached to the Government by a fixed allowance, they would soon have relinquished their military habits and become useful Potails. Many of them are so now, under the denomination of Mookyests. I would recommend that every Desway now acting be confirmed in the management of his village, and every one not employed be restored; that all the Naruwais be in the same manner reinstated in the charge of their villages; that in those villages in which the deswai rights belong to the Rajahs, the most intelligent of the present Mookyests, paying regard to length of service, be constituted the heads; that the same rule be followed in the villages where the families which held the deswai or jelmi rights may be extinct; that the villages or desims continue to remain separate, as at present; that the office of head of the village, or Mookyest, be made hereditary; ditary; that an allowance be granted to the head of the village, equal to one-fourth per cent. of the land-rent and village taxes, either in land or by a remission in his rent; that one Curnum be appointed to every division of territory consisting of one or more villages, yielding on an average a revenue of one thousand pagodas; that the establishment of Curnums completed by appointing in the first place such of the Menwas of the Parputtis and Sheristadars, and such of the hereditary Putwalles of the Naurwais as are willing to act; and in the second, such other persons as may be qualified, giving the preference always to the natives of the country; that the office of Curnum be made hereditary; that the Curnums, as far as practicable, be appointed to those villages in which their lands or houses are situated; that an allowance be granted to the Curnum, equal to two per cent. of the land-rent and village taxes of his village, either in land or in a remission of rent; that a village Peon or Kalkar be appointed to every division of territory yielding on an average revenue of one thousand pagodas, whether such a division comprises one or more villages, or one or more such divisions be comprized in one village; that there be one at least to every division in which there is a Curnum; that the establishment of Kalkars be composed of natives of the country, by taking in the first instance such of the Kalkars now employed under the Parputtis and Sheristadars as may be willing to act, and filling up any deficiency that may remain by new men; that the Kalkar perform all village duties under the orders of the head of the village and the Curnum; that his office be hereditary; that he be paid an allowance equal to three-fourths per cent. either in land or money, and that he be stationed, as far as may be practicable, either in his native village or in that where he usually resides, and that the lower classes continue to discharge all those village services under the head of the village, which they are bound to do by ancient custom, and the other classes to aid him in his public duty in all cases of emergency.

Colonel Munro's Report on Malabar, 4 July 1817.

31. After what has been already said, it can hardly be necessary to urge any thing more in support of the expediency of the proposed village system. But I must not conceal, that some of the best informed Nairs, who have long been revenue servants, both under the Mysore and the Company's Government, objected strongly to the heads of villages being hereditary, and still more to the general restoration of the Nurwais and Desways. I do not think, however, that their objections ought to induce any change in the proposed measure, or any delay in its execution. The objection to the office being hereditary was the common one, that it would not be well filled, because it would often fall into the hands of unfit persons, while by its being held as at present during pleasure, those who were unfit could be discharged, and those best qualified appointed This objection is applicable to every other province as well as to Malabar, and is greatly outweighed by the advantages of hereditary succession, the confidence which it inspires, the respectability which it communicates, and the removal of a great source of intrigue and corruption, which the appointment of any office, however trifling, always is among revenue servants. The objection to the general restoration of the Narwais and Desways was, that by it they would recover their ancient authority among the inhabitants, and be enabled to oppress them without the fear of complaint, and that they might even be encouraged to excite disturbances. In the early part of the Mysore Government there might have been some ground for such alarm: there is now, I am convinced, none. These men are in general much reduced in their circumstances: many of them are very poor: they seek only to live in tranquillity; they have no motive for wishing to raise disturbances; they could not hope for success, even with their Rajahs at their head, and still less when left to themselves. The present generation is a new race, which has never been engaged in war for its Rajahs, and cares very little about them. It is still respected by the people, but has lost all power of raising them against the Government. The best way of securing its attachment is by confidence and good treatment, not by fear and suspicion. The number of Narwais and Desways now actually employed as Mookyests or heads of villages, without any bad consequences, is a sufficient proof that no danger can result from employing the rest. The revenue servants, when they objected to their restoration, were not aware of the number which had already been imperceptibly restored. It appears from the accompanying return made by the village Parputtis, according

ing to a form which I transmitted to the Collector after leaving Malabar, that of the whole number now present in the province, the restoration of this small body, so far from being in any way likely to disturb, would tend rather to preserve the peace of the country, by leaving no class of men in it deprived of their ancient rights. It should be considered, too, that even if they are not restored, they will long continue to be what they are now, the real heads of the villages; for the Mookyests do nothing without consulting them, and are usually guided by their opinion, when it is not contrary to such orders as they may have received: they do not even sit in their presence without leave. It is, therefore, on every account better for the interests of the public service, that the real and nominal authority should be united in the ancient chiefs of villages. A different rule must, however, be followed in those villages of which the greater part or the whole of the land has become the property of Mapillas, but of which the deswai right is still retained by the ancient Bramin or Nair Chief, who resides in another village. In such villages one or two Mapella head-men now act as Mookyests: they ought to be confirmed in the office of heads of their respective villages, and to enjoy such allowance as may be annexed to it. The ancient chief will not reside in a village whose population is composed entirely of Mapillas, he could therefore be of no use in office; but as his rights of deswai are hereditary, he cannot be deprived of them. Though merely nominal, he sets a high value upon them; he might, therefore, be suffered not only to retain them, but to resume his situation as efficient head of the village, whenever such a transfer should happen of the landed property from Mapillas to Hindoos, as might enable him to take up his residence in it again. There are some villages of which the land partly belongs to Mapillas and partly to Hindoos, and in which both a Mapilla and Hindoo head-man preside over their respective castes. Where there is in such cases an hereditary Hindoo chief, he should be constituted the sole chief of the village, and the Mapilla Mookyest be directed to act under him: where there is no hereditary chief remaining, the Hindoo and Mapilla head-man should be appointed heads of their respective portions of the village, with a proportionate share of the official allowance.

32. The desims or villages are all single and independent of each other: their total number is 2,212. Many of them are very small, but on an average they are not smaller than the mouzahs or villages of other provinces. It would have been more convenient for the dispatch of public business, if many of the smaller ones had been originally larger; but as their present limits have existed for ages unchanged, and as two or more could not be united so as to form one, without interfering with ancient rights and creating discontent, it would be most advisable to let them stand as they are. The measure adopted by Hyder Ally, which has already been mentioned, of uniting together small villages so as to form one of two hundred pagodas revenue, was so much disliked that it was abandoned a few years afterwards. Such an arrangement might no doubt be now accomplished and rendered permanent, but it would bring with it no benefit that was worth the sacrifice of any right, or even of any prejudice of the people. Some Desways have from two to fifteen, or twenty villages. They are usually situated adjoining each other; and as they seldom yield altogether more revenue than one large village, they may be managed by their own Desway, who ought to be appointed chief of the whole. Where any village may be too distant from the rest for him to act as the head of it, he should be authorized to employ in that capacity an agent chosen by himself.

33. The Regulations passed in 1816, require that there should be Curnums to perform particular duties; but had no such Regulations been passed, Curnums would still have been necessary for the security of the revenue. Without them there can be no system in revenue accounts, and no information entitled to any confidence as to the resources of the country. If it is asked how the revenue details have been conducted during the last thirty years without them, it may be answered, that the Mysore Government in making its survey employed a vast number of village accountants as substitutes for Curnums; that from their labours the assessment which still exists, and which constitutes all we know of the land revenue, was formed; that the permanent nature of landed property in Malabar enabled this assessment to be taken for many years without inconvenience, and without alteration, as the basis of the settlement; that while improvements were making in some places the land-owners in others became unable to pay their rents, from the deterioration of their lands from inundations, the decay of garden trees, and other causes; that this evil is increasing every year without being seen, because the want of regular village accounts allows the revenue servants, without much fear of detection, to make up the deficiency by arbitrary exactions from other land-owners, and that in many places the assessment has gradually become inapplicable to the condition of the land. It is only by a Curnum establishment that a Collector can learn the actual state of the country, that he can save some landholders from destruction by a timely remission of their rents, and guard others from undue exactions. The number of Curnums proposed will be fully adequate to the performance of every service required of them. They will have more to do than in other districts in registering the sales and various kinds of mortgages of lands, but much less labour in accounts, because the revenue being paid in money rents, and generally paid without any balance by a very large proportion of the landholders, the details will be much simpler and shorter than where rents are paid both in money and kind, and are regulated every year by the extent of land in cultivation.

34. The number of Kolkars proposed (one to every thousand pagodas of revenue) may appear insufficient, when the number of the inferior village servants in other districts is adverted to; but the customs of Malabar render the greater part of such servants unnecessary. The land-owners, instead of dwelling together in villages, reside on their own estates, scattered at a distance from each other, and often separated by hills and jungles. Their houses and crops are guarded by their servants and slaves. They have, indeed, little to fear, for the natives being chiefly engaged in agriculture, are little addicted to thieving, and strangers are so different from them in language and appearance, that none can pass through the country without being instantly known. The rents being fixed, and in general moderate, are usually paid when called for, so that it is not necessary to employ servants to make repeated demands. The great superiority of the Nambories and Nairs to the other castes, and the long existence of military tenures, has established such an extraordinary degree of subordination among the different castes, and of deference from all to the chief of the village, that while it remains he hardly requires any servant, as every man in the village obeys his orders without hesitation but as it would not be advisable, under the different system now established, to leave him entirely dependent on the voluntary services of the inhabitants, such an establishment of Kolkars has been proposed, as it is thought will be sufficient to aid him in the discharge of his ordinary duties.

35. Though the inhabitants in general still continue, as usual, to execute all his orders, yet the fear of the courts often deters him from employing even the lower classes in carrying messages, or in bringing supplies for troops and passengers, and other duties which they are by custom bound to perform. It would be proper to remove all doubt on this head, by declaring that the lower classes were to discharge their customary duties, and that the other inhabitants were, in cases of necessity, to assist him, as formerly, in the public service of the village. As there is no cultivating in common, no rents in kind, and no emigrating of Ryots, the village service of Malabar is very trifling, compared to that of other districts. The land-owners are rarely called upon except when troops are marching through the country; their assistance is then sometimes required to procure supplies, or to make temporary repairs on the roads. The lower classes are Pullars, Chirmars, and other castes, corresponding in some degree with the Dhers and Chumbars of the Carnatic: they are exempted from taxation. This exemption has probably arisen from its having been found more useful to require service than rent. A very trifling tax upon their huts or houses would pay one or two servants in each village, who could easily perform all their duties; but as they would rather serve than pay, and as the taxing them would be disliked, even by the heads of villages, they ought to be continued upon their present footing, and to be made to render their customary services.

Colonel Munro's Report on Malabar, 4 July 1817.

36. It has already been suggested, that the village servants should be paid in land rather than in money. Land confers so much more respectability, and is regarded as so much more permanent, that a much higher value is set upon it than upon a money allowance. A good deal of land in Malabar has fallen into the hands of Government by forfeiture and other means, and ought, as far as possible, to be allotted to the maintenance of the village servants It can only be partially appropriated in this way at present, because it lies in large quantities, and is confined to particular villages, and can only be useful to the servant when it is situated in his own village. The unappropriated part of it might be gradually sold, and the price employed in the purchase of village service-land, wherever it was wanted. The village servants, when they do not receive land, ought to be paid by a remission of rent: this would be more acceptable to them than a money allowance, both because it is more convenient and more respectable. It has also another advantage; it is not liable to be diminished by embezzlement, to which all money payments, particularly to so numerous a body of revenue servants, are always more or less exposed. Where the village servant pays no rent in which he can receive a remission, he must necessarily be paid in money.

37. The expense of the proposed village establishment will be as follows, estimating the land rent and village taxes at.....................Pagodas 500,000

Heads of villages, one and a quarter per cent. of the above sum, Pagodas	6,255
Curnum or Menwas two per cent..	10,000
Kolkars three-quarters per cent..	3,750
Pagodas	20,000

These are the rates by which the whole charge of each class is calculated, but as the application of them to every village would make the allowances to the servants in some villages too high, and in others too low, it would be advisable to increase the rates in the small villages, and to diminish them in the large ones, in proportion to the amount of revenue, according to the accompanying scale.

The rate proposed for the heads of villages is low compared to what is usual in other districts; but as in Malabar they have in general lands of their own sufficient for their maintenance, and as they are fond of office, even where it confers no advantage besides a little authority and distinction, the rate will be sufficient to answer the ends of inducing them to execute cheerfully the duties assigned to them, and of attaching them to the Company's government.

38. The whole of the proposed charge will not, however, be in addition to the present expense. The Parputti, now called the village establishment, amounts annually to amounts annually to ....Pagodas	17,810	7	16

The proposed village establishment to be substituted for it is...	20,000	...	...
The additional expense by the proposed establishment will be	2,189	37	64

But as the reduction of the Parputti establishment will occasion an increase of that of the Tehsildars, the actual additional expense from the measure proposed will be about Pagodas 11,000. But were the whole sum of 20,000 Pagodas an extra charge, it ought not to prevent the immediate appointment of a village establishment, for without it we can have no correct knowledge of the state of the province and its resources, and there can neither be any efficient internal administration, nor that connection which ought to subsist between Government and the inhabitants, I must therefore beg to recommend in the strongest manner the adoption of the measure.

39. The huzzoor- and district establishments of Malabar are totally inadequate to the purposes of their institution, and require a complete reform The frauds in the Treasury in 1807-8, and again in 1812, and the long period they were carried on before they became known to the Collector, evince a great want of proper check and arrangement. A system of revenue accounts, calculated to guard against such practices, was introduced by Major Macleod, but it it was unfortunately allowed to be gradually supplanted by the disjointed one which now prevails. The main defects of this system are the want of detailed accounts of the land revenue, and the customs, tobacco, and salt, being placed under officers independent both of the Tehsildars and the huzzoor Sheristadar. The Sheristadar receives hardly any accounts from these departments, and has no control over them, and the agents entrusted with the management of them have consequently the same facility as formerly in Coimbatore, of committing the greatest abuses with very little danger of discovery. It may be said, that the accounts are transmitted to the Collector, and that he is himself the proper person, and not the Sheristadar, to control any department; but no Collector ever was, or ever can be competent to the execution of this task, without the co-operation of a Sheristadar possessing under him authority over every department in all its details. The reform which I would recommend is, therefore, founded in the granting of this authority to the Sheristadar, and in the providing the means of furnishing every account he may require. The estimates of the establishments which accompany this report have been drawn up with a view to this object. I shall state shortly in what they differ from the present establishments, and the causes of the difference.

40 The village Curnums must furnish the detailed accounts of the land revenue. The district or talook cutcherry should have copies of all these accounts in the same details as the Curnums, and whenever doubts arise, they should be able to compare them on the spot with the Ryots. These details, both in the rough state and prepared according to prescribed forms, should be transmitted to the huzzoor cutcherry, which should be composed of men accustomed to examine and check such accounts. The Curnums should be all natives of the country. The talook establishments should be partly composed of strangers, because when they have not this mixture it enables them to combine with more ease in defrauding the revenue, as is now the case. The huzzoor cutcherry, for the same reason, should have still a greater proportion of foreigners If both this and the subordinate cutcherries were made up of Nairs, they might, in defiance of the utmost vigilance of the Collector, embezzle the revenue with very little fear of detection. It is not safe in any collectorate, and still less in Malabar, to have only natives of it in the Collector's cutcherry: but there is another reason which renders the employment of strangers absolutely necessary, which is that the Nairs, though excellent village accountants, are not qualified to superintend the extensive accounts of a collectorate; the employing of strangers must unavoidably occasion some increase of allowances. Bramins are prohibited from living in Malabar, and though they are not always restrained by the prohibition, both they and every class of Hindoos in the other provinces have such an aversion to Malabar, that they will not go there if they can find service any where else. There are two Sheristadars in the huzzoor or Collector's cutcherry, of whom the principal receives forty, and the second thirty pagodas monthly pay. It is proposed that one hundred and fifty pagodas monthly shall be allowed for the Sheristadars, to be divided as may be thought expedient. The present head Sheristadar is not at all equal to the duties of the office. There are six Gomashtas and six Menwas or Curnums in the cutcherry. Of the six Gomashtas two are employed as Moonshees; two write Hindowi accounts, and the remaining two, with the six Curnums, write only Mallialli. It is proposed to give the Collector four Moonshees, and eight Hindowis and two Mallialli Gomashtas. The present record-keeper has twenty-five pagodas monthly pay, and usually acts as second Sheristadar, for which he is well qualified, but twelve pagodas per month is quite enough for a record-keeper. It is not easy to conceive how all the Gomashtas and Menwas of the cutcherry are employed, for they have hardly any of the accounts which they ought to have. Their working to so little purpose proceeds undoubtedly from the want of system. The only accounts of the land revenue kept in the Collector's cutcherry are the demand, collection, and balance, from which the English accounts are prepared. The cutcherry accounts are merely monthly abstracts of whole talooks transmitted by the Tehsildars. The cutcherry keeps neither village (gramivar) nor individual (ryotwar) accounts, without which nothing can be known of the actual state of the revenue: the proposed establishment will enable it to keep all these accounts.

Colonel Munro's Report on Malabar, 4 July 1817.

41. The Treasury establishment is extremely defective: it consists only of two Gomashtas and five Shroffs. It is proposed that it should consist of one cash-keeper or treasurer, four Gomashtas, four Shroffs, and four Gollars. The Sheristadar has no authority in the Treasury nor control over its accounts. The only account he receives is a monthly abstract of the receipts and disbursements: he ought to receive a daily account of them, specifying the different coins of which they are composed, and to have authority at all times to call for any account, made out in any form he pleases, and to employ his own Gomashtas in examining or assisting to prepare the Treasury accounts whenever he thinks fit. He should, in short, have full control over the Treasury accounts. These accounts should be open to every servant in the cutcherry, while the transactions of the Treasury are close, and the knowledge of them confined to the few persons stationed in it, and while the Sheristadar receives only monthly abstracts, the Treasury servants will have it in their power to carry on a constant trade in the coins, and to falsify every account.

The amount of the present establishment is	Star Pagodas	5,156
Of the proposed establishment		7,386
The increase is per annum		2,230

but more than half of this increase arises merely from putting the Sheristadars and the Treasurer on the same allowances they have every where else.

42. The talook or district establishment has only one Sheristadar and one Gomahsta to each district: it has under it a parputti establishment employed in the villages, and which it has been already recommended to abolish.

43. The district cutcherry keeps no account of the land revenue, but a village or gramivar demand, collection, and balance account, of which it sends only an abstract to the Collector's cutcherry. It has no accounts of the coins paid by the Ryots, or of their individual rents and balances, or of the land cultivated, waste, deserted, or confiscated. The village parputtis keep some of these accounts, but in a very incomplete state. The proposed establishment will keep all these accounts, and send copies of them to the Collector's cutcherry. It ought not, like the present one, to be composed entirely of Nairs, natives of the country, but of a mixture of Nairs and strangers. The two offices of Tehsildar and Sheristadar, if one be held by a Nair the other should be held by a person from another province; and of the Gomashtas, one only in each district should be a Nair to write Mallialli accounts, and the rest natives of other countries, to write Hindowi accounts.

The amount of the present talook establishment is Star Pagodas	6,465	42	24 and of the proposed establishment	15,798	...	...
the increase is Star Pagodas	9,332	2	56

It will be seen by a reference to the statement of particulars, that this increase is chiefly composed of the charge for the new office of Tehsildars, and of the pay of additional Gomashtas and Peons, rendered necessary by the suppression of the parputti establishment.

44. No augmentation of the present custom establishment is necessary, but there should be a complete change in the manner of conducting its duties. There are seven Chauckees, at each of which there are stationed a Sheristadar or Karyist, who acts as Chauckedar, and one or two Menwas or Curnums to keep the accounts under him. The money collected daily remains in charge of the Chauckedar until the end of the month, when it is transmitted with a monthly account to the huzzoor. The district cutcherry has no authority over the Chauckedar, who has therefore every facility of suppressing his receipts, and falsifying his accounts from one end of the month to the other. The Chauckedar should, like every other district servant, be entirely subject to the authority of the Tehsildar. The boxes in which he deposits his collections should have the Tehsildar's seal upon them. He should transmit every day to the Tehsildar an account particular of his receipts in duplicate, one copy to be kept in the district cutcherry and the other to be forwarded to the huzzoor. The box box containing the collections should be sent daily to the Tehsildar, unless when the sum is small, when it may be kept until a sufficient sum has been collected. He should, at the end of each month, furnish the Tehsildar with his monthly account in duplicate, one copy to remain in the district and the other to be forwarded to the Collector's cutcherry. The principal Sheristadar, on receiving this abstract, will, by comparing it with the daily accounts previously received, be able to detect any errors it may contain. The Chauckedar, notwithstanding this precaution, may still commit frauds, but he will have less time, and it will be much more difficult with daily than with monthly accounts; and as the Tehsildar can investigate his conduct whenever he suspects any fraud, it will be almost impossible for him to commit any without the connivance of that officer. There will, besides all this, be the additional check of the control of the Collector's principal Sheristadar, who has at present none over the custom department.

Colonel Munro's Report on Malabar 4 July 1817.

45. The same observations which have been made respecting the management of the custom department are equally applicable to that of the tobacco. This department is now independent of the authority both of the district cutcherry and the Collector's Sheristadar: it should be placed under that of both. There are only two tobacco stations, namely, Palgautcherry and Poonarie. Each of these should be under the immediate management of the Tehsildar's Peshka, instead of a Karyist: the same daily and monthly accounts should be transmitted as are prescribed for the customs. This arrangement, besides checking frauds, will admit of a small reduction being made in the establishment. The English writers are unnecessary, as their business will be done in the Collector's cutcherry. For the two Karyists at thirty, two Peshkars at fifteen pagodas monthly are substituted. The present Pishkar at Palgautcherry, who has not half the business of the Peshkar at Poonarie, has twenty pagodas per month, while the other has only ten.

46. The salt is another separate department, independent of the district and huzzoor cutcherry. There are seven salt stations, each under a Kayrist or manager and a Curnum, who sends monthly to the Collector's cutcherry, which frequently state the names only of the Datals or brokers, instead of the actual buyers and sellers. The accounts can neither shew the whole of the salt on hand, nor the quantity remaining in each godown. After part of the salt has been issued from a godown, a fresh quantity is thrown in, and alternate issues and receipts go on without its ever being emptied. When the issue is once begun from a godown, it should be continued until it is empty, before any fresh salt is thrown in. The godowns should be placed under the Tehsildars, and their Peshkars immediately in charge of them should furnish daily and monthly accounts, in the same manner as has been proposed for the customs. A trifling additional expense will be incurred, occasioned chiefly by allowing Ralkars or Peons one pagoda instead of two rupees monthly; but a considerable saving may be made in the extra expenses of godown repairs and rent, and cooly-hire for removing salt, which are much overrated from want of sufficient check.

The accounts of the huzzoor Sheristadar, from which the charges of the present establishment have been copied, do not contain sader warid; but as an expenditure under this head certainly takes place, though the Sheristadar has no statement of it, the amount must, of course, be deducted, in order to make the comparison correct. The actual increase of charge, therefore, will be Star Pagodas 10,619 18 10. This sum is no doubt considerable; but it will render the situation of the principal native servants respectable and the establishment efficient, which are at present totally the reverse; and it will give an establishment of fixed hereditary village servants, which at present does not exist, and without which we can neither have order in the details of revenue, nor any accurate knowledge of the actual condition of the inhabitants.

48. During my short stay in Malabar I received many more complaints than in all the other provinces taken together through which I have passed. This may, in some measure, be ascribed to the independent character of the people, to their being more affected by the salt monopoly than in other districts, and to the tobacco monopoly being peculiar to that coast; but it must also be admitted, that their complaints are in some instances well founded. The principal sources of them are the tobacco and salt monopolies and the land-rent. With regard to the tobacco, the grievance complained of is merely of that general nature which must always be felt, where the price of any article of general consumption is greatly enhanced by monopoly. It may also be observed, that though, under the native governments, a monopoly, such as the present is, never was established, yet the article was always subject to heavy duties, to restrictions in its sale. The bullock-men, who formerly earned a livelihood by transporting it from Coimbatore, are still employed, the same shopkeepers still make a profit by selling it in retail, and though the price is much higher to the consumers, the commodity is not a necessary of life, and there is no other way by which an equal revenue could be raised with equal ease to the inhabitants.

49. With respect to the salt, the inhabitants in general of Malabar are not more affected than those of other provinces by the monopoly price: but the dealers complain of the measurement at the depôts, and the land-owners, who make salt on their lands, both of the measurement and of the prohibition of the manufacture. The foreign salt has of late years almost entirely supplanted the home home manufacture. It is brought from Goa and Bombay, but chiefly from Bombay. The importers stated that the measurement, which had always been unfavourable to them, had been much more so since fusily 1223, and I thought it advisable, in consequence of their representations, as well as of information from other quarters, to examine the measurement personally. I went, for this purpose, to the salt godowns at Calicut, and in presence of a crowd of importers, shopkeepers, and revenue servants, made the measurer belonging to the salt department measure ten parrahs, first in the way usual in receiving it from the importers, and then in that in which he issued it to the purchasers. The difference was thirty-four per cent.; but the dealers asserting that the difference was still greater, and that the measurement had not been so unfavourable to them as it usually was, the operation was repeated by a Peon belonging to the customs, who always attends at the measurement, and who measured in the manner which he saw always practised. The result was a difference of forty-nine per cent. The importers were not yet satisfied, and maintained that the difference was actually fifty per cent., and that it would have been found so, had the Peon been as expert in the regular measure. Some Brinjarries who were present, and had just filled their bags with salt to carry to Mysore, requested that it might be submitted to a similar trial: the measurement was accordingly made, and the difference was found to be fifty-three per cent. It is easy to see why the measurement is more unfavourable to the Brinjarries than to the inhabitants of Calicut: they are strangers, and not so likely to be clamorous for redress.

Col. Monro's Report on Malabar, 4 July 1817.

50. The difference of measurement cannot properly be called a loss to the importers. They are aware of the custom, and as they still continue to import, it is a proof that whatever the measurement may be, they receive the full price of the commodity. The loss occasioned by the measurement evidently falls upon the revenue The exact extent of it cannot possibly be ascertained, except by getting possession of the real accounts, which are probably concealed; but an estimate of it may be formed, which will probably not be far from the truth. The annual wastage is reckoned by the dealers to be not higher than five per cent on the foreign, or than ten per cent. on the home salt. The great difference of measurement began in fusily 1223: before that period the difference was about twenty-five per cent and was partly intended to cover an annual wastage of twenty per cent, which it was supposed might take place, but it appears never reached one quarter of that amount By taking the excess of measurement from fusilies 1221 to 1222 at twenty-two and a half per cent, and from 1223 to 1225 at forty-five per cent, and allowing a wastage of ten per cent, both in the foreign and home salt, it will be found that a quantity of salt, equal to Garce 2,452 76 6¼, of the value of Star Pagodas 75,586 42 14, has been embezzled by the servants of the department in the course of five years, from the beginning of fusily 1221 to the end of fusily 1225 This sum may at first sight appear large; but when it is considered that there are seven stations, that it is only about two thousand pagodas a year to each, and that there is no control over them, it is in fact as little as could be expected. But it will be still more, if instead of allowing ten per cent for annual wastage, the amount of wastage be taken, as reported by the Collector to the Board of Revenue, at 573 garce. The total sum, instead of Pagodas 75,586 42 14, inserted in the accompanying statement, will be then Pagodas 92,500 10 74, as follows :

51. All the items in the statement are taken from the native accounts of the Collector's cutcherry, excepting those of excess of measurement, which, as already mentioned, are calculated from the trials made at the godowns. The cutcherry cutcherry accounts, as will be seen from the statement, shew an excess of measurement, during the years 1221, 1222, and 1223, of Garce 379 51 8½, but none during the two following years, when it was certainly higher than at any former period; and they also shew a wastage, but only for 1221, of one garce and eighty merkals. That there was an annual wastage cannot be doubted: but whether the whole was 573 garce, reported by the Collector, or more or less, is very uncertain. Whatever it was, its omission in the cutcherry accounts evinces how little they are to be depended upon.

52. The loss from the surplus measurement of the salt not being brought to account is not the only one which Government suffers; it loses also from paying more than the actual purchase price. The foreign salt, as shewn in the accompanying statement, is purchased from the importers, by Datals or brokers, at from twenty-seven to thirty rupees per garce, and sold to Government at from thirty-six to forty-eight rupees per garce. The importer sells his salt readily at twenty seven to thirty rupees, but as he is anxious to get away, he wants ready money, which the brokers give him. The broker, however, never takes charge of the salt. It lies on the ground for some days or weeks, until the Collector's servants are ready to receive it: the broker then sees it measured by the Collector's measurer, and deposited in the public godown, in presence of an agent of the owner, who is liable for all wastage while lying on the ground, previous to its receipt by the salt servants. From this date the wastage is borne by Government. The broker is exposed to no risk whatever. He gets the Collector's receipt for the whole quantity delivered into the godown, which is paid a few months afterwards, and he thus gets a profit of twenty or thirty per cent. merely for his paying ready money, which might easily have been done from the Collector's treasury, and the difference of price thereby saved.

The whole quantity of foreign salt received in five years, from 1221 to 1225, was Garce 8,134 329 4, for which the price paid, per the cutcherry accounts, or annually Star Pagodas 21,137 44 15.

This result, it is true, is not drawn altogether from actual accounts, but partly from estimates of surplus measurement and wastage, and prices paid to the importers by the brokers. But these estimates are, I believe, rather underrated than otherwise. A clear proof that they are not over-rated is that the dealers are willing, for ready money, to deliver the salt at the estimated price and measurement. Eight or ten importers and brokers made this offer to me when at Calicut, and I think it quite possible that an agreement might be made with them on terms still more favourable.

53. A rigid investigation, properly conducted, would shew to whose use the surplus salt has been appropriated. There can be little doubt but that it went partly to the servants in charge of the godowns and partly to the head Sheristadar, previous to fusily 1223; but from that period it has, I believe, gone chiefly to a person named Bisram-sing, not in the service of Government. This man, who had been for some years settled as a trader of Palgautcherry, was employed by the Collector, on the discovery of the defalcations in the Treasury, in 1223, in investigating the embezzlements of the Sheristadar and Treasurer and recovering the amount; and his services were found so useful on this occasion, that he has ever since, though without any official situation, been been permitted to have the principal direction of the revenue affairs of the province. Every office is held by men on whom he thinks he can depend. The salt at Calicut was in 1223 placed under Soor Narrayen Bhut, one of his dependents; but in 1225 he got this man transferred to the charge of the tobacco at Poonana, and his own domestic servant, Ram Kishnen, appointed to succeed him. He got the Treasury placed under the present Shroff, Akki Shitte, who of course attends to all his orders. The key of the Treasury chest is kept by the Shroff, but that of the apartment in which it is deposited is kept by Bisram Sing: no issues or receipts can take place without his notice. He has a room in the Treasury, where he sits, and where he keeps a box with his private cash for his commercial dealings; but it is evident that, from his connection with the Shroff, he may easily take loans privately from the Treasury, and issue them publicly from his box. Several of the brokers who sell the foreign salt to Government are either his agents or partners. It is therefore a great convenience to him, though he ultimately replaces the amount, to be able to draw the purchase-money from the Treasury. Before he came to be employed by the Collector he was a petty trader, worth about five or six thousand rupees: he is now supposed to be worth from two to three lacs. His influence has been such, that he may, without difficulty, have acquired a sum equal to this from the salt, tobacco, and other sources, without any embezzlement in the treasury; but a treasury in which a merchant has so completely established himself can never be safe. All the Collector's principal servants having been more or less concerned in the embezzlements of fusily 1222, and his having none in whom he could place confidence, his availing himself at the time of the services of Bisram Sing was perhaps unavoidable; but they ought to have been dispensed with long ago. The present Sheristadar is utterly unfit for his situation: he was brought forward by Bisram Sing, solely on account of his being a quiet tractable man. The office ought to be filled by one, or rather by two able men, not natives of Malabar.

54. The salt of Malabar is not made from sea water on the beach, but is manufactured on salt marshy lands unfit for cultivation, or on lands which, though formerly cultivated, have been found more productive by being converted into salt-pans. These lands are scattered in small portions over the country near the sea, and belong to a great number of different individuals, who have always complained of the measurement, but have of late complained more loudly of their having been prohibited from manufacturing salt, by which means their lands are rendered useless, as they will yield no other produce. The difficulty of preventing clandestine sale of salt when it is made at many hundred different places has led to this prohibition. The foreign salt, from being imported at only a few stations, is so much less exposed to this evil, that it is taken in preference to the home, and has almost entirely supplanted it. The mere convenience of the revenue ought not surely to subject the land-owners to so great a hardship as that of the loss of the whole produce of their land; neither ought they to be permitted to extend the manufacture beyond its former limit, because such an extension, joined to the high price, might so much increase clandestine sales as to occasion a serious loss to the revenue. An arrangement might, I think, be made, by which sufficient security might be afforded to the revenue without injustice to the landholders. The manufacture of salt should be permitted on all lands appropriated to this purpose before the monopoly, and also on all such lands as may have been converted to this use, in consequence of cowles from the Collector: on all other lands it should cease. The average quantity manufactured on the old lands by the respective owners previous to the monopoly, and on the new lands subsequently, should be ascertained, and adopted as the quantity to be annually received from by the salt department: the excess of the demand above this quantity should be supplied by foreign salt. It will be impossible, among so great a number of petty manufacturers as there are now in Malabar, to prevent fraud; but with a proper establishment of district and village servants, it may be kept within bounds. The quantity carried privately to their own houses, or sold to their neighbours by the manufacturers, will probably never be less than a fourth or a fifth of the whole; but this ought not to be deemed a sufficient reason for putting a stop to the manufacture, and preventing a great body of proprietors from deriving any return from their lands. To some the loss is not great, as only a very small small portion of their land is employed in this way, but to numbers it is very distressing, as it is principally by proprietors who have very little land that the manufacture is carried on, and among all the discontent is very great. Even if an increase of revenue were the only point deserving of consideration, it is not very certain that any thing would be gained by the complete substitution of foreign for home salt. There would be some increase of the salt revenue, but this would probably be counterbalanced by a gradual decrease of land revenue, in consequence of the diminished profits of the owners of the salt lands rendering them less able to discharge their rents. The fact of a salt revenue greater than that of Malabar being realized in Canara without any importation, is sufficient to prove that it is not absolutely necessary, even for the sake of revenue, to suppress the home manufacture. The following abstract exhibits in round numbers the quantities of Malabar and foreign salt purchased for the monopoly during five years, from fusily 1221 to 1225.

55. The next great subject of complaint in Malabar is the assessment of gardens and rice lands. By this is not meant any general inequality of assessment, but the continuance of the original assessment on gardens and rice lands, which have been so much deteriorated from various causes, that the produce is no longer equal to the discharge of the rent. Some lands are swept away by mountain torrents or by rivers; some are overflowed by the sea and rendered unproductive for several years, or for ever where the owner had not the means of repairing the damage: some are left uncultivated, either from their being over assessed, or from the inability of the proprietors, and gardens have gone to decay without new ones having been planted to supply their place, or if planted, without their having yet become productive. Where a garden yields nothing, a remission of the whole rent should be made: where young trees are coming forward, no rent should be demanded until they are productive: where rice land has been destroyed, the rent should be given up: where rice land lies waste from the poverty of the owner, if a remission of rent for a few years is likely to enable him to cultivate the land, it should be allowed, on his giving security for the payment of the full rent after the expiration of that period; if it be waste from over assessment the rent should be lowered; if from its remote situation and the waste of cultivators the whole rent should be remitted. The investigation of these details, if made annually, would occupy but little time, and would not only secure the revenue, but obviate, in a great measure, the necessity of selling land for arrears.

56. The assessment of Malabar is in general very moderate, but were it lowered one half, failures would still be frequent. They must always be expected among such a body as forty thousand petty landholders, a considerable share of whom are little above the rank of common cultivators. Government receives from them so great a portion of the produce of the soil as revenue, that it ought to act rather as an indulgent landlord than as a rigid creditor. The little estates of these men ought not always to be sold, merely because it offers the readiest way of recovering their balances: they should be sold only when, after granting the owners every reasonable indulgence as to time, allowing them an abatement of assessment for a term of years in order that they may bring their lands into good condition, there is no hope of their being able to pay their rent. The power of selling should exist as a check over fraudulent defaulters, but with good management it will rarely be necessary to increase it There were few or no sales before 1225, but the Ryots have now been called upon for their accumulated balances. From 1221 to 1225 inclusive, the lands of those who could not pay them have been sold. The amount of these balances is trifling, but as the number of individuals who suffer is considerable, as the lands are sold for much less than the proprietors paid for them, and in some cases probably for less than might have been got, and as the sale of lands for arrears of revenue was formerly unknown in Malabar, the practice of it, now so generally introduced, is viewed with a good deal of dissatisfaction dissatisfaction by all classes of landholders. The principal Sheristadars had not the accounts of these sales, but I found the account of two talooks with the talook Sheristadar. From these accounts it appears that in twenty-nine villages, balances against eighty-six landholders, amounting to Rupees 1,970 3 56, were discharged in the following manner, viz. Col. Munro's Report on Malabar, 4 July 1817.

By the sale of personal effects ....Rupees	99	3	92¾
——— of 42 rice-fields	958	1	42¼
——— of 94 gardens	912	2	21½
Rupees	1,970	3	56

and that the rice-fields were purchased by the late owners for Rupees 4,153 3, or more than four times the amount of what they have now been sold for.

57. The balances of 1226 are more considerable than in former years, and they will go on accumulating and augmenting the discontent of the inhabitants, while the present system of attempting to realize them solely by the sale of the land is persevered in. The fear of being obliged to part with their lands has induced the proprietors, for some years, to continue paying the rent of lands which no longer yielded an adequate produce. Some have now exhausted their means and cannot pay, and more will be in the same situation the next and every following year. Other remedies than the sale of the land must be resorted to: this remedy may be a very proper one among zemindarries and great estates, but it is a very bad one among innumerable small properties, as in Malabar, where the land-owner and the cultivator are very commonly united in the same person. The same means should be adopted both for the security of the land-owner and of the revenue as in a well regulated ryotwarry district: no demand should be made for unproductive lands; a reasonable allowance should be occasionally made to the poorer classes for losses; no balance should be kept hanging over and distressing them for years; every balance outstanding at the end of the year should, within three, or at most four months from that date, be either realized or remitted. The diminution of revenue which would immediately ensue from lowering the rent where assessment is too high, and remitting it altogether where the land is unproductive, is estimated at ten thousand pagodas. Much of this loss, however, would not be permanent, because, as it is owing to the poverty of the owners, and to the land lying in remote situations where there is a scarcity of cultivators. it would be gradually lessened as the improvement of the circumstances of the inhabitants again brought the lands into cultivation. It would not be advisable to attempt to make up the deficiency by an equalization of the land assessment, because though there are equalities, they are not of such magnitude as to require a new assessment, and because such a measure would be extremely unpopular in the country. But there is another mode, sanctioned by ancient custom, by which the revenue might easily be made up, namely, by assessing new gardens on their becoming productive. It was the universal practice under the government of the Rajahs, to inspect all gardens once in every twelve years, and to alter the rent of them according as the produce had declined by the loss of old trees, or augmented by the planting of new ones. The Rajahs adopted it in their own domains, and enforced it whenever called upon among the landholders and their tenants. Its origin is of very ancient date, and is said to have been coeval with the establishment of the ancestors of the present race of Rajahs, and the custom itself was kept up until the transfer of the country to the British Government. The period of twelve years was, no doubt, chosen as that which gave the young garden time to come to maturity. Before the land-owner could demand the increased rent from the tenant, the tenant was entitled to demand an abatement of rent. The periodical raising and lowering the assessment of gardens ought to be revived and continued. Some objections would be made by those who have made new gardens where none existed before, but these would be easily overruled by the general sense of the country in favour of the ancient practice. The assessment by which the revenue always has been, and is now collected, is founded upon the principle of all garden trees being taxed while productive. Nearly one-third of the land revenue arises from fruit trees; but as the rent of a garden must necessarily be omitted as the trees decay, it seems but fair that new trees should be taxed on on becoming productive, according to the custom of the country. Unless this rule be observed, it will be the interest of a great number of the owners of gardens to let them go to decay, and make new ones on land which pays very little rent. If they have not already done this, it is because they had no assurance that either the new or the old garden would be exempted from taxation. It is supposed that the increase of revenue which would be derived from assessing the new trees would amount to about twenty thousand pagodas.

58. There does not seem to be any sufficient reason for exempting the pepper vine from taxation. It may be said that it encourages the land-owners to grow more, and enables them to furnish it on cheaper terms for the Europe market; that a greater quantity is in consequence exported, and that the customs on the extra quantity will probably compensate for the loss of rent. It is not said that the former tax discouraged the production of the article. After Tippoo had ordered most of the pepper vines to be destroyed, they were again planted in spite of that tax, and continued to increase: the tax, therefore, viewed merely as it affected the land-owners, did not require to be abolished, though some abatement might have been proper. It is for Government to determine whether any additional advantages have resulted from the measure to the trade or the customs, to make amends for the sacrifice of an annual revenue of thirty thousand pagodas.

59. Before concluding this long report, I must again take the liberty of earnestly recommending the introduction of the proposed village system, as absolutely necessary to the establishing of a connection between Government and the people, and the adoption of the establishments proposed for the different departments under the Collector, as without them he can neither know the actual condition of the inhabitants, nor protect them from unauthorized exactions, or the revenue from embezzlement.

I have the honour to be, &c.

THOS. MUNRO,
First Commissioner.

EXTRACT PROCEEDINGS of the BOARD of REVENUE,
The 16th October 1817.

To the President and Members of the Board of Revenue.

GENTLEMEN:

Mr Thackeray's Report, 4 Oct. 1817.

Par. 1. I meant to have submitted, before this time, drafts of a cowle, as directed in Mr. Hanbury's letter of the 5th December last, but am still in doubt about many important points. I now wish to ask the advice and instructions of the Board

2. The lands usually occupied by each Ryot have been considered his putcut, or farm, where they were highly assessed; his estate, where lowly assessed. He seems to have been considered answerable for the rent of his putcut under all circumstances, though remissions and indulgences have been frequently necessary. Two years' possession seems to have been considered to give him his rights, and impose on him the duties of an occupant. He seems to have been allowed to throw up part of his land, good and bad together, upon giving notice in time, that the Circar might get another tenant. Annual engagements have been taken from him, but it would appear much more strictly since the introduction of courts of justice. It was considered necessary to have some written documents to proceed upon in case of dispute. Garden lands, some lowly assessed wet lands, and plantations, classed also among the wet lands, are a saleable, many poonjee lands a valuable property. The putcut would generally have been a profitable farm, if not a valuable estate, if other exactions and impositions had not been continued or introduced. The Ryot has been subject to have lands imposed on him against his consent, or to pay extra assessments and deficiencies in the bareez of the village, under the head of gross tax. This is the best account I can give of a putcut: but there have been so many changes, that neither the rights of the Government nor the Ryot are fixed with precision.

3. If inquiry could be made, it would be found a putcut consisted of lands which came to the Ryot from his father; of lands he took willingly, because profitable lands; of lands, though unprofitable, which he agreed to take, in consideration of some indulgence, remission, deduction of teerwa, or relief from former exaction; and of lands formerly composing the putcut of another Ryot, who failed, and which he agreed to take, good and bad together, the bad for the sake of the good. These lands he ought not to be allowed to throw up, because he has, in fact, promised to keep them, and it is one of the conditions on which he holds his profitable lands: nor has the Ryot a right to take a good and refuse a bad field, of a lot of Circar waste and untenanted land offered him. The lands entered in his name in the accounts to make up deficiencies in the bareez of the village, and to pay extra assessments, are different; he should be allowed to relinquish them. But this inquiry, if carried too far or begun incautiously, would lead to a thousand frauds, falsehoods, confusion, and loss of revenue, most of which Government has a right to.

4. All these circumstances should have been taken into consideration when the survey was made. A survey affords a good general standard, but is too unequal to be the sole rule of assessment. It does not seem clear whether it was intended, when the survey was made, that the Ryots should be allowed to throw up their over-assessed lands: if so, the present survey rates on the good lands are too low, on the bad too high. We should lose, Mr. Sullivan computes, from fifty to seventy thousand pagodas if they had this freedom. They would concentrate their stock on the smallest extent of the best and lowest assessed land: all the bad and highly assessed would be left waste and pay no revenue, and the Ryots would retain their good lands at the rent below their value, and without performing one of the conditions on which they may now be considered to hold them.

5. If, indeed, the survey had been equal at first, and could continue so, no loss would result from this freedom; because the rent being every where exactly proportioned to the value of the land, the Ryot, wherever he went, and whatever extent of land he occupied, would have to pay the proportionate rent. But no survey rate can be so nicely adjusted at first; and if it could, would soon change. The value and rent of land fluctuates like the value of any thing else. But even at first we cannot so nicely appraise earth; and if we could, ten thousand mistakes must find their way into a survey. Frauds cannot be prevented, and erroneous principles are frequently adopted.

6. It is evident we must take a broader and coarser rule. Coimbatore is a country paying six lacs of pagodas; a certain village paying a thousand; a certain Ryot with a well, two ploughs, and twenty bullahs of land, thirty pagodas.

7. Our survey, as it now stands, may be nearer than the beezwaric of the native Governments; but we have attempted too much if we proposed to make the survey the sole rule of assessment. If we made it the sole rule here, and allowed the Ryots to throw up what lands they pleased, we should lose above half a lac of pagodas; if we demanded the whole survey rate on the whole of the lands now entered as occupied, we should ask for near a lac and a half of pagodas more than the country can pay. The difference between the survey rates and the actual settlement is chiefly on the grass lands; but these are as necessary, and perhaps on the whole as valuable, as any other lands: they seem to have been formerly taxed at the same rates. The errors of the survey have been corrected by making the Ryots keep or take a good and bad field together, or by giving him grass land at a low rent to compensate for the high rent on some of his poonje land, or by entering in the accounts grass land as cultivated to make up for too low a rent on his old poonje land. In this manner, the loss of revenue by the deduction of the teerwa, in fusily 1217, was made up. The requisite quantity of grass land was entered in the accounts as poonje, and made to pay poonje rent. Some lands may have been saddled on the Ryots besides; but, on the whole, if fusily 1217 was a tolerable year, and they had not suffered much from the previous year of famine, which lowered

Mr. Thackeray's Report, 4 Oct. 1817.

the revenue of fusily 1216, it is evident they did not pay more than a fair average revenue.*

8. If no more than the old rent on both his poonje and grass together was taken from the Ryot in fusily 1217, this arrangement was good for Government and him too; but perhaps on this, and many other occasions, many Ryots were actually made to pay more money. Waste, sometimes useless, was merely entered in his name in the accounts to raise his payments, in fact, upon his old lands, from which they came. All this† shews the survey is unequal: indeed, the very circumstance of the Ryot wishing to throw up one field, and being tenacious of another, is enough to prove it.

9. But it would be highly inexpedient to make a new survey. A new survey, even if we could be sure it would be more equal, would produce alarm, probably loss, much trouble, confusion, and expense. Rich Ryots, now easily assessed, would get further reductions by bribing the surveyors; and if Government made up the loss by an addition to the burthens of others, the operation would be justly considered an invasion of property, and the people would be still further from believing they could have a valuable property in their putcut lands: and besides these objections, the value of lands alters, and in a few years a new survey might be called for. The safest rule now seems, to get the Ryots to come to some permanent agreement for the lands they usually occupy, and for the rent they usually pay.

10. The annual operation of settling the jummabundy on valuable putcut estates is expensive and troublesome, fetters agriculture, and opens a door to the disputes, frauds, and errors, which may be supposed to find their way into the annual adjustment of an hundred thousand accounts current, where so many interests are concerned, and so many circumstances to be taken into consideration.

11. The revenue officers raise the payments of the Ryots by charging full survey rate on lands previously, from some cause, on cowle, or grass rent; by charging garden teerwa on some lands newly watered that year from his old, or from newly dug wells; by saddling him with waste or untenanted Circar land, and by renting the Circar wastes for grass to one or two principal inhabitants, who subrent them, or rather make a tufreek of the amount, or more sometimes, on the Ryots of the village. They can also ease him, when necessary, by charging only cowle or grass rent on lands for which he before paid full rent, by allowing him only to pay poonje rent where he before paid garden, by allowing him to throw up part of his bad lands, and last year by allowing him a reduction of half the rent on lands left uncultivated that year. From whatever cause, this remission, which amounted to 10,732, was contrary to usage, because the Ryots are considered responsible for the rent of their poonje lands under all circumstances, and perhaps was wrong in principle: but it was no doubt beneficial, perhaps absolutely necessary, in the present state of the revenue; and after a bad season, it had also the advantage of simplifying accounts, where they are so complicated, and saving saving the time, frauds, and danger of an inquiry into the circumstances of each Ryot's waste or uncultivated putcut land. But it was a temporary expedient. They ought to have been allowed to throw up many of these lands, or rather never saddled with them. But there is, perhaps, no time for such inquiries, and they might lead to endless disputes

12. The settlement of the jummabundy now may be considered rather as a final adjustment of the accounts of the year, than as a previous settlement of the terms on which the lands are to be held. The settlement is, in fact, going on always. In the beginning of the year the revenue officers and Monigars are trying to get the Ryots to give moochelkas for their putcut lands, and take as much more as they will agree to: if they neglect this duty, they neglect the interest of their master, the landlord. The jummabundy begins in November or December, according to the season, and goes on till the end of the year, when there are generally some claims to remissions still left to be settled: it is a struggle the whole time between the Ryots and revenue officers, to keep up revenue on one side and to evade on the other. The difficulty of keeping up the revenue will be more felt every year, as the power of the revenue officers declines. If we do not come to some fair and permanent terms, the Ryots will try by frauds, falsehoods, petitions, and prosecutions, to evade the fair, as well as the unfair demand. The revenue officers must try by the patronage, influence, and means still left them, to keep up the revenue, or the Government will lose a great deal of fair revenue. The bad consequences of this struggle must be evident. it has produced bad consequences already Ever since the establishment of the court, the revenue officers have, in fact, been harder or sharper with the Ryots, and obliged to insist upon more strict engagements from them. This, if it did not lead to the practice of taking razeenamahs, has made it more necessary. This struggle hurts the moral character of the people, and makes revenue less secure: it would be better to give up some revenue to induce the Ryots to come to permanent terms. Disputes about land are frequent now. The Ryot is now anxious to get his pottah, which he considers an acknowledgment from the highest authority of his at least temporary right. How much more interest would a permanent pottah give? If the annual pottah gives him some credit and importance, how much more might a permanent pottah give? There is no doubt of the great advantage of some permanent settlement in every respect; many of its practicability. Here the people, if not impoverished, are debased and suspicious. There have been so many changes and monopolies, so much Circar interference, so many exactions and restrictions; individuals have so long and often abused the name and authority of the state, that the people seem to have lost all sense of truth and justice After so many years of peace and plenty, it is lamentable to find the revenue less secure, the people less respectable and perhaps intelligent, the servants less to be depended on, and private rights not more certain and secure than when the province first came under the Company's government. No other improvements are to be observed than those resulting from the situation of the province and military reputation of the Government, which have protected it from foreign invasion and poligar pillage. The system here has been to make the cutcherry of the Collector the focus of all business, the depositary of all power, the source of all influence, the arbiter of the fortunes of the landed proprietors, the controller-general of agriculture and commerce. The Collector not only regulated whether rent should be paid, but whether half, or quarter rent. The most intelligent and active Collector will make not unfrequent mistakes; but where, from whatever cause, he neglects his duties, the worst abuses follow. It gets more difficult every day to carry on the present system of temporary expediency, and the Government may lose more by the struggle between the revenue officers and Ryots, than by giving up what may be necessary to induce them to come to some permanent terms. The revenue officers must not give up the just rights of the Government: they act at their peril, and must be considered the stewards of a great landlord, rather than as formerly, the representatives of the Government. All these difficulties were known when the village leases were introduced.

13. The Honourable the Court of Directors approve of permanent engagements with the Ryots for the lands they usually occupy and for the rent they usually usually pay. Mr. Sullivan, in some of his reports, particularly paragraph 42 of his letter of the 7th September 1816, seems anxious to introduce some more permanent system. Under such a settlement the Government would lose the difference between poonje and garden teerwa on new wells;* but it may be observed:

Mr. Thackeray's Report, 4 Oct. 1817.

Sic orig.

14. Many old wells have been deserted, many have been dug since the survey. There are more wells now than under the native Government; but the amount exacted under the native Government was perhaps double the survey rates. The reduction of teerwa has therefore produced more wells, and in fact more revenue for the country in general: and in the long run the revenue benefits generally by the greater number of wells, even at half the old assessment, because the produce of the country is generally so much increased and secured by the additional number of wells. A well on a putcut farm may enable the Ryot to pay the teerwa on his other dry land in a bad year. The old wells deserted have gone to decay, chiefly from the burthen of the assessment; a few from unfavourable situation and from the water failing, and more from the owner disappearing. Nobody but his heir will take the well, because, according to the custom of the country, the owner or his heir may reclaim possession. The increased number of wells since the survey seems almost entirely owing to the comparatively low teerwa. The teerwa on well, as well as all other land, under the native Government, and indeed in all parts of India, was fixed at a share, or supposed share, of the produce. Land under a well was supposed to produce three or four times as much in the year as the same extent of dry land, therefore it paid three or four times as much. The stock and labour employed was not, perhaps, sufficiently considered: at all events, the number of wells dug since the teerwa was lowered, shews the good effects of a low teerwa. There are many other considerations which operate to induce the Company to refrain from modes of assessment, which might have answered well under the native Government. Here the advantage of simplifying accounts seems to me alone to compensate for the supposed sacrifice of revenue. I do not know exactly the expense of digging, and a capital required to work a well. Suppose it only fifty pagodas, the interest and additional teerwa would come to twenty-two per cent. per annum on that capital: supposing the capital less, the teerwa would be still a higher tax upon it. Tuccavi has been advanced to Ryots undertaking to dig wells: it would be better to leave them to dig and enjoy fully the profits of the wells. It is more difficult to calculate the profits and clear rent of a well above those on dry land. If the Ryot works his own well, he gets the farmer's profit and most of the wages of labour besides the rent. Well lands are not, perhaps, so generally rented to farmers by the owners as to afford data for calculating the rent; but from what inquiries I have made, it seems that the owner's rent very little exceeds the interest on the cost of digging the well. The present rates, therefore, certainly do not offer too much temptation to this mode of employing capital: on the contrary, in this, as in other countries, money and labour laid out on land generally bring less returns than in other lines; but then this is more secure and pleasing. The additional teerwa on gardens is, in fact, an income tax. Giving up this income tax is inviting capital into this mode of investment; and in the most unfavourable view of it, is only offering a bounty to new wells, which some may think unnecessary, but a bounty to a species of improvement which cannot be too much encouraged. The number of wells might perhaps be doubled, the produce of the country and revenue proportionally augmented and secured. When they can pay more revenue easily, it will be easy to find expedients to get more from them. The present object is to secure the present revenue; by and bye it may be the object to increase revenue. Nothing is more likely to secure the present, and enable the people hereafter to pay more revenue, than a greater number of wells; and nothing is more likely to encourage the people to dig new wells, than giving them a full sense of property in their putcut lands, which they cannot well feel while subject to the continual interference the claim to additional teerwa for new, and the extension of garden cultivation under the old wells, and other improvements must produce. I do not recollect any case in which I would raise the payments of the Ryots, except where poonje, or garden, may be converted into nunje, by water from

Circar

Circartanks or watercourses. Here the Circar is at the expense of bringing the water, and should immediately get the difference of rent. It may be said, some of the old wells will be deserted and the revenue lost, and the Government ought to be allowed to make up the loss on the new wells. It may be answered, this is only a part, and a very small part, of the present annual losses, which it is hoped a greater number of wells would in a degree and in time, with the other advantages to be given to the permanent Ryots, altogether prevent. Of course it is the same to the Government, whether the Revenue, as long as it does not fall off, is brought to account as garden, or dry, or wet land; it is not necessary to keep a running account of wells, and have the new as a set off against the deserted wells. In most cases it would not be so much a sacrifice of revenue as a favourable bargain with the Ryot, giving him up the difference between the present teerwa and that to be imposed on his future improvements, to induce, and so far enable him to pay his present rent regularly: it would be so far like ensuring the present revenue. If a permanent settlement is made with the Ryots, it is probable many new wells will be dug and some old may go to decay, and possibly on the same estate. The whole estate will be rendered more valuable, some parts more than others. When the estate shall come to be divided, the parties will divide it according to its existing value, the value of all its component parts, and the whole fixed land tax will be calculated by the parties and by the punchayet, who will generally preside at the division, and they will regulate their respective shares accordingly. It will, of course, be necessary for the revenue officers to see that the land tax is fairly divided according to the then existing value of the lands, rather than according to the old survey rate on each field, unless all parties wish it. If all parties wish it, it will be pretty certain the survey rate still continues the fair and equal assessment on each field, and it should be continued; but not so much because it is the survey rate, as because it is admitted to be the fair rate at the time. If it is necessary to alter the survey rates, because one part of the estate going to one individual has been materially improved, another going to another individual materially deteriorated since the survey, the revenue officers must subdivide the assessment by the same rule that the parties divide the property. The same rule must be observed in sales and transfers. It may be said, this will be a difficult task, and will produce collusive transfers to evade the public revenue, and will overthrow the survey rates and lead to loss and confusion. With respect to the difficulty of the task, it is evident that it will only be to be performed occasionally, while it is now to be performed annually; that the land tax will be more easily divided in this way than the present annual rent is settled; and that if we cannot depend on our revenue officers to subdivide the assessment, so as to secure the Government from loss, and our judicial tribunals to settle disputes, we must admit our administration to be so bad, as to force us to deprive the people of private property in the land, and to rule for ever, not by system, but by temporary expedients. With respect to the overthrow of the survey rates, it is to be hoped that the country will in time be so much improved, that the survey will be applicable only as a general standard, and that the land tax will be more like what it is in England. This would actually be the case here, on an estate of fifteen bullahs of dry, converted by new and the extension of garden cultivation under the old wells into fifteen bullahs of garden, still paying the old dry teerwa. Of course a great capital must be invested in the land to make it so valuable. The survey rates may be proper enough at present, and as the customary rates now in general afford the surest guide in assessment; but they are not calculated, nor can be expected to last for ever: and if the condition of particular districts, villages, estates or fields, fairly, and it may be called naturally, require they should be altered, there can be no doubt of the necessity of altering them; and if altered, it must be done with reference to the value of the land at the time. The survey rate on particular fields will be altered, but on the principle of the survey itself, which is to raise or lower the rate according to the value of the land. A change may take place in the value of land; in the value of fields probably in ten years; of estates, in ten or twenty; and in thirty and forty even in the value of villages. The lands may be expected to be generally improved, but some more than others; some even deteriorated. A field may at once be rendered more valuable by a well; an estate

Mr. Thackeray's Report, 4 Oct. 1817.

estate by several wells or plantations: on others wells and plantations may be allowed to decay. A village may be improved, not only by the improvement of its own component parts, but by the general improvement of the surrounding country, or by troops or great public establishments in its neighbourhood. It may be ruined, as many have been in Coimbatore, by the ravages of wild beasts, and some even by the vexation occasioned by the travellers and troops marching. In the future subdivision of estates and land tax, the then existing value of the lands will be taken into the calculation, as well as the old survey teerwa, and the lots be subdivided between the parties, and the land tax sub-assessed accordingly. Any alteration, so far from being injurious by overthrowing the survey rates, will be the wholesome and natural way of correcting those rates upon the survey principle, and making the land-tax fit itself to the circumstances of the estate. It would be as reasonable to take Doomsday book as the sole guide for assessment in England, as to expect that the survey rates as they now stand are to remain unchanged for ever. In the same manner, if thirty or forty years hence it should be found expedient to revise the land tax generally, the value of each estate will be taken into the account, and it must be assessed on the old survey principles upon its then existing value, or any other new principles that may be determined on. If at the end of that period the country should be found in a worse condition than at present, the revenue must fall under any system; but there is every reason to hope a permanent settlement will produce a general improvement, which will compensate for partial loss, and such a settlement is more likely than any other to prevent partial loss.

15. I have the honour to enclose a draft of a cowle. There is no objection to publishing it now, though I fear the permanent offer it contains may not be accepted generally for some years.

16. No. 2, a statement of the lands and rent of Poottea Gowd, who proposes to take his lands on permanent terms. He proposes to pay 472 chuckrums for lands, the survey rent on which is 599 chuckrums: his present payment is 457 chuckrums. It may be said he gets his waste too cheap; bullahs seventy for five instead of sixty chuckrums, the survey rate: but it may be answered, the survey is an imaginary rate, which the lands never have, and may not be able to pay for a century, and therefore is a clog on improvement, and a weight hanging over the heads of the inhabitants, which will effectually prevent them from acquiring a valuable property in their putcut lands. On the whole, Poottea Gowd's offer is advantageous to the Circar: he is to pay for his wet land in all seasons and under all circumstances.

17. Statement No. 3, shews the number of wells in each year of the Company's Government.

18. No. 4, shews the difference between the survey rates and the actual settlement of fusily 1226, on the whole of the lands now entered as occupied. This shews the Ryots now pay less than the survey rates for more land than they would occupy if left to themselves. This seems to give the Government the power of raising the rent at pleasure, but is only the power of raising the rent on lands which may be supposed unable to pay, for if they had, they would have been raised to the full survey teerwa long ago. No great improvement can be expected in villages where more land has been forced on the Ryots than they want, and where the jummabundy is nothing more than raising the rent of each individual towards, or reducing it somewhat further below the survey rate.

19. It is not to be expected a permanent settlement can be paid without any remission; but some arrangement, more permanent and secure than the present practice of temporary expediency, may be adopted. Remissions must be necessary every where, unless insured against by a great sacrifice of revenue. Occasional remissions will produce less inconvenience and difficulty than the present operations of first getting the Ryots to take the lands, than settling the jummabundy, and afterwards frequently granting remissions. Besides, a permanent settlement may be made on the well lands, in plantations now classed among the nunje lands, and in some valuable, because lowly assessed, both nunje and punje lands; but failures will occasionally take place under any system.

Mr Thackeray's Report, 4 Oct. 1817.

20. If permanent terms are made, all the grass lands usually occupied and forming part of puttcut farms should be continued to the Ryots, not at one third, one-fourth, or one-fifth of the full rent, but on a general view of all the circumstances of the land, ryot and village, on an average of the fair rent usually paid for the whole of his farm.

21. The Ryots are now liable to be ejected from these lands, or to pay full rent, if any other Ryot offers to cultivate and pay full rent for them. The Ryots sometimes plough, sometimes keep the same field fallow or under grass, when the grass rent is to be raised to full, the full rent lowered to grass rent, according to the change. This leads to disputes, fetters agriculture, weakens the security of the Ryots, and makes accounts complicated.

Sic orig

22. It may be said, many of them will get too good a bargain, and the Government will lose too much for that a Ryot who now has a little cultivated at full, a great deal of grass at one-third, or one-fourth, will in time cultivate it all: it may be answered, we make the Ryots keep the good and bad land together, and therefore ought to let them get the profit from improveable land in their occupation. Probably where the Ryot has much grass, his cultivated land is highly assessed, or he has some at full rent which has never been cultivated at all, but was saddled on him to make up some deficiency in the bareez of the village, or pay some extra assessment, and got the grass to counterbalance that or some other imposition. His rent is paid from the whole of his lands, grass included If hereafter some permanent arrangement should be made, the rent should be fixed on a general view of all the circumstances of the land, ryot and village, and the rent on improveable lands should be raised accordingly About half the grass lands entered in the jummabundy statements may, from the accounts from the districts, be supposed usually in the occupation of the Ryots The difference between the survey rent and the present low rent may be fifty thousand pagodas. This is a nominal sacrifice, which must probably be made if permanent terms are accepted, and it may be necessary to give up some more of the Circar grass lands, in certain cases, besides It is a sacrifice which should be made if they agree to permanent terms, but until then no deviation from the custom of the country should be admitted.

Sic orig

23. This sacrifice, however, is like that of the difference between poonje and garden teerwa, resigning what cannot be expected for many years, if ever.

24 The grass rent on Circar waste is a distinct consideration They have generally been rented out to one or two principal Ryots, who sub-rent them, or rather make a tufreek on the village of the amount they themselves have to pay, often more. This is one of the usual modes of making up deficiencies and paying extra assessments it opens a wide door to abuse In some villages the Ryots seem to divide the grass lands by a private arrangement, different from our accounts Much of the Circar grass lands previously rented out to one or two individuals, but perhaps held jointly by the village, was entered in the pottahs of fusily 1226 as part of the putcut of the individual, that is, the share of the grass lands which he was supposed to hold and pay for jointly with the other Ryots, was considered, in fusily 1226, as a part of his private farm. I would make no changes from ancient custom, nor give up any of the usual rights of Government, till a more permanent settlement is made.

25. With reference to the observation of the Board on the settlement of fusily 1226, it is necessary to remark that the jummabundy here is to be considered rather a final adjustment of the accounts of the year than a previous settlement of the terms on which the Ryots are to hold their lands The Ryots generally seem considered responsible for the rent of their putcut lands according to what they paid last year, but it has been usual, particularly since the establishment of the courts, to take agreements from them in the beginning of the year to prevent disputes, and such agreements are absolutely necessary under the present system They are prescribed by the Regulations and if they were not taken the revenue officers would have no legal instrument to proceed upon in the case of refusal to pay rent Moochilkas, also, gave great facility to the settlement of the jummabundy I have no scruple in ordering them to be taken they are proper and necessary, but must be taken with the consent of the the Ryots. The Ryots are averse to enter into these engagements till the rain falls, and are only now signing them. These arrangements are made by the Monigars, Curnums, and Tehsildars, from August to October: the huzzoor cutcherry goes round in December, and corrects any mistakes, redresses any injustice, and brings to account any frauds which may have found their way into these transactions. The jummabundy of fusily 1226 was, considering the difficulty of the task, a moderate and good adjustment of the accounts of the year. Lands unfairly saddled on the Ryot were deducted from the accounts, or the general remission of half the rent on uncultivated lands was allowed, when there was no time for the inquiry. The rent on poonje converted in fusily 1226 into garden by new, or extending the garden culture under old wells, was not raised, though the rent was raised on lands surveyed as garden, but which for some years had been reduced to poonje rent. I have some doubts about the policy of giving up the difference between poonje and garden teerwa till some permanent terms are agreed to. The confusion and abuses which prevailed here for so many years, made the jummabundy of fusily 1226 a difficult task: that of fusily 1227 will not be less tedious, nor perhaps less difficult. If a permanent settlement could be made, this annual adjustment would be easier. It would be to revise the registers of lands, and enter them in the name of the Ryots to whom transferred when sold or disposed of; to enter and charge for the waste newly occupied, and raise the rent of poonje, or garden newly converted into nunje, by Circar water; and in bad seasons, when remissions are necessary, to ascertain the extent of loss, and settle the amount to be remitted. I would publish the cowle and come to permanent terms with such Ryots as offer. If it is found impossible to get them to come to permanent terms, I do not see how we can much improve on the present practice of temporary expediency. We must get them to take as much land and pay as much as we can; they will try to pay as little as they can: loss, confusion. and disputes must attend this struggle. The orders of the Honourable the Court of Directors exclude any shape of village rent, but they are too disunited to rent their villages jointly. The village might perhaps be rented separately to the two or three parties generally to be found in it, but they might quarrel among themselves.

Mr. Thackeray's Report, 4 Oct. 1817.

26. I have the honour to transmit a statement shewing the difference between the survey rates on the nunje lands in different districts, and to state, that it may be proper eventually to lower the high rates in Erroad, and perhaps in other places, if found necessary after further inquiry. It will be observed, that the average rate in Erroad is Con. 7 8F. 11P. per cawney on the old nunje, but only 4 3 on the new nunje. The old and new are the same nearly in all circumstances of soil, water, and situation. In Caroor the old nunje is only 3 6 14, the new only 1 9 12. In Erroad it is difficult to get Ryots to take the land: in Caroor nunje is saleable property. Whether the terms are for the year, or a term of years, this reduction may be necessary. It is desirable to settle either for one year or a term of years with whole families, or sets of the same caste in a village, for the whole of their lands, where they may approve of such an arrangement.

27. It is desirable to lower the survey teerwa at once, where it evidently appears too high, particularly where the land is deserted in consequence; but this must be done with caution.

28. It is desirable to relieve all Ryots engaged in agriculture from payment of the house-tax. Many Ryots now take out separate pottahs merely to avoid this tax, from which Pottahdars are exempt: this makes the accounts complicated. Many, in fact, sub-tenants, are now entered as independent occupants, merely to avoid this tax.

29. It is just to make an allowance for lands saddled on the Ryot without any advantage to compensate for the imposition, or to allow him to throw them up; but great caution is necessary in making the inquiry.

30. The decennial renters gave cowle on very low terms for waste newly brought under cultivation: these low cowles were continued in fusilies 1225 and 1226. It seems doubtful whether the rent should be raised above the cowles: the circumstances of each case must in a great measure regulate the

Mr. Thackeray's Report, 4 Oct. 1817.

the decision. These are the only points which now seem necessary to be stated for the instructions of the Board. The other statements I have the honour to transmit will shew the details of the present system, and explain the difficulties of making the jummabundy.

31. Some loss of revenue may be apprehended this year on the poonje lands, partly because only a few partial showers fell from the beginning of June to the end of September, and partly because the Ryots are getting more independent from various causes.

32. The Board authorized Mr. Sullivan to rent the Circar grass at one-fifth: I would recommend that no change be made till some permanent terms are agreed to. There is no reason why one-fifth should be a fitter rate than one-third or one-fourth, the usual rates. Any change produces trouble and some confusion. In the southern division, where there is most of this land, poonje and grass paid the same until the survey. Mr. Hurdis raised the poonje and reduced the grass rent. In fusily 1227 the rent on poonje was lowered, and grass rent, to the amount required to make up the loss, entered as poonje.

33. These changes are generally nominal: the Ryot pays the same, or more, under another head. Till some arrangements with regard to the Circar grass lands can be made, as directed in Mr. Hanbury's letter of the 5th December last, I would propose to let out the Circar waste land for this year to such inhabitants as may voluntarily apply for it, but would recommend that the usual rates of one-third or one-fourth be continued for the present, instead of the new rate one-fifth proposed. Of course, the Collector will take all the care he can that no deficiencies in the bareez of the village or extra assessments are levied under this head, but that the land is voluntarily taken and paid for.

34. In the Coimbatore division it has been customary never to take less than garden rent on the whole of the lands entered as garden by survey, whether they were watered and under garden culture or not, and to charge garden rent on old poonje besides, newly brought under garden culture by water from the old or new wells. In fusily 1226, garden rent was confined to the land entered as garden by survey, not extended to poonje land brought that year under garden culture by water from old or new wells.

35. In the southern division it has been customary for some years to charge garden rent on such lands only as were actually watered, not on all the lands entered by survey as the garden attached to the well. The lands entered as garden by survey were charged as poonje, when not actually watered. In fusily 1226, the rent on the whole of the lands entered as garden was raised towards full garden rent, whether such lands were that year under poonje or garden culture. It might be advisable to make no change till some permanent terms are agreed to. Changes always produce complaints; sometimes injustice. In the northern division the Ryots may be as ready to pay garden teerwa on poonje newly brought under garden culture, because the custom, as the Ryots in the southern division may be averse to pay garden teerwa on garden lands by survey under poonje culture, because the practice has for some years been otherwise. There is generally some good reason at bottom for any established custom, though it may at first seem impolitic or unjust. The assessment is on the whole not so heavy as in most provinces: the only real grievances so general as to deserve public representation are, entering in the accounts, and charging for lands never wanted nor used by the Ryots, to make up deficiencies in the bareez of the village, or pay extra assessments, and the tufreek under the head of grass-tax.

I have the honour to be, with much respect, Gentlemen,

Your most obedient servant,

(Signed) Wm. THACKERAY,
Acting Collector.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE, Dated the 31st January 1818.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 31 Jan. 1818.

Par. 58. This settlement* itself did not call for any particular observation from us, further than the expression of our approbation of the great attention which Mr. John Sullivan, the Collector, appeared to have paid to the arduous duties of his situation: but the correspondence to which the settlement had given rise between the Board of Revenue and the Collector, drew our notice to the defective state of the information before Government, with regard to the progress which had been made in the preparations for carrying into effect the orders of your Honourable Court for recurring to the ryotwar mode of settlement.

59. We therefore gave instructions to that Board, to submit, as soon as possible, a statement on the following points.

First, The mode of settlement which, either in whole or in part, subsisted in each of the districts under this Government.

Second, The precise date at which the subsisting settlements of a temporary nature would terminate in the several districts where they prevailed.

Third, The degree in which each district was prepared for a ryotwar settlement, by the establishment of teerwas, and by such other means as the Board might deem necessary.

60. We at the same time intimated to the Board of Revenue our hope, that considerable progress had been made in framing a Regulation for the intended ryotwar settlement; our regret that the present lease settlement had been left without that only legitimate foundation; and our approbation of the basis of justice and moderation on which they proposed that the ryotwar settlement should be formed: and we particularly impressed on the Board, the importance of furnishing the information called for without delay, both that the proper steps might be taken in due time for preparing to execute, in the most successful manner, the instructions which had been received from your Honourable Court, and that there might be an opportunity of making any reference to your Honourable Court which might eventually prove necessary with regard to the detailed or local application of those instructions.

61. The reply of the Board of Revenue, contained in a letter from their Secretary, accompanied by voluminous papers, calculated to afford information respecting the preparations made for recurring to the ryotwar mode of settlement, was taken into consideration at our Consultation on the 24th June.

62. As that part of the letter from the Secretary to the Board of Revenue which relates to the first two points on which we had called for information contains a summary view of the state of the several districts under this presidency, with regard to the settlement of their land revenue, which may prove interesting to your Honourable Court, we shall take the liberty of inserting the substance of it.

63. The whole of the district of Ganjam was in possession of Zemindars, holding their lands on the permanent zemindarry tenure, with the exception of the Itchapoor and other pergunnahs, which had been granted on lease to the late Major Evans, and subsequently surrendered to Government; the zemindarry of Gumsoor, recently forfeited, and the Bavanapoor mootah and Chicacole estates, in which the permanent settlement had been annulled. In the pergunnahs above-mentioned, in Gumsoor, and in the Bavanapoor mootah, annual village settlements prevailed; and in the Chicacole estates there had been formed a village settlement for five years, which would expire with fusily 1228.

64. In the district of Vizagapatam, the only lands not permanently settled were those of the Hoonjaram estate, of which a village settlement had been made for five years ending with fusily 1229.

65. The whole of the district of Rajahmundry was settled according to the permanent zemindarry system, excepting six estates which were under the management of the Collector, and in which annual settlements prevailed.

66. The

* Coimbatore.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 31 Jan. 1818.

66. The only lands not permanently settled in the district of Masulipatam were the two small resumed mocassah villages of Caupavaram and Singagoodum, which were annually rented out, and the resumed jaghire village of Kytapilly, which had been rented out on a lease expiring in fusily 1228.

67. Of the lands under the Collector of Guntoor, the district of Palnaud was the only part not permanently settled. A village settlement of seven years had been formed by the Collector for the dry lands of that district, but the Government had refused to confirm it, and had declared it terminable as soon as the necessary measures could be taken for the introduction of the ryotwar system. In the wet lands the established share of the produce belonging to the Government had been ordered to be received in kind from each cultivator, and so far the collection of the revenue was ryotwar. The commutation of the revenue in kind for a revenue in money remains to be effected.

68. In the district of Chingleput, the whole of which was formerly settled on permanent zemindarry tenure, numerous estates had gradually lapsed to Government; and the greater part of them had been settled on village leases for ten years, which would expire in fusily 1232. Several, however, remained under aumany management, for want of adequate offers for the rent of them.

69. In the district of Salem, one of those in which the permanent zemindarry settlement was formerly established, the ryotwar system had been reverted to, with respect to such estates, as, from time to time, had been brought in on account of Government.

70. In the Bellary division of the Ceded Districts a decennial village settlement prevailed, which would expire with fusily 1231; but as there was reason to believe that many of the renters were inclined to surrender their leases, the Collector had been authorized to resume them in such cases, and to revert to the ryotwar mode of settlement.

71. In the district of Cuddapah, the other division of the Ceded Districts, a decennial village settlement had been made, which would expire with fusily 1230.

72. In the districts of Nellore and Ongole, in the northern and southern divisions of Arcot, in Tanjore, and in the wet lands of Tinnevelly and Trichinopoly, there prevailed village settlements, which would terminate in Nellore with fusily 1231, in both divisions of Arcot and in Tanjore with fusily 1230, and in the wet lands of Tinnevelly and Trichinopoly with fusily 1232.

73. In the dry lands of Tinnevelly and Trichinopoly the settlements were annual and ryotwar, on the old money rents.

74. In Coimbatore, and in the districts of Madura and Dindigul, the ryotwar mode of settlement had been reverted to.

75. The foregoing is a concise but, we believe, correct account of the different modes of settlement subsisting in each of the districts under this Government, Malabar and Canara only excepted, and of the periods yet unexpired of such of those settlements as are of a temporary nature. The peculiar nature of the settlements which prevail in the provinces of Malabar and Canara is, no doubt, well known to your Honourable Court.

76. The information afforded by the Board of Revenue with respect to the third point on which we had called for their report, namely, the degree in which each district might be prepared for a ryotwar settlement, by the establishment of teerwas and by other necessary means, was very defective; they however submitted to us such parts of their correspondence with the officers under their superintendence, as related to the adoption of preparatory steps to the general introduction of the system, together with a rough outline of a Regulation for the ryotwar settlement, which they proposed to circulate in that unfinished state for the consideration of the several Collectors, in order to have the benefit of every procurable information on the subject, before submitting the Regulation to Government with a view to its enactment. It was also stated in the letter of their Secretary, that with the view of enabling the Collectors to discover any practical difficulties that might occur in introducing the proposed settlement, and to provide remedies against them, as well as to render render the rules for the formation of the settlement both correct in principle and uniform in their practical result, the Board had desired each of those Collectors in whose districts the ryotwar system was not established, to select one village, and to proceed to measure, class, and assess its fields, on the principles laid down by Colonel Munro, in his survey of the Ceded Districts.

77. Before passing any resolutions upon this communication from the Board of Revenue, we considered it desirable to avail ourselves of the benefit to be derived from the intimate acquaintance with the subject of the ryotwar mode of settlement possessed by Colonel Munro; we therefore caused that communication, with its several enclosures, to be transmitted to him, for such observations thereupon as he might think fit to offer.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 24 June 1817.

1. I am directed by the President and Members of the Board of Revenue to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Secretary Hill's letter, under date the 15th ultimo, in which it is stated, that the attention of the Government has been drawn to the defective state of the information before them, with regard to the progress that has been made in the preparations for recurring to the ryotwar mode of settlement in the territories under this Government, and that the Right Honourable the Governor in Council therefore requires a statement on the following points: 1st. The mode of settlement subsisting in each district; 2dly, The precise date at which the existing temporary settlements will terminate; and 3dly, The degree in which each district may be prepared for a ryotwar settlement.

2. The periodical reports of the Board, already before the Right Honourable the Governor in Council, will, it is believed, be found to contain detailed and particular information on the two first points; but as it may be satisfactory and convenient to have a summary thereof, it is now subjoined.

Ganjam.

3. The whole of this district is in the possession of Zemindars, who hold their lands under the permanent zemindarry tenure; with the exception of the Itchapoor pergunnahs, granted to the late Major Evans on lease, and since surrendered to Government; the zemindarry of Gumsoor, recently forfeited; the Bavanapoor mootah and the Chicacole estates, in which the permanent settlement was annulled.

4. In the Itchapoor, &c. pergunnahs, in Gumsoor, and in the Bavanapoor mootah, annual village settlements prevail; the existing settlements will therefore expire with the current year fusily 1226. In the Chicacole estates a quinquennial village lease has been introduced, which will expire with fusily 1228.

Vizagapatam.

5. The only lands not permanently settled in the Vizagapatam district are those of the Hoonjaram estate, in which a quinquennial village lease has been introduced, that will expire in fusily 1229.

Rajahmundry, viz. Yanamadoroo, Paulcoodaroo, Woopalagooptum, Salkenatepillay, Bendarmalanka, Masulipatam.

6. In the Rajahmundry district six estates are under the management of the Collector, and in these annual settlements prevail; the existing settlements will consequently expire there with the current year 1226.

7. The only aumany lands in the Masulipatam district are the two small resumed mocassah villages of Caupavaram and Singagoodum, which are annually ally rented out, and the resumed jaghire village of Kytapilly, which has been rented out on a lease expiring in fusily 1228.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 29 May 1817.

Guntoor.

8. The only lands not permanently settled under the Collector of Guntoor are those in the district of Palnaud. The dry lands in that district were settled by the Collector on a septennial village lease, but the Government have refused to confirm the same, and have declared the lease terminable so soon as the requisite measures can be taken for the introduction of the ryotwar system. In the wet lands the established share of Government has been ordered to be received from each cultivator in kind, and so far the collection of the Revenue is ryotwar. The commutation of the revenue in kind for a revenue in money remains to be effected under the rules now framing.

Chingleput.

9. Most of the numerous estates in this permanently settled district which have gradually lapsed to Government have been settled on a village lease for ten years, which will expire in fusily 1232: several, however, are under aumany management, from the want of adequate offers for the rent.

Salem.

10. The ryotwar mode of settlement and collection have been reverted to in the estates of this district, which have been bought in from time to time on account of Government.

Ceded Districts: Bellary, Cuddapah.

11. In Bellary a decennial village lease prevails, which will expire with fusily 1231; but the Collector has been authorized to resume the leases of such as may be inclined to surrender them, and in that event to revert to the ryotwar mode of settlement. In Cuddapah a decennial lease settlement has been established, which will expire with fusily 1230.

Nellore, two Divisions of Arcot, Tanjore, Tinnevelly, Trichinopoly.

12 In Nellore and Ongole, in the northern and southern divisions of Arcot, in Tanjore, and in the wet lands of Tinnevelly and Trichinopoly, village lease settlements prevail, which terminate in Nellore with fusily 1231, in the northern division of Arcot with fusily 1230, in the southern division of Arcot with fusily 1230, in Tanjore with fusily 1230, in the wet lands of Tinnevelly with fusily 1232, and in the wet lands of Trichinopoly with fusily 1232.

13. In the dry lands of Tinnevelly and Trichinopoly, the settlements are annual and ryotwar, on the old money rents.

Coimbatore, Madura, Dindigul.

14. In Coimbatore and in the districts of Madura and Dindigul the ryotwar mode of settlement and collection has been resorted to.

Malabar and Canara.

15. The peculiar nature of the annual settlements which exist on the western coast are too well known to the Government to require any elucidation in this place.

16. Having given this concise abstract of the existing settlements in each district, and stated when those of a temporary nature will terminate, it remains for the Board to shew in what degree each district, not at present settled on the ryotwar plan, may be prepared for that system. To do this it is necessary that the Board should enter at some length into an elucidation of the landed tenures of the different provinces, and of the nature and effects of the ryotwar survey where it has been introduced. A minute on this subject, involving also various other questions connected with the general introduction of the ryotwar plan of settlement, has been partly prepared, and is now under the consideration of the Board, who hope soon to have it in their power to submit it to the Government in a complete state:* meantime, with the view of enabling the Right Honourable the Governor in Council to judge of the preparatory steps that have been taken for the general introduction of the ryotwar settlement, they beg leave to enclose for his information copies of the papers noted in the margin.*

17. From these enclosures it will be observed, that considerable progress has been made in the formation of a Regulation for the intended settlement. It is proposed by the Board to circulate the draft as it now stands for the consideration of the several Collectors, in order that they may have the benefit of every information to be procured on the subject, previously to submitting the Regulation for enactment; but it is to be considered at present as a mere outline of the proposed law, which it will be requisite to modify considerably as further information may prove expedient.

18. With the view, also, of enabling the Collectors to discover any practical difficulties that may occur in introducing the proposed settlement, and to provide remedies for the same, as well as to render the rules for the formation of the settlement correct in principle and uniform in their practical result, the Board have desired those in whose districts the ryotwar system has not been satisfactorily established to select one village, and to proceed to measure, class, and assess the fields thereof on the principles laid down by Colonel Munro in his survey of the Ceded Districts. It is hoped that this measure will not only enable the Board to anticipate and provide against the chief difficulties likely to arise on the introduction of the new settlement, but assist its establishment on uniform and satisfactory principles throughout the country.

19. But when the Board of Revenue consider the great difficulty likely to arise in the Northern Circars in the conversion of the Government share of the produce, which in some districts is as high as sixty or seventy per cent. of the whole, into a moderate money payment; when they find that in many places the former ryotwar settlement existed only in the accounts of the Collector's cutcherry, and never was adopted or followed by the people; that it was very inaccurately established in other districts, and that in general the result of most of the former ryotwar surveys has been unsatisfactory; but, above all, when they observe the little regard paid to ancient usages and private rights under the surveys hitherto made on the ryotwar plan, they are desirous, in reverting to that system, to guard against these evils; and while they vest the revenue officers with such powers as may be requisite to enable them to measure, class, and assess the lands, they wish to confirm existing rights, to prevent oppression, and to ensure speedy redress of individual wrongs. The Board are extremely anxious to effect this at as early a period as possible, and no efforts on their part shall be wanting for this end: but the interests involved in the new system of revenue administration are so momentous, that the Board are desirous that it should be rather well than hastily established.

I have, &c.

Fort St. George, 29 May, 1817.

DRAFT of a REGULATION for the general Introduction of the Ryotwar Mode of Settlement and Collection.

Draft Regulation for Ryotwar Settlement.

Whereas it has been deemed expedient that the settlement and collection of the public revenue, on lease, whether by one or more villages, shall be discontinued after the expiration of all existing leases, and that the public revenue shall henceforth, in all practicable cases, be collected by public officers in the pay of Government, either European or native, direct from each contributor; and whereas it has been deemed expedient that a measurement, classification, and new assessment should be made of all arable and waste land, and that a certain, fair, and reasonable equivalent or composition should be fixed in money for all public revenue heretofore received in kind, and that the variable public assessment now paid in money for land should be changed for a fixed field assessment: wherefore the Right Honourable the Governor in Council has been pleased to make the following rules.

1. From

* Circular letters, 25th March, and 3d April 1816; to Mr. Hyde and Mr. Roberts, 17th April; to Mr. Ellis, 17th April; to Col. Caldwall, 22d May 1816; circular letter, 22d May 1816; draft of the ryotwar Regulation.

Draft Regulation for Ryotwar Settlement.

1. From and after the date of the promulgation of this Regulation, the collection of the public revenue shall not be rented out by villages, or other larger divisions of country, for a term exceeding one year, unless the sanction of the Governor in Council shall have been first obtained.

2. Where no leases exist on the promulgation of this Regulation, and in all cases where leases elapse, the settlement of the public revenue shall henceforth be made by the officers of Government, either European or native, direct with each individual contributor.

3. In all practicable cases the amount of public revenue to be paid by each contributor for each fusily year shall be settled by the Collector with the contributor, or by his assistant; but where, from the extent of the collectorship, this cannot be done, the settlement of the amount of revenue payable by each contributor shall be made by the native servants of the Collector, under defined and written instructions from the Collector. The settlement, when made in the first instance by the native officers, shall be revised by the Collector, or by the Assistant to the Collector, and be reported for the approval of the Board of Revenue.

4. In all villages where a measurement and classification of the land has been made, and the public revenue demandable from each field under cultivation has been fixed by a competent authority, the collections of the public revenue shall be made according to the rates of assessment so fixed.

5. Where the rates of assessment on a field have been fixed by a public act of a Collector, and those rates have been followed as the rule of demand for more than one year, such rates shall be considered to have been fixed by competent authority.

6. Where the rates of assessment which have been fixed in the manner described in the foregoing section shall, after due investigation, appear in the opinion of the Collector to require being modified, he shall appoint a punchayet of cultivators and native revenue officers to value the land, with reference to the public assessment fixed on land of the same quality in the village where the land in question is situated, or in the adjoining villages. The Collector shall then report, for the final sanction of the Board of Revenue, the reduction of the assessment which has been found to be necessary.

7. Where no measurement, classification, and assessment of land have been completed on punjah lands (commonly called dry grain lands), but the public revenue has nevertheless been paid in money (teerwa), the revenue shall be collected agreeably to the rates heretofore established, till such time as new rates, to be proposed under the measurement, classification, and assessment herein provided for, have been approved and confirmed. Where any dispute may arise respecting the existing rate of teerwa to be demanded, the revenue shall be collected according to the rate that has been most prevalent during the last ten years preceding the dispute. .

8. It being intended that the public revenue, now usually demandable in money, but varying in the rate of the tax according to the nature of the produce, should be changed for a fixed rate of assessment to be levied without reference to the nature of the produce, Collectors shall proceed, under the rules contained in this Regulation, to change the varying rate of assessment for a fixed field assessment.

9. In cases where the public revenue has hitherto been customarily demandable in kind, the public revenue shall be collected according to such custom, and according to the customary rates of division (warum or pauloo), till such time as a certain fair and reasonable equivalent in money shall have been established. Where any dispute may arise respecting the existing rate of division, the rate which has been most prevalent during the ten years last preceding the publication of this Regulation shall be considered the customary rate.

10. It being intended by this Regulation that the public revenue heretofore paid in kind should be commuted for a payment in money, Collectors, under the instructions and rules contained in this Regulation, shall proceed to commute mute the revenue demandable in kind for a certain fair and reasonable equivalent or composition in money.

11. No collection shall be made according to the new rates of money assessment, until such rates of assessment shall have been assented to by the cultivators whom it may concern, or a decision on the justness of the rate has been passed by a competent authority.

12. In cases where a cultivator may not agree to the commutation of the revenue heretofore paid in kind for a money tax, or to the new rate of money tax proposed to be substituted for the existing rate, on the ground of over-assessment, the Collector shall cause a punchayet to be assembled, to be composed of five persons, of whom two shall be chosen by the cultivator who objects to the assessment, and two by the Collector or his officers, and one by the four persons thus chosen. The punchayet shall give their award in writing on the amount of the money tax to be assessed on the land in question. Where a Collector may approve the money assessment proposed by the punchayet, he shall confirm it. Where the Collector may consider the assessment unreasonably low, he is at liberty to decline confirming it, and shall in such cases continue the previously existing rate of warum or teerwa, till further experience has ascertained the true value of the land in question, or the cultivators shall assent to a fair commutation proposed by the Collector.

13. Where disputes may arise respecting the equitableness of the assessment proposed to be fixed on any field in lieu of the varying assessment alluded to in Sections 8 and 9, the Collector shall be guided by the rules of Section 12 in bringing such disputes to a settlement, and shall, where he may suspect fraud or collusion in the punchayets, be at liberty to recur to the customary rates of assessment, till such time as an equitable fixed assessment has been acceded to.

14. In order to prevent the loss by waste, fraud, and embezzlement, which arises when the public revenue is received in kind immediately by the officers of Government, Collectors are permitted, till such time as the commutation of the payment in kind for a payment in money has been made, to ascertain the quantity and quality of the crop of the current year, to value the same in money, and to offer to each cultivator separately, or to all the cultivators of the village collectively, to make over to them the Government revenue in kind, commonly called the Circar share of the produce, for a fixed sum in money. In cases where the cultivators may refuse the terms offered, and the Collector cannot come to a settlement with them for a money payment, he is authorized to rent the collection of the public revenue for the then current fusily by villages, to any person or persons, not being native officers in the pay of Government, or otherwise exceptionable, giving the preference (where all circumstances are the same) to persons residing in or near the village, and reporting all the circumstances of the case for the information of the Board of Revenue. This mode of settlement shall continue only till such time as an assessment in money has been fixed on each field. In all such cases the cultivator's share of the produce shall be delivered over to the cultivators so soon after the crops have been cut as may be practicable.

15. All fees established in grain usually taken from the gross produce, or from the Circar or cultivator's share, shall be paid in such cases immediately upon the crops being reaped or beat out, as the case may be, to the persons entitled to receive them. The collection of the Circar share being all that is to be rented, no delay shall occur in delivering to the cultivators the share they are entitled to of each crop.

16. Collectors shall limit the demand for public revenue to lands actually cultivated, unless the occupier of uncultivated land prefers retaining the land and paying the teerwa on it, to giving it up to another who has offered to cultivate it. Contracts voluntarily entered into to pay revenue for a specific quantity of land at a given rate or amount, may nevertheless be enforced by Collectors.

17. In villages* in which the lands under cultivation are held permanently by the same cultivator, and are not liable by custom to be periodically changed, and

* See the extract of the general letter which follows, dated 16th December 1812, par. 38. "The principle of the proposition that was suggested by Mr. Græme, for confining the leases to "the and in which no valid objection is made by the other cultivators to the measure, it shall be competent to cultivators to demand, and to Collectors to grant a lease of such lands on terms to be mutually agreed on; provided such terms are approved by the Board of Revenue and confirmed by the Governor in Council: and the revenue of the last year of such lease, provided the measure be sanctioned by the Honourable the Court of Directors, shall be the permanent revenue demandable on such land. Waste land shall not, in any case, be included in the leases or permanent tenures allowed to be made by this section. The form of the deed to be issued for such leases shall be submitted to the Board of Revenue for approval, previously to being issued.

Draft Regulation for Ryotwar Settlement.

18. The collection of the public revenue due from lands which have actually been sown, but which have proved wholly or partially unproductive, may be suspended at the discretion of Collectors. Provided, however, that in cases where the assessment, as in Malabar and Canara, is fixed on an entire estate, or a defined extent of land, no such suspension be made by Collectors without the previous sanction of the Board of Revenue.

19. Compulsory measures shall not be used to cause the cultivators to extend their cultivation, and cultivators shall be left at liberty to extend or contract their cultivation annually in the way they may think most to their advantage. A cultivator shall not, however, be permitted to throw up any one of his dry grain fields, which may be so surrounded by his other fields that it cannot be got at without passing over the fields in his occupation, and which consequently no one else will take; unless such cultivator shall consent to allow, without any remission, a road of twelve feet broad through his other fields to such fields without claiming any remission.

20. Where disputes may arise regarding the occupancy of land, and the cultivators cannot come to any agreement amongst themselves, before the season of cultivation, on the subject in dispute, the Collector, or the Tehsildars under him, shall decide on a summary inquiry who shall have the right of occupancy for the then current fusily year, and give his decision with the reasons for it in writing. If the parties be dissatisfied with such summary investigation, they shall be at liberty to institute a regular suit, to try the right in the court competent to try the suit. The land in dispute shall, for the current year, be cultivated by the person in whose favour the written decision by the revenue officers shall have been made, but such decision shall not give any title to permanent possession of the land.

21. Persons who are desirous of cultivating unoccupied lands may take them at any period during the year, but persons who may intend to throw up lands shall signify such intention within the period to be fixed by each Collector for the surrender of lands in the actual occupation of any cultivator. All lands retained after proclamation so made will be liable to be assessed with public revenue.

22. Where the lands so thrown up in any one year are lands held under meerassy tenure, the previous occupant or occupants of them shall be at liberty to reclaim them in the ensuing year, on agreeing to cultivate them, and to pay the public revenue due thereon. The temporary occupant shall be considered a Pyacarry only.

23. The assessment to be fixed on fields under this Regulation shall not hereafter be raised, in cases where the productive powers of the land shall have been increased by improvements made by the Ryots at their own expense, in digging wells, repairing tanks, &c.

 24. In

" the lands that have been considered and are classed under the head of lands in cultivation, might, " we conceive, if it had been adopted, have had a beneficial effect upon the minds of the Ryots; " and wherever they were in circumstances that would have rendered them responsible tenants for a " rent equal or nearly equal in amount to that which their lands had paid, we should have approved " of your granting long leases, and would have confirmed them in perpetuity to such Ryot " individually, because we are of opinion that the effect of such separate settlements would be not " only to stimulate the industry of those who should be thus permanently established in their pro- " perty, and enable them gradually to apply for portions of the waste lands upon the terms at " which it has been customary to allot such lands, convertible into a perpetuity at a reasonable " assessment, but because the example thus held out of the benefits derived from exertion could " not fail, in the course of time, to have a general influence upon the other occupants of land."

Draft Regulation for Ryotwar Settlement.

24. In cases where no person offers to take a field to cultivate during the season of cultivation, cultivators shall be at liberty to apply to occupy fields so relinquished for pasture, on agreeing to pay, where a pasture tax is usually levied, the pasture tax customarily assessed on fields preserved for grazing.*

25. Collectors, under the authority of the Board of Revenue, may issue cowles for the encouragement of the cultivation of waste lands, for the digging of wells, for the construction of tanks, for the irrigation of land, for the cultivation of indigo, sugar, cane, cotton, or of any exotics, and for the breeding of cattle and sheep for sale.

26. The terms upon which it is proposed to grant cowles for the purposes above described, shall be submitted by the Collector for the approval of the Board of Revenue, and confirmation of the Governor in Council.

27. Upon a cultivator occupying waste land for cultivation he shall be entitled to receive a pottah under the signature of the Collector, specifying the period for which he is to hold the land on cowle and the public revenue he is to pay thereon.

28. When land may be held on cowle for a term of years, the rate of assessment of the last year of the cowle shall be considered as the future fixed rate of assessment, except in the following cases.

1st. When a person may excavate or sink a well and make a new garden, he shall, at the expiration of the term of the cowle, enjoy one-third of the land or produce free from tax; that is to say, he shall only pay two-thirds of the full revenue which such land would otherwise be liable to pay.

2dly. When a person may construct a new tank for the irrigation of lands, he shall receive from the Governor in Council, as a testimony of their approbation and an encouragement to others to follow his example, a grant of the public revenue of .... of the land newly brought into cultivation; that is to say, he shall pay only .... of the full revenue of the land watered from such tank.

29. The cultivators shall be entitled to, and may demand from the Curnums of the villages, a cultivation chit for each field, at the time of occupancy, shewing the public tax on each field; and when it may be proved to the satisfaction of the Collector that any Curnum has refused to give such chit, the Collector shall have authority to levy a fine from him not exceeding .... rupees. The form of the chit shall be approved by the Collector, in the first instance, and be submitted for the confirmation of the Board of Revenue.

30. When the settlement of the amount due from each contributor shall have been concluded, pottahs under the seal and signature of the Collector, in a form to be approved by the Board of Revenue, shall be granted to each contributor, specifying the names and extent of the fields cultivated by them, and the amount of the public revenue they are to pay.

31. Receipts shall be granted to all contributors of public revenue for their payments on the public account, through all the gradations of collection, viz. 1st, by the persons employed by authority or custom to collect the revenue of the village from each contributor, whether such collector of the public revenue be a public officer, head inhabitant, or Curnum; 2dly, by the Tehsildars to the village officers; and 3dly, by the Collector to the Tehsildars.

32. When a payment on account of public revenue shall have been made by a cultivator or other contributor to an inferior agent, such agent shall grant a receipt for the amount; and upon forwarding such receipt to the talook cutcherry, the cultivator shall receive in exchange for it a receipt under the signature of the Tehsildar.

33. The receipts shall specify the date of payment and the kist for which paid. A form of receipt shall be lodged by Collectors with each Tehsildar and each inferior agent, so soon as all demands have been liquidated for each fusily year. A general receipt shall be granted by the Tehsildar to each cultivator, who who has paid all demands in full; a form for this receipt shall be furnished by the Collector.

* This applies chiefly to the dry grain province of Coimbatore.

34. Tehsildars shall compare the receipts granted by the inferior village agents with the payments made to him on account of the village, and shall report to the Collector where any excess of collection shall appear to have been made by such inferior agents.

35. Curnums shall be bound, on the application of any cultivator or contributor of public revenue, to furnish him with a copy of the demand, collection, and balance account of such individual, and also to allow him to read, or to read to him, the accounts of village charges. Where Curnums shall be proved, on complaint to Collectors, to have neglected or refused to comply with the rules herein laid down, such Curnums shall be fined in a sum not exceeding .... rupees for the first offence, and in a sum not exceeding .... for the second offence.

36. When it may be proved to the satisfaction of the Collector that Tehsildars, the revenue officers under him, head inhabitants or Curnums, have neglected or refused to grant the receipts specified in Section .... of this Regulation, the Collectors shall have authority to levy a fine not exceeding .... rupees from the ...., and not exceeding .... rupees from the ...., for each case of neglect or refusal.

37. Where disputes may arise between the cultivators and the Collector, regarding the amount of the assessment in money or share of the produce justly demandable from such cultivators, under the assessment authorized to be made as public revenue by this regulation, the Collector, where he considers the demand just, shall make, or cause his Tehsildar or other authorized agent to make, the demand in writing.

38. Cultivators, on receiving such written demand, shall be bound to pay the money in the first instance. Cultivators having paid the demand so made, shall be at liberty to institute a suit in the zillah court, for the recovery of whatever sum he may consider to have been unlawfully collected from him by the Collector, or by any person employed by him.

39. If the demand of the Collector shall prove to have been incorrect or not justly due, damages shall be awarded to the cultivator, in a sum not exceeding double the amount of the excess of revenue levied in addition to the repayment of the over-collection, with interest at twelve per cent. per annum.

40. All suits instituted by cultivators for the recovery of excess of revenue levied by Collectors, or under their authority, shall be heard and decided by the Judge as summary suits, and in preference to all other suits, with the least practicable delay.

41. Where cultivators or other contributors of the public revenue shall fail to pay the public revenue, the Collector shall have the power of keeping such defaulters under personal restraint for a period not exceeding two months, either by placing Peons over them, or by confining them in the talook or huzzoor cutcherry, or in any other suitable building.

42. If at the expiration of two months defaulters shall refuse to come to any arrangement for the liquidation of the public revenue due by them, the Collector shall either proceed to the attachment of their personal property, or in cases where he may consider it necessary, the Collector shall send the defaulter to the civil jail of the zillah, with a precept to the Government Vakeel to make a motion to the Judge, in or out of court, for the confinement of the defaulter. The Judge, whether in or out of court, shall pass an order and cause the defaulter to be confined, without going into any previous inquiry as to the justness of the debt for which he is confined. On the defaulter so confined paying the demand against him, or giving security to the Judge or Collector for the due discharge thereof within fifteen days, he shall be forthwith released.

43. Where defaulters and their sureties may fail to discharge the demand against them within the time limited in the security bonds, the Judge, on the motion of the Collector, made in or out of court through the Government Vakeel,

Draft Regulation for Ryotwar Settlement.

Vakeel, shall commit the defaulter and the security or securities to prison, to be dealt with as the law directs.

44. Collectors, previously to attaching personal property, shall allow such reasonable time as may appear to them to be proper for the discharge of the public revenue which may be due, and if the defaulters should still persist in refusing to come to any adjustment, the Collector shall notify the intended sale of the property at thirty days from the date of such notification.

45. The sale of property under attachment shall be made by Commissioners to be appointed by the Collector, by a written instrument. Such Commissioners shall be liable to prosecution before the Judge or Magistrate, as the case may be, for all breaches of the law of distraint.

46. The ploughs and implements of husbandry and trade, the cattle trained to the plough, and the seed-grain of the cultivators, shall not be distrained for arrears of revenue, so long as any other property shall be forthcoming. Where balances may arise from the insolvency or absence of the inhabitants of a village, no additional assessment shall be levied from the other inhabitants of the same or any other village to make good such balances, unless in cases where the inhabitants collectively have entered into any agreement for the rent of the public revenue.

47. The provisions of Section 41 to 46 inclusive of this Regulation shall be applicable to persons liable to pay personal or professional taxes, or taxes on income, commonly called ready money taxes, paid by persons not cultivators, and the taxes demandable on account of Government from such persons shall be collected from such persons under the provisions of these sections.

48. In all cases not provided for by this Regulation, the public revenue shall henceforth be collected from cultivators individually, or cultivators collectively renting their villages, according to the rules of Regulation XXVIII, A. D. 1802; and Regulation XXVII, A. D. 1802, shall henceforth be considered applicable only to intermediate renters, permanent or temporary Zemindars, Shotriumdars, Jaghiredars, and Enamdars.

49. Where a cultivator or other contributor shall complain to Collectors of unauthorized and illegal exactions having been made from him by the Tehsildars, their authorized agents, heads of villages, village servants, or any other person, and where it may be proved to the satisfaction of the Collector that such exactions have been made, the Collector shall cause the amount to be immediately refunded and paid to the complainant, and shall levy a fine on the offender, not exceeding four times the amount of such unauthorized exaction. If such offender be a public servant on the establishment of the Collector, he shall, in addition to the fine, be liable to dismission, and be declared, at the discretion of the Governor in Council, incapable of again serving the Company. A copy of this clause shall be delivered to all public servants, and an acknowledgment of its having been received be taken.

50. In order to prevent litigious suits, and to secure public servants from continual accusations, complaints of exactions must be made to Collectors within .... months after the expiration of the fusily year in which such exactions were levied; if not made within that period, the parties aggrieved shall be referred by the Collector to the zillah or other court competent to afford redress.

51. Where exactions are proved to the satisfaction of the Collector, the demand for the refund of such sums as have been proved shall be made by a writing under the signature of the Collector, and the amount shall be collected in the same manner as an arrear of revenue, whether such refunds be due from public officers, head inhabitants, Curnums, or any other description of persons.

52. Where persons called upon to pay such refunds may consider themselves aggrieved by the demand, they shall be at liberty to institute a suit against the person or persons by whom they may consider themselves aggrieved, in the civil courts, within thirty days, on first paying the demand, or on giving good and sufficient security for the payment thereof.

53. As

53. As it will not be possible for the Board of Revenue to examine and report to Government on the proceedings of Collectors for the realization of the public revenue under annual settlements, unless Collectors report their proceedings in due time, Collectors who have annual settlements to make with the cultivators, shall transmit their report on such settlements to the Board of Revenue on or before the ...., on pain of incurring the displeasure of the Governor in Council. Draft Regulation for Ryotwar Settlement.

54. All fines authorized to be levied under this Regulation shall be levied in the mode and manner prescribed for the collection of an arrear of revenue, under Regulation XXVIII, A. D. 1802.

55. The powers given to Collectors in this Regulation shall extend to Assistant Collectors, whenever Collectors may consider it expedient to delegate their authority to Assistants, and all acts done by Assistants to Collectors, or native officers under the orders of a Collector, or under these rules, shall be held to be acts of the Collector.

56. Where Collectors are required to measure, class, and assess a money revenue on land from which a revenue was formerly demandable in kind, or to fix a money revenue on land from which a revenue in money was demandable, fluctuating with the variations in the produce, they shall be guided by the following rules.*

ORDERED, in consequence, that the following letter be dispatched to Colonel Munro, First Commissioner:

To Colonel Munro, First Commissioner.

SIR:

Before passing any resolutions on the accompanying communications from the Board of Revenue, on the subject of introducing the ryotwar mode of revenue settlement wherever practicable, the Right Honourable the Governor in Council is desirous of availing himself of the benefit to be derived from your intimate acquaintance with that subject; I am therefore directed to transmit to you, for such observations thereupon as you may think fit to offer, the communication above referred to, with its several enclosures. Letter to Colonel Munro, 24 June 1817.

EXTRACT FORT ST. GEORGE REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,
The 16th December 1817.

READ the following letter:

To the Chief Secretary to the Government of Fort St. George.

SIR:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th June, transmitting a letter from the Board of Revenue and the enclosures to which it refers. These papers not having reached me until the 8th ultimo, the day on which I left Bangalore for Madras, and my subsequent journey to this place, are the causes for my not having answered your letter at an earlier period. Letter from Colonel Munro, 22 Aug. 1817.

2. I have read over with attention the outline of the proposed draft of a Regulation for ryotwar settlement, and the documents which accompanied it. As the rules submitted by the Board of Revenue are, with very few exceptions,

* These are the rules to Surveyors and Assessors, issued by Colonel Munro in the Ceded Districts, which have already been circulated to the Collectors.

Letter from Colonel Munro, 22 Aug. 1817.

tions, such as seem well calculated for the attainment of the object in view, I have confined my remarks in the accompanying paper to those which appeared to require modification.

3. I have not suggested any alteration in the instructions to Surveyors, &c. because those instructions were founded upon extensive experience, when every thing connected with them came daily under my notice, and when, from such constant practice, I was better qualified to judge of their fitness than I can possibly be at this distant period. As the Ceded Districts contain within their limits every variety of soil and tenure that is to be found in the territories under the Madras Government, and as the rules for surveying and assessing the lands were found adapted to every situation in the Ceded Districts, there can be no reason why they should not be equally applicable to the same purposes in all the other districts. Though I believe this to be the case, I am persuaded that they may gradually derive from experience many improvements, equally suited to all districts, and it would therefore, I think, be better to circulate them in the shape of Instructions than in that of a Regulation.

4. The Board of Revenue, in their letter, state that "in Bellary a de-"cennial lease settlement prevails, which will expire with fusily 1231; but "the Collector has been authorized to resume the leases of such as may be "inclined to surrender them, and in that event to revert to the ryotwarry mode "of settlement." When I was at Hurrikar, on the borders of the Ceded Districts, I was informed that the chief cause of many of the leases not being given up, was the inability of the leaseholders to comply with the condition required, of previously discharging their arrears. If the whole, or the greater part of them, could be induced to relinquish their leases by the remission of their arrears, the measure ought undoubtedly to be immediately adopted, as it would be highly beneficial both to the inhabitants and to the future revenue of the country. Were it intended to carry on a system of leases, the proposed measure would be extremely injurious, because it would encourage the lease-holders to withhold their balances, in the hope of a remission; but as a ryotwar settlement is to be introduced, this objection will be done away, because the danger of the remission being converted into a precedent will no longer exist. It would, therefore, be useless to suspend the cancelling of the leases, in the expectation of collecting the balances. These balances never can be realized: they will go on accumulating, and the longer the vain attempt to collect them is persisted in, the more exhausted will the resources of the country become.

5. If the leases are cancelled, the next step ought to be to reduce the rate of assessment, as proposed in my report to the Board of Revenue in 1807. Without this reduction no lasting or extensive improvement can take place. The inhabitants in ordinary years will barely be able to pay their rents, and in bad ones will require considerable remissions. Some of the finest districts in the Ceded Countries, such as Bellary, Gooty, and Adoni, have been in the worst state ever since 1792, and they can never receive the improvement of which they are so susceptible until an abatement takes place in their assessment. No time can be so proper for this alteration as the present, when most of the principal native servants employed in the survey are still in the service, and when they are under the direction of a Collector, who has had the advantage of long experience in the districts If it be deferred, the old native servants will gradually disappear from age and other causes, and a new set, under a new Collector, will not be competent to the proper execution of the task.

6. A temporary loss of revenue will be the necessary consequence of the proposed plan; but if the reduction be gradually made, by introducing it into a certain number of districts yearly, those districts in which it is first begun will have so much improved before it is carried into effect in the whole, that the loss of revenue will probably never, in any one year, amount to one-half of the whole sum remitted in the assessment; and this temporary loss would soon be compensated by the revenue rising to its former level, and continuing to advance progressively under a lighter taxation and a greater encouragement to agriculture.

I have the honour to be, &c.

First Commissioner.

Remarks on the Outline of the Ryotwar Regulation, and the Papers accompanying it.

Col. Munro's Remarks on the Ryotwar Regulation.

6.* The way in which it is here proposed to modify the assessment appears to be very proper; but as, in modifying the assessment, there may sometimes be an increase as well as a reduction, the concluding lines of the section should run thus: "The Collector shall then report, for the final sanction of the "Board of Revenue, the reduction (or increase) of the assessment, &c."

14. Where it becomes necessary, as supposed in this section, to rent the Circar share of the produce of a village to any person or persons not being public officers, the head of the village should not be excluded as a public officer. The main objection to him as a renter is, that he will instigate the other inhabitants to reject the commutations of their rent in kind for one in money. This will, no doubt, sometimes happen; but if he gain by a money rent of the whole village, the other Ryots will soon discover that they will gain also by a money rent of their several shares, and be the more easily induced to agree to it. The head of a village is often deterred from agreeing to a money rent by the fear of loss: this fear can only be removed by finding, from experience, that instead of loss there is gain. It is of great importance in establishing money rents, that the prejudice against them of any one principal inhabitant, and still more of the head of the village, should be overcome, because all the difficulty lies in the first beginning; and when it is once made, the example is soon followed by all the rest of the Ryots. The head of the village should, therefore, be encouraged to rent it, in preference to any inhabitant of a neighbouring, or to any inhabitant of the same villages, who is not a cultivator.

17. If a field assessment has taken place on the lands proposed to be leased, no particular lease is necessary, because it is understood that when a field assessment has been approved by Government it is permanent, and that every occupant of such land is at liberty to hold what he has as long as he pleases, without any increase of assessment, and that he is also at liberty, at the end of any year, to throw up whatever land he finds himself unable to cultivate. The lease should be on the principle laid down in Section 19 by the Board of Revenue, with respect to keeping or throwing up land. This is the most advantageous lease to Ryots, and the only one that ought to be granted to them. It leaves them perfectly free: it is permanent as long as they please, or they may throw up in any year any part of their land which they may find it inconvenient to retain. Every lease to Ryots which binds them to pay a specific rent for a term of years, without permitting them to throw up any part of their lands when they meet with losses, will often be productive of great oppression, and of their total ruin without answering any purpose.

If the lease is to be granted where there is no field assessment, it should not bind the Ryot longer than he finds it convenient to hold the land, and it should terminate when the field assessment takes place, unless he agrees to that assessment.

18. It will be advisable to continue to the Collectors of Malabar and Canara, as in other districts, the discretionary authority of suspending the collections, in certain cases, "from lands which have proved wholly or partially unpro-"ductive." Properties are often so small in those two provinces, and the proprietors so poor, that the rigid exaction of the rent, in every case, would occasion great distress; it would, therefore, be safer to leave the power with the Collector. The general controul of the Board of Revenue would easily enable them to check any improper use of it.

28. Persons building tanks at their own expense should pay only from one-half to two-thirds of the full rent of the extra land brought into cultivation by means of such tanks; or they might be permitted to enjoy from one-third to one-half of such land rent-free. The passion for building tanks is so great among Hindoos, that they are often satisfied with one-fourth, or even one-fifth of the land watered by it; but the consequence generally is, that their successors are unable to keep up the necessary repairs from such slender means, and that the work goes to ruin. Substantial Ryots often engage in tank building, miscalculate the expense, sink their whole property, and leave the work work unfinished. New tanks are not so much required as the repair of old ones, for in most tank districts there are already as many, or more than are adequate to the wants of the present population. What is proposed in this section appears to be at variance with the principle laid down in Section 23, 'that the assessment, when fixed, shall not be raised when land is improved by wells, tanks, &c. at the expense of the Ryot. There can be no doubt but that the adoption of the principle would, in all districts, be favourable to the Ryots, and to the ultimate increase of the revenue; but in some districts, in which numbers of new wells and tanks might be dug to advantage, it might for many years reduce the present amount of revenue, by gradually withdrawing the cultivators from the old high-rated to the new low-rated lands. There are, however, but few districts in which this effect would be much felt, and the principle might, perhaps, without any danger, be extended to all. Should it, however, be thought unsafe to introduce it generally without longer experience, the terms which it has already been proposed to allow for improvements by tanks, wells, &c. might be adopted to advantage.

* These numbers correspond with the Draft Regulation, page 872.

Col. Munro's Remarks on the Ryotwar Regulation.

30. All pottahs should have the seal of the Collector; but as they amount in different districts, to from twenty to one hundred thousand, he cannot possibly put his signature to them unless where the district is small.

32. The receipt of the village servant to the Ryot is sufficient. There are often five or six thousand Ryots in a tehsildarry who pay their revenue in six or eight kists. Were the Tehsildar to give a receipt to each Ryot for each kist, it would require thirty or forty thousand receipts, and would occasion a vast deal of labour and a great hindrance of other business without any benefit.

33. The general receipts to each cultivator at the close of the year, after the payment of all demands, proposed to be given by the Tehsildar, should be given by the Curnum or head of the village. The Tehsildar receipts should only be given to the village officer for the collections from the village. To require him to give receipts for the kists of individual Ryots would, in practice, be attended with a great deal of confusion, and would, even if practicable, be detrimental to the public service, by occupying so much of his time as not to leave him enough to give to more important points of his duty.

46. Even in villages where " the inhabitants collectively have entered into " any agreement for the rent of the public revenue," Government ought to reserve the power of making up, to a limited extent, the loss arising from individual failures, by an extra assessment on the village.

The practice is general under all native governments, where rents are paid in money. It is the best security against demands for remission on false pleas of losses or poverty, because the Ryots who are to pay will not suffer such pretences to screen any person who can pay his balance. The extra assessment might be limited, so as not, in any case, to exceed ten per cent. of the rent of each Ryot on whom it is levied. The Collector might be prohibited from levying it without the previous sanction of the Board of Revenue. In districts where the assessment is high, the extra demand should rarely be made; but where the assessment is moderate, and more particularly if it has been lowered under the Company's Government, in order to ease the Ryot and facilitate the collection of the revenue, the extra demand might be resorted to with more freedom, because it could only be considered as a casual payment from the portion of rent which had been remitted from the former standard.

49. This section, in order to answer its intention, should extend not only to cases " where a cultivator or other contributor shall complain to Collectors " of unauthorized and illegal exactions," but to cases when, without any complaint having been preferred, the Collector discovers that such exactions have been made. Not one Ryot in a hundred ever complains of exactions. The Collector would know very little of them were he to make no inquiry without a previous complaint. The Ryot seldom complains, unless he is encouraged by the head of the village to come forward; but as the head of the village is usually himself a party in the exactions, it is not likely that he will endeavour to bring them to light. Even where he has no concern in them, he is commonly prevented, by his fear of the superior revenue servants, from giving any information.

Col. Munro's Remarks on the Ryotwar Regulation.

50. The provisions of this section, if acted upon, would destroy all the benefit of those of the preceding one. A Ryot will hardly ever carry a complaint of exaction to the zillah court; and if the Collector be debarred from taking notice of it, unless preferred within a certain number of months after the expiration of the fusily year, "in order to prevent litigious suits, and to "secure public servants from continual accusations," the effect of such a rule would be to encourage exaction and embezzlement, for it would, in fact, hold out indemnity to every revenue servant who had made exactions, if he could only prevent their being complained of for a few months after the end of the year.

They are seldom discovered until the year following that in which they are levied, when the Collector is making his circuit; but if he is not vigilant, they may remain unknown for several years. There ought, therefore, to be no limitation as to the time of his taking cognizance of them. There will be litigious complaints, but they will be few compared to the number of cases of real grievance, and they can occasion no inconvenience, which ought to be remedied at the expense of preventing, in any degree, the redress of so great an evil as illegal exaction.

53 The period within which Collectors may finish their settlements, where they are made annually, must vary according to a variety of circumstances. The settlements will require the longest time where the district is extensive and the crops late; but there is no district in which he may not finish them by the beginning, or at farthest the middle of April: and if a month be allowed to return to his cutcherry and prepare his accounts, his report on his settlement may always be transmitted by the 1st, or at the latest the 15th of May; but there are many districts in which it may be transmitted at least a month earlier. Collectors should be required to finish not only their settlements, but also their collections, within a limited period. Under a ryotwar settlement, whatever cannot be collected within the fusily year, or within one month after its close, ought to be remitted. If the Ryot can pay, the whole of his rent can always be collected within that period; if he cannot pay, the demand ought to be relinquished; for whatever he might pay at a later date would not be the balance of the last year, but an anticipation of the rent of the current one. By the adoption of this limitation some fraudulent Ryots might possibly withhold balances which they had the means of discharging; but the number would be few, and the loss of revenue trifling, and of no account when weighed against the evils which arise from following the demand of balances from year to year. The practice of collecting balances in succeeding years is the source of great oppression to the Ryots and great fraud on the revenue. It introduces a loose mode of management, renders the revenue servants negligent in collecting at the proper times, facilitates frauds, by letting balances mix and accumulate to such an extent that it becomes impossible to investigate the real cause of them, and it harrasses and ruins many Ryots, by subjecting them, at distant periods, to demands for balances which they are unable to discharge. Any rule which may be adopted for prohibiting the collection of balances after a certain period should not make part of a Regulation, but should be inserted in the instructions to Collectors, and be liable to suspension by the Board of Revenue in cases where fraud was evident.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE,

Dated the 2d October 1819.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 2 Oct. 1819.

Par. 192. The minute of the Board of Revenue, bearing date the 5th of January 1818, on the subject of the course of proceeding proper to be adopted under your orders respecting the general introduction of the ryotwar mode of settlement, will have been already brought to the notice of your Honourable

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 2 Oct. 1819,

Court by the letter from our Secretary to your late Secretary Mr. Cobb, dated the 19th of the following March.

193. Our attention was afterwards drawn to that paper by a communication from the Board of Revenue, under date the 21st of September, and having taken the subject into consideration at our Consultation of the 29th of December, we then caused our sentiments and instructions regarding it to be conveyed to the Board.

194. We intimated to them our high approbation of the object of their minute, as stated in the fifth paragraph of it, in these words, viz. "In order "to prevent any misunderstanding on the part of the subordinate local officers, "in carrying the orders from England into effect, it will be necessary to illus- "trate the general principles of the modified ryotwar system, as prescribed by "the Honourable Court of Directors, and to explain, for the information of "the several Collectors, the chief points in which it differs from the settlements "at present in force in their respective districts." For this purpose we observed, they had gone into an examination of the relative rights of all parties having any interest in the soil, and of the various settlements of land revenue which had formerly prevailed. We placed full confidence in the intentions with which that examination had been conducted, and deemed it a valuable accession to the revenue information on our records. While, however, we expressed a hope that, by a just estimate of the rights of all the parties concerned in fixing the land revenue, and by a candid review of former systems, the discordant opinions entertained on this important subject might be at length reconciled, and the new system in progress be founded on principles which experience had approved, and which justice sanctioned, we deemed it proper to advert to the necessity, in order to its answering these ends, that the review should be free from all bias either for or against any particular mode of settlement, and should exhibit the principles which operated, and the results they produced, rather than justify or condemn them.

195. We observed, that the remarks upon the zemindarry settlement (from paragraph 127 to paragraph 135 both inclusive) were not confined to an exposition of its principles and of its success or failure, but assumed more of the character of a justification from certain charges supposed to be brought against it, than was consistent with the professed object of the minute; and that, in the same manner, the minute (from paragraph 266 to paragragh 277, and from 286 to 291) was occupied with severe strictures on the ryotwar system, and warm encomiums on the plan of a village lease settlement. As the whole object of the minute was to obtain a concurrence of opinion and of exertion in carrying the new ryotwarry settlement into effect, it seemed to us ill judged to start topics, or to employ expressions, by which that object was likely to be defeated.

196. We observed, that the same remarks applied to what was stated in paragraph 306, with regard to Colonel Munro's renewed proposal of an extra assessment of ten per cent., to make up deficiencies in the ryotwarry settlement. The language used was that not merely of dissent, but of reprobation; whereas it was at variance with the professed object of the minute, to signify more than a rejection of the proposed measure, or to use harsh terms in rejecting it.

197. In the last paragraph the Board intimated an intention of deputing one of their members to superintend the execution of the settlement; and as that measure had not obtained the sanction of the Government, without which it could not be carried into effect, the intimation appeared to us to be at least premature.

198. These observations we caused to be communicated to the Board of Revenue, and directed that the paragraphs from 127 to 135, from 266 to 277, and from 286 to 291, with paragraph 306 and paragraph 308, should be struck out of the minute, before it was circulated for the information of the Collectors.

199. We at the same time authorized the Board to circulate certain other papers relating to the same subject, which were submitted to us with their Secretary's letter of the 21st September, directing them, however, to make such alterations alterations in the instructions which they proposed to issue to the Collectors, as might be requisite to render them consistent with our views and orders now communicated to them.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 2 Oct. 1819.

200. With reference to the 77th paragraph of our letter of the 31st January 1818, we think it proper to acquaint your Honourable Court that we were disappointed in our expectation of receiving the benefit of Colonel Munro's observations on the communication from the Board of Revenue, respecting the ryotwar mode of settlement, which is there referred to. At the time our desire was intimated to Colonel Munro, his active employment on military service in the southern Mahratta country prevented him, as he informed us,* from being able to give the requisite consideration to the subject; and the short period which he remained in India, after his return from the field, did not afford to him the opportunity of devoting to it the uninterrupted leisure which he stated that it would require.

MINUTE of the BOARD of REVENUE,
The 5th of January 1818.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

Par. 1. The Board proceed to take into consideration the voluminous correspondence noted in the margin,† connected with the important orders from England, directing the abandonment of the existing system of revenue administration, and the introduction of the ryotwar mode of settlement and collection, in all practicable cases, throughout the provinces subject to the Government of Fort St. George.

2. From the time that the East-India Company first acquired the sovereignty of these territories, the land revenue has continued to constitute the chief branch of the public resources; and from its paramount financial importance, as well as from its intimate connexion with the interests of the great agricultural body of the people, discussions respecting the preferable mode of managing this revenue have occupied a considerable share of attention, not only on the part of every successive Indian Government and their subordinate Boards, but of the controlling authorities, and occasionally even of the Legislature at home.

3. In consequence of the fluctuating nature of our administration, however, both at home and abroad, a preference has been given at different periods to different revenue systems. The zemindarry settlement, the settlement on lease to intermediate renters, the village settlement on lease with the inhabitants, and the ryotwar settlement, have each had their advocates both in India and England; each in its turn has been adopted, established, and abandoned; and each therefore may now be found partially to obtain in some of the districts under this presidency.‡

4. That this instability in our system of revenue management has long been, and still continues to be, an evil of great magnitude, appears to be universally acknowledged; and the object of the Honourable Court of Directors in directing the introduction of the new mode of settlement, prescribed in their late revenue dispatches, seems to be the final adoption of a fixed and permanent arrangement

* 7th January 1818.

† From the Chief Secretary to Government, under date the 11th September 1812; to the Government, under date the 28th January 1813; from the Chief Secretary to Government, under date the 8th June 1813; to the Government, under date the 10th June and 16th August 1813; to the Chief Secretary to Government, under date the 30th August 1813; From the Secretary to Government in the Revenue Department, under date the 3d September 1813, 1st July 1814, 29th March 1815, and 20th October 1815.

‡ The zemindarry settlement prevails in Ganjam, Vizagapatam, Rajahmundry, Masulipatam, Guntoor, Salem, Chingleput, the Cuddalore District, and the western, southern, and Chittoor pollams. The ryotwar in Malabar, Canara, Coimbatore, Madura, and Dindigul. The village lease in the Ceded Districts, Nellore, the two divisions of Arcot, Palnaud, Trichinopoly, Tinnevelly, and Tanjore. Single villages are sometimes even now rented out to individuals not connected with the villages; but whole talooks have not been so rented for a long time, except the talooks granted in rent to Major Evans, which have since been resumed by Government.

arrangement respecting their land revenue, by the establishment, in all practicable cases, of the ryotwar settlement, selected after much discussion and investigation in England, as the least objectionable and most profitable of the different systems that have hitherto prevailed, and modified so as to conform to the general principles of justice prescribed by the British Legislature for the government of India.

5. In order to prevent any misunderstanding on the part of the subordinate local officers in carrying the orders from England into effect, it will be necessary to illustrate the general principles of the modified ryotwar system, as prescribed by the Honourable Court of Directors, and to explain, for the information of the several Collectors, the chief points in which it differs from the settlements at present in force in their respective districts.

6. For the better understanding of this important subject, the Board find it necessary, in the first instance, to advert to the subject of private property in the land; more especially as, entering on a system of revenue administration novel to many of the local revenue officers, it is particularly necessary to caution them against any infraction of individual rights, which the Board observe that it is the particular desire of the Honourable Court of Directors to uphold, but which can never be efficiently protected, so long as they continue imperfectly understood.

7. In the territories subject to this Government, the persons whose rights are more or less immediately connected with the soil, and consequently with the land revenue, may be divided into three distinct classes: the actual labourer, the Ryot, or cultivating inhabitant, and the Zemindar; but the rights of the two former of these classes are found to vary with the different nations to which they belong.

8. It may be useful here to explain, that most Ryots employ labourers to aid them in the tillage of the land they occupy; but in some districts (districts abounding in dry grain land particularly) labourers occasionally become proprietors of a plough: in other words, there is a class of poor Ryots who plough in the season of cultivation and follow other pursuits for a livelihood when it is over. In some instances Zemindars, renters of a talook or village, and Shotriumdars who are permanent renters of a village, have ploughs of their own, worked by their own labourers and bullocks. This is not, however, a general practice, nor a practice in any case carried to a great extent. All intermediate agents between the Ryot and the Government, whether permanent or temporary, receive the public revenue demandable from the land cultivated by the Ryots; but with the exceptions specified, and a few others, they seldom engage in cultivation.

9. The provinces now subject to this Government appear originally to have constituted several distinct Hindoo states, which are still to be traced by the difference of language, manners, and customs, that so strongly distinguish the inhabitants of one part of the country from the other. The five northern circars of Ganjam, Vizagapatam, Rajahmundry, Masulipatam, and Guntoor, together with the districts of Bellary, Cuddapah, Palnaud, and Nellore, or wherever the Telinga is the language of the people, may be considered one of these; the second may be said to include the district of Chingleput, the two divisions of the Arcot Soobah, Salem,* Baramahl, Coimbatore, Madura, Dindigul, Trichinopoly, Tanjore, and Tinnevelly, or wherever the Tamil language is spoken; and the third comprises the provinces of Malabar and Canara, on the other coast of the Peninsula, where the Malayalam and Toolavoo are the vernacular dialects of the country.

The Rights of the Labourer.

10. In all of these districts, the labourer, who holds the plough and performs the inferior offices of husbandry, is of the lowest, poorest, most ignorant, yet most numerous order in society; in general an outcast, or at least often of the

* In some detached parts of Salem, Baramahl, Coimbatore, and Bellary, the Canarese is spoken. This arises from these districts comprehending part of the borders of the ancient kingdom of Carnataca, but the small extent of our territory in which that language is spoken renders it unnecessary to class it separately from the rest.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

the degraded class of Hindoos, and therefore usually resident in the outskirts of his village, every where without any property in the land which he can transfer by gift, sale, or bequest, and receiving from his employer, the Ryot, little more than food, with a scanty supply of raiment.

11. It is almost superfluous to remark, that with this description of persons the Government officers have seldom had any direct communication: yet this may possibly be the cause that their situation has not yet received that consideration which it appears to merit; for it is not, perhaps, sufficiently known, that throughout the Tamil country, as well as in Malabar and Canara, far the greater part * of the labouring classes of the people have, from time immemorial, been in a state of acknowledged bondage, in which they continue to the present time.

12. In Malabar and Canara, where the land is very generally divided and occupied as separate and distinct properties, the labourer is the personal slave of the proprietor, and is sold and mortgaged by him, independently of his lands.† In the Tamil country, where land is of less value ‡ and belongs more frequently to a community than to an individual, the labourer is understood to be the slave rather of the soil than of its owner, and is seldom sold or mortgaged, except along with the land to which he is attached: but in Telingana, where it is difficult now to trace the remains of private property in the land, this class of people is considered free. §

13. It is certainly a curious circumstance, that in those provinces where the severe and arbitrary system of the Mussulman government was established at the most early and for the longest period, where consequently the public assessment on the land is the most high, and private property in the soil the most rare and least valuable, the labourer should also be the most free; while his condition is the most abject in those countries where the ancient institutions of the Hindoos have been the least disturbed, where the public demand on the soil is the most light, and private property in the land is universal and of the highest value. It seems probable, however, that in former times slavery may have been as prevalent in the northern, as it now is in the southern and western provinces; and the same circumstances that reduced the landlord of Telingana to the situation of a landholder, may have tended gradually to weaken the power he possessed over his slaves, until they finally became altogether emancipated from his authority.

14. There cannot, however, be a doubt, that the slavery prevalent among the lower classes of Hindoos is of a very different and opposite nature from that so strongly and justly reprobated in England, in as much as foreign traffic or external commerce in slaves is quite different from domestic slavery. It has been stated by very competent authority, Mr. F. W. Ellis, the Collector of Madras, that in the Tamil country, the Parriyars and Pullers, most of whom are slaves attached to the lands of the Vellaler, as well as the Pulli, who are generally serfs on the lands of the Bramin Meerassidars, sometimes claim meras, or hereditary private property, in the "incidents of their villainage," and that "it is generally allowed to them and their descendants, on proving their "former residence in the village, however long they may have been absent "from it." || On the other hand, the late magistrate in Malabar, in addressing Government respecting the sale of men, women, and children of the Pollar, Cherumakul, Panian, Kanakan, Kallady, Yocallan, and Nacady tribes submits, that "if the general question of slavery, as recognized by the local usages of "Malabar,

* It is only the greater part, not the whole, of the labourers in these countries that are slaves; many of them are also free.

† As it is not the interest of the landlords in Malabar and Canara to sell the slaves who cultivate their lands, they usually dispose of the increasing stock only, for which they have no immediate use; but their power to dispose of all their slaves, independently of their lands, seems undisputed.

‡ The cause of land being of less value in the Tamil country than in Malabar and Canara will be noticed hereafter.

§ In Telingana, a labourer cannot remove from one village to another pending engagements which he has not fulfilled; but he is free to make his own terms, and after performing the engagements into which he voluntarily enters becomes again the master of his own labour. It is believed, however, that the labourers in Telingana generally remain in the same village, and attached to the same family of the Ryot, from generation to generation.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

"Malabar, or by the Hindoo and Mahommedan law, is not affected by the "laws made to abolish the slave trade, adverting to the wretchedness and "diminutive appearance of this description of natives, it still appears to be a "subject well worthy the humane consideration of the Right Honourable the "Governor in Council, to enact such legislative provisions as will tend to "ameliorate their condition, and prevent their being sold out of the talook, or "indeed off the estate, the place of their nativity, and above all from being "exposed for sale by public auction, in execution of decrees or in satisfaction "of revenue * demands."†

15. The right which the slaves in the Tamil country possess to continue attached to the soil where they are born, which, though not universal, is pretty general among them; their dependence rather on a community than on an individual, and perhaps the vicinity of some of them to the presidency, where a general knowledge prevails that the spirit of our Government is inimical to bondage, seem all, more or less, to have contributed to render their condition, in some degree at least, superior to that of their brethren on the other coast. It is by no means, however, to be understood, that this is universally the case. Their treatment necessarily depends principally on the individual character of their owners, and when we reflect on those evils that are inseparable from even the mildest state of slavery, and consider how large a portion of our most industrious subjects are at present totally deprived of a free market for their labour, restricted by inheritance to a mere subsistence, and sold and transferred with the land which they till, policy no less than humanity would appear to dictate the propriety of gradually relieving them from those restrictions which have reduced them, and must otherwise continue to confine them, to a condition scarcely superior to that of the cattle which they follow at the plough.

16. While such, in the opinion of the Board, ought to be the policy to be pursued with regard to this class of people, it would be obviously unjust to interfere with the private property which there can be no doubt that the Ryots at present possess in their slaves; and it might be dangerous too suddenly to disturb the long established relations in society subsisting between these two orders. For the present, therefore, it would seem sufficient, with the view to prevent oppression or abuse of authority, to define by legislative enactments the power which may be lawfully exercised by a Ryot over his slaves: but as the revenue records do not afford information sufficiently minute and satisfactory for this purpose, it is resolved to call the particular attention of the Collectors in Canara, Malabar, and the Tamil country, to this subject, and to desire that they will take an early opportunity to communicate fully their sentiments thereon for the consideration of the Board.

The Rights of the Ryot.

17. In proceeding to investigate the rights of the Ryot, the Board deem it proper to premise that this term, which is familiar to all acquainted with Indian finance, as applied to designate the cultivators of the soil in general, is here employed by them to distinguish that particular class only among them who employ, superintend, and sometimes assist the labourer, and who are every where the farmers of the country, the creators and payers of the land revenue. In many parts of the Tamil country, but especially in the province of Tanjore, the privileges of many of this class have been purchased, usurped,‡ or acquired, by Bramins, and in Malabar by Moplas, or Mussulmans of Arabian descent, who now therefore represent the original Ryots; but in general, like the Nairs of Malabar, the Vellalers of the Tamil country, the Coombees of the Ceded Districts, and the Reddies and Naidoos of the Northern Circars, the Ryots are the principal among the Soodras, the lowest of the pure Hindoo tribes, who appear originally to have possessed the exclusive occupancy of the land throughout Hindoostan.

18. The

* The Board are not aware that this is ever done in satisfaction of revenue demands, payable direct to the Government; but all assignments of revenue give a right to make revenue demands, and the assignee is at liberty to follow the established practice in realizing his lawful demands, where the practice and the law are not at variance.

† See enclosure in Mr. Secretary Hill's letter, 9th December 1814.

‡ See an instance of transfer by the power of the sovereign authority, in Mr. Hodgson's report on Tinnevelly, dated 24th September 1807.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

18. The universally distinguishing character, as well as the chief privilege of this class of people, is their exclusive right to the hereditary possession and usufruct of the soil, so long as they render a certain portion of the produce of the land, in kind or money, as public revenue; for whether rendered in service, in money, or in kind, and whether paid to Rajahs, Jaghiredars, Zemindars, Poligars, Mootahdars, Shotriumdars, Mauniamdars, or Government officers, such as Tehsildars, Aumildars, Aumeens, or Thanadars, the payments which have always been made by the Ryot are universally termed and considered the dues of the Government.

19. The hereditary right of the Ryot, as above described, though every where of the same, or at least of a similar nature, is in value very different in different districts. After discharging the wages of his hired labourers, and defraying the subsistence of his slaves, or other immediate expenses of cultivation, if the public assessment payable by him is so moderate as to leave him a considerable annual surplus, his interest in the soil is that of the landlord, and his land yields a clear land rent, and is of course a saleable and transferable property; but where the revenue payable by him is so high as to absorb the whole of the landlord's rent, and to leave him a bare and precarious subsistence only, his interest in the land dwindles into mere occupancy, and from a landlord he is reduced to a landholder, still indeed clinging to the soil and subsisting by tilling it, but no longer possessing any saleable property in it.

20. The value of the Ryot's right, therefore, varies with the weight of the public assessment on the land, which is generally found to be heavy in proportion to the length of time that the country may have been subjected to the Mahommedan government. On the western coast of the Peninsula, where the Mussulman's power was both of the most recent introduction and of the shortest duration, this right constitutes a property of great value, which is vested in each individual Ryot. In the Tamil country it is vested more frequently in all the Ryots of a village collectively than in each individually, and is of less value than in Canara and Malabar, and sometimes of little or no value as a saleable property. In the Ceded Districts and Northern Circars, which were the longest under Mahommedan rule, though the Coombees, Reddies, Naidoos, and other cadeem* inhabitants assert their hereditary right to a priority and preference of occupancy, they do not now appear to possess any saleable property in the soil.

In Malabar.†

21. In the province of Malabar, the exclusive right of the Ryot to the hereditary possession and usufruct of the soil is known by the term jenm, or birth-right, and originally belonged exclusively to the natives of that province, being vested partly in the Namboories, or Bramins peculiar to the western coast, but chiefly in the Nairs, who though Soodras, constituted at once the chief landed proprietors and the principal military tribe of Malabar. In latter times, however, the Moplas also, descended from the numerous Arabian colonies that emigrated and settled in Malabar in the earlier centuries of the Mahommedan era, have by degrees become possessed of a considerable share of the jenm property of that province.

22. It is a most remarkable circumstance, that until the conquest of Malabar by the Mussulman princes of Mysore, this right seems to have been held by the Jenmkars, free from any condition of a payment, in money or produce, to the Government; for, until that period, a land revenue appears to have been altogether unknown to the people. Previously to that event, the province was divided into a number of petty independent principalities, and the revenue of the prince consisted of a jeum of his own hereditary lands; of a certain portion of all the property of which his mopla subjects died possessed, levied under the denomination of poorashandrum, before the next heir could take possession; of imposts on trade and mint duties; fines for criminal offences, protection money from fugitive subjects of other rajahs; escheated and confiscated estates; offerings by his subjects at the great annual festivals and at the investiture of each senior Rajah; professional taxes on weavers, distillers,

* Cadeem means ancient.

† See Mr. Warden's letters to the Board, dated 20th April and 21st September 1815.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

distillers, &c., and the royalties of gold ore, elephants, ivory, teak trees, bamboos, vessels wrecked on the coast, and a few others; but the Jenmkars, or persons vested with the jenm right, paid nothing to the Government. The Namboory and Nair Jenmkars may indeed be said to have rendered their dues to the public, by the performance of service to the state, the various rites of the Hindoo church devolving on the former, and the defence of the country on the latter tribe;* and the general tax levied on all the property of the moplas, at their death, may be considered as having fallen on their lands, as well as on their other property; but the Namboories and Nairs did not contribute, either in kind or money, to the support of the state, and the tax paid by the moplas was a general tax on the capital of a wealthy tribe of foreign settlers, not a tax upon the land.

23. Nothing, therefore, could be more complete than the property in the soil thus vested in the Jenmkars. After defraying the expenses of cultivation, the produce of the land, or its value, was their own, free from tax. The Jenmkar held the land on the tenure of the sword, and as he was entitled to subsistence money when called into active service, the condition of the tenure still left it a very valuable property. Hence, in Malabar, there were none of those hereditary village registers who, under the denomination of Curnums, Conicopilies, or Shambogues, were elsewhere universally found necessary by the Government to keep detailed accounts of the occupation and cultivation of the soil. The non-existence of a land revenue in that province rendered the employment of such persons unnecessary; and the Jenmkars, free from all interference of this kind, were the independent owners of the land. They held, by right of birth, not of the prince, but in common with him, and therefore may be considered as having possessed a property in the soil more absolute than even that of the landlord in Europe.

24. The Namboories or Bramins, however, as well as the Rajahs, the Mopla merchants, and many others among the Jenmkars of Malabar, being precluded by the nature of their several avocations from the immediate superintendence of the cultivation of the soil, were in the habit of renting out their lands and slaves, on lease for a limited period, to an inferior, but most useful description of Ryots, termed Patomkars. These persons, in consideration of paying to the Jenmkar, not a share of the produce, but a certain fixed patom or rent for a defined extent of land, generally in kind, but sometimes in money, according to mutual agreement, became vested, for the period of their leases, with all the rights of the Jenmkar, except that of disposing of his jenm. The Patomkar, therefore, was an under Ryot, holding on temporary lease from the Jenmkar, in the same manner that the tenant or farmer holds of the landlord in England, or the Pyacarri of the Meerassidars in the Tamil country, except that the Pyacarri right is sometimes permanent or hereditary.

25. Though many of the Jenmkars rented out their lands, in this manner, to Patomkars or tenants, many of them also cultivated their own lands, and to the character of landlord united that of farmer also. The whole of them were remarkable for the extraordinary tenacity with which they clung to their jenm: with it they could never be induced to part, except in consequence of the most urgent necessity; and this strong attachment to their hereditary property seems to have given rise in Malabar to a third class of men, who though neither Jenmkars or landlords, nor Patomkars or tenants, are now more intimately connected than either with its landed interests. The Board allude to the Kanumkars,† or holders of the kanum, the peculiar land mortgage prevalent in this province.

26. The peculiarity of the kanum, or land mortgage prevalent in Malabar, consisted in its never admitting of foreclosure, and its containing within itself an inherent principle of self-redemption.

27. The

* The province of Malabar was divided into deshyums, or divisions, sometimes called villages, and these again into naads, or subdivisions; and each naad was assessed, not with a certain number of pagodas, but with a certain number of Nairs, the number allotted to each being well known even at the present day.

† From the want of proper explanations by the Collector, which have been since supplied, the Board, in their proceedings of the 16th January 1815, were led to confound the Kanumkar, or mortgagee, with the Patomkar, or tenant.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

27. The Jenmkar, when in distress, rarely sold his jenm: he generally borrowed money on the security of his land, which he pledged to his creditor for the liquidation of the interest on the debt; and, by a series of deeds well known in Malabar, he could gradually raise nearly the full price of his estate, in the shape of a loan, on this kind of mortgage. The debt thus incurred was considered fastened to the soil, which, with this incumbrance, might be transferred by the Jenmkar to others; but the debt, until liquidated, could never be separated from the land.

28. Over the soil, however, the mortgagee had no controul, except what was necessary to ensure the due liquidation of the interest on his debt. So long as that was paid, the person holding the jenm right remained in undisturbed possession of the land, either cultivating it by means of his own hired labourers and slaves, or renting it out on lease to Patomkars or tenants; but on failure in payment of the interest on the debt, the Kanumkar, or mortgagee, was immediately entitled to possession: he might then rent out the land to new Patomkars, or if himself a Ryot, might cultivate it by means of his own people, but he was bound to pay to the person possessing the jenm right all rent or produce exceeding the interest on his debt; and though the person possessing that right, in consideration of a further advance of money by the mortgagee, might formally transfer it to him, and thereby convert him from the Kanumkar, or mortgagee, into the Jenmkar, or landlord of the soil, the Kanumkar, as such, could never foreclose his mortgage, or dispose of the jenm to satisfy his debt. To secure the interest thereon, he was entitled to possession, under the limitation respecting surplus produce or rent mentioned above; but however desirous of realizing the principal of his debt, he was obliged, for this purpose, either to wait the convenience of the Jenmkar, or to sell or mortgage either the whole or a part of his kanum to another, who succeeded to his rights alone.

29. As all surplus rent or produce beyond the interest of the debt belonged, as before stated, to the Jenmkar, where the debt was light he still retained a valuable property in the soil, and seldom lost possession of his estate; but where the debt was so heavy that the interest absorbed the chief part of the landlord's rent, the mortgagee, in consequence of the Jenmkar's failure in discharging the interest on his debt, generally assumed possession, and the property of the Jenmkar in the land was often reduced to a handful of grain, a measure of ghee, or some other nominal surplus, paid merely to mark the nature of the tenure. The Jenmkar, however, always retained the important privilege of redeeming, at any time, the khanum or mortgage, by paying off the principal of the debt; but if the Kanumkar had obtained possession of the land, the value of any permanent improvements made by him was also to be paid by the Jenmkar previously to regaining possession.

30. This peculiar kind of perpetually redeemable mortgage, though not unknown in the Tamil country, is still prevalent chiefly on the western coast; but in Malabar it possesses the peculiarity already noticed, which elsewhere is not attached to it, namely, an inherent principle of self-redemption. It was formerly considered, and is still claimed and partially exercised, as the prerogative of the Malabar Jenmkar, that all kanum or mortgage deeds shall be renewed after the lapse of a certain number of years, generally on the death of the Jenmkar; and in issuing on these occasions new deeds, thirteen per cent. is always deducted from the principal of the original debt. By periodical renewals and concomitant deductions of this kind, the land, in course of time, becomes released from its mortgage, and at length reverts to the heirs of the Jenmkar free of all incumbrance. This custom, from immemorial usage,* seems gradually to have grown into prescriptive right; but from the circumstance of its not being mentioned in any of the numerous written deeds in use in Malabar, by which our courts of justice seem chiefly guided in their decisions, as well perhaps as from its bearing rather hard on the mortgagee, it does not now appear to be so generally observed as formerly.

31. Such were the respective rights of the Jenmkars, Kanumkars, and Patomkars of Malabar, when that province was invaded by Hyder Ally, the founder of the Mahommedan dynasty of Mysore. This prince, actuated by that arbitrary principle which, unfortunately for the inhabitants of these countries, was not only adopted, but in general enforced, by all the Mussulman conquerors of Hindostan, regardless of private property in the soil, immediately declared half the produce to be the share of the Circar. Whether his executive officers calculated that the landlord's patom, or rent, exceeded that share of the produce, and therefore argued that to take a fixed portion of the patom was in fact to obey their master's orders, or whether they were afraid strictly to enforce his mandate among a warlike, bold, and only half-subdued people, to whom a land-tax was as yet unknown, it may not now be easy to determine; certain it is, however, that while "the orders from the huzzoor were to take half the "produce, the orders of his local executive officers direct a fixed share* of "the patom to be taken as the circar share."

32. To collect a fixed portion of the Jenmkar's or landlord's rent, was therefore the principle of the first land-tax introduced into Malabar; but the ignorance, ability, corruption, or zeal of the different local agents employed to carry this principle into effect, led, as they ever must lead in every kind of detailed settlement, to great inequality of taxation. Accordingly, says the present Collector, "on our accession to the government of the province, "though we were informed what the principle of the assessment was, we "found that the actual rate of taxation was different in every district, and "this unequal state of the assessment has remained unaltered† to the present day."

33. The absence of all accounts of the land revenue in Malabar, proceeding from the non-existence of such a tax, necessarily left the assessors of Hyder without any other alternative for their guidance, in fixing the amount of the land-tax, than the scanty and interested information to be gathered from the people themselves, or from a local inspection of the country; the original assessment, therefore, though unequal, was not in general oppressive, and from the highly improvable nature of the paramba, or garden lands of Malabar, which were assessed, not according to their extent, but according to the number of productive trees growing at the time upon them, this assessment, since our acquisition of the province has gradually become less heavy, though perhaps still more unequal.

34. Very voluminous discussions have lately arisen, and are still pending, with the Collector in Malabar, on the subject of the equalization of this land-tax; but though they have not yet been brought to a conclusion, the general impression of the Board continues to be, that infinitely more evil would arise from a revision of the assessment, necessarily involving an alteration in the value of almost every estate in the province, than could ever possibly be compensated by any good attending the attempt to equalize the present land-tax. Its existing inequalities confessedly arise as much from the different degrees of labour bestowed upon the land, as from any original disparity of assessment; a revision of it, therefore, would, in fact, be tantamount to a tax on improvement, and would itself soon again require alteration, while it is to be borne in mind that, though the existing assessment is now light on many estates, it is stated by the Collector that it bears heavily on few or none.

35. The land-tax introduced by Hyder into Malabar, which continues to the present time, was an assessment of so much money upon each (paramba) garden or plantation, and a separate assessment of so much money upon each (batty) seed land, or paddy field; and it has been calculated that it averages about eighty per cent. of the Jenmkar's or landlord's patom in the southern, and about fifty per cent. in the northern talooks. Accordingly, where the landlord's rent was free from other incumbrances, there still remained to him, after the payment

* The Board do not clearly understand what share of the patom was intended to be taken; but it would seem probable, from various parts of the Collector's letters, that the portion intended was either one-half (fifty per cent.), or six-tenths (sixty per cent.).

† It is not quite correct to state, that the assessment has remained "unaltered," for a revision of it took place in 1800 by Major Macleod; but the former assessment, which was almost immediately reverted to, was founded on that of the Commissioners of Malabar for the year of the Malabar era 976, and this was framed on a previous quinquennial settlement founded on that here alluded to as introduced by Arshed Beg Khan, Hyder's deputy, in the Malabar year 959, or A.D. 1783-4; so that, in fact, the assessment of Hyder is that which now subsists. For the causes which prevented the further revision of the assessment in Malabar, the Board beg leave to refer to their proceedings of the 16th January 1815.

payment of this tax, a considerable though greatly reduced surplus, which he could enjoy, mortgage, or sell, as formerly; but, at the period of the imposition of the land-tax by Hyder, the greater portion of the estates in Malabar had been pledged in kanum, and many of them, under the circumstances before explained, had come into possession of the Kanumkars: the Jenmkars, however, being entitled to all surplus produce or rent beyond what was necessary for the liquidation of the kanum interest, had hitherto enjoyed a greater or less landlord's profit, even from these estates; but this was now almost universally absorbed in the payment of the public dues, and where it was not sufficient for this purpose, the loss fell on the Kanumkar.

36. The assessment of Hyder, therefore, by generally reducing, and in some cases by nearly destroying the income immemorially derivable from the land by the Jenmkar, materially loosened those ties that had hitherto so firmly bound him to the soil: but in proportion as it partially affected the immediate interests of the Kanumkar, the more strongly did it connect him with the land; for where the public assessment trenched on that portion of the landlord's rent, which had hitherto been appropriable to the payment of the kanum interest, it necessarily removed still further the period for the liquidation of the mortgage, and many Jenmkars who had hitherto retained possession of their lands though pledged in kanum, being now unable to discharge regularly the interest on their debt in addition to the public assessment, were forced to give up possession of their estates to the Kanumkars, with scarcely any prospect of ever being able to redeem them.

37. This redeemable, but in fact nearly permanent transfer of the greater portion of the landlords' rights to the Kanumkars, which had commenced long before the Mussulman invasion of the country, and which the introduction of a land-tax by that government materially increased, was further promoted by the extraordinary edict of Tippoo, for the forcible conversion of the inhabitants of the country to the Mussulman faith; for the Hindoo population of Malabar, justly alarmed at the promulgation of a mandate which threatened them with all the horrors attendant on the loss of caste,* fled with dismay in every direction; and many of the Hindoo Jenmkars, anxious to raise a little money to supply their immediate necessities in those countries to which they were about to emigrate, were readily induced, by a small advance of money, to grant large kanum assignments of their lands to the Moplas, who being of the Mahomedan faith had no cause for alarm, and gladly availed themselves of the consternation of their Hindoo neighbours to make an advantageous use of their accumulated wealth.

38. The number of jenms or private estates in Malabar is at present forty-four thousand, three hundred and seventy-eight, and the land assessment being about Star Pagodas 4,80,000, each estate, on an average, bears to the whole revenue a proportion of little more than ten pagodas per annum. Under the circumstances above explained, however, few of the Jenmkars are now in possession of their lands. Many of the Namboory or Bramin landlords have never returned from Travancore, whither they fled on the first promulgation of Tippoo's edict, leaving their lands in the hands either of their Kanumkars or mortgagees, or of their Patomkars or tenants; and, though many of them have agents in Malabar, who collect and remit to them any surplus produce or rent, others have never come to a settlement with their tenants or Kanumkars for years.

39. Accordingly, though a considerable portion of the landlord's rent of Malabar is still retained by the Jenmkars,† far the greater part, or about three-fourths

* After circumcision no Hindoo can be re-admitted into his tribe; and by forcible circumcision, at the period here alluded to, many high caste men of Malabar, still professing the Hindoo faith, have been for ever most cruelly excluded from their caste.

† It has been stated by Mr. Warden, that almost the whole of the jenm property is vested in the pagodas and other religious establishments. By the law of mortmain similar appropriations were restricted many ages ago in England; but in some Catholic countries, particularly in the territory belonging to the Roman See, the church has absorbed a great portion of the real property in the same manner as in Malabar. "Sur trente-six mille maisons que l'on compte à Rome, la main-" morte en possède vingt mille. En effet depuis un grand nombre de siècles la main-morte hérite " sans cesse et elle n'a point d'héritiers. Elle doit, à la longue, posséder tout, c'est-à-dire tout " envahir." This was written in 1776.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

fourths of the whole, has become intrinsically vested, chiefly in the Kanumkars, and partly in the Patomkars also: and as these classes are still more numerous than the Jenmkars, and the land-tax is in general collected from those in possession of the chief portion of the landlord's rent, the revenue is now received in great detail.* The rights of each, however, though altered in value, are not in their nature changed. The privileges attached to the patom, the kanum, and the jenm, remain the same as heretofore; and, notwithstanding the last-mentioned right has lost much of its former value, such is still the attachment of the people to what has descended to them from their ancestors, that though a great number of the Hindoo Jenmkars who emigrated from Malabar, in consequence of the edict of Tippoo, were forced to pledge their lands almost irrecoverably on the kanum tenure, there is not a single instance known of one of them disposing of his jenm.

In Canara.†

40. It will not be necessary to enter so much into detail respecting the landed tenures of Canara, for though not precisely of the same nature, they are very similar to those of Malabar.

41. The exclusive right to the hereditary possession and usufruct of the soil is, in Canara, termed wurgha, meaning separate independent property in the land, and seems originally, as in Malabar, to have been vested in the military tribe of the Nairs, the first, and at one time the exclusive Mulees or landlords of that province; for, except to unclaimed waste, or to estates escheated from want of heirs,‡ it does not appear that the Government in Canara at any time possessed, or even pretended to the smallest right to property in the land.

42. The Nairs had under them a great number of inferior Ryots, termed Guenies, or tenants, to whom they rented out those portions of their lands which they did not cultivate by means of their own hired labourers or slaves, and the rent paid by these persons to the landlord was also, as in Malabar, a fixed sum of money, or a fixed quantity of grain, settled by mutual consent of the parties, never a share of the produce. But the Guenies, or tenants, in Canara, were of two distinct classes, the Mul-guenies, or permanent tenants, and the Chalie-guenies, or temporary tenants.

43. The Mul-guenies, or permanent tenants of Canara, were a class of people unknown to Malabar, who, on condition of the payment of a specified invariable rent to the Mulee, or landlord, and his successors, obtained from him a perpetual grant§ of a certain portion of land to be held by them and their heirs for ever. This right could not be sold by the Mul-guenie or his heirs, but it might be mortgaged by them; and so long as the stipulated rent continued to be paid duly, he and his descendants inherited this land, like any other part of their hereditary property. The landlord and his heir were precluded from ever raising the rent of the Mul-guenies; it was therefore originally either higher than that procurable from temporary tenants, or was fixed at the same‖ or a lower rate, in consideration of a certain sum being paid as premium or purchase money for the grant in money, or as a favour conferred by the landlord on some of his dependents. It amounted, in fact, to a permanent alienation of a certain portion of land by the landlord; for it never again lapsed to him or his descendants, except on failure of heirs to the Mul-guenies; and this class of people, therefore, may be considered rather as subordinate landlords than as tenants of the soil, more especially, as though many of them cultivated their lands by means of their own hired labourers or slaves, others sub-rented them to the Chalie-guenies, or temporary tenants.

44. This last description of persons, who were much more numerous than the Mul-guenies, rented farms on a fixed rent for a limited period, either from them, or directly from the landlords, and corresponded precisely with the Patomkars

* The number of persons paying the land-tax in Malabar is estimated by the Collector, in round numbers, at one hundred and fifty thousand.

† See Mr. Read's Letter to the Board, dated 1st January 1814.

‡ In fusily 1222 the number of estates which had lapsed to Government from the expulsion of the ancient landlords, the want of heirs, or other causes, during a long series of years, was 8,352.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

kars of Malabar. But though removable at the expiration of their leases, they were not often ousted from their farms; for on a rent more advantageous to the landlord being offered by others at the termination of their leases, they usually acceded to the increased terms proposed, and being in possession, generally obtained the preference. Nay, it even appears that after renting directly from the landlord the same farm for several generations, or for a period not less than fifty years, they sometimes claimed to have it confirmed to them in perpetuity: in other words, to be converted from Chalie into Mul-guenies: but this was seldom done, except where they had made extensive improvements, or brought new lands under cultivation; and apparently never, even then, unless they consented to a considerable increase of rent.

45. On the conquest of Canara, in early times, by the Pandian princes of Madura, most of the Nair landlords were extirpated or expelled, and their privileges would appear to have been conferred by the conquerors on the ancestors of the present Hullers and various other castes now in possession of the mulee or landlord's rights. The descendants of the Mul-guenies who originally held from the old Nair landlords are now termed Nair Mul-guenies, in order to distinguish them from the Shud Mul-guenies, or mere permanent tenants, whose tenures are of a less ancient origin.

46. Besides the Mulees or landlords, the Nair and Shud Mul guenies or permanent tenants, and the Chalie-guenies or temporary tenants, there are in Canara a great number of persons holding possession of the land as mortgagees, on a perpetually redeemable mortgage, which differs in no respect from the kanum of Malabar, except that there is no renewal of the mortgage deeds, nor deduction of thirteen per cent. from the principal of the debt; and that in Canara it has two distinct denominations, the mortgage without possession of the land being called tooradhoo,* for which term bogyadhi† is substituted, when, on failure in payment of the interest on the debt, the mortgagee assumes possession.

47. A most remarkable difference, however, is observable between the two neighbouring districts of Malabar and Canara; namely, that while in the former province the Jenmkars enjoyed their hereditary rights free from assessment, and a land-tax was consequently unknown until the period of the Mussulman invasion, the landlords of Canara held their hereditary right under the express condition of a payment to Government, which seems to have existed from time immemorial.

48. Previously to the conquest of Canara by the Pandian princes of Madura, one-sixth of the produce, as prescribed by the Hindoo law, is stated to have been paid by the landlord for the support of the state. On that event, the Government are reported to have required their share of the produce to be delivered, deprived of the husk, and thereby to have made an addition of about ten per cent. to the assessment, which, without further alteration, continued at this rate until about the commencement of the fourteenth century, when the province fell under the dominion of the new empire of Vijianagara or Bijnagur.

49. Hurryhur Roy, one of the first kings of that dynasty, is stated to have entirely new-modelled the land assessment of Canara; and under the appearance of adhering to the rules of the Shaster, granting one-sixth of the produce to the state, to have raised the assessment so as to absorb nearly one-fourth of the produce, by converting the payment in grain into a cash payment, and assessing a fixed sum of money not only on each estate, but apparently on each field of the province: a circumstance which deserves particular notice, as the peculiar characteristic which distinguishes this district from all others under the Government,‡ except Malabar, where a similar field assessment appears to have been introduced by Hyder.

‡ It is possible that the Canarese Government of Bijnagur may have extended this field assessment to other parts of Carnataca proper, such as Mysore and part of the Ceded Districts; or that from these countries it may have been extended to Canara; but though they subsequently subdued

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

50. The principle prescribed by Hurryhur Roy for the introduction of this field assessment, was that an extent of ground requiring two and a half kautees of seed to sow it should pay to the Government the sum of one ghetti pagoda; but, in applying this rule to practice, it does not appear that any actual survey of the land took place.

51. In Canara there is comparatively little, if any, variation in the crop, most of the lands being invariably cultivated with rice, immemorially the staple commodity of the district. The rains of the south-west monsoon are also regular, and the seasons therefore, in general, certain. From these circumstances, as well as from the stability of the tenant's tenure prompting them to cultivate to the utmost, the average produce of almost every arable field in Canara has been known for ages, and each is currently termed a field of so many morahs produce.

52. The Government had hitherto from the earliest times received a portion of this produce in kind, and the employment of a number of servants, termed Shambogues, or village accountants, to keep detailed accounts of the occupation, cultivation, and produce of the land, appears in Canara, and indeed throughout India, to have been coeval with the realization of a land revenue, being in fact a necessary consequence of the imposition and collection of a detailed tax in kind. The produce of each field was easily ascertained from the accounts kept by these people, and the seed being calculated to bear to the produce the proportion of one to twelve,* the assessment in money seems thus to have been determined on each field,† without any attempt at an actual survey of the land or arbitrary classification of the soil.

53. This assessment, with a few trifling additions made to it by the subsequent kings of Vijianagara, continued fixed for nearly two centuries and a half; and in order to distinguish it from the shamul, or extra assessments afterwards imposed, it is termed the rekha or standard land-tax of Canara. It seems to have been paid in great detail, and to have borne lightly on the country; for though the tax receivable from the different landlords varied from five thousand to five pagodas, the average was nearer fifty pagodas than any other sum; and that portion of the landlord's lands which he rented out to others, independently of what he retained in his own hands, was in general sufficient to liquidate the Government demand on the whole estate; land being at the same time saleable for ten, and in some cases as high as twenty or thirty years' purchase.

54. Under the Bednore government, this land-tax was increased about ten per cent, at which rate it continued fixed for more than another century; but no sooner did Canara fall under the baneful administration of the Mussulman princes of Mysore, than the most injudicious and oppressive extra assessments were imposed, in all cases materially reducing, and in some entirely annihilating private property in the soil. Accordingly, when the British Government obtained possession of the province, the saleable lands were few in number, and limited in extent. Many of the landlords were reduced to the situation of labourers on their own estates; the population had fallen greatly below its former standard; and the Collector, who had recently left the Baramahl district, emphatically added, that the inhabitants were now "as poor as those "of the neighbouring countries."

55. Omitting from account that small portion of Canara which soon after its acquisition was ceded to the Rajah of Coorg, it appears that, on our accession to the government of this province, the rekha, or ancient land-tax, was Star Pagodas 3,61,802, and the shamul, or extra assessments by the Bednore government and Hyder Ally, up to the year 1784, Star Pagodas 2,17,913, nearly subdued the Northern Circars and the greater part of the Tamil country, no such assessment appears to have been ever introduced into the lands of these countries. A money assessment, but fluctuating with the produce sown, has been very generally introduced on dry grain land, but almost every where the revenue from rice land is demandable in kind in Mysore, and even in the Ceded Districts and provinces east of the Ghauts, before the introduction of ryotwar.

* This is the proportion laid down in the Shaster, and is very near the fact: the late Collector, Mr. Read, estimates it as one to eleven.

† It is understood that even in the garden lands, cultivated with cocoa-nut, pepper, and betel-nut trees, two-thirds pay the field assessment fixed on the soil as paddy land, not on the trees; about one-third only pays so much per tree.

nearly sixty per cent. of the rekha, making a total government demand, of rekha and shamul, to the amount of Pagodas 5,79,715, which had been rather nominally than really increased by Tippoo to a much greater extent, for though his demand exceeded six lacs, his collections never amounted to five lacs of pagodas.

56. Satisfied that the whole course of Hyder's administration was "nothing "but a series of experiments made for the purpose of discovering the utmost "extent to which the land rent could be carried, or how much it was possible "to extract from the farmer without diminishing cultivation," Colonel Munro, the first Collector in Canara, seems at an early period of his administration to have been strongly impressed with a conviction, that a reduction of the land-tax below Hyder's assessment was essentially necessary, to prevent the completion of that ruin in which the impolitic extra assessments of the Mussulman government had already begun to involve the landed interests of the province. His settlement for the first year after our acquisition of Canara, fusily 1209, was therefore Pagodas 4,40,630, being still an increase on the rekha of about thirty-four per cent., but about a lac and thirty-nine thousand pagodas below the rekha and shamul of Hyder; and in his instructions to the subordinate Collectors for the settlement of the following year, fusily 1210, he directs that no lands should be assessed higher than at some former period; in other words, that if any lands had escaped the extra assessments of the Bednore princes or of Hyder's government, they should continue exempted from them, but that if they had ever been made liable to these assessments, and did not now pay them, the maximum of the demand on such lands should be the ancient rekha, with one, two, or at the utmost not more than three-fourths of these modern additional cesses; thereby limiting the maximum land-tax to the rekha, and three-fourths of the shamul in Hyder's time.

57. Under the judicious limitation thus imposed on the land-tax in Canara, no field was assessed with a higher tax than that to which it had already been subject, and where experience had proved this amount to be so high as to trench on the vital resources of the country, it was proportionally reduced. The effects of a moderation to which the people for many years past had been so little accustomed, immediately became perceptible throughout the province; for, by inspiring the inhabitants with confidence against any further unlimited demands on the part of Government, it gave rise to innumerable claims to land, which once again resumed its former value, a general improvement was sensibly observable in all parts of the district, and the revenue was realized with a facility which, except in Malabar, was elsewhere unknown.

58. It is greatly to be regretted that a limitation founded on such wise principles, and followed by such happy effects, should on any account have been infringed by the local authorities who succeeded Colonel Munro; but especially that the mere desire "of maintaining the land-rent to the same annual "standard" should have induced them to adopt a measure confessedly so "impolitic and unjust," as to make up by a small increase to low-rated lands "the rent of others which had failed altogether;" for the consequence has been, that though the land revenue of the fourteenth year exceeds that of the first year of our possession of this province, by Pagodas 23,763, yet of this increase only Pagodas 5,569 arises from the extended cultivation of waste lands, Pagodas 4,624 from the discovery of concealed or the recovery of inundated lands, and no less than Pagodas 14,170 from the additions made to the rents of these lowly-assessed estates; while of 43,366 persons paying the total land revenue, amounting to Pagodas 4,87,366, only 22,467 persons paying Pagodas 2,15,847 are now assessed within the maximum established by Colonel Munro, and no less than 20,899 persons paying Pagodas 2,71,518, or more than one-half of the revenue, are assessed above that standard.

59. This, however, in the opinion of the Board, is not the whole extent of the evil. It appears that the rekha, with the full amount of the shamil in Hyder's time, is now declared the maximum demand on all the lands of the province. As such, it is entered under the term beriz in the ky-kaguz* or individual pottah given annually to each Ryot, under the Collector's seal and signature, signature, and in the same paper is specified the proportion thereof which may be fixed as his jummabundy or settlement for the fusily year; but as the latter is never determined until near the conclusion of the fusily, it is liable annually to variation, and as it must often be left to be settled at the discretion of the native revenue servants,* experience has shewn that it may occasionally be, and doubtless often has been fixed with reference rather to the capability of the Ryot than to the productive powers of his land.

* Signed paper.

60. To the practice of loading the lowly-assessed or industrious Ryot with the tax of his less fortunate or more improvident neighbour (condemned by the very officer who adopted it as both "impolitic and unjust"), to the consumption of a maximum standard of assessment (the beriz) much beyond the capability† of the country, even at the period of its greatest prosperity, to the gradual approximation made to this high standard in the actual demand on more than half the landed property in Canara, and to the annual variation and consequent uncertainty in the amount of the assessment on individual Ryots, as much as to any temporary reduced value of produce, or the imposition of new indirect taxes, are to be ascribed the decline in agriculture, the poverty among the Ryots, the increased private sale‡ of landed property by the landlords, the difficulty of realizing the collections, and the necessity, before unknown, of disposing of defaulters' lands in satisfaction of revenue demands,§ which, after fourteen years residence in Canara, at length constrained the late Collector to record his conviction that the present assessment is beyond the resources of the province.

61. The Board, in another place, will take into consideration the best means of remedying these obvious defects in the local administration of Canara. Meantime it may be necessary to remark, that the course of proceeding which the Board have condemned was followed by the late Collector upon his own discretion, and that it did not, until very recently, come to the knowledge of the Board. It may at the same time be satisfactory to know, that the practice adverted to, however prejudicial in its tendency, has not yet been carried so far as to produce any serious permanent evil. The guenies, or tenants of Canara, have in no respect been affected by the various alterations that at different times have been made in the amount of the land-tax; on payment of their rents, they have continued, as heretofore, to enjoy the full fruits of their labour, and it is calculated that, on an average, the Mul-guenie receives fifty, and the Chalie-guenie from forty to fifty per cent. of the gross produce of all the lands they cultivate. In Canara, as in Malabar, it is the landlords, or mortgagees in possession of the landlords' rent, whose interests have been affected by the increase of the land-tax. Including both what is paid to them by the Mul and Chalie-guenies, and what they obtain from that portion of the land which is retained under their own management, it is calculated that, on an average, they receive sixty per cent. of the gross produce on their entire estates; but as the land-tax now absorbs from fifty to ninety per cent. of this rent, the landlord's net income has been materially reduced from its ancient standard.

62. In Canara there are at present no less than forty-three thousand three hundred and sixty-six persons paying land revenue direct to the officers of Government, and as the average collections from each are only eleven pagodas thirty-seven fanams and fifty-five cash per annum, it is evident that the revenue is there realized in great, though not perhaps quite in so much detail as in Malabar. What portion of the persons now paying revenue to Government are landlords, what portion mortgagees, and what portion Guenies, or tenants, on the lands that, from want of heirs, have lapsed to Government, is not discoverable

* It appears that in some parts of Canara all that was done by the European authority was to confirm the settlement made by the native servants.

† Colonel Munro, in his report of the 27th January 1800, says, "I thought the rents too high "(in Canara), as I think they are in every part of India that I have seen; but I conceive it "belonged to the Board, and not to me, to determine what part of them it might hereafter be "proper to reduce."

‡ On the western coast of the peninsula, where the attachment of the people to their lands is so great, an increased sale argues more distress on the part of the landlords than it would be proper to infer from the same result in other countries.

§ This was never done until 1807, and the sales have since increased annually.

verable from the revenue records; but it is obvious that, as in Malabar, the increase in the land-tax must have tended to transfer from the landlord to the mortgagee a considerable portion of his property in the soil; and as the absolute transfer of the landlord's rights is rather more common in Canara than in Malabar, it is probable that in the former province it has been often complete and irrevocable, while in the latter it has in general been only partial and redeemable.

63. A considerable portion of the property in the land of Canara may thus have changed its owner, and it may perhaps have been diminished, both in value and extent, since the days of the ancient Hindoo government; yet it still continues in this province, as in Malabar, to be highly valuable. From the great inequality of the land-tax in Canara, it appears that some estates sell as low as one, and others as high as thirty-five years' purchase: but the result of a calculation founded on sales that actually took place in the different talooks of the province, gives, on an average, eleven years' purchase, a sufficient proof of the high value which the people still attach to this species of property.

*In the Tamil Country.

64. In proceeding to consider the landed tenures in the Tamil country, we are immediately struck by the marked distinction observable between them and those on the western coast; originating, apparently, in the different statesof society existing on the two opposite sides of the peninsula.

65. In Malabar and Canara the natives seldom reside together in any considerable number; and in these districts, therefore, villages,† or rather an assemblage of houses into townships, is rarely to be seen. The numerous persons employed in, or connected with the civil or military departments of the Government, as well as the merchants, traders, and others interested in the foreign commerce of the country, inhabit the principal sea-port towns situated immediately on the coast; but, in the interior, the agricultural population is scattered in little groupes all over the face of the country, and each landlord resides apart on his own private estate. Hence a spirit of independence characterizes all the landed proprietors in these districts, and community of property, or common interest in the soil, is altogether unknown; every right or privilege connected with it being vested in individuals, never in any collective body of the people. But on the eastern coast of the peninsula we find the whole population of the country congregated in villages of a greater or less extent, each of which has not inaptly been compared to a separate and independent corporation or township. The Curnum or accountant, the Bramin Poojary or priest; the carpenter, and the potter, with many others, from the astronomer down to the blacksmith, are all servants, officers, or members of the village community, of which the Ryots,‡ already described, form the principal and leading party. Each individual participates more or less in the common united concerns of the village; and there has consequently arisen on this side of the peninsula a community of interest in the land, which, though not universal, is so prevalent throughout the country as materially to affect its landed tenures.

66. In every Tamil village the exclusive right to the hereditary possession and usufruct of the several descriptions of land situated within its boundaries was originally vested in the Vellalers, one of the principal Soodra castes of that nation, by whom it is termed cawnyatchi, or free hereditary property in the land. It would now be of little utility, were it possible, to attempt to trace the different gradations by which, in the course of time, this right has been partially transferred from the members of this caste to the various other tribes in whose possession it is now to be found. It is sufficient to know that in all parts of the Tamil country it is still retained principally by the Vellalers, but is now frequently held by the Bramins also, who distinguish it by the Sanscrit term suastium, signifying any thing peculiarly one's own, and partly by other Hindoo tribes, by Mussulmans,* and sometimes by native Christians, among whom, as well as among Europeans, it is now generally known by the name of meerassy, a word of Arabic derivation, denoting hereditary property in general, and apparently introduced, and applied to this right, by the Mahomedans, soon after their conquest of the Deccan.

67. It may here be proper to remark, that the term meerassy, by which, as being now in most common acceptation, the Board propose to designate this particular right, is occasionally applied to other hereditary privileges of a very different nature, though all more or less connected with the land, and it is therefore of consequence that the landed meerassy under consideration should not, from this circumstance, be confounded with those other rights, which, for the sake of distinction, may be termed office meerassy.

68. The office meerassy consists of the hereditary right to certain marahs or deductions from the gross produce of all taxable lands, and to certain mauniums or assignments of the Government tax on particular spots of ground, which have been attached to various village and district offices, not only in the Tamil country, but elsewhere. Thus the meerassy of the village Curnum or accountant, as well as those of the village or district Cavilgar or police officer, of the village Taliar, blacksmith, carpenter, washerman, barber, and of various other village officers, are to be found as prevalent in the provinces of Telingana as in the southern districts; but the landed meerassy, which alone is now under notice, is understood to be peculiar to those provinces which have been distinguished by the name of the Tamil country.

69. As regards this particular meerassy right, the lands of every Tamil village may be divided into two distinct kinds: 1st, those held free from the condition of any payment on the part of the Meerassidars; 2dly, those which they hold on the express condition of rendering a certain portion of the produce as public revenue to the state. In the first class are included, 1st, the perumboc, or lands incapable of cultivation; and 2dly, the tarisee, or waste lands. In the second are included all the cultivated lands in the village, consisting, 1st, of mauniums, or land of which the public revenue has been transferred by the Government to certain individuals, with a right to receive it from whoever cultivates the land; and 2dly, of waraput † and teerwaput,‡ or lands the public revenue from which has not been alienated, but is paid to the state. The meerassy right extends to all these different descriptions of land; but each must be enjoyed according to its peculiar nature.

70. The perumboc, or land incapable of cultivation, consists of rocks, public roads, the beds of rivers, tanks, and watercourses, the public ground in which the bodies of the dead are burnt or interred, the paracheri or suburbs of the village, occupied by the huts of Pariar slaves and other outcasts, the lands on which the different village temples stand, and the site of the village itself, called in Tamil the Nuttum. It is in this last place that the houses of the landlord Meerassidars are invariably to be found: for here, and no where else, are they permitted to build their houses. Various other pure tribes, such as Bramins, weavers, merchants, and others, are admitted to dwell in this place, and all therefore who reside in it are not Meerassidars; but all the Meerassidars have houses, or at least sites for their houses, in the nuttum. Indeed, their title to erect their dwellings on that particular spot, and their right to controul the affairs of the village pagoda, and to appropriate the produce of quarries, mines, or fisheries, are the chief privileges they possess in the perumboc, which, as here described, being incapable of being cultivated, is not liable to any tax.

71. The tarisee, or waste land, is subdivided into the anadi carumboo, or immemorial waste, and the sheycal carumboo, or waste land that has at some time been cultivated; each of these consists chiefly of tracts of common, on which the Meerassidars graze the cattle employed by them in agriculture, or of

* The occupiers of land for tillage (on caniatchey or on any tenure) of the Mussulman tribe are not numerous in the territories under the Presidency of Fort St. George. The tillage of land is not much followed for a livelihood by Mussulmans in this part of India.

† Paying a warum or share. ‡ Paying a teerwa or money tax.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

of jungle, in which they cut the fire-wood used by them for fuel, and both are held free from tax. Should the Meerassidars, however, possess the means, they are vested with ample right to extend their cultivation to these lands, though it is understood that the consent of Government is necessary before they can break up the anadi carumboo, or land that has never been under the plough; but the moment any part of either the sheycal or anadi carumboo is reclaimed, the nature of the land is changed, it ceases to be taiisee or waste, and no sooner is it converted into cultivated land than it is transferred, as such, in the village accounts, to the head of waraput or teerwaput, and in common with all land of that description becomes, for the plain reasons already given, liable to tax.

72. The tax on waste land, or rather the terms on which the cultivation of waste is undertaken, are well known, and in general regularly followed in every province; but a specific exemption is always claimed from the standard rate established for the cultivated lands, before the cultivation of waste is undertaken. The tax on waste is low at first, and rises gradually to the general standard rate.

73. The maunium lands of each village are divided into turabudy and sunnud or doombala mauniums; the former are arable lands, the public tax on which has from time immemorial been payable to certain descriptions of people belonging to the village community, and which are therefore held by them under the authority of the village Register; the latter are arable lands, the public tax on which has been alienated to individuals either connected or unconnected with the village, and which are held under special grants* from the ruling power.†

74. The remaining lands in each village are waraput, and teerwaput or arable, lands paying tax to the state, the first in kind, the other in money, as the terms imply, and in general are the most extensive and valuable of all.

75. The division above-mentioned of the cultivated lands into maunium and waraput or teerwaput, is a division‡ connected more with the dues of Government than with the rights of the Meerassidars, which are the same in all three; for it has already been stated to be one of the leading principles of the meerassy tenure, that public revenue is demandable on all cultivated land, whether maunium,§ waraput, or teerwaput. With reference to these, the cultivated fields of every Tamil village, including the several descriptions of land mentioned above, are more generally classed in the Tamil country under the three following heads: nunjah or wet lands, poonjah or dry lands, and totacal or gardens and plantations.

76. A considerable portion of the lands in the Tamil country is nunjah or wet land cultivated with paddy, requiring copious irrigation. These are dependent for supplies of water chiefly on the rains of the north-east monsoon, which are extremely variable and uncertain.

* A special grant, existing or implied, from the original foundation of the village, can alone be pleaded in bar to the sovereign right to a certain portion of the produce of all land

† There are no other terms to designate these grants than the foreign words sunnud and doombala, both of Hindoostanee derivation; and it would therefore seem that they originated with the Mussulman government, not with the Hindoos.

‡ Maunium denotes that the public revenue is assigned; waraput, that it is collected in kind; teerwaput, that it is collected in money.

§ The Mauniamdar or holder of the assignment receives or collects the public revenue assigned Where the Meerassidar cultivates the maunium land, instead of paying the revenue to Government he pays it to the Mauniumdar, or if the Meerassidar be the Mauniumdar himself, he retains the whole produce without any payment: so that, in point of fact, no productive land is literally exempt from revenue, although a very large portion of the public revenue from productive land is not received by the Government All mauniums, all alienations of whatever kind, are thus distinctly transfers of the public revenue, and in no case transfers of the land; but sometimes the boundaries of mauniums are fixed, and the land described, and sometimes the Mauniumdar cultivates his own maunium; still as he would have revenue to pay unless exempted by a special sunnud it is clearly from the payment of revenue that he is exempted, and that revenue is the object of the grant, not land. Possession of the land is seldom given; it is generally acquired subsequently The value of endowments in land in England, and of tithes, has kept pace with the change in the value of money, while legacies and endowments in money have ceased to afford the income required for the objects intended to be supported.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

77. Reservoirs for holding water, commonly called tanks, cuts from rivers to fill them, cuts from the beds of rivers to drain off the spring water when the floods have ceased, and natural springs in sandy soils, are numerous in all parts of the Carnatic Payenghaut, and the greater part of the lands of Tanjore and Trichinopoly is watered by cuts from the Cauveri, and in the Madura and Tinnevelly provinces the sources of irrigation are also numerous. The sums of money disbursed in keeping these reservoirs in repair, in making new ones, and repairing old ones, as also in restoring those destroyed by tempest, are very considerable, and is a great field for fraud on the part of native revenue officers.

78. The revenue claimed by the sovereign from land of this description appears immemorially to have been collected in kind: not a fixed quantity of grain for a defined extent of land, like the rents in kind paid to the landlords of Malabar and Canara, but a certain portion of the produce, whatever that may chance to be, denominated mail warum, the remainder being termed coodee warum, or inhabitants' share of the produce.

79. It is not easy, perhaps, to account for the revenue of wet or nunjah land having been customarily demandable in kind in almost all provinces in the peninsula east of the ghauts. The fluctuation in the produce, in the value of the produce, the desire to obtain the utmost possible revenue in times of high price, a knowledge of the fluctuation in the value of the precious metals, the impossibility of otherwise obtaining so large a proportion of the gross produce as fifty per cent. may all, or in part, have perpetuated the custom of receiving in kind the revenue demandable from rice lands.

80. The dry grain, or poonjah culture, is brought to maturity by the falling rains; it requires only a partial and occasional supply of water. The public revenue from land of this kind is generally demandable in money in the western and southern provinces, but is still paid in kind in the northern provinces, and was formerly rendered in kind in the Carnatic. The crop of a dry field often consists of a variety* of grain ripening at different seasons of the year, which probably made it inconvenient and expensive for the Government to receive their dues in kind. The lands producing poonjah crops, therefore, seem long before the establishment of our Government to have been assessed with a teerwa, or fixed money tax, for a fixed measure of land, generally varying, however, with the nature, not the extent, of the produce.

81. The totacal, or garden and plantation lands, is usually secure of irrigation by artificial means, and is more generally assessed with a fixed money tax; except that, from this kind of cultivation being extremely expensive, the tax, though much higher in proportion to the extent of land, is much lighter in proportion to the value of the produce.

82. The teerwa was in general so much money for a fixed measure of land if cultivated with raggy or pulse, so much for the same measure of land if cultivated with grain, and so on; the rate varying with the nature of the crop, and the crop with the season. For instance, horse grain will come to maturity with a moisture in which other grain would perish. Lands planted with sugar-cane, plantains, the beetle-vine, tobacco, although not classed as gardens, were assessed with a high money rent the year they were so cultivated; but so soon as these lands were again converted into rice land, they fell to the usual warum or portion of the produce taken from rice land. The high assessment on the cultivation of such articles partook, therefore, much of the nature of consumption taxes.

83. It occasionally occurred that land which in one year produced a poonjah crop might perhaps in the next be converted into nunjah,† might then revert to poonjah, again be made nunjah, and afterwards perhaps totacal; so that the ancient Tamil land-tax may be truly said to have been a tax not fixed on the land, but regulated chiefly by the nature of the crop, and in the nunjah lands, where it was a portion of the produce received in kind, it was dependent also on the extent and price of that produce.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

84. The Meerassidars render the public dues, as they are described above, on all the waraput and teerwaput lands which they cultivate, to the officers of the Government appointed to receive them; but the Meerassidars who cultivate lands assigned in maunium tenure render the public revenue due from such lands direct to the individuals to whom the rights of Government have been transferred.

85. In addition to the exclusive right to the hereditary possession and usufruct of the lands in each village, which on the tenure above explained was vested in all the Tamil Meerassidars, a peculiarity distinguished those who inhabited that particular portion of the Tamil country which is known by the name of Tondei Mandalam, and which, extending from the southern extremity of the Nellore district nearly to the river Colleroon, includes chiefly the Company's jaghire, now the zillah of Chingleput, and the two divisions of the Arcot subah.

86. From the earliest times, it would appear that in the villages of that part of the country a certain portion of arable land, to be held altogether free from tax, was attached to the meerassy, and formed an integral and important part of that right. It is termed the cawniatchi or grama maunium, and is altogether distinct from the turabudy, sunnud, or doombala mauniums; for on these the public tax was paid by the Meerassidars to the several individuals holding the same; but on the grama maunium they paid the public tax to themselves, in other words, they held it altogether exempt from tax.

87. Inseparably connected with the cawniatchi maunium, was another peculiar privilege of the Meerassidars of Tondei Mandalam, namely, their right to certain fees or marahs which, under the denomination of cooputtum, cani or grama marah, and calavasem,* they received in the shape of deductions from the gross produce of all the cultivated lands in the village paying tax to the Government Where the lands were cultivated by their own labourers or slaves, this secured to them an additional profit in the nunjah lands only, for in these the deductions were made from the gross produce before the Government share was paid by them; in the poonjah, and other lands assessed with a money tax, the whole of the produce was already their own. But where these lands were cultivated by others, as hereafter explained, the Meerassidars received their marahs on the poonjah, totacal, &c. as well as on the nunjah lands.

88. These marahs, peculiar to the Meerassidars of Tondei Mandalam, must not be confounded with other marahs, or deductions from the gross produce, which, as before-mentioned, are prevalent throughout both the northern and southern provinces in favour of certain village or other officers, such as the village Curnum or accountant, the village or district officer or Cavilgar, or which have been established for other public purposes, such as the repair of tanks, &c. These are paid by the Meerassidars of Tondei Mandalam in common with all others who cultivate the lands, but their own marahs are received by them.

89. On the establishment of every Tamil village, as now constituted, the rights above explained were vested in all the original vellaler settlers, as a collective body, not in each individually; every one of them, therefore, possessed a separate equal share in the whole meerassy, and hence in each village, to the present day, the number of equal shares into which the meerassy was at first divided remains the same as when the village was originally settled. In some villages there are a hundred shares, in others of the same extent fifty or ten only; but whatever may be now the number of Meerassidars, the number of shares invariably remains the same as at first determined. From the number of Meerassidars having decreased since the settlement of the village, some of them may now hold two, three, four, or fifty shares. From their number having increased since that period, the shares may have been split into fourth, sixteenths, thirty-seconds, or other fractional† parts, and many may therefore hold a part only of a share; but the number of original equal shares in each village has continued unaltered for ages. Supposing a village to have been at first divided among thirty-two original settlers, into thirty-two equal shares, shares, and its Meerassidars now to be a hundred in number, if any one of them is asked how many shares there are in the village, he will immediately answer thirty-two, but when asked how many of these belong to himself, or to any other particular Meerassidar, he will answer two, three, or four shares; or perhaps the half, the fourth, or the sixteenth part of a share, as the case happens to be. It was these well known and ascertained facts which induced the Board to record, in their proceedings of the 22d August 1816, that the Potail, and the office, as described by Colonels Munro and Wilkes, did not exist in Tondei Mandalam, or as they believed any where east of the Payenghaut.

* The calavasem marah is generally given to the free labourers, in lieu of hire, and, in some cases, indulgent masters grant it even to their slaves also. Where Pyacarries cultivate the land, the calavasem is appropriated by them, and the other marahs only paid to the Meerassidars.

† The fractions of the peninsula descend by fours, in the same manner as our decimals by tens.

90. In all Tamil villages, the perumboc or uncultivable land, the tarisee or waste, and in Tondei Mandalam the meerassy maunium and marahs also are held in common joint property by the whole of the Meerassidars, each, in proportion to his share in the meerassy, being entitled to participate therein. If a village consists of thirty-two shares, and a Meerassidar possesses half a share, he is entitled to a sixty-fourth part of all the advantages derived from the fisheries, mines, or quarries in the perumboc; to a sixty-fourth part of the pasturage, firewood, and other profits of the tarisee or waste; and, in Tondei Mandalam, to a sixty-fourth part of the gross produce of the meerassy maunium and marahs. In mortgaging or selling the whole or any part of his meerassy, he mortgages or sells a proportionate part of his share in these; but he cannot divide and dispose of any particular spot of land in the perumboc, the tarisee, or meerassy maunium. No particular spot in any of these belongs to him; he possesses a share in all, not a part of each, and the whole must remain entire. This, however, does not apply to the cultivated land, which in some villages is held in this manner by all the Meerassidars collectively, as one joint indivisible property, but in others by each individually, as property of a separate, distinct, and independent nature. Hence its tenure is two-fold, pasang-carei or samadayem, and arudi-carei or pala-b,hogum.*

91. Pasang-carei in Tamil, and samadayem in Sanscrit, are terms both implying collective proprietary right, used to denote that particular joint tenure of the cultivated lands† which, like the joint tenure of the perumboc, tarisee, &c. explained above, was anciently universal throughout the Tamil country, and still prevails in many villages in every part of it, but especially in that known to the natives by the name of Tondei Mandalam. Under this system, the meerassy right to any particular spot of cultivated land in the village is not vested in any individual. The meerassy of the entire cultivated lands attached to it, like that of the perumboc, tarisee, &c. belongs to the whole body of Meerassidars; each, in proportion to the shares or parts of a share he holds, being entitled to participate in the common property. The number of shares belonging to each Meerassidar being known, the lands are either cultivated by them in common, and the net produce, after payment of tax, divided according to the share of each in the meerassy, or the land itself is thus divided, either annually, or every five, six, or ten years, the fields of which the meerassy is to be held by each for that period being fixed by drawing lots.‡

92. In many villages, however, especially in those of Tanjore, Tinnevelly, Madura, Dindigul, and the other Tamil provinces to the south of the Colleroon, the Meerassidars, instead of dividing the cultivated lands of the village periodically, according to the shares or parts of a share held by each, appear, after having once divided them in that manner, to have declared the division permanent, and thus to have converted the ancient collective tenure of the cultivated lands into one in severalty, which is distinguished by the Tamil denomination arudi-carei, or by the corresponding Sanscrit word Pala-b,hogum. Under this system each Meerassidar enjoys the meerassy of his own particular cultivated fields, and has no interference whatever with those of his neighbours; and when he sells his meerassy, he transfers to the purchaser not only his common

* It will be shewn hereafter that the ryotwar plan of assessment destroyed by violence all these ancient usages and customs in the two divisions of Arcot, and so completely, that both Mr Ravenshaw and Mr. Greame have denied the existence of meerassy in those provinces; but it is believed that the courts of justice have been required to try causes relating to this property.

† These terms are also applied to the joint tenure of the perumboc, tarisee, &c.

‡ The ryotwar plan of assessment fixes the assessment on the field, but it does not necessarily fix the field or the lot of a particular individual, although the Board fear it has done so in most cases.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

mon right to participate, to the extent of the share he holds, in the perumboc, tarisee, meerassy maunium, marahs, and other collective property in the village, but his individual right to certain particular and defined cultivated lands. Supposing him to hold half a share in an arudi-carei village of thirty-two shares, he would possess a sixty-fourth part of the whole cultivated lands; namely, fields 1, 2, 3, and 4, with which no other Meerassidar could possibly interfere; but if it were a pasang-carei village, he would possess a sixty-fourth share only in the whole cultivated lands, from 1 to 64 inclusive; in lieu of fields 1, 2, 3, and 4, fields 61, 62, 63, and 64 might fall to his lot, and at the termination of a certain period he would be obliged to relinquish these lands to some other Meerassidar, and to take such other fields as chance might allot to him.

93. In many instances in Tanjore, and occasionally even in other districts, the whole meerassy of a village has by purchase, or other means, become vested in a single individual; and the tenure, in this case, is distinguished from the other two above-mentioned by the denomination of eka-b,hogum.

94. From the nature of these tenures, no village can be partly pasang-carei, partly arudi-carei, and partly eka-b,hogum; it must be one only of the three. Each is to be found in all parts of the country, but, as already explained, the first is most prevalent in the northern, and the second in the southern Tamil provinces; and to these also the last is chiefly confined.

95. The Tamil Meerassidars have thus far been considered as themselves cultivating the lands, by means of their own hired labourers or slaves, as they do so much more universally than the landlords of Malabar or Canara; but like them, also, they occasionally rent out their lands to under-tenants, named Pyacarries.*

96. The Pyacarries, on condition of paying to the Meerassidars a certain share of the produce, or sometimes on poonjah land a certain teerwa in money, but rarely a fixed sum of money for a given extent of land, rent from them lands of a greater or less extent, for one, two, or more years. In the pasang-carei villages they hold of all the Meerassidars collectively, in the arudi-carei villages from each individually, and in the eka-b,hogum villages from the sole Meerassidar. In Tondei Mandalam, in addition to their stipulated rents in kind or money, they pay the established marahs of the Meerassidars, known by the denomination of cooputtum, cawnyatchey, or grama marah, &c. In no case have they any concern whatever with the perumboc, tarisee, or in Tondei Mandalam with the meerassy maunium; and of the rent paid by the Pyacarries, what remains to the Meerassidars, after the liquidation of the land-tax, is called toondoo-warum, or swam b,hogum, the clear net landlord's rent.

97. The Pyacarries or tenants are divided into two distinct classes, named Oolcoody Pyacarries or permanent tenants, and Paracoody Pyacarries or temporary tenants.

98. The Paracoody Pyacarries are strangers admitted into the village as tenants from year to year, or for some other limited period. The terms on which they rent are settled between themselves and the Meerassidars;† and on the expiration of their leases their rents may be raised, or they may be altogether ousted from their farms. In this respect they resemble the Patomkars of Malabar, or the Chalie-guenies of Canara, and like them are, in fact, tenants either at will or under special agreements.

99. But where land for a certain period, which varies in different places, has for several generations been farmed by the same family, the tenant is termed an Oolcoody Pyacarry, and by prescription becomes possessed of an hereditary right to hold his farm in perpetuity, on condition of the regular payment of the maumool

* "This term," observes Mr. Ellis, "is said to be derived from the Persian words paye the foot, "and kurdun to labour, or kisht carkurdun to cultivate. The proper Tamil term is payer-cudi, "or payercaren, from payer, cultivation, and cudi or caren, an inhabitant, a person, from the latter "of which it is probably corrupted."

† For instance, if the tank of a meerassy village is burst by too great a flow of water in a storm, and the water runs off, the Meerassidars of the village visited with so great a calamity would carry their labour to a neighbouring village and cultivate as Pyacarries, but must pay the fees of superiority to prevent their laying any claim, at a future period, to a share of the meerassy of the village in which they have been admitted as temporary cultivators.

maumool or customary warum or teerwa. Like the Mul-guenie of Canara, the Oolcoody Pyacarry and his descendants never can be ousted from their farm so long as this is paid, nor can the warum or teerwa be raised by the Meerassidar; but though they can mortgage, they can never sell these their hereditary privileges.

100. The foregoing may be considered a tolerably correct view of the landed tenures in the Tamil country, as established during the ancient Hindoo governments. The Tamil meerassy never appears to have been of equal value to the jenm of Malabar, or the wurgha of Canara, and the Meerassidars seem to have united in their own persons the character of farmer with that of landlord, much more universal than the Jenmkars or Mulees of the western coast. The difference in the value of these properties is distinctly traceable to the larger portion of the produce taken as public revenue, the less productive nature of the soil, and less favourable climate on the eastern side of the peninsula, compared with the advantages enjoyed by the occupiers of land in Malabar and Canara; but, from the numerous deeds of sale still extant throughout the southern provinces, there is no doubt that at one time meerassy was universally a saleable and transferable property, and that the Meerassidars every where enjoyed a toondoo-warum, or clear landlord's rent, from all the lands cultivated by their Pyacarry tenants, and both a landlord's rent and a farmer's profit from the lands which were cultivated by their own labourers or slaves.*

101. It is by no means, however, to be understood, that this is the state generally of meerassy property at the present time. The severe and arbitrary policy of the Mussulman princes, which, notwithstanding their short and unstable authority on the other coast of the peninsula, so materially affected the interests of the landlords both in Canara and Malabar, proved much more detrimental to the Meerassidars of the Tamil country, where their authority was of considerable duration, and their dominion was firmly established under the commanding influence of European power. It is well known that, by successive augmentations, the demand on the Meerassidars of the Carnatic was gradually raised, so as at last very generally to absorb not only the whole of the landlord's rent, but in many places a portion of the farmer's profit also. Most of the Meerassidars in that part of the country were thus reduced to a situation which, except in name, differed little† from that of the Oolcoody Pyacarries or permanent farmers; and the Mussulman Government, by absorbing the whole landlord's rent, became not only the sovereigns but the landlords of the country, enforcing in practice their favourite maxim, that the state is the exclusive proprietor of the soil.

102. Accordingly, of the Tamil provinces, Tanjore, which was transferred to us directly from the Hindoo government, and was scarcely ever under the Mussulman power, is the only one in which, on our acquisition of the country, meerassy right was found, as before described, nearly unimpaired. In the Chingleput district, also, which was ceded to the Company as a jaghire, before the full extent of the arbitrary power and severity of the Mahomedan government had begun to be felt, as well as in Dindigul, Madura, Trichinopoly, and Tinnevelly,

* The Bramin Meerassidars who do not follow the plough themselves, and even many Soodras, leave their lands under the care of the Oolcoody Pyacarry, who pays about forty-five per cent. of the produce of the land as revenue to the Government, direct, or through the Bramin, from twenty-two to twenty-five per cent. as landlord's rent to the absentee, and is content with from twenty-eight to thirty-three per cent. in remuneration for his labour, for seed, for cattle, and for his subsistence. Many of the Hircarrahs attached to the company of guides are Bramins of the villages of Madranticum and Ootramalore, and hold meerassy. Their meerassy is cultivated by Pyacarries, who pay to the relatives or agents of these Bramins the difference betveen the portion of the produce to Government and the portion due to themselves.

† There was some difference. The Meerassidar besides his right in the cultivated lands, whence he derived his landlord's rent and farmer's profit, possessed other privileges, as already explained, in the perumboc, tarisee, meerassy, mauniums, marahs, &c., and these priviliges continued to be enjoyed, and sometimes to be sold, though his landlord's rent was gone.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818

Tinnevelly, the latest of their southern conquests, meerassy, though greatly reduced in value, was found in a tolerably perfect state; but throughout the soobah of Arcot, and very generally in Salem, Baramahl, and Coimbatore, the successive augmentations made to the land-tax, or what is the same thing, in its effects, the excessive demands made by the Mahommedan government in other shapes, had left of meerassy little else than the name.

103. In Malabar and Canara, where the land-tax was a portion of the landlord's rent, fixed on the land, and collected from the landlord, or those in possession of his rights, whether the fields were cultivated or fallow, the Government did not interfere in any respect with the cultivation of the soil; but from the greater part of the land in the Tamil country consisting of nunjah, and the land-tax thereon being a portion of the produce, any failure of the Meerassidars to cultivate their lands directly affected the public finances. Hence it became an established principle of meerassy tenure, that it was incumbent on the Meerassidars to cultivate all the waraput and teerwaput lands attached to their village, either by means of their own servants or slaves, or by renting them out to Pyacarries or tenants.

104. So long as there remained to the Meerassidars a toondoowarum or clear landlord's rent, they wanted no other stimulus to urge them to cultivate to the utmost; but where this now became absorbed in the Government demands, or in the loss arising from compulsory contracts, or forcible impositions at arbitrary prices of the Government portion of the produce, the land-tax was converted into a land-rent, the landlords sunk into land occupiers or holders, and restricted to the profits of mere farmers in the land cultivated by their own labourers or slaves, they ceased to employ Pyacarry tenants in those other lands, from which they no longer derived any advantage.

105. To prevent the public revenue suffering from arable land being thus left vacant, the Government resorted to the expedient of transferring it *temporarily to Pyacarries or tenants of their own selection. Nay, this principle was even applied to the tarisee or waste lands, and on the Meerassidars declining to cultivate waste for which other offers had been made, it became customary for the Government to grant cowles to Pyacarries, securing them in the occupation thereof, for such a limited term of years as was deemed necessary to ensure to them a fair return for the stock and labour employed to render the land productive. In Tondei Mandalam, however, the share of the produce allowed by the Government to the Pyacarries thus employed by them was more favourable than that which they allowed to the Meerassidars; but this difference was more than compensated to the latter by their retaining the cawniatchy maunium, which the Pyacarries never enjoyed, and which seems to have continued in possession of the descendants of the ancient Meerassidars, even in those places where they relinquished or were ousted from, proportions of their other lands.

106. The employment of Pyacarries or tenants by the Government itself, the natural result of over assessment, greatly contributed to level the ancient distinctions between the meerassy landlords and their pyacarry tenants; for, notwithstanding the Pyacarries thus employed by the Government often admitted the justice of the Meerassidar's demand for his cooputtum, marahs, and toondo-warum, and in Tondei Mandalam for his meerassy marahs also, they too frequently asserted, perhaps with truth, their inability to discharge these dues, in addition to the public assessment; and from their being placed in immediate contact with the Circar, the meerassy landlord had no longer any power to enforce his demands. Under these circumstances, the Pyacarries or tenants, in many instances, from the secession, emigration, or removal of the Meerassidars or landlords, became possessed of a great portion of the cultivated lands in the village. Mr Place, in his elaborate report, under date the 6th June 1799, which has the merit of being the first public document that treated to any extent on the subject of meerassy right, after stating that 15,994 meerassy shares are held by 8,387 Meerassidars, the total number then in the jaghire, expressly adds,* that "the remainder, or 1,827 shares are unclaimed, but "occupied by Pyacarries." Mr. Lushington, in his report on Tinnevelly, under date the 29th December 1800, particularly mentions whole villages of this description, as distinguished from those in which the meerassy still remained entire. The last mentioned villages are known in Tinnevelly by the name of pundarah or agrahara vadiky (meerassy villages of Soodras or Bramins), and the distinction between them and a pyacarry village is well described by Mr. Lushington, as consisting in the latter "not being purchased, and in "their being no practices prevailing in them of pungs,† carays,‡ or rushum,§ "for the lands of the village in general, or any right indeed, in the inha- "bitants, to dispose of, or alienate in perpetuity, the lands they occupy, as is "possessed by the proprietors of the pundarah and agraharah vadiky." Where the meerassy was not yet destroyed, the Meerassidars still possessed a saleable property in the land; but where, by over-assessment, over-collections, or compulsory contracts, they had been reduced to a situation little different from that of mere Pyacarries, or on their quitting or giving up their lands, their former pyacarry tenants had usurped, or been placed in possession of them by Government, all vestige of the original shares into which the village was divided, or of the existing share of each Meerassidar was obliterated: every ancient distinction of this kind disappeared with the private property to which it was attached, and all the cultivators, being considered as Pyacarries or tenants, now paid their rents directly to the state, which had assumed the functions of the landlord also.

10 T expressly

107. Such, more or less, was the situation of each of the Tamil provinces, except Tanjore, when the British Government obtained possession of the country. In Tanjore, meerassy right remained universal throughout the province, and continued a very valuable property. Mr. Harris, in his report of the 9th May 1804, estimated the Meerassidars' toondoo-warum, or clear net landlord's rent, at somewhat less than twenty-five per cent., or about one fourth of the gross produce of the land; the Meerassidars being about the same period upwards of sixty thousand in number. In Trichinopoly, also, Mr. Wallace's report of the 8th September 1805, shews that meerassy was there generally prevalent and valuable. Mr. Hodgson, in his report on Tinnevelly, estimates the toondoo-warum, or surplus rent of the Meerassidars in that province at thirteen and a half per cent. of the gross produce; and his reports also shew that meerassy still existed very generally in Dindigul and Madura, as well as in those lands of Coimbatore which possess wells: but it was universal no where except in Tanjore, and not every where of equal value. It is, however, to be remarked, that in many parts of the country the superstitious veneration of the inferior Hindoo officers of the Mussulman government for the privileges of the Bramins, had preserved the meerassy rights of that sacred tribe from the additional cesses which destroyed those of their less favoured Soodra brethren; for in the northern division of Arcot, where the existence of meerassy generally has been denied by the Collector,‖ he allows that the swastiums of the Bramins are saleable property. In Tinnevelly, also, the dhurmasenum lands on the banks of the Tambrapurney, belonging to a colony of Telinga Bramins, were found more favourably assessed than the Pundarah vadiky, or Soodra meerassy lands; and even in Tanjore the Soodra Meerassidars did not receive so high a warum or share as the Bramins.

108. Having given this view of the actual state of meerassy property on our first acquisition of the Tamil provinces, it remains to shew how far it has been affected by various systems of revenue management adopted by the British Government.

* This gentleman removed the Meerassidars from some of the finest villages, and conferred the meerassy of them, by cowle, on the Pyacarries, or even on strangers: because the Meerassidars refused the terms on which he offered them the rent or contract of the Government portion of the produce for three years. The Government of the time sanctioned the measure Its injustice cannot now be misunderstood. It compelled the Meerassidar not only to render the public dues in kind as established by long usage, but to consent to contract for the value of those dues during three years to come, on an estimate formed by the Collector of the extent of the produce and its price. In other words, on his (the Collector's) estimate of the amount and value of the public tax for the three years to come.

Government. But as the consideration of this subject is connected with the settlements introduced into other parts of the country, such as the Ceded Districts, Nellore, and Palnaud, the Board are obliged to defer their observertions on this head to a subsequent part of this minute, and will now proceed to submit a few remarks respecting the rights of the Ryots in those provinces which have been distinguished by the name of Telingana. Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

In Telingana.

109. Notwithstanding the Northern Circars are the oldest possessions of the British Government on the coast, and some of the most able of the Company's servants have been employed in the Ceded Districts,* we possess less information of the ancient Hindoo tenures of land in Telingana than of those in any other part of the peninsula.

110. This is, perhaps, chiefly to be ascribed to the long period that these provinces were subject to a Mahommedan government. The Bhamanee, Adilshahee, Kootubshahee, and Nizam-shahee dynasties had firmly established their power in these countries, considerably before they were subdued by the princes of the house of Delhi; and while the shortness of the Mussulman power in other parts of the peninsula allowed only of a partial infraction of ancient rights, it was here of sufficient duration to enable them so entirely to subvert the original Hindoo institutions of the country, as to leave of them scarcely a vestige remaining by which they can now be traced.

111. From such information, however, respecting these countries, as is to be procured from the records of the Board, there can be no doubt that the tenures of Telingana were originally very similar to those obtaining in the southern or Tamil provinces.

112. A Telinga village, in regard to its internal constitution, and the community of interest which unites its inhabitants, is precisely the same as one in the Tamil country. Its lands are also divided, in a similar manner, into waste, and cultivated land; the latter is also subdivided into mauniums, or lands on which the whole of the government tax has been alienated to individuals, khandregas, or lands on which a portion only of the Government tax has been so alienated, and lands upon which the full tax is paid to the Government. The nature of the tax payable on the land seems also originally to have varied, as in the Tamil country, with the nature of the crop. On the magance, or lands cultivated with a wet crop, the koroo or Government share of the produce was taken. On the remainder, being the madepaloo or Ryot's share, literally the share of the plough-handle, and on land cultivated with a dry crop, or with garden or plantation produce, a fixed money rent was generally paid, in the same manner as in the southern provinces; but in some cases the revenue on dry crops was rendered in kind.

113. On condition of the due payment of these taxes, and of various office meerassy fees to the village and other public officers, as before explained, the exclusive right to the hereditary possession and usufruct of the soil in each village of Telingana seems originally to have been vested in certain classes of Hindoos, of the Coombee, Reddy, and other Soodra casts, whose descendants are now known by the Hindoostanee appellation of Cadeems, or representatives of the antient inhabitants, and who continue to this day to be the principal cultivators in every village of Telingana.

114. From the marked distinction still maintained between these Cadeems and the Pyacarri Ryots, from the Potail mauniums of the Ceded Districts and those of the head Reddies and Naicks, or Pedda Caupoos in the Northern Circars, being often held in shares, like the grama maunium of Tondei Mandalam, from the general resemblance of the village institutions of the two countries, and from the word cawnatchey being well understood and employed in Telingana to designate private landed property, even though now there unknown, the Board have little doubt that the Tamil meerassy, or a very similar tenure, was at one time established throughout the northern districts. Certain however it is, that long before our acquisition of the country, private property in the land, if it ever prevailed in these provinces, had ceased to exist. The

* Cuddapah and Bellary.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan 1818.

The Cadeems, if they at any time enjoyed a toondoo-warum or clear landlord's rent, had long before that period been universally deprived of it, by the over-assessments of their Mussulman rulers; and if they ever possessed the power to sell or dispose of their lands, it must have been at a time far beyond the memory of man; for not only has this power continued unclaimed by any Ryot, from Nellore to Ganjam, but there has not yet been discovered a single deed of the sale of landed property by individuals in any of the provinces throughout Telingana.

115. Accordingly, on the cession of the Telinga provinces to the British Government, the Cadeems, whatever their former situation may have been, were possessed of no other rights than those of the Oolcoody Pyacarries in the Tamil country. Their landlord's rent, if it ever existed, with all power of selling or disposing of the land, was universall ygone; but they continued the hereditary permanent farmers of their villages, and so long as they paid the public dues, they could not be ousted from their lands, which, though not now saleable, have descended from father to son from generation to generation.

116. This hereditary right to their lands seems, indeed, to have been the only distinction remaining between them and the Pyacarry Ryots; for the public dues had here been raised higher than in any other part of the peninsula.* One-half, and in some cases only one third of the wet, two-thirds or even one-half of the dry, and from three-fourths to seven-eighths of the garden crop, has been calculated as the nominal share of the Ryot; but, in fact, the demand on him was limited only by the supposed extent of his means: his share was often reduced to a fifth, or even a sixth of the produce, and over-assessment had every where levelled the Cadeem to the situation of the Pyacarri.†

117. Where the ancient system continued to be observed, each Ryot occupied and cultivated the lands which had been ploughed by his fathers, rendering to the Government, or its representative of whatever rank or class, a portion of the wet crop, and a fixed money tax on dry grain lands and garden produce. But whether introduced by some of the great revenue officers of the native governments as an improved system of administration, or resorted to by the Ryots themselves, in order in some degree to avoid the undefined demands and oppressive exactions of the Mahommedan government, what is known in the Northern Circars by the name of the veesabudy settlement had existed in many of the villages of Telingana long anterior to the introduction of our power. Under this system, a fixed sum of money was assessed on the whole village, for one or more years. A certain number of the most respectable Ryots became answerable for this amount, each being responsible for his own separate portion thereof, and all for each other, and the lands were divided by lot, as in the samadayem villages of the Tamil country, the portion of land to be occupied by each being determined by the proportion of the rent for which he became responsible. Thus, if ten Ryots obtained their village for three years at a veesabuddy rent of one hundred pagodas, the first becoming responsible for twenty, the second for forty, and the other eight for five pagodas each, the lands of the village would be divided into ten equal shares, the first would be entitled to two of these, the second to four, and each of the others to half a share; and from this division of the lands into shares the settlement took its name of veesabuddy, namely, a village settlement by shares in ready money.

118. The foregoing remarks, it is hoped, are sufficiently explanatory of the rights of the Ryot in Telingana and the Tamil country, at the period of our first acquisition of these provinces. It remains to shew how far they have been affected by the various systems of revenue management introduced under our rule.

119. In

* See fifth Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons.

† It does not appear to have been customary for the cultivators in the Northern Circars to take the Government portion of the produce at a fixed price. The Cadeem inhabitants have seldom been renters of their villages, and a difficulty is now experienced in prevailing on the Cadeem inhabitants of the Chicacole estates to rent their villages even for a grain rent. The public revenue has very generally, and for a long period, been paid through intermediate renters, not only in the havelly lands but in the zemindarries. These renters take the Government portion of the crop in kind and make the most of it, paying an equivalent in money to the Zemindar or Collector, as the case may be.

Minute of Board of Revenue 5 Jan. 1818.

119. In considering this branch of the subject, it would extend these proceedings to a most voluminous length to enter into a detail of the measures adopted in each district on its transfer to our authority. Much at first was necessarily left to the discretion of the different local authorities deputed to take possession of the country; but the settlements were various, fluctuating, and ill defined, until a regular system of revenue administration was adopted, by the introduction first of the zemindarry, next of the ryotwar, and lastly of the village settlement.

Rights of the Zemindar.—The Zemindarry Settlement.

120. In the preceding part of this minute, the payments in kind or money made by the great body of the Ryots in the northern and southern provinces on the coast, have been considered, as they always have been by the people themselves, to be the dues of the state. But on our accession to the government, these dues were seldom paid directly into the public treasury. In the Northern Circars we found the country divided into zemindarries and havellies, and in the rest of the country into pollam and ain lands. In the zemindarries and pollams the dues of the Government, as before described, were paid by the Ryots to a class of people known by the denomination of hereditary Zemindars or Poligars, with whom the Government settled annually or periodically for their revenue; but in those parts of the country distinguished by the appellation of havelly or ain lands, the Ryots paid their dues either to the Government itself, or to servants or renters authorized by them to receive the same. In the Northern Circars the zemindarries were much more extensive than the havellies; but in the other parts of the country the pollams bore a very small proportion to the ain lands.

121. There cannot be any doubt that the greater number of the Zemindars, and several of the Poligars also, were in fact the descendants of the ancient Hindoo princes of the country. The Velmas were an aboriginal race of Telinga origin, that had existed in the northern provinces from time immemorial. The Ratsewars were the descendants of a colony of the pure Raja tribe, from the north of Hindoostan, who had emigrated to the Northern Circars, and incorporated themselves with the people considerably anterior to the Mahommedan conquest; and the Woorias were the offspring of the Guzzeputty, or kings of Orissa, whose inroads and conquest in the Circars are celebrated by many of the best native authors. At the same time, it must be admitted, that some of the Zemindars, and most of the Poligars, could boast no higher extraction than being desended from officers of the ancient Hindoo states, who in times of confusion had usurped the revenues of those lands with the management of which they had been entrusted: such were the Deshmooks, Deshpondiahs and Muzmadars of the Northern Circars, and the Southern Poligars who were Cavelcars.

122. Whatever may have been the origin of these persons, certain it is that, in consequence of the woody, unhealthy, or inaccessible nature of their zemindarries and pollams, most of them were confirmed by the Mahommedan government, at the period of their invasion, in the hereditary right to collect the revenues of the lands which they occupied, on condition of paying to the Government a revenue called a jumma or peshcush, which was fixed with reference to the supposed amount of the public dues demandable from the Ryots. The difference between the revenue thus paid by them to Government, and that which they received from the Ryots, constituted, after deducting charges of collection, the value of the tenures they held.

123. On our acquisition of the country, the existing Zemindars and Poligars, on condition of continuing the payment of a jumma, peshcush, or revenue to the Government, at first fixed annually, but afterwards periodically, were left to collect the public dues from the Ryots in their respective zemindarries and pollams, according to the established usage of the country, respecting which little information had at that time been acquired; and, with a few exceptions, this system was continued in these lands, until the period of the introduction of the permanent zemindarry settlement, in 1802 and 1803.

124. To enter into a detail of the revenue assessed up to that period on the different Zemindars and Poligars would now be of little utility; nor does it seem seem necessary particularly to describe the nature and amount of the fluctuating settlements at first established in the havelly or ain lands, subsequently settled on the zemindarry tenure; it seems sufficient to observe, that though the public dues were there payable by the Ryots directly to the Government, they were at first rented out, in the ancient possessions of the Company, by large provinces, and subsequently by pergunnahs or smaller divisions, and that it was not until a late period that the Collectors succeeded in establishing there detailed settlements, similar to those subsequently introduced at once into the modern possessions of the Company, consisting in general either of an aumanee settlement, under which the dues of Government were received from the Ryots, either individually or collectively, in kind, or of what was styled a rent on dowl or estimate, under which the Government share of the produce was valued in money, with reference either to the current prices of the day, or the average price of grain for a number of years past, and a money rent stipulated for in lieu of the payment in kind. In such cases the gross produce was made over to the renters. These renters were generally strangers and speculators. So that in the Northern Circars, during a long course of years, the public revenue was collected direct in kind from the cultivators by intermediate agents either temporary or permanent. In a few cases only, and that of late years, has it been collected by the immediate officers of Government.

125. The evils arising from the fluctuating and temporary settlements thus adopted in the ancient possessions of the East-India Company on the coast, were too obvious long to escape observation. They finally attracted the most serious notice both of this, and of the Supreme Government; and the permanent zemindarry settlement, which after much discussion, and most mature deliberation, had been introduced by Marquis Cornwallis, to remedy similar evils in Bengal, was ordered by the Court of Directors to be established throughout the provinces immediately subject to this presidency, and accordingly was introduced into a part or the whole of the following districts.

126. The principles of the permanent zemindarry settlement have been so often and so fully discussed, and are now so generally understood, that an elaborate illustration of them in this place would be superfluous. It will be sufficient briefly to state that each zemindarry, including all the lands, both waste and arable, within the boundaries of a certain number of villages, was assessed in perpetuity with a fixed land revenue payable in all seasons; that this revenue was assessed, not on each village, but on the whole number of villages in the zemindarry collectively; and that, on condition of the payment of this defined sum, each Zemindar in his own zemindarry was vested with what was termed "the proprietary right of the soil," assumed hitherto to have belonged belonged to the Government, but was restricted in his demands on the Ryots to the fixed rates of assessment in money, or division of the produce in kind long established. In cases of disputes, the rates prevailing in the cultivated lands of his zemindarry, in the year preceding the permanent settlement, was to be his guide and his right. This tenure fixed the rate, but not the amount of the dues payable to the Zemindar; the amount payable by him, however, was unalterably determined, and on this tenure the zemindarry and pollam lands were made over to the existing Zemindars and Poligars in perpetuity. The havellies or ain lands were subdivided, in the same manner, into estates or mootahs, composed of many villages. They varied in size, in the number of villages, and consequently in their value, according to circumstances. The permanent assessment on these lands fluctuated from one thousand to five thousand pagodas, and the zemindarry tenure thereof was sold, by public auction, to the highest bidder, who became vested with all the rights which this tenure conferred, or rather with all the rights of the sellers, the Government.

127. Of the success which has attended this settlement, where it was not formed on erroneous* principles as to the amount, a very convincing proof was afforded in the Board's address to Government of the 26th December 1814, where it was shewn that in the permanently settled districts, exclusive of Ganjam, the demand on settlement for the last twelve years, amounting to upwards of three hundred and thirty-two lacs of pagodas, had been realized to the extent of upwards of three hundred and twenty-seven lacs, leaving a balance of little more than five lacs, or somewhat less than two per cent., a large portion of which is recoverable. The increased facility and regularity with which this revenue has been collected, free from any extensive abuses on the part of the native revenue servants, and exempting the Government, through its Collectors and superintending Boards, from the heavy duties inseparable from annual settlements, and from investigations into annual accusations of fraud and embezzlement in the collection of the revenue, and in the money expended in repairs of the reservoirs for irrigation, and its securing tranquillity with a force diminished in a most extraordinary degree, forms a striking contrast with the former fruitless attempts of the Government to enforce the payment of their dues in the circars, the evasion and subterfuges practised by the Zemindars and Poligars, the coercion and assistance of a military force to which it was so often found necessary to resort for the purpose of realizing the collections from the zemindarry and pollam lands, and the numerous abuses of every description formerly so prevalent throughout the native establishments, and which still continue to disgrace those districts in which temporary settlements continue to prevail.

128. While these and many other important benefits, expected to be produced by the permanent zemindarry system, are fully allowed to have resulted from it, it has been argued that the private rights of the Ryot have been infringed, by the declaration that the Zemindars are vested with "the proprietary right of the soil." There can be no doubt that, at the time the settlement was made, the rights of the Ryots were not so well ascertained as they have been since that period; and this, with the circumstance of the Ryots in the ancient possessions of the Company in Telingana possessing no ostensible property in the soil, may have led to the erroneous conclusion that the Government, or their representative the Zemindar, were the proprietors of the land, and thus given rise to the expression quoted above; but that the proprietary right transferred by the Government to the Zemindars was nothing more than their own proprietary right; in other words, their right to receive and appropriate the public dues payable by the Ryot, is sufficiently evident from this circumstance, that the same Regulations which gave what is perhaps incorrectly termed "a proprietary right" to the Zemindar, restrict his demands on the Ryot to the customary rates of assessment in money, or division of the produce in kind, or in case of dispute to the rates prevailing in the cultivated lands of his zemindarry in the year preceding the permanent settlement. The Government, in short, transferred to the Zemindars nothing but what they were competent to transfer, viz. the right to collect the public dues from the Ryots;

* The error was in over-assessment, not in any other part of the plan. It is an error which has been committed in every other plan for collecting the public revenue, viz. rents by districts, by talooks, by villages, by fields.

Ryots; and as the amount of these could not be fixed, they limited the rates of assessment to those which were payable by the Ryot at the period the permanent settlement was introduced.

129. By these provisions, the rights of the Ryot, both in Telingana and the Tamil country, have not only been preserved under the permanent zemindarry system, but, by the establishment of regular courts of judicature, introduced along with that system, they have been confirmed and upheld, in a manner before unknown under the British rule; and the privileges of the Cadeems in the northern, and of the Meerassidars in the southern provinces, as before described, have often been preserved by the courts from infraction, not only by the Zemindars, but what it is to be feared has often proved of much more serious injury, the over-zeal of native revenue servants, and sometimes of their superior officers.

130. The situation of the Ryots under this system of collection, so far as a judgment can be formed from the information before the Board, may be pronounced to be in general favourable. Pottahs, it is true, are seldom issued; but more, it is believed, from the unwillingness of the Ryots to receive these writings, than from any backwardness on the part of the Zemindars to grant them. A division of the crop is the general mode of settlement, and in this case a pottah is considered unnecessary by either party, the share of each being most clearly defined by the custom of the country as established long anterior to the period when the zemindarry settlement was introduced. Hence the Ryot has been led to consider a pottah as nearly synonimous with a fixed rent in money or in kind; and although, in such cases, the Board have reason to believe that agreements are usually exchanged, they are inclined to think that the Ryot generally prefers cultivating for his share only: and except in some of the ancient zemindarries, where the arbitrary power formerly exercised by the Zemindar is not yet fully eradicated, the situation of a zemindarry Ryot is considered by many, and by our senior member in particular, as superior to most of those placed immediately under Collectors and their native officers.

131. At the same time it must be admitted, that in some districts the permanent zemindarry settlement has not proved so successful as in others. This, however, is to be attributed not to any defect in the principles of that settlement, but to errors in applying these principles in practice. The Honourable Court of Directors have stated that errors of considerable magnitude were committed in forming the permanent zemindarry settlement in Bengal;* but if the Board are rightly informed, the general error there was under-assessment, proceeding from the want of correct information respecting the real resources of the country. The principal error here has unfortunately been of the opposite nature.

132. In the Chicacole and Ganjam havellies, and in the Dindigul district, the permanent settlement has altogether failed, a great part of these lands having reverted to the Government. In Salem also, and in the Company's jaghire, now the zillah of Chingleput, a considerable portion of the country has returned into the hands of Government; and instances of a similar kind have occurred in regard to some of the southern pollams, but in the other permanently settled districts the settlement has in general stood, and every year it is probable will add to its stability. The estates advertised for sale at the termination of each fusily year are still indeed numerous; but this is a mere form, most of the balances being paid off before the day of sale, and few estates being now ever brought to the hammer.

133. The universal cause of these failures has been ascertained to have been over-assessment at the period of fixing the amount of the permanent jumma. The origin of this over-assessment in Salem and Dindigul will be sufficiently explained by the subsequent remarks of the Board on the ryotwar survey of these districts. That in Chingleput is to be attributed chiefly to the enhanced village rents of Mr. Place, founded on estimates of the produce, and other hypothetical data, included in his turabuddy and teerwa accounts, unfortunately taken as correct estimates in the accounts framed for guides in forming the permanent settlement, and the over-assessment in the permanent settlement of of the Chicacole havelly is to be ascribed to causes of a local nature, which it is impossible to detail in this place, but which are fully explained in the Report from the former Collector, noted in the margin.*

134. Though the permanent zemindarry settlement has thus failed in some particular instances, from a cause that would equally have affected any other kind of settlement whatever, it is the opinion of the Board that experience has confirmed the wisdom of the policy which dictated its introduction into the zemindarry and pollam lands. The ancient Zemindars and Poligars were, in fact, the nobility of the country, and though the origin of some of their tenures would not bear too minute a scrutiny, they were connected with the people by ties which it was more politic, more liberal, and more just to strengthen than to dissolve. Had our power in the northern Circars been as strong on the acquisition of these provinces, as it subsequently became at the period of the transfer of the Ceded Districts, the ancient Zemindars, like the Poligars† of the latter country might perhaps have been removed from their lands, and reduced to the situation of mere pensioners on our bounty; but when the attachment of the people to their native chieftains and the local situation of many zemindarries are considered, it may be greatly doubted whether such a policy would not have been as unwise as it would have been ungenerous, and at the time perhaps impracticable. The Board, not being unanimous in their opinion, are not prepared to maintain that the creation of Zemindars in the havelly and ain lands was equally free from objection; they are, however satisfied, and hope what they have stated will satisfy others, that it did not interfere, as has been erroneously supposed by some, with the rights of the Ryots, but where meerassy was a saleable property, the creation of a new and distinct proprietary right, even nominally in the land, was perhaps unnecessary, if not objectionable.

135. In concluding these remarks upon the permanent zemindarry settlement, it may be proper to notice that its extension has been lately resisted chiefly on the ground that it limits in perpetuity the demand of the state upon the land, while the expenses of the Government continue undefined and unlimited. This, the Board must admit, is an objection of great weight against any settlement in perpetuity, and they are inclined to believe that nearly the same advantages might have been obtained by limiting the demand of Government for a long but definite period, as have followed from the settlement fixed in perpetuity.

The Ryotwar Settlement.

136. The ancient territories of the Company having been long in their posssession, previously to the introduction of the permanent zemindarry settlement, the actual collections for a series of years past were adopted as the general basis of the assessment in perpetuity. But possessing no correct information respecting the real resources of their more modern acquisitions, a detailed survey of the country was there deemed a necessary preliminary to the conclusion of a permanent settlement, and this survey, adopted at first merely with a view to the introduction of the permanent zemindarry settlement, gradually gave rise to a new system of revenue administration, now generally known by the name of the ryotwar settlement.

137. The ryotwar system had its origin in the Baramahl and Salem districts, ceded to the Company in 1792, and was first introduced there by Colonel Read, the officer appointed to take charge of that country on its cession; Colonel Munro, Colonel Macleod, and Colonel Graham, then Lieutenants, were assistants under Colonel Read.‡

138. This system has been defined to be "for the Collector, instead of "renting the lands of the village to the head inhabitant of it, to enter into "direct engagements with every Ryot or cultivator situated within its boun-

 "daries

* From Mr. Alexander, dated 25th February 1807.

‡ Thus, in a province yielding about four and a half lacs of Pagodas, four efficient European officers stood appointed, whose time was chiefly devoted to the duties of revenue.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

" daries for the revenue he was to pay on account of land he occupied;" for which purpose " a regular survey of the lands was undertaken, by which it " was ascertained what was the real extent of land cultivated, the different " descriptions of it, both with reference to the tenures by which it was held " and the kinds of produce which it yielded; what quantity a given portion of " seed would yield of a particular produce; what was the extent of land, " either uncultivated or waste, and also, what was the share of the produce to " which, according to the unadulterated usage of the country, the Government " was entitled."*

139. It has been stated, in the former part of this minute, that in the Baramahl, and other districts belonging to the Company's modern possessions, a share of the produce on wet crops, and a teerwa in money on dry cultivation, varying with the species of grain cultivated, was payable by the Ryot directly to the Government: in short, that the public revenue varied with the nature of the crop, and in the wet lands with the extent and price of the produce also. The object of the ryotwar settlement was to fix a defined tax in money on each field, whether of wet land, dry land, or garden land, whatever might be produced on it: to tax the land itself instead of the crop.

140. The grand difference between this system and the permanent zemindarry settlement was, that engagements for the revenue were entered into by the Government directly with each individual Ryot, instead of with an intermediate hereditary Zemindar; that in consequence of this detail, the revenue was collected by a great number of district servants, instead of being paid by a Zemindar directly into the huzzoor treasury; that the assessment was a permanent maximum rent fixed on each field, and liable to remission annually, instead of a fixed invariable revenue being stipulated for, in lieu of the Government rights, from an extensive district including many villages; and that the waste land brought into cultivation gave an increase of public revenue, instead of being added to the amount of the dues payable to the Zemindar, but not to the public.

141. The object under ryotwar being to tax the soil itself, instead of the crop, the first step was to ascertain the superficial extent of the land, by the actual measurement of each cultivated field and each tract of waste; the next and more difficult step was to assess a fixed sum of money on each field or tract thus measured. This two-fold process was what has been called the ryotwar survey; and as the Board have reason to believe that neither this important part of the old ryotwar system, nor its effects, are generally well understood, they consider it necessary here to give a concise abstract of such information as they possess on this subject.

In Baramahl.†

142. The ryotwar survey was introduced into Salem and Baramahl under Colonel Read, by Colonel Macleod in the centre, and Colonel Graham in the northern division. The Board are not aware what means were adopted to obtain a correct measurement of the extent of land in these countries; but as the business was new to all, and the measurement does not appear to have been revised, it is probable that, as elsewhere, it may in detail have been often very erroneously executed.

143. Colonel Read has been more explicit in detailing the second part of the survey, viz. the assessment of the land surveyed. His process was, 1st, to ascertain the average produce of each field in a favourable season; 2dly, thence to deduce its average produce, including seasons both good, bad, and indifferent; 3dly, next to convert this average produce into money; and 4thly, to divide this money in certain proportions between the Ryot and the Government.

144. In ascertaining the average produce of each field in favourable seasons, the Assessor was guided by his own judgment of the nature and situation of the soil, by the crop or stubble on the ground, or by the information of the people on the spot. Suppose that from these data he calculated that a dry field, in a good

* See Fifth Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons.

† See Colonel Read's Report, 4th April 1800.

Minute of Board of Revenue 5 Jan. 1818.

good season, would produce thirty-five candies of raggy, and in another twenty-five of bajra, the total of these is sixty, the average thirty, and this was adopted; suppose also that, from the same data, he calculated that a wet field, in a good season, would produce twenty candies of paddy, the average produce of these two fields in a favourable season would be assumed as follows:

The dry........................30 candies,
The wet ....20 candies.

145. The next process was thence to deduce the average produce in all seasons, including good, bad, and indifferent years. For this purpose it was assumed that an average year's produce was equal to eleven-sixteenths of a full dry crop, and thirteen-sixteenths of a full wet crop: the quantities above-mentioned weretherefore reduced

In the dry lands to......Candies 20 11 2
In the wet lands to 16 15 0

146. The price at which these quantities of grain were converted into money was fifteen and a quarter cantary fanams per candy for dry, and sixteen cantary fanams per candy for wet produce. Hence the quantities above-mentioned became in money:

	Chs.	Fs.	C.
The dry	31	4	8
The wet	26	8	0

147. This money was then divided between the Ryot and the Government in the following proportions:

	To the Ryot, per cent.	To Government, per cent.
In dry lands	68	32
In wet lands, watered by superior rivers	55	45
Ditto by inferior	60	40
Ditto by tanks	62½	37½
Ditto by tanks three-quarters, and by wells one quarter	67	33
Ditto by tanks one-half, and by wells one-half	70	30
Ditto by tanks one-quarter, and by wells three-quarters	72½	27½
Ditto by wells more than eighteen feet	75	25
Ditto ....less	80	20

148. Supposing, therefore, that the wet field before-mentioned was one watered by a tank, without the assistance of wells, the Circar teerwa on the two fields would be as follows:

The dry thirty-two per cent.........................10 chs.
The wet thirty-seven and a-half per cent.........10 chs.

149. From the foregoing data a table was prepared by Colonel Read, by which the Surveyors, on estimating the produce of a field in plentiful years, were enabled nearly at once to fix the rate of teerwa in money to be assessed thereon.*

150. New rates † of teerwa having been thus obtained, they were modified, 1st, by the circumstances both of the lands and of the cultivators; 2dly, by the rent of the preceding and current year. In regard to the first modification, it may be proper to observe that "the proximity or distance of lands in respect "to market towns" was considered; next "the strength, health, stock, and "other circumstances of the cultivator" In regard to the second modification, the Board will also quote Colonel Read's own words, premising that by "valuation" he means the valuation of the ryotwar survey. "If the "valuation, the former rent, and the demand were nearly the same, the "medium was deemed the fair assessment. If the former rent and demand "were above the valuation, and the Ryot rich, the assessment was raised; if poor,

" poor, it was lowered. If they were below the valuation, and the Ryot poor, " they were admitted as the fair assessment. If the valuation, the former " rent, and the demand, all differed, the medium was taken, and modified, " as in all cases, to the ability of the Ryot."

151. Colonel Read then adds, that as the teerwas were "thus generally reduced " below the valuation," in order to suit the circumstances of the Ryots, and as the Ryots were subject to frequent changes, they were subsequently raised, in the second or third year, to " their proper standard, or those which the " Ryots in common could afford."

152. Under the foregoing circumstances the rates of teerwa in the Baramahl countries were extremely numerous. Colonel Read enumerates no less than sixty-six different rates on dry land, varying from 2 Pagodas 11 Fanams 20 Cash, to 2 Fanams 65 Cash, and averaging Pagodas 0 21 40 per acre; and no less than fifty-one different rates on wet land, varying from Pagodas 6 18 16 to Pagodas 0 11 20, and averaging Pagodas 2 3 28 per acre.*

153. The following statement exhibits the average rate of teerwa in each division, the survey assessment on the arable lands, the settlement for fusily 1202, and the difference between that settlement and the survey.†

154. A very superficial review of the principles of this survey would seem sufficient to satisfy the most scrupulous inquirer that it was ill calculated to effect the object it had in view, viz. an equal and moderate money assessment on each field. It commenced by a loose estimate of the probable produce of a field in a good season, it then proceeded on the hypothesis that, of this estimate, eleven-sixteenths in dry, and thirteen-sixteenths in wet lands, was the average produce in average seasons, and it converted this produce into money at an assumed average price. The Board have no doubt that the average produce and price assumed by Colonel Read were the result of much statistical inquiry, and deep, intricate calculations; but the whole would appear to have been founded on hypothesis, not on actual results.

155. The rates of division between Ryot and Government were no doubt liberal; but this was undone, by raising or lowering the assessment on the soil, " according to the health, strength, stock, and other circumstances of the " cultivator;" and surely it was a misnomer to call that an assessment on the land, which was " modified in all cases to the ability of the Ryot."

156. Experience has, indeed, amply proved, what may in some degree be gathered from Colonel Read's own reports, that this survey, which professed to tax the soil, taxed rather the cultivator, and imposed not a moderate equal maximum assessment, but a most unequal, and in general an over-assessment on the country.

157. Of the inequality of the assessment, the very great difference between the average rates of teerwa in the three divisions is a strong proof; for after making every allowance for a difference of soil, which scarcely can exist in countries so contiguous, it is impossible otherwise to account for so great a discrepancy. In the dry lands the average rates of teerwa in the centre division exceeded those in the northern by two fanams per acre, and those in the southern

† See Paragraph 196 and 198.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

southern were higher than those in the centre by seven fanams per acre, or one-third. In the wet lands the rates in the centre division were the lowest, those in the northern division were higher by three fanams seventy-four cash per acre, and those in the southern higher than those in the northern division by no less than Pagoda 1 17 10 per acre.

158. But decisive proof, both of the inequality and excess of the new assessment, has been since afforded; for when, with reference to the ryotwar assessment and the collections under it, the lands of these districts were subsequently assessed with a jumma, on the permanent zemindarry tenure, the Zemindars found it immediately necessary to reduce the teerwas, and these reductions in some cases extended to half the land under cultivation.* Nay, the high jumma assessed on the estates in the Salem or southern division, in consequence of the high ryotwar teerwas of Colonel Macleod, which exceeded the settlement of 1202 by no less than thirty-six and a half per cent., has been the principal cause of the failure of the permanent zemindarry settlement in that part of the country; and in the estates of the Salem district which have consequently reverted to the Government, the Board have been obliged to authorize a general reduction of the pre-existing teerwa.† No where, indeed, do the survey rates of assessment appear generally to have stood well, except in the Baramahl or centre division, where they were fixed by Colonel Munro, who seems, more than any of the others, to have modified his teerwas by the only certain criterion, the past actual collections; for his survey assessment exceeded the settlement of 1202 by only three and a half per cent., while that of Colonel Graham was twenty-nine and a half, and that of Colonel Macleod thirty-six and a half per cent. above it.

In the Ceded Districts.‡

159. The ryotwar settlement was subsequently introduced by Colonel Munro himself into the Ceded Districts in 1800; but the experience he had acquired in the Baramahl, while under Colonel Read, enabled him to effect the survey of these extensive provinces in a manner much more satisfactory than that of the Baramahl.

160. This survey was commenced in 1802, but was not concluded until 1807. It was conducted on a regular systematic plan, under various judicious checks and under detailed written instructions, and was attended by an expense of upwards of 80,000 pagodas.

161. It began, as in Baramahl, with the measurement of the superficial extent of each field and tract of waste. The Potail with other inhabitants and the Curnum attended the Surveyors employed for this purpose, who were required to measure a certain quantity of land every month, and each Ryot had notice of the time that his field was to be measured in order that he might attend. To correct the measurement of the Surveyors also, head Surveyors were employed, who measured monthly one-tenth of the land fixed for a Surveyor, tried the measurement of each Surveyor every month, and if any Ryot complained of the unfair measurement of his field measured it again. By dividing this part of the survey from the rest, and employing a distinct class of persons for the purpose, by checking the first measurement by a second, and enabling the Ryot to be present when the extent of his field was ascertained, the Board are of opinion that, so far as error could be obviated in the detailed measurement of so extensive a country, it was prevented in the Ceded Districts.

162. The next and most important part of the survey was to assess a sum of money on each field. For this purpose Colonel Munro first formed tables, dividing the land into certain classes, and affixing a rate of assessment to each class: 2dly, he deputed Surveyors to class and assess the fields of each village, according to these tables.

164. It is much to be regretted that Colonel Munro's reports and statements afford no information respecting the sources whence he formed these tables. Those for dry land may have been the result of his inquiries respecting the actual teerwas on punjah land, of which the Ceded Districts chiefly consists; or, like those for the wet lands, they may have been the result of calculations of average produce and price, founded either on actual or hypothetical data. On this important branch of the survey, on which so much depended, no satisfactory information is to be obtained. It is stated, however, that though the rates were nineteen in number for dry, and twelve for wet fields, the number of rates in any one village was limited to ten for dry, six for garden, and eight for wet fields; and that though the difference between each rate was five cantary fanams for wet and garden fields, and half a cantary fanam for dry land, intermediate rates were found necessary in some districts.

165. The tables above mentioned, with appropriate detailed instructions in writing, having been delivered to the Assessor, for his guidance, he "went over "the land with the Potail, Curnum, and Ryots, and arranged it in different "classes according to its quality."—"The classification was made rather by "the Potail, Curnum, and Ryots, than by the Assessor; for he adopted their "opinion, unless he saw evident cause to believe that it was wrong, when a "reference was made to the head Ryots of any of the neighbouring villages, "who fixed the class to which the land in dispute should belong."

166. To correct errors arising from the negligence or fraud of the Assessors, head Assessors were appointed to review their accounts, and to insert, in columns left blank for the purpose, any incorrect or partial classification or assessment that they might detect; and as an interval of several months intervened between the investigation of the ordinary Assessor and that of the head one, every Ryot had time to ascertain whether his lands were properly assessed; and if he thought that they were not, the head Assessor, by means of arbitrators from the neighbouring villages, the inhabitants of which were already assembled, easily determined the dispute.

167. Had Colonel Munro stopped here, the ryotwar survey of the Ceded Districts, notwithstanding its being more regular, more systematic, and better conducted than that of the Baramahl, would still perhaps have been equally far from a just maximum standard of assessment. But experience had taught him that "it is the nature of an assessment proceeding from single fields to "whole

" whole districts, and taking each field at its supposed average, to make the " aggregate sum greater than could be easily realized."—" The whole classi- " fication and assessment," therefore, " underwent a complete investigation " in the Collector's cutcherry," all the Potails, Curnums, and Ryots of each district to be settled being there assembled, and " the business was begun " by fixing the sum which was to be the total revenue of the district. This " was usually effected by the Collector in a few days, by comparing the collec- " tions under the Native Princes, under the Company's Government from its " commencement, the estimates of the ordinary and the head Asssors, and the " opinions of the most intelligent natives;" and the amount fixed " was " usually from five to fifteen per cent. lower than the estimates of the Asses- " sors." It remained next to apportion this remission on the several villages. This was not done by an uniform remission of so much per cent.: more was granted to one village, and less to another, according to the investigation and opinion of the principal Ryots of the neighbouring villages. " After settling " what proportion of the whole remission was to be allowed to each village, " it still was necessary to ascertain whether, or not, any alteration was requi- " site in the classification of lands. In some villages where none appeared to " be necessary, and where no objections were made, the classification of the " head Assessor was confirmed, and the rent of each class, and consequently " of each field, determined at once, by lowering their assessment by the rate " of remission granted to the village. In those villages where complaints " were made of the classification, the objections were examined; and if they " were allowed to be just by Ryots not interested in the matter, the necessary " alterations were made."

168. The ryotwar survey of the Ceded Districts thus proceeded on sounder principles than that of the Baramahl, or perhaps than that of any other province under this Government; but notwithstanding the ability with which it was conducted, it appears to have been defective in some respects, and the rates have been found too high.

169. The employment of one class of men to survey the extent of each field, and of another separate class of people to superintend its classification and assessment, was highly judicious. The same may be said of the different checks imposed on both, and of the arrangement which left the classification and assessment of the lands in each village to the Potail, Curnum, and inhabitants, under the check and controul of their neighbours, and by distributing the aggregate demand in detail upon the fields of the country, according to the local information and individual interests of the people themselves, made the Assessor rather the registrar of their arrangements than a person employed by Government to fix an arbitrary money tax on each field of an extensive province, according to his own ignorant, vague, or erroneous estimate of its produce. It was also obviously a wise principle that induced Colonel Munro to proceed from the aggregate to the detail, instead of from the detail to the aggregate, to fix the assessment first on each district, and then to subdivide it upon villages and fields, instead of the reverse process which had hitherto obtained; and it is particularly deserving of notice that this led to a reduction of the estimates of the Assessors from five to fifteen per cent.

170. But in determining the extent of this reduction, in ascertaining how far " an assessment proceeding from single fields to whole districts, and taking " each field at its supposed average," made the aggregate sum "greater than " could be realized," " the estimates of the ordinary and head Assessors," instead of being thrown aside, appear to have been too much considered, and too little weight given to the actual collections under the Native Princes and the Company's Government. The consequence has been, that the estimates of the Assessors were not sufficiently reduced, that Colonel Munro himself was subsequently constrained to declare that the survey assessment " never has " been, nor even can be, completely realized, so long as there are bad crops " and poor Ryots,"* and that in the course of the decennial settlement, under which the people have been left to make their own arrangements with the renters, the survey teerwas have in general been abandoned. A universal reduction of them seems to have taken place in the Cuddapah division; and in in the Bellary district, where the renters could not afford to make this sacrifice; the Ryots appear very generally to have found it preferable to insist on reverting to a division of the produce, rather than to continue the high assessment of the ryotwar survey.*

In Coimbatore.†

171. Colonel Macleod, who had conducted the ryotwar survey of the southern division of the Baramahl under Colonel Read, was the first officer appointed to take charge of that part of the Coimbatore country which lies north of the river Noel, and was formerly denominated the Northern division of Coimbatore, and here he immediately introduced the same system.

172. He began by employing Surveyors to measure the extent of each field in the district, and after this process was completed he selected the most skilful of the Surveyors to class the lands into gradations; the assessment on each class, and consequently on each field, was afterwards determined by himself at the huzzoor. "I consider," says he, "this mode of forming lands "into gradations, according to the apparent relative state of fertility or "improvement, to be better adapted for equalizing the rents and guarding "against partiality, than that which was followed in all parts of the Baramahl, "viz. valuing every field on the spot by attaching to it its rate of rent."

173. The measurement adopted by Colonel Macleod was a bulla of 166,464 square feet for poonjah and garden lands, and a goontah of 576 square feet for nunjah lands, These were adopted as the measurement "most prevalent "for the whole" district. But it was soon found that this measured survey bulla and goontah were much smaller than the mamool or customary estimated bulla or goontah, and that the same extent of land therefore contained many more survey than mamool bullas or goontahs: thus, 44,355 bullas of poonjah, 1,905 bullas of garden land, and 8,13,692 goontahs of nunjah, contained in five talooks, according to the Curnum's accounts of fusily 1209, were by the survey converted into 85,992 bullas of poonjah, 5,260 bullas of garden land, and 8,72,824 goontahs of nunjah.‡ The difference between the survey and mamool standard of measurement was therefore immense; but this, though the chief, does not seem to have been the sole cause of the greater extent of land shewn by the survey than by the Curnum's accounts. Colonel Macleod appears in some degree to have attributed it to the latter having omitted much land from account, for he states that they were "detected, in hundreds of "instances, to have falsified their accounts to the prejudice of the public "revenue." But the present Collector, Mr. Sullivan, has lately assured the Board that "short measure was in many instances dealt out to the Ryots in the "northern division."§ Under such circumstances, it may be asked, what confidence can be placed in this branch of the Coimbatore survey?

174. The classification of fields was conducted by the most able of the Surveyors, who were directed to allow the people to class their own lands; and the number of classes was

For poonjah ....twelve.
For gardens ....four.
For nunjah..............................four.

175. But there were first, second, third, and fourth class talooks, and first, second, third, and fourth class villages, each containing some of the classes of fields abovementioned;‖ so that the total number of classes into which the fields of the whole district were divided was very great.

176. In determining the money tax to be assessed on each of the various classes of poonjah and garden land, Colonel Macleod's first process appears to have been to ascertain the average mamool or prescriptive rate of teerwa in each of the four classes of villages. This was done by taking the average of forty-forty four villages in the Andoor, and thirty-four villages in the Eroad talook. The highest was found to be 3 C. Chs. 2 Fs. 0 A. for poonjah, and 8 C. Chs. 0 Fs. 0 A. for garden land, per mamool or estimated bulla, and this was adopted as the assessment of the first class of land in the first class of villages of the first class of talooks.* The assessment was lowered by two fanams for poonjah, and from ten to five fanams for garden land, per mamool bulla, on each class, whether of fields, of villages, or of talooks.†

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

177. But when this rate per prescriptive estimated mamool bulla came to be applied to the number of bullas entered in the survey accounts, the latter were so much smaller, and consequently so much more numerous than the mamool bullas, that the revenue was raised in every village infinitely beyond its resources. Hence Colonel Macleod assumed rates of reduction to convert the assessment per mamool bulla into an assessment per survey bulla. A reduction of the rates to the extent of six-sixteenths in poonjah, five-sixteenths in garden lands, and one-sixteenth in nunjah, seems to have been considered by him as sufficient for this purpose; and so far as the Board can gather from Mr. Garrow's report and statements, which on this point are rather obscure, this seems to have been the general rate of reduction adopted.‡

178. By this correction the rate on the first class of fields in the first class of villages of the first class of talooks was reduced from 3 Chs. 2 Fs. for poonjah, and 8 Chs. for garden lands, per mamool bulla, to 2 Chs. for poonjah and 5 Chs. for garden lands per survey bulla, and the rates on the various inferior classes were proportionally reduced according to the rates of remission granted. These seem occasionally to have varied, for reasons which are not stated, and which the Board are somewhat at a loss to divine; but in general the remission was that above-mentioned.

179. With regard to the few nunjah lands in the province, it is stated that "the measurement and classification took place at the same time and in the "same manner" as in the other lands; but the assessment seems to have been less moderate. "The average of five of the highest assessed villages "in the Eroad district" was taken, and was found to amount to Chs. 1 $2\frac{10}{16}$ per goontah, or Chs. 11 6 $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cawney. Hence was deduced Chs. 1 1 per goontah, or Chs. 10 6 4 per cawney, as the assessment on the first class of nunjah land in the first class of villages; a deduction of 1 or 2 annas was made for the class next immediately below it, and "a progressive decrease of "one anna between each of the remaining inferior gradations." With regard to some of the nunjah lands which did not always produce two crops, it was determined that they should be allowed a remission of one-quarter of the full assessment, in the event of their not bearing a second crop; and where land, either waste or otherwise, might be used as pasture, one-third of the full assessment was also to be paid.

180. Such were the rules under which a money assessment was attached to each field in the northern division of Coimbatore, and the Board confess that the assessment seems to have been regulated in a manner little more satisfactory than the measurement of the province.

181. Instead of checking the classification of his Surveyors, or deputing head Surveyors to correct their errors or frauds, Colonel Macleod informs them that "after the lands of a village may have been classed, should any of "the farmers object to the first classing, it will not be necessary to do it a "second time."§ The improvement also which he made of separating the assessment from the classification of the land was one of very doubtful policy. It was at first adopted by Colonel Munro in the Ceded Districts, but was almost immediately abandoned by him; for he found, "after a trial of a few months, "that by following this mode, the Potails and Ryots, not seeing immediately "the effects of the classification, were not sufficiently impressed with its " importance, and sometimes by entering too much land in the higher classes, " and sometimes in the lower, the assessment of some villages became more " than they could possibly pay, and of others much less than they had ever " paid before."—" To obviate this mischief," says he, " the lands were both " classed and assessed at the same time."* It would have been, perhaps, as well had the same system been pursued in Coimbatore.

182. But the moderation and justice of Coloned Macleod's assessment depended wholly upon the survey rate per bulla or goontah bearing the same proportion to the mamool rate that the survey standard of measurement bore to the mamool standard. It has been shewn that in five talooks the survey exceeded the mamool measurement by more than one-half, or eight-sixteenths, in the poonjah and garden land, while the survey rate was reduced below the mamool rate only six-sixteenths in the former, and five-sixteenths in the latter description of land. There was thus a positive addition of from two to three-sixteenths, or nearly eighteen and three-quarters per cent. to the mamool or prescriptive assessment on the principal lands in the country. Colonel Macleod and Mr. Garrow supposed that this arose from " the greater quantity of land " brought into account" by the discovery of the frauds of the Curnums; but it may be inferred from Mr. Sullivan's letter, that it may also have arisen from " the short measure dealt out to the Ryots." In either case, it was injudicious; in the latter most unjust. The assessment had already been raised by Tippoo to its full extent; and if some lands were concealed, they only enabled the people to pay an excessive assessment on those which were registered. To extend the same excessive assessment to all the lands discovered by the ryotwar survey, was therefore to over-assess the country; but to appply it to a short measurement was adding oppression to over-assessment. Unhappily for the people, it chanced to be Colonel Macleod's opinion that the Sultan's beriz, " though never realized by his managers, had a considerable degree of affinity " to what the resources of the country under good management might be " brought to yield." This evidently influenced all his proceedings: he commenced by equalizing, but terminated by raising the assessment; and to this is to be ascribed " the increase of assessment in nunjah," mentioned in the twenty-fourth paragraph of Mr. Garrow's report, which, as noticed in the thirty-second paragraph, raised the assessment on the nunjah lands of Gopaulchetty polliam from an average of 3 Chs. 6 Fs. ½ C. per cawney, to from 9 Chs. 3 Fs. 12 C. to 3 Chs. 7 Fs. 8 C. in nine villages, and from 5 Chs. to 2 Chs. 8 Fs. 2 C. in four others; in many cases doubling and trebling the assessment.† In justification of this, it is stated that the talook in question abounded with " Bramins, the dependents of the late government servants. " As the uncertainty of money payments from the Circar was a plausible " excuse, so they availed themselves of it in paying themselves in land, at a " low rent, which they underlet to the lower Ryot: their friends and relations " were, in course, not forgotten in these misappropriations." But had there then existed a zillah court in the country, the Board are inclined to think that some of these Bramins might have proved themselves the Meerassidars of the villages they inhabited, who, by working on the religious prejudices, on the friendship, or perhaps on the corruption of the servants of the late government, had preserved their rights from that annihilation in which those of their less favoured Soodra brethren were involved, by the arbitrary assessments of the Mussulman government; but whose utmost efforts were now insufficient to save their privileges from infraction, under the severer scrutiny, and equalizing system of the ryotwar survey.

183. The Board regret that it is not in their power to give any satisfactory account of the ryotwar survey in the southern division of Coimbatore, as introduced by Mr. Hurdis, and revised by the late Collector, Mr. Garrow, in fusily 1217. The correspondence noted in the margin‡ will shew that no information on this subject is to be found on their records; but the Dindigul survey by Mr. Hurdis may perhaps give some insight into the principles on which he proceeded in the southern division of Coimbatore, and the causes which led to a reduction of his teerwas by Mr. Garrow.

184. During Colonel Read's administration of the Baramahl, Mr. Hurdis was appointed an Assistant under him, and in that situation acquired a knowledge of the ryotwar system, which he afterwards put in practice by introducing it into the districts of Madura and Dindigul.

185. The latter province, from the period of its cession in 1792 until fusily 1204, had been rented out by villages or mootahs, to which succeeded a quinquennial lease with the head inhabitants terminating with fusily 1208. A temporary annual settlement intervened in fusily 1209, but in fusily 1210, or about the year 1800, Mr. Hurdis commenced the ryotwar survey, which terminated in fusily 1112 or 1802.

186. Of Mr. Hurdis's instructions to his Surveyors and Assessors the Board do not possess any copies, they are not therefore informed whether the survey in Dindigul was conducted separately from the classification and assessment of the lands, or by the same persons; nor are they aware whether any, and if any, what measurement was adopted to check that measurement and assessment. There are, however, too many proofs in Mr. Hurdis's own report of the erroneous principles on which the survey proceeded, and the mischief it produced in the district has been great.

187. The following is a concise abstract of the result of the Dindigul survey, as taken from Mr. Hurdis's report.

188. In assessing the poonjah garden lands, as well as the poonjah itself, Mr. Hurdis appears to have paid no attention whatever to the mamool or ancient prescriptive rates of teerwa established in the district. His process seems to have been to calculate how much it was probable each field would produce per survey goontah, to convert this assumed produce in money, at some rate which is not stated, and then to proceed as follows:

	Garden Poonjah. C. Fs.		Poonjah. C. Fs.
Gross produce in money per goontah, say	108		40
Deduct "three colly fanams per "goontah prescriptive allow- "ance for manure."	3		0

Two-thirds to the Ryot	70	Three-fifths to the Ryot	24
One-third to the Government	35 C. Fs. per goontah.	Two-fifths to the Govt.	16 C. Fs. per goontah.

189. The assessment on garden poonjah seems thus to have varied from 4 to 35 C. Fans. and upwards per goontah, averaging 1 C Chs. 4 Fs. $1\frac{7\frac{1}{2}}{16}$ A. per goontah, and including more than twenty-two classes; and on poonjah from 2 to 15 C. Fans. per goontah, averaging C. Fans. 3 $14\frac{8\frac{1}{2}}{16}$ per goontah, and including upwards of fourteen classes.†

191. Nunjah turm poonjah lands were assessed at the rate of twelve fanams per goontah.

192. It accordingly appears that the system was to assess poonjah gardens with one-third, poonjah lands with two fifths, nunjah gardens watered with nullahs throughout the year with one-third, those watered by tanks for a portion of the year only with one-fourth, those watered by wells with one-fifth, and all other nunjah lands with one-half of the supposed net produce, converted into money.

193. But the most trifling error respecting the gross produce, the charges, or the commutation price, most materially affected the correctness of the whole assessment. For instance, if a jaggery field of one goontah produced on an average only ninety, instead of one hundred tolans, as supposed by Mr. Hurdis, or if the fair average * price of that article was three, instead of three and a half fanams per tolan, his assessment would shew the following result.

Produce

* The average price assumed by Mr. Hurdis in some instances, perhaps in all, was not the average of actual prices for a number of years past, but the medium between the highest and lowest price for a number of years. Suppose the actual price was for ten years as follows:

Minute of Board of Revenue 5 Jan. 1818.

194. This unfortunately is no mere hypothesis, but, as will be shewn hereafter, has to a very considerable extent been the actual result of the Dindigul survey. It was to guard against this obvious danger that Colonel Read, whose system was not otherwise essentially different from that of Mr. Hurdis, endeavoured to correct and modify his field assessments by the rent of the preceding and current year. It was to obviate similar mischief, that Colonel Munro reduced his teerwas from five to fifteen per cent. with reference to the actual collections of former years; and it was in some degree to prevent the same evil, that Colonel Macleod, as before explained, modified his assessment But in Dindigul in vain do we look for any such proceeding. The Curnums' accounts are indeed referred to, but only that the Collector, while he confesses his ignorance of them, may descant on their falsity, and extol the superior merit of his own survey. "The accounts of the Curnums," says he, "were delivered in at the "cutcherry as the survey proceeded, and the falsity of them has been "proved before the village. In what manner the accounts were made up "by the Curnums, or on what measurement, I cannot find out; but the "survey has restored order, and the accounts now with the Curnums are those "made by the survey."

195 The former measurement by the Curnums' accounts, and the actual collections of the previous twelve years, are also mentioned, but with the view of contrasting them with the survey, not with the view of correcting it by reference to them. Mr. Hurdis, after observing that in the measurement there is an increase of upwards of one hundred and nine per cent. "on the ain cultivable land" only, and adding that in the waste the increase of upwards of one hundred and forty-one per cent. "is enormously more in quantity than the total "amount of the number of goontahs given in by the Curnums as the ain "Circar land," goes on in paragraph 224, to state that, exclusive of the assessment on the waste land, amounting as before shewn to Colly Chs. 2,14,594 2, the assessment by survey on the cultivated and pasture land, being Colly Chs. 2,16,670 2 11, or Star Pags. 1,31,315 14 12, exceeded the average settlement for the previous twelve years, or from fusily 1200 to 1211 inclusive, by no less than 80 3½ per cent., and the average actual collections during that period by no less than 101 14¼ per cent.

196. To find the revenue of a district thus more than doubled by the ryotwar survey does not at the time appear to have excited any surprise, but rather to have been considered the natural result of a system which went to discover the true true resources of the country: accordingly, on the collections resulting from this survey was chiefly founded the settlement of the Dindigul province, on the permanent zemindarry tenure: a settlement which was no sooner made than it failed, and which failed entirely from the excessive jumma imposed on the several estates, in consequence of Mr. Hurdis's over-collections founded on this survey.*

197. The lands of Dindigul having since reverted to the Government, the mischievous effects of the ryotwar survey have been strongly exhibited, and will be found fully detailed in the Board's address to Government of the 3d August 1815, from which it appears that the assessment of Mr. Hurdis was in some cases so excessive, as to equal the value of the whole produce of the soil; that upwards of 49,000 goontahs of the finest land in the country, or about one-eighth of the whole under cultivation at the time the survey was introduced, has since been abandoned, and a proportionate quantity of the lower assessed, but less productive waste brought under the plough; and that some of the best land in the district, "claimed chiefly by Bramins as their meerassy, "is allowed to be waste, from their inability or unwillingness to cultivate it."

198. Though the Board possess the assurance of Mr. Hurdis, that the ryotwar assessment was formed "as well from the judgment of the Surveyors as "as from the consent of the Ryots of the village, who, with the proprietor of "the land, were always present at every valuation and fully canvassed every "rate of teerwa ere the rate itself was made,"† they cannot resist the convincing though lamentable proof, which has thus been afforded of the excess of his assessment, and the consequent destruction by over-assessment of that right or property which Mr. Hurdis was so desirous of defending from the encroachment of Mootahdars under the permanent settlement.

199. The ryotwar system was also introduced by Mr. Hurdis into the Madura district,‡ but his teerwas were there more moderate than in Dindigul. It is probable, however, that his system was the same, and the Board have been obliged in both districts to authorize a reduction of his assessment.

In the Southern Division of Arcot.§

200. The southern division of the the Arcot soobah, on its first cession to the British Government, was for a short time committed to the charge of Colonel Graham, who rented it out by villages and mootahs composed of several villages; but when his removal took place, Mr. G. Garrow was promoted to the charge of this district.

201. Mr. Garrow, having filled the office of Secretary to the Board of Revenue for some time previously to his nomination to the southern division of Arcot, left Madras for his new charge with impressions strongly in favour of the ryotwar system, which, at this time, though little understood, even by the controlling authorities at the presidency, was from the impression made by Colonel Read's reports highly in repute. During the first year after his appointment an aumany settlement took place, but Mr. Garrow strongly urged the expediency of introducing the ryotwar system, and easily obtained authority for that purpose.

202. He had scarcely, however, taken the necessary preliminary measures for the introduction of this settlement, before he was superseded by Colonel Macleod, who was desired to complete what his predecessor had only begun. The measures which he consequently adopted will be found detailed in his report, noted in the margin.||

203. No survey having yet been made of this district, it appears that "the "average of five years' collections on the cultivated cawney, for that period, "of nunjah, poonjah, and gardens, was taken for these three classes, as the "average of each village, to form the assessment of fusily 1213," and that the distribution of this assessment, and the division of the lands into classes was "through necessity left to the Curnums."

204. Under

* See Mr. Hodgson's Report, dated 15th May 1808. † See paragraph 25.

‡ No report was ever received by the Board respecting this survey.

204. Under this system, however, the averages of neighbouring and similar villages were frequently found so high and unequal, that the Collector proposed to reduce all averages above six pagodas on nunjah, or two pagodas on poonjah, per cawney, to that rate, and to raise all those below three pagodas on nunjah, and thirty fanams on poonjah, per cawney, to that standard. At the same time he strongly urged the expediency of the ryotwar survey, as the only means of discovering the resources of the province.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

205 Before proceeding to explain the nature and result of the ryotwar survey in the southern division of Arcot, it may be proper, in elucidation of the system pursued by Colonel Macleod and his successors, and of the rights of the people in this part of the country, to quote the following observations of that officer respecting meerassy right.

"The assumed rights of the heads of villages are very prejudicial to the "prosperity of the country, and so long as these rights are acknowledged "to the extent to which they claim them, it will be impossible effectually to "suppress abuses. This situation must have been originally a temporary public "employment, which could have been continued no longer than the individual "was supposed deserving and capable of the charge."

"Some persons have shares in ten or twenty villages, at the distance of per-"haps thirty miles asunder. They even pretend to have divided among them "the whole lands of villages, in which there may be more than one Meerassi-"dar, and they prevent the occupancy of any part of their imaginary shares "without their concurrence.

"Though I have not taken upon myself to abolish the right of any Meeras-"sidar, I consider it as repugnant to good policy to employ more of this "description of people than may be required to make the collections and to "superintend the cultivation; and as the pay or the fees attached to the situa-"tion would be inadequate to the trouble and responsibility which falls to the "man who manages, if he be obliged to share it with others, I think the "manager or the Monigar of the village should receive the whole."

206. From this statement it is evident, as before explained, that though the privileges of the Meerassidars in the southern division of Arcot had been grievously diminished by the over-assessments of the Mussulman government, they had not yet been entirely annihilated. It is assumed however here, that meerassy, instead of a private hereditary property, was a public temporary employment, "continued no longer than the individual was considered "deserving and capable;" that the meerassy shares were "imaginary," and although the right of any Meerassidar is not abolished, it is intimated that the whole should be transferred to the Monigar, because when divided, according to ancient usage, between him and the other Meerassidars, it was inadequate.

207. The introduction of the ryotwar survey, recommended by Colonel Macleod, was undertaken by his successor, Mr. Ravenshaw; but, fortunately for the people, this latter officer had just previously been employed in a district (Canara) where a moderate land-tax, not an excessive land-rent, was assessed on the country.

208. In recommending the survey, therefore, he proposed when the average assessment of the nunjah lands of a village exceeded five pagodas per cawney, to reduce it to that sum, instead of limiting the maximum average to six pagodas, as proposed by Colonel Macleod. "This," observes he, "will give "the cultivators about Pagodas 24 44 57 per cent. of the gross produce, "which is less by twenty-five per cent. than I consider him entitled to (fifty "per cent)." The limitation of the poonjah assessment, on an average, to two pagodas per cawney, as proposed by Colonel Macleod, he deemed sufficient, but added, it "will not give the Ryot more than Pagodas 31 11 per cent. of "the gross produce." He also recommended that the commutation price be reduced from four to four and a half cullums of paddy, and from five to five and a half cullums of dry grain, per pagoda, and even this reduction he considered to be "by no means favourable;" but he thought that these alterations would be sufficient to relieve the distresses of the people, until the survey should introduce a more just assessment.

209. In

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

209. In his report on the revenues of the subsequent year,* we find him stating that these measures had materially relieved the inhabitants of those villages that benefited thereby; but that much was still to be done to alleviate the situation of the cultivators, and to fix the assessment on the principle determined by the Governor in Council "of an equal distribution between the Ryot and the Government."

210. It was during this year, fusily 1215, that he commenced the ryotwar survey of the country, which he nearly completed in the subsequent year, fusily 1216. In reporting on the revenues of the last-mentioned year, he alludes to his having been obliged to depart from a rule of his ryotwar system, which required the Ryot "to pay the full rent of every field he cultivates, whether he "rears a crop from the whole or only from a part of such field:" a rule, he observes, which "supposes the Ryot capable of doing what it seems he could "not possibly have done." He also mentions a decrease of Pagodas 23,935 11 40 below the revenue of the preceding year, in consequence of seven talooks having been settled on the principle of the ryotwar survey, and he promises a report on this survey, as soon as the statements required to accompany it could be prepared and translated. This report was accordingly furnished by Mr. Ravenshaw, under date the 10th May 1808, and copies of his instructions to the Assessors and Surveyors have lately been transmitted to the Board by Mr. Hyde.

211. From these papers it appears that the whole of the district was measured, under instructions very similar to those issued by Colonel Munro in the Ceded Districts, and that this survey added 1,46,209 cawnies of arable poonjah, and 16,757 of arable nunjah, to the land before entered in account; but this measurement does not appear to have been checked, as in the Ceded Districts, by head Surveyors, neither was there any allowance made for the measuring rod formerly in use, which might have differed in every talook or every village; and a general measurement by a rod of an uniform size might therefore increase the extent of land merely nominally.

212. Of twenty-two talooks, however, thus surveyed, the fields of only seven were classed and assessed; the classification and assessment of the rest being stopped by the introduction of the triennial village settlement.

213. In order to determine the amount of assessment on each field, Mr. Ravenshaw's first process appears to have been to calculate, as follows, the tax to be imposed on a tract of land producing one hundred cullums of grain.

Having fixed ten pagodas per field producing one hundred cullums of grain as the general rate of assessment, he thence formed the following tables.

214. It will be perceived that the assessment on nunjah lands consisted of sixteen different rates, varying from eight to a half-pagoda per cawney; those on garden lands of nine different rates, varying from seven to three pagodas per cawney; and those on poonjah of twelve different rates, varying from four pagodas to eighteen fanams per cawney.

215 It appears that the consent of the Ryots was necessary to the classification and assessment of the lands, and that the survey was undertaken with the express view of reducing the assessment from one to four-sixteenths. Where fine land had improperly been included in the lower classes, it was to be re-classed, and the rate might be raised from one to two-sixteenths; but in no case was the average rate per cawney in any village to exceed five pagodas for nunjah, and two pagodas for poonjah lands.

216. In the seven talooks thus assessed, the immediate decrease of revenue, in consequence of the survey, was Pagodas 28,809 15 43, and the former teerwas on poonjah were reduced at the rate of from 16 84 $42\frac{8}{10}$ to

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

Pagodas 4 12 74$\frac{6}{18}$, or on an average Star Pagodas 8 23 25½ per cent.; and on nunjah from Pagodas 22 34 36¼ to Pagodas 5 28 10, or on an average Pagodas 9 37 76 per cent.

217. A reduction of one-fourth was made from the assessment in favour of nunjah lands dependent for irrigation entirely on the rains of heaven, and a reduction of five per cent. at first, and afterwards of ten per cent. from the assessment of all lands cultivated by Bramins or Mussulmans.

218. In reviewing this survey, it cannot fail to be remarked that it is the only one hitherto mentioned which appears to have terminated in a reduction of the assessment, or of the rate of public revenue hitherto demandable. In a general point of view, therefore, it must have been highly beneficial to the country; and on this account it is, perhaps, to be regretted that it was not extended to all the talooks of the district.

219. Like some of the other surveys before-mentioned, it proceeded on calculations of average produce, a division thereof between the Government and the Ryot, and the conversion of the Government share into money; but by fixing the commutation price for paddy at five, instead of four cullums per pagoda, Mr Ravenshaw reduced the assessment on those lands which chiefly contribute to the revenue of the district twenty-five per cent., or one-fourth below what it would have been fixed by Colonel Macleod; and he prevented any gross errors, such as occurred in Dindigul, by limiting the average rate on each village to a maximum standard (which on nunjah was one-sixth below that proposed by his predecessor), and by forbidding any increase of the existing rates beyond two-sixteenths, yet authorizing a reduction generally to double that extent.

220. Still the Board do not consider this survey free from a material objection; for they apprehend that it involved an infraction of the little meerassy right remaining in the district. Among the sotuntrums resumed and added to the revenue of Government, to the extent of about two per cent. in the poonjah, and no less than about twenty per cent. in the nunjah lands, they observe that the marahs of the Gramatans (literally villagers) were included;* and these Gramatans, whose oppressions on the lower Ryots are the theme of all Mr. Ravenshaw's reports, the Board believe to have been "the heads of villages" mentioned by Colonel Macleod, as possessing meerassy shares in the village, but whom he considered it repugnant to good policy to employ. Mr. Ravenshaw, who to the last denied the existence of meerassy in any part of his district, seems to have taken a similar view of the rights of these persons: their marahs or extra privileges were therefore resumed; and, if the Board mistake not, the value of them in money was, and is still paid, as proposed by Colonel Macleod, to the Monigars (now called Putta-Monigars), the meerassy being thus not expressly abolished, but indirectly destroyed, and the office of Potail created by an act of injustice. The Putta-Monigar, in the southern division of Arcot, is thus an inhabitant selected to collect the revenue, and receives a stipendiary allowance for the duty from a fund created out of a property notoriously belonging to others. Mr. Ravenshaw, notwithstanding his great anxiety to remove oppression of every kind, and particularly that oppression of the head inhabitants (Gramatans) which he represents to be so great in so many reports, did not restore to those people the rights of which the first attempt at a survey had deprived them.

221. The assessment, by Mr. Ravenshaw's own admission, was so excessive on the southern division of Arcot, that it is not surprisin gif the Meerassidars endeavoured, by additional assessments on their Pyacarry Ryots, to reimburse themselves for the extortions of the Government; and the oppressions to which the lower classes of the people were thus subjected may not therefore have been exaggerated by Mr. Ravenshaw in his reports. But in remedying one evil the Board apprehend that another was committed; while the Pyacarries were relieved from the pressure of their burdens, the few remaining privileges of the Meerassidars were resumed, and they were by the ryotwar survey reduced reduced to an equal level with those who had formerly been their inferior tenants. Under such circumstances, it is not surprizing that they united with the Curnums to obtain by fraud, what was otherwise denied to them; and that on the detection of their abuses, they seceded with many of their Pyacarry Ryots from their villages, and appealed to the controuling authorities at Madras; but, on warrants being issued to apprehend them, they returned to their villages.

* See Enclosure C, in Mr. Ravenshaw's Letter, 10th May 1808.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

*In the Northern Division of Arcot.

222. On the cession of the Carnatic, Mr. Stratton was appointed to take charge of the northern division of Arcot. This gentleman rented out the country by villages on annual lease in fusily 1211, the first year of the acquisition, and described it as a desirable object to constitute the head inhabitants of each village its renters, and make them jointly and severally security for each others engagements Mr. Stratton was of opinion that village rents would secure to the Ryots a just return for their labour, and describes the plan of village rents to have been followed when the country was under the Nabob of the Carnatic; in many instances direct with the Circar in others with intermediate renters of districts.

223. The Board, in a letter to Mr. Stratton, of the 13th August 1802, stated that where the mode of renting villages had been entirely unknown, a settlement† with the head inhabitants was an approach to a better system, but that which the Board were most desirous to establish was where the proprietary inhabitants at large of each village enter into engagements with the Circar, and derive a common and exclusive interest in the cultivation of their lands in proportion to their right of property.

224. Mr. Stratton made the settlement of the second year, or fusily 1212, by villages, and explained, probably in consequence of the remarks of the Board quoted above, that notwithstanding only a village settlement had that year been accomplished, yet it possessed all the advantages of a ryotwar settlement, since from some complaints having been preferred to him in the former year of improper exactions of Renters, he had been induced to obviate all such cause of complaint, by particularizing in the rent pottah of every village in the districts of Sholungur, Moneywauk, Caverypauk, and Velloor Pollam, the exact teerwa on each crop to be levied from the Ryots, and the exact warum they were entitled to, agreeably to the rates fixed many years before by Rajah Beerbur, commonly called Royagee, who for a long time managed the revenues of the Arcot soubah under the Nabob Wallajah.

225. In 1803 Mr. D. Cockburn succeeded Mr. Stratton; Mr. D. Cockburn had been previously employed in the Salem district, where he had superintended the introduction of the ryotwar system into the small province of Balaghaut, conquered in 1799 from Mysore; and on his arrival in the northern division of Arcot was desired to make a survey of the country, for the purpose of establishing a fixed teerwa on those lands in which the rates of warum were supposed not to have been distinctly ascertained.

226. Mr. Cockburn, however, in reply, explained, that in every village there was a known fixed demand as revenue, either in money or grain, but that the cultivators were liable to various other exactions, some of which were authorized by custom, and certain others, though sanctioned by the same claim of right, arbitrary and undetermined; he therefore proposed, by fixing what was thus uncertain, to "bring great comparative relief to the Ryot," and in order to conduct his system "to every attainable perfection," he requested leave to commence the Ryotwar survey; and in the mean time forwarded a translation of the orders he had issued to the "servants employed in "ascertaining the extent of cultivation, and in determining the rent of each "cultivator."

† These observations were made while Mr. Place was in the Board of Revenue: his village rents of the jaghire and those of Mr. Hodgson and Mr. Greenway were formed on the principles thus described.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

227. From this document, and from Mr. Cockburn's subsequent report of the 31st March 1804, it appears that the settlement for fusily 1213 was determined on each field "by the computed produce of the field, by the amount of "rent paid last year, by the average rent of that field for five years back, and "by the seeming circumstances of the Ryot." In his instructions, Mr. Cockburn observes that it had "been customary in the Carnatic, besides "collections under the term rent, to collect sums on various acco[illegible] such "as Renter's and Curnum's russooms, Renter's and Curnum's r[illegible] tur-"tenah, saderwared, charity, loss on rent, &c &c., exactions, al[illegible] that [illegible]h," says he, "you will add to the rent of the land!" The warum in nunjah land was converted into money at six mercals, in one Pagoda value of grain, cheaper than the registered selling prices for the previous ten years; but half of the Renters, Curnums, Shroffs, carpenters, smiths, and sohuntra maras were assumed, and added to the Circar share, thereby increasing it to the extent of nearly fifteen per cent.

228. This arrangement was considered by the Government to constitute an equitable basis of a temporary settlement. Mr. Cockburn, however, was desired no longer to delay the introduction of the ryotwar survey; but in consequence of his promotion to the judicial department, this duty devolved on his successor, Mr. Grœme, and the result was reported to the Board under date the 18th October 1806.

229. From this report, and from the instructions to the Surveyors and Assessors, with copies of which the Board have lately been furnished, it appears that the survey was conducted by one class of people, and the classification and assessment by another, and that each were checked by head Surveyors and head Assessors.

230. By this survey, cultivated land, to the extent of Cawnies 18,962 2, valued at Pagodas 32,134 29 66,* was discovered, and added in the accounts; but by a decrease in the rates of teerwa or assessment, as hereafter explained, this increase was reduced to a net increase of only Pagodas 7,162 35 33.

231. In determining the assessment on the land, Mr. Grœme seems to have proceeded in the following manner.

232. The deduction on account of marah in nunjah land, as well as the commutation price of both nunjah and poonjah, varied for every talook; hence the rates of assessment were different in each; but the foregoing affords a sufficient insight into the general principles of the assessment.

233. The garden lands were divided into from four to six classes, each assessed at the rate of from Star Pagodas 9 15 60 to Star Pagodas 1 31 40 per cawney.

234. The result of the assessment generally was, that in the different talooks the average teerwa on poonjah varied from 30 Fs. $35\frac{1}{2}$ to Pagodas 1 1 $17\frac{1}{2}$; the average on nunjah from 2 41 $4\frac{1}{2}$ to Pagodas 5 26 $14\frac{1}{16}$; and the average in garden lands from Pagodas 2 4 $27\frac{3}{4}$ to Pagodas 6 11 $26\frac{1}{4}$ per cawney: and that, by applying these rates to the quantity of land according to the Curnum's accounts of fusily 1213, there appeared a reduction of Pagodas 24,971 39 43;* but by deducting this decrease from the increase in consequence of the measurement, or, in other words, by applying this assessment to the quantity of land according to the survey accounts, a net increase was given by the survey of Pagodas 7,162 35 33,† as before mentioned.

235. In Mr. Grœme's report and statements it is not clearly stated whether lands producing two crops were assessed with one or two teerwas, viz. a teerwa on the first crop, and a separate additional teerwa in the event of their producing a second crop; or whether, as in other districts, the two were consolidated into one teerwa assessed on the land, whatever number of crops it might produce. The Board are inclined to believe that the latter was the case.

236. It appears that all the marahs resumed by Mr. Cockburn, with the exception of the Curnum's and Monigar's marahs, were included in the Ryot's share, and were made payable by him according to the ancient custom of the country; but in the opinion of the Board there is no doubt that the Monigar's marah, subsequently converted into a money payment to the extent of about twelve thousand pagodas per annum, was originally, like that of the Gramatans in the southern division of Arcot, the marahs of the Meerassidars.‡ It seems to have been called by Mr. Cockburn the renter's marah.§

237. In reviewing this survey, it is worthy of remark that Mr. Cockburn's settlement of fusily 1213 was regulated as much by the average rent each field had paid for five years back, as by its computed value; and that Mr. Grœme's subsequent teerwas, though they proceeded on the ground of gross produce, division with the Ryot and average price, were more moderate than those of Mr. Cockburn; the result, therefore, would have been a considerable reduction of the assessment, had not the survey discovered a quantity of land hitherto omitted from account, and taxed it in common with the rest.

238 Notwithstanding the great care, therefore, taken by Mr. Grœme to equalize the assessment, by a fair division of the produce, and a commutation thereof into money, according to the average price of ten moderate years in every talook, whereby it was adapted to the peculiar localities of each, his revision of Mr. Cockburn's assessment terminated in increasing it to the extent of upwards of seven thousand pagodas.

§ See the Board's Proceedings, 16th November 1815.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

239. This proceeding Mr. Grœme has since, with much candour, exposed, as an error of some magnitude, in his ryotwar survey: and experience has proved that it led to an over-assessment on the country, which he has estimated at upwards of twelve thousand pagodas. It has been stated, and in the opinion of the Board with much truth, that at the period of the cession of the Carnatic, the demand of the Government upon the country was already excessive; and that the Ryots were enabled to pay this high assessment on the lands registered as cultivated, from the illicit cultivation of other fields, which the connivance of the inferior officers of Government exempted from registry, and therefore from tax; but that, under the ryotwar survey, the demand on the registered land continued undiminished, while the land that had been hitherto secretly cultivated was newly registered and newly assessed; and the Ryot deprived of the means he formerly possessed of paying a high rent on his registered fields, was now called upon to pay the same high rent on his unregistered fields also. This the Board believe to have been the case to a much greater extent in other districts than the northern division of Arcot, where Mr. Grœme himself, on the introduction of the decennial lease, was induced to recommend a remission of upwards of twelve thousand pagodas, in favour of those Ryots whose lands had been thus over-assessed by the ryotwar survey.

*In Nellore.

240. Previously to the cession of the Carnatic, the revenues of this district had been rented out by the Nabobs in extensive talooks or mootahs; but on Mr. Travers being appointed to take charge of it, he concluded a settlement by villages with the head inhabitants of each.

241. Finding however, that the influence of the head Ryots proved "equally detrimental to the happiness of the people and the interests of "Government," Mr. Travers subsequently resolved to introduce the ryotwar system; and for this purpose commenced a survey of the country, with the view of establishing, on each field, teerwas, or, as he terms them, muctah rents.

242. The instructions given to the Surveyors in Nellore are extremely concise and imperfect; and the means adopted to check their measurement do not appear to have been very efficient.† Mr. Travers himself, indeed, seems to have considered their measurement to have been far from correct;‡ yet he thought it could be "so far depended on, as to commence the introduction of "muctah rents." The result of the survey shewed an increase by measurement in the cultivable lands of 52,441$\frac{32}{64}$ goortahs of metta (dry land), and 15,914$\frac{38}{64}$ goortahs of magauny (wet lands), being an increase above the measurement, according to the Curnum's accounts of the previous year, to the extent of nearly three-fourths or seventy-five per cent.§

243. Having ascertained the average gross produce of each goortah of land, "from information obtained by the survey, as well as what is admitted by the "inhabitants," Mr. Travers proceeded to assess it as follows. He first deducted from the gross produce six and a half per cent. for baudooloo, the admitted fees of the Curnums, village artificers, servants, &c.; the remainder was then, in supposition, divided between Government and the Ryot, in the proportion of eleven in twenty, or fifty-five per cent. to the former, and nine in twenty, or forty five per cent. to the latter, and the Government share of eleven in twenty, or fifty-five per cent. was finally converted into money, at the rate of seven Madras pagodas for dry grain, and five Madras pagodas for paddy, per pooty. From the different quantities of grain supposed to be produced by goortahs of different descriptions of soil, the assessment was thus divided in dry land into fifteen rates, varying from Madras Pagodas 7 10 30 to Madras Pagodas 92 8$\frac{1}{4}$ per goortah, supposed to produce from two pooties to one mercal; and in wet land into no less than thirty-eight different rates, varying from Madras Pagodas 21 11 6$\frac{4}{8}\frac{1}{4}$ to Madras Pagodas 1 39 73$\frac{1}{2}\frac{2}{5}\frac{7}{6}$ per goortah, calculated to produce, to a mercal of seed, from three pooties to five mercals.

* From Mr. Travers, 10th June 1803. † See No. 2 in Mr. Travers' Letter, 5th June 1802.

‡ Paragraphs 25 to 28, from Mr. Travers, 10th June 1803.

§ It is obvious that this increase must have been nominal more than real. The rod and mode of measurement not being the same, a difference must of necessity have occurred.

244. The assessment on garden lands was regulated as follows: Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

" The other garden cultivation of these districts," says Mr. Travers, " formerly distinguished as muctah gardens, and in which is produced sugar-cane, " tumeric, beetle, tobacco, and vegetables of various descriptions, have their " rates of assessment already established by custom,* and do not appear to " require alteration."

245. The original result of this survey was an addition to the public demand on the Ryots of the Nellore district, to the extent of Star Pagodas 1,00,356 42 4, or about one-fourth of that for the previous year; from which deducting Pagodas 19,413 21 44, decrease from the abolition of various collections under the head of saderwared, tahereer, &c., there remains a net increase by the ryotwar survey of Star Pagodas 80,943 20 40.†

246. It is particularly deserving of notice, that the ryotwar system thus introduced into Nellore by Mr. Travers, differed most materially from every other before-mentioned. All other surveys proceeded on the principle, either declared or implied, that the teerwa or fixed money tax assessed on each field was the maximum of the Government demand thereon, never to be increased; but in Nellore it was published for general information, that the muctah rents, teerwas, money taxes, or " prices," as Mr. Travers terms them, " fixed for " the first class of soils, being calculated on the highest produce of the land of " the village to which it belonged, it would limit the demands of Government " thereon, whatever might be its produce, so long as it was continued under " coroo cultivation; but that as it was expected that the value of the lower " soils might increase, they were still to be considered at the disposal of " Government, until their valuation rose to the rate limited for the best land " of the village under coroo cultivation; that the valuation of the lower soils " would be formed from public appraisement created by competition, and that " on its disposal the first proprietor would be entitled to the preference "

247. By this the Board understand it to have been declared, that the teerwas on all mettah or maganny land in the inferior classes might eventually be raised to that of the highest class; and that even the teerwas on the highest class might be raised, in the event of its being converted into gardens, the limitation existing no longer than it might continue under " coroo cultivation."

248. The ryotwar system in Nellore also differed in another material respect from that generally pursued elsewhere, viz. in the waste, as well as the cultivated lands, being parcelled out among the inhabitants. On the ground that " private property is better looked after than public property," Mr. Travers divided

* This was the case in other districts, yet they were altered under the survey assessments.

† See Statement No. 1, in Mr. Travers' letter, 16th June 1803, 2d last column below the 18th line.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

divided the waste at the same time as the cultivated land. It was however assessed, or rather declared assessable, at what was fixed for the worst of the "arable lands," and it was thought that this would do away "an idea that "might otherwise be entertained, that such lands, by not having a value, might "be considered, as before, the general property of the village." For the present, however, the assessment of the waste was either deferred, or, if it did take place, remitted; and hence we find Mr. Travers, in the forty-second paragraph of his report, alluding to the probability of the people deriving a profit from "the whole of the lands being divided among them, and the settlement of "Government only formed on a portion."

249. The Board are not aware whether the intention, intimated in the fifty-seventh paragraph of Mr. Travers' report, of converting the poolary tax on cattle into a tax on land used as pasture, was ever carried into effect.

250. Another remarkable circumstance in this settlement is, that while Mr. Travers admits the Pyacarries to have been "under the authority of the "Cadeems," and from the agreements of the Pyacarries for their lands being generally formed with the Cadeems, concludes that the latter had an advantage in the larger share of the produce allowed to the former, he divides the lands among the whole indiscriminately. "Having," says he, "arranged under "these considerations the rates of assessment for the different soils, the inha- "bitants of each village were assembled in the respective talooks, and the "survey accounts laid before them, in order to determine the extent and qua- "lity of the whole of the arable lands at the disposal of Government; when a "division took place between the whole of the Cadeem inhabitants and such "of the Pyacarries as wished to participate, determine the quantity and qua- "lity of land to each, in proportion to their ploughs."

251. This indiscriminate admission of the Pyacarry Ryots in common with the Cadeems, was certainly an infraction of private right, exemplifying the levelling system with which the ryotwar survey were generally conducted; and the division of the waste,* formerly "the general property of the village," among the Pyacarries and Cadeems promiscuously, while it affected the rights of the latter, also tended to destroy that community of property which for ages has existed on this side of the Peninsula.

252. The Board, however, have since understood that much of this ryotwar settlement of Nellore existed only in the accounts of the Collector's cutcherry;† that in many places the village community having ascertained the aggregate of the demand on individuals, parcelled out the lands anew among themselves, assessing each Ryot with a new quota of the total revenue payable by the village; and that while the Collector believed he had established ryotwar, the people continued to adhere to their old system of the village settlement and share of the crop.

In Satwaid ‡

253. The only remaining district into which the ryotwar survey was introduced was the small district of Satwaid, a part of the Carnatic ceded to the Government in the year 1801, and placed under charge first of the Collector in Chingleput, and afterwards of the Collector in the northern division of Arcot.

254. The survey of this small tract of country was conducted in a very satisfactory manner, under the instructions of Mr. Hepburn, and the assessment of the land surveyed proceeded on principles of great moderation.

255. In assessing the nunjah lands, seventy-seven and a half per cent. or twelve and one eight sixteenths of a full crop was adopted as the probable average

* It is probable that this division of the waste lands among all the inhabitants became necessary, in consequence of the effects of the ryotwar survey. Great quantities of cattle are bred for sale in the Nellore and Ongole districts, and the right to pasture cattle in particular lands necessarily became an object of some consideration.

† It is very probable that in many situations, where the wet land is greater than the dry land, that the same thing occurred.

80

One-half to the Ryot........ 40
One-half to the Government........ 40

The Government share was then converted into money, at the average price of the previous ten years.

256. But the mode of assessing the poonjah lands of Satwaid was very different from that adopted in any other district. It was not so much an assessment on the land as on the crop; for the teerwas varied, as under the native government, according to the particular description of dry grain grown on the land.

257. On the nunjah the teerwas consisted of sixteen different rates, varying from Pagodas 6 38 65 to Fanams 18 55 per cawney. On poonjah also of sixteen rates, varying from Pagodas 3 23 to Fanams 11 40 per cawney; and on garden ground of thirteen rates, varying from 2 20 10 to 3 5 60 per cawney.

258. From the superior care and moderation of the Collector, and from the smallness of the district allowing of a greater personal controul over the survey than could possibly be exercised elsewhere, and of a greater reduction* without exciting much attention, the field money assessment in this small province, although neither free from inequalities nor errors, possesses generally the solid advantage of being one-fourth less than that in many of the neighbouring districts.†

Palnaud.

259. A reference to the Board's address to Government of the 20th of January 1806, and to their subsequent proceedings of the 30th November 1815, will shew the grounds of their belief, that though in Palnaud a settlement was professedly made with each Ryot, it was only nominally, not really, a ryotwar settlement. A crude attempt at the survey of that district was indeed made, but the settlement in question was in fact a village settlement subdivided on a nominal list of fields.

Tanjore, Trichinopoly, and Tinnevelly.

260. It seems equally unnecessary to make any detailed remarks on the abortive attempt at ryotwar which was made in Tanjore. A measurement of the arable land was made, but a regular field money assessment was not introduced, either into that district, or into the neighbouring provinces of Trichinopoly or Tinnevelly,‡ and what has by some been termed ryotwar in Tanjore, was in fact a village settlement. The assessment was made on the entire lands of the village, and the Meerassidars were allowed to divide it amongst themselves, on their individual kuttas§ or fields, the Collector merely causing such division to be registered in the public accounts, and the revenue being still paid collectively, and not kulwar or individually.

General Principles of Ryotwar.||

261. It has been stated by very high authority as one great recommendation "in favour of the ryotwar settlement, that it is most favourable" to the prosecution of the ryotwar survey; but the review which has been taken above of

 that

* The district produces from Pagodas 16,000 to Pagodas 20,000 annual revenue: a considerable reduction of the revenue of any former year would not in so small a sum be considered of importance.

† See Board's Proceedings on the northern division of Arcot, 16th November 1815.

‡ In Trichinopoly and in Tinnevelly, as also in the high districts of Tanjore, the public revenue from unirrigated land was customarily demandable in money, at a fixed rate for a given extent of land.

§ A kuttai is a much larger division of land than is generally implied by a "field." It contains a great number of paddy fields, and is rather a division of the village into the different descriptions of soil.

|| See Fifth Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

that survey in the several districts into which it has been introduced, seems to lead to the conclusion that this is by no means a recommendation in its favour, and compels the Board to record their opinion that there is no part of the former ryotwar system more open to objection.

262. An attentive examination of the voluminous reports received from the different Collectors on this subject will shew that the details of the ryotwar survey, including measurement, classification of soil, and assessment, varied with the particular views of each local officer; that it was by no means conducted in the several provinces either on uniform, correct, or just principles; that every change of authority was attended by a change of plan; and that, except in the Ceded Districts, where it was completed under the person who begun it, and cost upwards of eighty thousand pagodas, the ryotwar survey was in general hastily performed and badly executed. The detailed information which it afforded may perhaps, in some instances, have been matter of statistic curiosity, but its effects on the revenue and on the country have proved, there is much reason to believe, of a most mischievous tendency.*

263. In those provinces which we acquired from the Mussulman princes of the peninsula, the state of private property in the land, at the period of their transfer, has already been described to have been so reduced by their exactions, as to have required the most fostering and careful management on our part to preserve it from entire annihilation. But however beneficial in other respects our administration may have proved to the people, it is greatly to be feared that the almost immediate introduction into these districts of the ryotwar system, which included not only an entire new measurement of the land, but an entire change in the nature and in many instances in the extent of the land-tax, which forcibly changed warum into teerwa, and by which new rates of teerwa were substituted even where the revenue was heretofore payable in money, tended to complete the destruction of that property which it was so much our interest and our duty to support.

264. While the ryotwar survey assessment professed to fix an equal and moderate tax in money on each field, we find it in almost every instance greatly increasing the Government demand upon the country. In Dindigul it nearly doubled the public assessment. In Baramahl it increased it twenty-one per cent. In the northern division of Arcot the additional imposts and illegal exactions of the renters under the native governments were by the ryotwar survey incorporated with the land-rent. In Nellore the highest rate of teerwa fixed on the finest land was alone declared to be the ultimate limit of the Government demand upon all land; and even in the Ceded Districts, where it was perhaps most moderate, the demand on the land was raised so high as in general to be greatly beyond the resources of the people. "An assessment thus proceeding from single fields to whole districts, and taking each field at its supposed average," was indeed "found to make the aggregate greater than could be easily realized,"† or than ought ever to have been assessed; and in attempting to fix a moderate equal assessment on each field, we imposed a most unequal and heavy over-assessment on the country.

265. It is true that this over-assessment constituted rather the maximum, than the absolute demand upon the Ryot; but it was to this maximum that he was taught to look as the sum ultimately demandable from him. It was only his inability to pay it that caused its temporary reduction; and as his means improved, the demand upon him rose, until it reached this high standard.

266. From the ryotwar survey also resulted the other great evil already pointed out by the Board, viz. the interference with private rights, and the nearly complete destruction of the little landed property, and superiorities attached to it, remaining in those provinces where the ryotwar system was fully introduced. The infraction of the rights of the Meerassidars in the Carnatic generally have already been particularly noticed; the admission of the Pyacarries Pyacarries and the Cadeems on equal terms to the occupation of land in Nellore has likewise been mentioned; and the ryotwar system may be justly said to have proceeded on the maxim of its chief advocate, Colonel Munro, that "on this side of the Peninsula there is no private property in the land." Mr. Hyde, the present Collector in the southern division of Arcot, expressly states, that the ma[illegible]s, toondoo-warum, and other rights of the Meerassidars in that district, were incorporated with the ryotwar teerwas, and "no sort of remu-"neration was granted in lieu thereof:" "indeed," says he, "meerassy has "never been acknowledged by any of my predecessors." In the northern division of Arcot all these superiorities were also resumed and incorporated with the public revenue. In short, the survey assessment was raised so high as to absorb, in the Government revenue, any little rent remaining to the landholders. No intermediate person was acknowledged between the state and the actual cultivator, and the ryotwar survey, supported by the power of a strong and well organized government, completed the practical illustration of the doctrine, so unjustly introduced with the Mussulmans, that in India the sovereign and the landlord are one.*

267. It has been stated by the same high authority before alluded to, that under the ryotwar system "the Ryot knew, before he set his oxen to the "plough, and dropped his seed into the ground, the utmost limit of rent that "he could be called on to pay, and that the advantage of additional labour "employed upon his fields would be all his own, as well as the advantage of "additional produce in an abundant season; and that he also knew, that in "an unfavourable season an abatement of the demand would be made in his "favour, if his diminished means rendered him unable to satisfy it."†

268. But where the utmost limit of rent was raised so much above the means of the Ryot, and where the ability of the people was to be the limit of the collection, it is obvious that the Ryot's knowledge of it was of little consequence. When he yoked his oxen, and dropped his seed into the ground, all that he knew was, that the ultimate rent demandable from him was greatly beyond his power to pay: of the actual or absolute demand upon him he knew nothing, until "the season became sufficiently advanced to enable the Collector and his "Assistants to judge, from the appearance or state of the crops, as to the "means of the Ryots to pay their rents."‡ It was not until he had reared his crop that the absolute demand upon him was determined, and it was then too generally fixed rather with reference to his actual means, than to the produce of his lands. "Whatever," says Colonel Munro, in a letter to his Assistants explanatory of the ryotwar system, "may have been the crop, should it have "been even less than the seed, they should always be made to pay the full "rent, if they can;" and "where the loss appears in a village whose inha-"bitants are able to make it good, the Aumildar ought to take no notice of it, "but proceed with his collections in the same manner as if there had been a "plentiful crop."§

269. The ryotwar settlement, in fact, was made annually, frequently by the Tehsildars or Sheristadars,‖ and was not in general concluded until after the crop had been raised: the system then was, to make as high a settlement as it was practicable to realize. If the crop was good, the demand was raised as high, within the survey rates, as the means of the Ryot would admit; if the crop was bad, the last farthing was notwithstanding demanded, and no remission was allowed, unless the Ryot was totally unable to pay the rent. On this point the most severe scrutiny was instituted, for not only was the whole of the Collector's detailed establishment of servants employed in an investigation of his means, but each of his neighbours were converted into inquisitors, by being

* Colonel Macleod actually proposed to abolish meerassy, and Mr. Ravenshaw never acknowledged its existence. It is true that Mr Garrow's ryotwar survey assessment had contributed to annihilate meerassy in South Arcot before Mr. Ravenshaw was appointed to the district, but many proofs remained and still remain of its existence.

§ From Colonel Munro to his Assistants, dated the 25th August 1802.

‖ It may fairly be asked, whether Collectors or their Assistants were able to ascertain annually the means of the Ryots; if they were not, the scrutiny must have been left to native revenue officers.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

being themselves made liable for his failure, unless they could shew that he was possessed of property.

270. This last-mentioned rule of the ryotwar system, which, to make good the failure of unsuccessful Ryots, imposed an extra assessment, not exceeding ten per cent., upon their more fortunate neighbours in the same village, and even occasionally upon those in the villages of the vicinity, was found to be indispensable to the security of the revenue under that system. The little profit accruing to the industrious Ryot was thus taken by the state, to remunerate it for the losses it sustained from the failure of the less fortunate or more extravagant; and while the ryotwar system dissolved the unity of interest and the joint partnership in profit and loss, which formerly existed among each village community, in all the provinces east of the Ghauts, and was so beneficial both to the members of its own municipal body and to the Government, it in fact admitted that their joint responsibility was necessary for the security of the public revenue, and precluding the Ryots from an equal participation of the profit, most unjustly obliged them to share jointly the loss.

271. Under the ryotwar system, however, though the ultimate assessment on each field was thus fixed in money, and as much thereof as could be obtained was demanded annually, the amount levied on each Ryot was in fact left to be determined at the discretion of the European or native revenue officers; for it was the practice to compel the Ryot to occupy as much land, and consequently to pay as much revenue, as they deemed proportionate to his circumstances. He was not allowed, on payment even of the high survey assessment fixed on each field, to cultivate only those fields to which he gave the preference; his task was assigned to him; he was constrained to occupy all such fields as were allotted to him by the revenue officers, and whether he cultivated them or not, he was, as Mr. Thackeray emphatically terms it, saddled with the rent of each.* To use the words of Mr. Chaplin, the Collector in Bellary, one of the most able of Colonel Munro's former Assistants, and still one of the most strenuous advocates for the ryotwar system, it was the custom under it "to exert in a great degree the authority, which is "incompatible with the existing Regulations, of compelling the inhabitants to "cultivate a quantity of ground proportionate to their circumstances."† This he explains to have been done by "the power to confine and punish" them, exercised by the Collector and his native revenue servants; and he expressly adds, that if the Ryot was driven by these oppressions from the fields which he tilled, it was the established practice "to follow the fugitive wherever he "went, and by assessing him at discretion, to deprive him of all advantage "that he might expect to derive from a change of residence."

272. Reviewing the former ryotwar system as it thus existed in practice, nothing can well be more revolting to justice, and to all sound principles of civil government. Indeed the description given, by very high authority, of one of its fundamental rules, may with great propriety be applied to the whole system as it existed in practice, viz. that it was "better calculated to secure "the public revenue from failure, than to render individual justice to the "people."‡

273. There is no doubt that during the time that this system prevailed, a Collector's merits were too often estimated rather by the amount of his collections than by the soundness of his revenue principles, or any other standard; and his over ardent zeal to satisfy the urgent demands of the treasury made him too often blind to defects in his management, which to a more dispassionate and impartial observer it would seem necessary only to illustrate, in order to condemn.

274. Ignorant of the true resources of the newly acquired countries, as of the precise nature of their landed tenures, we find a small band of foreign conquerors no sooner obtaining possession of a vast extent of territory, peopled by various nations, differing from each other in language, customs, and habits, than they attempt what would be deemed a Herculean task, or rather a visionary project, even in the most civilized countries of Europe, of which every every statistical information is possessed, and of which the government are one with the people, viz. to fix a land-rent, not on each province, district, or country, not on each estate or farm, but on every separate field within their dominions. In pursuit of this supposed improvement, we find them unintentionally dissolving the ancient ties, "the ancient usages" which united the republic of each Hindoo village, and by a kind of agrarian law, newly assessing and parcelling out the lands which from time immemorial had belonged to the village community collectively, not only among the individual members of the privileged order (the Meerassidars and Cadeems), but even among their inferior tenantry (the Pyacarries): we observe them ignorantly denying, and by their denial abolishing private property in the land; resuming what belonged to a public body (the Grama manium), and conferring in lieu of it a stipend in money on one individual; professing to limit their demand on each field, but in fact, by establishing for such limit an unattainable maximum, assessing the Ryot at discretion; and, like the Mussulman government which preceded them, binding the Ryot by force to the plough, compelling him to till land acknowledged to be over-assessed, dragging him back to it if he absconded, deferring their demand upon him until his crop came to maturity, then taking from him all that could be obtained, and leaving to him nothing but his bullocks and his seed grain, nay, perhaps obliged to supply him even with these, in order to renew his melancholy task of cultivating, not for himself, but for them.

275. That the foregoing is no exaggerated description of the ryotwar system, as it existed in practice, the Board appeal to the admissions and statements of its own advocates, on which it is founded; and it must candidly be admitted, that this system, so fraught with individual injustice, might possibly have been in existence to the present day, but for the laws enacted in 1802, taken from those framed in Bengal by the Marquis Cornwallis, which engrafted on the Indian codes the principles of British justice, conferred upon our subjects in these countries the free command of their own labour, insured to them the free enjoyment of its fruits, and established independent courts to secure to them these truly inestimable blessings.

276. It was not, as has been heretofore supposed and recorded, that the forms established by these laws were incompatible with the details of the ryotwar system, for any little incongruity in this respect could easily have been reconciled; but it was that the fundamental principles of the new code were entirely at variance with those of the existing revenue administration. The new Regulations declared revenue to be subordinate to justice, while the ryotwar system had rendered justice entirely subordinate to revenue. The new laws, by their general principles, and not by any specific enactment, took from the native revenue officers the power to "punish and confine," which they had exercised to coerce the Ryot to cultivate, and annually to take from him all that he was able to pay; the Tehsildar was stripped of the ketticole or hand torture, the stone placed on the head under a burning sun, the stocks, and other of his former insignia of office, by the display and occasional use of which he had been enabled to saddle the Ryots with the rent of such lands as he deemed proper. The Lictor, deprived of his fasces, was no longer terrible to the people, and as they gradually acquired a knowledge of the rights conferred upon them by the British legislature, they would no longer obey the injunctions of the local officers, which they found that they had not now the power to enforce, and accordingly refused to cultivate for the Government, and not for themselves.

277. The ryotwar system was thus not abandoned, but overthrown. The artificial props borrowed from an arbitrary and oppressive government, by which the superstructure had been supported, were immediately sapped by the principles of British justice, and these once destroyed, the whole fabric fell, never it is hoped to be raised again on a similar foundation.

The Village Settlement.

278. The ryotwar system being thus destroyed, and it being generally deemed inexpedient further to extend the permanent zemindarry settlement to those provinces in which no Zemindars previously existed, and where it

 consequently

consequently would have been necessary to create them, it remained to adopt some new plan for the collection of the public revenue; and accordingly, after great deliberation, the village settlement was adopted, first for three, and subsequently for ten years.

279. This village settlement proceeded on the principle of assessing for a term of years a fixed sum as public revenue upon each village, not upon each field, and in consideration of the payment thereof, making over for that period the government right to the public revenue from the entire lands of the whole village, both arable and waste,* to the village community, either, where practicable, by a direct settlement with the whole body of the Ryots collectively, or by one made with the head or heads of the village.

280. The terms triennial and decennial lease, by which these village settlements have occasionally been designated, appear in England to have led to incorrect notions respecting the principles of this system, and to have induced the belief that, as under the Mahommedans, and the first years of our possession of the Northern Circars, a set of renters, distinct from the people of the village, were introduced between them and the Government, a kind of middle men of the most objectionable description. This was by no means the principle of the village settlement. It differed from the ryotwar chiefly in the assessment being fixed on the entire aggregate lands of the village, not on each distinct and separate field; in its being concluded with all the Ryots collectively, not with each individually; and in its giving up to the Ryots not only the revenue to be derived from the arable lands, but that also to be obtained by after-exertion from the waste also. In fact, in leaving, in consideration of a contract to pay a given sum as public revenue, the entire internal administration of the affairs to the village community.

281. The object in view was to adapt the revenue administration to the ancient institutions and ancient usages of the country, to which the Hindoos are proverbially attached; to suit the system to the people, and not to attempt to bend the people to the system. Mr. Place, quoted by some mistake in England as an advocate for ryotwar, has well described the village settlement, and it is curious to observe the accuracy with which he predicted the consequences resulting from an attempt at the introduction of ryotwar in the Tamil country.

" It would," says he, " be superfluous, impracticable, and impolitic, to " ascertain with greater precision than has already been done, the measured " extent of each share or of each man's proportion of meerassy; because, in " the first place, it would strengthen those suspicions which have arisen, and " in the next, it could only be done by personal survey, and the most unre- " mitting attention, which I think hardly any one man can give, to the " completion of such a work, independent of innumerable variations that " would take place while it was in hand; and it would be unwise, because " not only it will be ever the most beneficial mode to let the lands of every village " jointly to the inhabitants at large, both with a view to security and to good " cultivation; but to let them separately, would tend to create divisions and " dissentions, to the undoubted embarrassment of themselves, as well as of the " public. No difficulty occurs in fixing the value of all the lands together of one " village, but it would be nearly impossible to assign to every small allotment its " portion so exactly, and with such due regard to fertility of soil and other " circumstances, that some should not benefit and others suffer; yet the latter " would not receive the assistance of the former, in case of failure in their " engagements.

" At present, every village considers itself a distinct society, and its general " concerns the sole object of the inhabitants at large: a practice, surely, " which

* It was supposed that the making over the revenue to be derived from waste lands to the Zemindars and Mootahdars, under the plan of a zemindarry permanent assessment, and to the village community under the village rents, was giving up advantages that the state should or might have reserved Let it be remembered, however, that it was a necessary sacrifice, if sacrifice it can be called, to secure the high scale at which the public revenue had in both cases been fixed. Under the ryotwar permanent field rents, the result must be the same, but the process different. The reduction must be made in the first instance, to be recovered hereafter or not, as circumstances may turn out.

"which redounds as much to the public good as to theirs; each having, in "some way or other, the assistance of the rest. The labours of all yield the "rent; they enjoy the profit proportionate to the original interest, and the loss "falls light. It consists exactly with the principles upon which the advantages "are derived by a division of labour: one man goes to market, whilst the rest "attend to the cultivation and harvest: each has his particular occupation "assigned to him, and insensibly labours for all; but if each had these several "duties to attend to, it is obvious that all the inhabitants must be absent "together at those times that are most critical, both to them and to the state, "and that many must want those abilities necessary to the performance of the "various employments that would arise.

"If a measurement of lands should be made, with a view to assign to each "proprietor what belonged to him, and to confine him to the cultivation of "that spot only, it would interfere with another practice, which very frequently "prevails, and which I do not know can be surmounted, of each changing his "lands every year. It is found in some of the richest villages, and intended, "I imagine, to obviate that inequality to which a fixed distribution would be "liable.

"On the whole, I cannot but consider that any reform tending to do away "the union, or, if I may be allowed the expression, the unity of the inhabitants, "and to fix each exclusively to his property, will be attended with danger."

282. The village system, in fact, was founded upon the ancient institutions of the country, which may be traced beyond the age of Menu. The integrity of the village corporation was acknowledged, the lands, both arable and waste, and the revenue to be derived from them, during the term of the existing contract, for the joint payment of the public revenue, were left at the disposal of the whole community collectively, not in parts to each individually, and the public revenue was assessed, when the village was rented, on the entire village, not on each field. When the village was not rented to the village community, the public revenue was, as has been frequently described, collected either by an intermediate renter or by the officers of Government; and in kind or in money, as might be the local custom.

283. A system, "the success of which principally and almost wholly "depends on an active, uniform, and unrelaxed exercise of superintendence, "and personal controul and inspection, on the part of the Collectors, over "the different gradations of public servants employed under their authority,"* under which "a clear practical knowledge of languages, pure intentions, clear "understanding, and active habits of body and mind, were all indispensable,"† was thought to require too much: and on the same grounds that unlimited monarchy is condemned as a system of government, because all sovereigns are not equally perfect, ryotwar was deemed an inexpedient system of revenue management, because all collectors are not gifted with the rare qualifications which it requires. The question was, not what was theoretically, but what was practically best. A settled system of revenue administration was to be adopted which was to be conducted not by a selected few, but by men of all talents and abilities; and it was thought that a Collector, even of the greatest attainments, with numerous other avocations, would find it a sufficiently arduous task to apportion a just assessment on each of the many villages within its jurisdiction, without descending to the difficult and arduous details of apportioning it on each field.

284. It was also conceived, that the assessment upon the people would be much less liable to inequality when fixed upon the entire lands of the village, and left to be distributed by the people themselves, according to their established rights, individual interests, and local information, than when the Government hired temporary servants to determine in perpetuity the maximum of their demand on each field, the value of which is liable to perpetual variation, from the different hands into which it may fall, the degree of culture or neglect it may consequently receive, and from the corruption and fraud which would influence the assessment on it; and it seemed obvious that an assessment proceeding from villages to fields, from the aggregate to the detail, was less

* See Fifth Report. † Ibid.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

less open to error than one proceeding from fields to villages, or from the detail to the aggregate.

285. It was apprehended by some, that where the collective body of the Ryots would not consent to the assessment fixed by the Collector on the village, and it became consequently requisite to enter into a settlement with the head only of the village, he would exercise over the inferior Ryots all sorts of oppression; but it was conceived that his petty tyrannies could never equal those to which the Ryot was liable from the more powerful Tehsildar. On the contrary, it was thought that his more intimate acquaintance with the affairs of the village, his superior knowledge of all its localities, his fellow-feeling for his unfortunate brethren, the assistance and forbearance which he knew when and how to afford to each Ryot much better than the Tehsildar, the interest he possessed in supporting his popularity among the village community by a system of conciliation, and above all, his entire dependence on the Ryots themselves to enable him to fulfil his engagements, would render him a much more acceptable superior to them, than the Collector's severe and authoritative deputy, connected with the Ryot by no ties of dependence, friendship, or fellow-feeling, and dependent for all his prospects in life chiefly on the state of his treasury and the precision of his collections.

286. The village settlement, however, though it commenced by fixing the assessment, on each village and making over the lands to the people collectively, or to the head of the village, expressly contemplated its gradual subdivision and distribution, not indeed upon each field, but upon the entire lands of each Ryot; and consequently the gradual conversion of the collective into an individual settlement, wherever the interests of the village community would admit of this change. One of the chief advantages of the ryotwar system was thus engrafted on the village settlement; but the measure was not to be universally or immediately introduced. The people were not to be constrained to adopt an arrangement, which, however abstractedly expedient, was in a great number of the provinces at variance with the landed tenures, the ancient institutions, and the circumstances of the inhabitants. It was hoped that as their means improved the obstacles to this arrangement would be overcome, and accordingly it was to be rather promoted than introduced by the Collectors.

287. The judgment which has been pronounced in England against the village system, of which the outline is given above, is founded on a very partial and unfavourable view of its results; for it does not appear that the authorities at home had, at the time when that judgment was passed, any information before them respecting any other portion of it than its commencement, the triennial settlement. It is hoped that the reports which have since been forwarded, in elucidation of the effects of the decennial settlement, will enable them to form a more correct opinion of the tendency of the village system.

288. Nothing, however, that has been urged at home, appears to contravene any of the fundamental principles of the village system. The whole of the evils arising from the triennial settlement, or which have been attributed to it, may distinctly be traced, not to its intrinsic principles, but to its over-assessment, which it must be allowed has been justly condemned; for it was nearly every where a mere rack-rent. Under the pressing orders received from England, about that period, requiring from this country a surplus revenue of a million sterling, accompanied by a threat from the Honourable Court of Directors to take the revision of the establishments into their own hands, not only was the most rigid economy enforced in all departments of the state, but the triennial settlement of each village where the ryotwar system had existed was too generally determined with "reference to the payments under the survey "rent;" in other words, with reference to the collections under the ryotwar system, when all was taken from the people that they were able to pay.* The over-assessment during this period, therefore, arose from the triennial settlement having, in a great degree, been founded upon the fallacious data of the ryotwar collections; and if any inference is to be drawn from this circumstance, it is one against the ryotwar, not against the village settlement.

289. This

* See Report of the Board of Revenue to Government, dated 25th April 1808.

289. This practical error, with some others of a similar nature which had inadvertently crept into the triennial settlement, and are attributable entirely to a deviation from its principles, was in general avoided in the decennial settlement, which, as embracing a longer period and a greater vicissitude of seasons, is the standard by which a fair judgment may be formed of the result of the village system.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

290. To take a complete review of the result of this settlement would extend these already voluminous proceedings to too great a length. Referring therefore for particular information to the late reports of the Board on this subject, it will here be sufficient briefly to state, that although this system has not been equally successful in every district, yet even where (as in Bellary) it has been the least so, the Collectors are unanimous in opinion that it has most materially improved the condition of the great agricultural population of the country, and that it is the great body of the Ryots, and not the mere parties with whom the settlement was concluded, who have chiefly benefited by the village settlement. The ryotwar teerwas have nearly every where been greatly reduced, and instead of the head Ryots oppressing their inferiors, most of the Collectors have been obliged to prop their weakened authority by that of their Tehsildars. This, without any material exception, is the universal language of all their reports, and it is a result which may be confidently offered as conclusive evidence that the system has generally answered the expectations of those by whom it was introduced. But where the settlement has been best conducted, as in Cuddapah and the northern division of Arcot, a picture of prosperity is drawn, of which the parallel may in vain be sought for throughout the revenue records of this presidency.

291. That the village settlement did not embrace as many of the Ryots as were competent to become parties to it, may be seen on reference to the detailed reports of the Board; but this is to be attributed to the situation to which most had been previously reduced, and to their unwillingness to enter into renewed contracts. But in Tanjore upwards of sixty-six thousand persons were immediate parties to the settlement; and the number of Ryots in Tinnevelly and the northern division of Arcot, who by degrees became indirectly parties to it, fully shews that the system not only professed, but actually tended gradually to convert the collective gramwar or village settlement into an individual ryotwar, free of all the evils arising from permanent field money assessments * incapable of being permanent, and from compulsion; and if similar results were not produced in other districts, it was because the village system tended rather gradually to promote this change than suddenly to introduce it, and that the system had no sooner commenced its operation than orders were received from England to abandon it altogether.

New Ryotwar Settlement.

292. The Board refrain from entering into any further remarks on the subject of the village settlement. The object of this minute is not to advocate any particular system of revenue administration, all further discussion on that point being, for the present at least, precluded by the orders lately received from England, for reverting generally to annual ryotwar settlements. The sole object of this minute has been to condense, for the use of the Collectors generally, such scattered information as the Records of the Board afford, respecting the nature of the landed tenures of the country, and the principles and effects of the different revenue systems hitherto pursued, in order thereby to afford to each of the local revenue officers the means of taking advantage of the information and experience of former Collectors, to warn them against the errors committed either in their own or in the neighbouring districts, and consequently to promote and facilitate such a modified and improved annual ryotwar settlement, as may meet the expectations and obtain the approbation of the authorities at home.

293. The correspondence with Government, which has already been circulated to the Collectors, will have shewn that the ryotwar system now to be introduced, though founded on that which formerly prevailed, differs from it in

* See Colonel Munro's examination before the House of Commons, in which the ryotwar plan of revenue is described as a permanent system, so far as regards the lands already assessed.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

in several points of essential importance. The Board will accordingly proceed to close this already too voluminous paper, by calling the attention of the Collectors generally to a few remarks on the chief points of difference between the two systems.

294. In the first place, it is distinctly to be understood that any compulsion or restraint on the free labour of the Ryot, which may have been exercised under the former ryotwar system, is most expressly forbidden under the settlement now to be introduced; and as its continuance is chiefly to be apprehended on the part of the native revenue officers, Collectors will consider it to be their particular duty specially to warn them against all improper assumption of power, or the exercise of undue influence in the settlement or collection of the revenue. For this purpose, it may be proper fully to explain to them that they are no longer at liberty to employ those arts known by the denomination of sumjaish, or any other threats, as the engagements between the Government and the Ryot must now on both sides be entirely voluntary. The restraint exercised under the former ryotwar system was not the less dangerous from its never having been openly avowed, and it will be the duty of Collectors to ascertain from the Ryots themselves that they are not deceived as to the conduct of their native servants in this respect.

295. The Board have considered this caution to be the more requisite, because the whole of the Revenue officers have lately been armed with the additional authority of the magisterial department; and the Collectors will therefore not only themselves be held responsible that they keep their revenue duties distinct and separate from those of the Magistrate, but that they see that their native servants do so likewise.

296. The Board are aware that it may be urged, that if free labour is to be continued to the Ryots under the new settlement, the revenues will materially suffer, because they will give up "all the bad, and keep all the good land "which they occupy," throw up the highly assessed fields, and retain those only which are lowly assessed. The Board will be prepared to listen with attention to any suggestions which it may be in the power of the different Collectors to offer, and to sanction any remedies that they may be able to devise, with the view of preventing an evil which never could have arisen, had the former ryotwar system, including the survey, been founded on just and correct principles; but it must be clearly understood, that the revenue is to continue as at present subordinate to justice, that freedom of labour to the Ryots is by the Court or Directors themselves declared to be the basis of the new settlement, and that therefore no restraint whatever, inconsistent with it, can be imposed upon them.

297. The new settlement also differs from that which formerly prevailed, in another essential point. Instead of denying the existence of all private property in the lands on this side of the Peninsula, it expressly acknowledges that property to exist in most of the provinces, to a greater or less extent; and as it is no less the desire of the Honourable Court of Directors than that of the Government and the Board, to uphold private rights, it will be the duty of Collectors specially to guard against any infraction of the landed tenures of the country. The attention of the Collectors in Dindigul, Madura, and the two divisions of Arcot, is accordingly particularly called to the necessity of revising the former ryotwar surveys of their respective districts, with the view of ascertaining how far they interfered with the established rights of the Meerassidars, and how far the restoration of these rights is now practicable. It is evident not only that the marahs, tondoo-warum, and other privileges of the Meerassidars, were very generally incorporated with the land revenue in these districts, but that in many places their grama-mauniums were resumed, and it would appear that where the pasung-carei tenure existed, the ryotwar survey in many villages, particularly in the southern division of Arcot, instead of assessing each field and leaving the Meerassidars to cast lots as usual for the occupation of them, made over particular fields to particular individuals, thereby forcibly converting the pasung into the arudi-carei tenure; and as many of the individuals thus admitted to the immediate occupation of the land appear to have been Pyacarries, the rights of the Meerassidars were likewise thereby materially infringed.

298. All

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

298. All Collectors, therefore, those in the Tamil provinces in particular, will be careful to avoid errors of a similar nature. They will perceive, that in order to "preserve the rights of the Meerassidars, Oolcoodies, and Cadeems, "from the infraction in favour of their inferior tenants, the Pyacarries, which, "by admitting both on a footing of equality was the cause of a just ground of "complaint under the former ryotwar system," the Board proposed to Government that the Collectors should be forbidden "to admit any persons to "enter into engagements with the officers of Government under the ryotwar "system, who are not by hereditary or prescriptive right entitled to pay their "dues directly to the Circar." The Government, in reply, have stated that "the ryotwar settlement should not be attended with any infraction of the "rights of the Meerassidars or others in the soil; but that further than that "object may require, it does not appear necessary to preclude Collectors "from entering into agreements with Ryots who may not hitherto have paid "revenue direct to Government." Now the Board apprehend that, in the Tamil provinces in particular, and even elsewhere, the admission of Pyacarries to a direct settlement with the Government will in general be found to be an infraction of the rights of the Meerassidars or Cadeems; but on this important subject it is their intention to address the Collectors separately.

299. The proposed settlement also differs from the former ryotwar, as regards the rates of teerwa, or the maximum assessment on each field. From what has been stated in the former part of this minute, there can be no doubt that these in general were excessive, and greatly beyond the resources of the people; the necessity of revising them has therefore been universally admitted. In the Ceded Districts, where they were best established, Mr. Chaplin has admitted, and Colonel Munro himself has lately urged the expediency of reducing them. The Government have repeatedly recorded their conviction, that to keep up the teerwas will not keep up, but depress the revenue; and in their late orders they have desired that "the rate of assessment" "may be "such as is" calculated to give "encouragement to agricultural industry, and "thereby promote the general prosperity of the country."

300. The review which has been taken of the different revenue systems hitherto pursued will shew, that in all the chief error has been over-assessment. The zemindarry, the mootahdarry, the ryotwar, and the gramwar or village settlement, has each partially failed from this cause, but in none is over-assessment so mischievous as under the ryotwar system. In the zemindarry settlement over-assessment may ruin the extravagant representative of an ancient family, or the speculative newly created Mootahdar. Under the village system it may affect such of the inhabitants as become immediate parties to the settlement; but under the ryotwar system it reaches every cultivator, absorbs the very sources whence all revenue flows, and strikes at once at the roots of prosperity.

301. Over-assessment, also, is not only more mischievous in its effects under ryotwar, but more likely to occur under that system than under any other; for the assessment under it has hitherto been founded, not as in the zemindarry and village settlements, on the firm basis of past actual collections, but on an estimate of value, with reference rather to extent and soil than to produce, which in this country is affected more by irrigation and price than either by the nature or the extent of the land.

302. The Board, therefore, desire to impress upon the minds of the Collectors the vast importance of guarding against an evil, which even the most able ryotwar Collectors have not escaped. It seems chiefly to have originated from the circumstance of the settlement being founded on exaggerated measurement, vague estimates of the probable productive quality of the soil, and exorbitant prices, and above all, from its having proceeded from details to the aggregate, and not from the aggregate to details.

303. The authority to modify the teerwas, granted to the Collectors of those districts in which a field assessment was established by the Ryotwar survey, will, it is hoped, enable them to remedy the evil in question; and the errors into which former Collectors have fallen in this respect should be a beacon to guard those Collectors about to introduce this system for the first time into their in several points of essential importance. The Board will accordingly proceed to close this already too voluminous paper, by calling the attention of the Collectors generally to a few remarks on the chief points of difference between the two systems.

294. In the first place, it is distinctly to be understood that any compulsion or restraint on the free labour of the Ryot, which may have been exercised under the former ryotwar system, is most expressly forbidden under the settlement now to be introduced; and as its continuance is chiefly to be apprehended on the part of the native revenue officers, Collectors will consider it to be their particular duty specially to warn them against all improper assumption of power, or the exercise of undue influence in the settlement or collection of the revenue. For this purpose, it may be proper fully to explain to them that they are no longer at liberty to employ those arts known by the denomination of sumjaish, or any other threats, as the engagements between the Government and the Ryot must now on both sides be entirely voluntary. The restraint exercised under the former ryotwar system was not the less dangerous from its never having been openly avowed, and it will be the duty of Collectors to ascertain from the Ryots themselves that they are not deceived as to the conduct of their native servants in this respect.

295. The Board have considered this caution to be the more requisite, because the whole of the Revenue officers have lately been armed with the additional authority of the magisterial department; and the Collectors will therefore not only themselves be held responsible that they keep their revenue duties distinct and separate from those of the Magistrate, but that they see that their native servants do so likewise.

296. The Board are aware that it may be urged, that if free labour is to be continued to the Ryots under the new settlement, the revenues will materially suffer, because they will give up "all the bad, and keep all the good land "which they occupy," throw up the highly assessed fields, and retain those only which are lowly assessed. The Board will be prepared to listen with attention to any suggestions which it may be in the power of the different Collectors to offer, and to sanction any remedies that they may be able to devise, with the view of preventing an evil which never could have arisen, had the former ryotwar system, including the survey, been founded on just and correct principles; but it must be clearly understood, that the revenue is to continue as at present subordinate to justice, that freedom of labour to the Ryots is by the Court or Directors themselves declared to be the basis of the new settlement, and that therefore no restraint whatever, inconsistent with it, can be imposed upon them.

297. The new settlement also differs from that which formerly prevailed, in another essential point. Instead of denying the existence of all private property in the lands on this side of the Peninsula, it expressly acknowledges that property to exist in most of the provinces, to a greater or less extent; and as it is no less the desire of the Honourable Court of Directors than that of the Government and the Board, to uphold private rights, it will be the duty of Collectors specially to guard against any infraction of the landed tenures of the country. The attention of the Collectors in Dindigul, Madura, and the two divisions of Arcot, is accordingly particularly called to the necessity of revising the former ryotwar surveys of their respective districts, with the view of ascertaining how far they interfered with the established rights of the Meerassidars, and how far the restoration of these rights is now practicable. It is evident not only that the marahs, tondoo-warum, and other privileges of the Meerassidars, were very generally incorporated with the land revenue in these districts, but that in many places their grama-mauniums were resumed, and it would appear that where the pasung-carei tenure existed, the ryotwar survey in many villages, particularly in the southern division of Arcot, instead of assessing each field and leaving the Meerassidars to cast lots as usual for the occupation of them, made over particular fields to particular individuals, thereby forcibly converting the pasung into the arudi-carei tenure; and as many of the individuals thus admitted to the immediate occupation of the land appear to have been Pyacarries, the rights of the Meerassidars were likewise thereby materially infringed.

298. All

298. All Collectors, therefore, those in the Tamil provinces in particular, will be careful to avoid errors of a similar nature. They will perceive, that in order to "preserve the rights of the Meerassidars, Oolcoodies, and Cadeems, "from the infraction in favour of their inferior tenants, the Pyacarries, which "by admitting both on a footing of equality was the cause of a just ground of "complaint under the former ryotwar system," the Board proposed to Government that the Collectors should be forbidden "to admit any persons to "enter into engagements with the officers of Government under the ryotwar "system, who are not by hereditary or prescriptive right entitled to pay their "dues directly to the Circar." The Government, in reply, have stated that "the ryotwar settlement should not be attended with any infraction of the "rights of the Meerassidars or others in the soil; but that further than that "object may require, it does not appear necessary to preclude Collectors "from entering into agreements with Ryots who may not hitherto have paid "revenue direct to Government." Now the Board apprehend that, in the Tamil provinces in particular, and even elsewhere, the admission of Pyacarries to a direct settlement with the Government will in general be found to be an infraction of the rights of the Meerassidars or Cadeems; but on this important subject it is their intention to address the Collectors separately.

Minute of Board of Revenue, 5 Jan. 1818.

299. The proposed settlement also differs from the former ryotwar, as regards the rates of teerwa, or the maximum assessment on each field. From what has been stated in the former part of this minute, there can be no doubt that these in general were excessive, and greatly beyond the resources of the people; the necessity of revising them has therefore been universally admitted. In the Ceded Districts, where they were best established, Mr. Chaplin has admitted, and Colonel Munro himself has lately urged the expediency of reducing them. The Government have repeatedly recorded their conviction, that to keep up the teerwas will not keep up, but depress the revenue; and in their late orders they have desired that "the rate of assessment" "may be "such as is" calculated to give "encouragement to agricultural industry, and "thereby promote the general prosperity of the country."

300. The review which has been taken of the different revenue systems hitherto pursued will shew, that in all the chief error has been over-assessment. The zemindarry, the mootahdarry, the ryotwar, and the gramwar or village settlement, has each partially failed from this cause, but in none is over-assessment so mischievous as under the ryotwar system. In the zemindarry settlement over-assessment may ruin the extravagant representative of an ancient family, or the speculative newly created Mootahdar. Under the village system it may affect such of the inhabitants as become immediate parties to the settlement; but under the ryotwar system it reaches every cultivator, absorbs the very sources whence all revenue flows, and strikes at once at the roots of prosperity.

301. Over-assessment, also, is not only more mischievous in its effects under ryotwar, but more likely to occur under that system than under any other; for the assessment under it has hitherto been founded, not as in the zemindarry and village settlements, on the firm basis of past actual collections, but on an estimate of value, with reference rather to extent and soil than to produce, which in this country is affected more by irrigation and price than either by the nature or the extent of the land.

302. The Board, therefore, desire to impress upon the minds of the Collectors the vast importance of guarding against an evil, which even the most able ryotwar Collectors have not escaped. It seems chiefly to have originated from the circumstance of the settlement being founded on exaggerated measurement, vague estimates of the probable productive quality of the soil, and exorbitant prices, and above all, from its having proceeded from details to the aggregate, and not from the aggregate to details.

303. The authority to modify the teerwas, granted to the Collectors of those districts in which a field assessment was established by the Ryotwar survey, will, it is hoped, enable them to remedy the evil in question; and the errors into which former Collectors have fallen in this respect should be a beacon to guard those Collectors about to introduce this system for the first time into their their districts, against a step so fatal to the system, and so pregnant with ruin to the great agricultural population of the country.

304. In converting the (warum or paloo) assessment in kind into a money assessment on each field (teerwa), the Collectors will perceive that the Government approve of the directions contained in the Board's circular letter of the 22d May (paragraph 2), which assimilates to the seventh rule proposed by Mr. Ellis, in his letter of the 25th June. The Collectors, with reference thereto as well as to the survey of a village, which most of them will soon have completed, are required maturely to consider and report whether a survey or measurement of the land, as described by Colonel Munro, is in their opinion necessary to introduce a field money assessment; or whether it would not be preferable to found it on the village accounts of average actual produce and selling prices, for a series of years past, on a known extent of land, rather than upon actual measurement and estimates of the productive quality of each field.

305. Whatever may be their opinion, or the final orders to be issued by Government on this point, experience has shewn that before assessing each cultivated field, it would be preferable to determine, in the aggregate, the maximum Government demand upon the whole arable lands under cultivation in the village, and that this aggregate should not exceed the average past collections from the village for former years. The aggregate demand on the cultivated lands being thus determined, it may then easily be distributed upon the fields in detail, in proportion to their productive quality, as shewn by the village accounts; the arable lands not under cultivation may then be separately assessed, according to their average produce, as shewn by the former accounts of the village, and the waste may be assessed hereafter, according to such further general orders as may be issued on that subject.

306. There is only one point more in which the new ryotwar settlement differs from that which formerly obtained, to which the Board deem it necessary to call the particular attention of the Collectors, viz. that no extra assessment to the extent of ten per cent. is to be made on the more fortunate or illustrious Ryot, in order to compensate the Government for the failure of the more extravagant or unfortunate. This rule formed one of the fundamental principles of the former ryotwar system, and it has recently been urged by Colonel Munro to the Government as requisite for the support of the settlement now to be generally introduced. In forwarding the letter in which this recommendation is contained, the Board observe that the Government have taken no notice of it; and it is so repugnant to every principle of justice, has been so strongly condemned by the highest authority in England, and is so subversive of every right deliberately conferred upon the people by the judicial code, to the maintenance of which the faith of the Government is solemnly pledged, that the Board feel satisfied an enactment of this description will never receive the sanction of their authority.

307. The Collectors, in entering on the new settlement, should ever recollect that the great object in view is not immediately, but by degrees, to substitute the ryotwarry of the western coast for the old Carnatic and Ceded Dictrict ryotwarry: not to create but to restore landed property, gradually to convert the bad farms of the Tamil country into good estates, and the land-holders into land-owners; and where, as in the Ceded Districts, private property in the land does not exist, and the Court of Directors have declared their determination to stand forth as the landlords of the soil, the Collectors must bear in mind that they desire to be liberal landlords, not avaricious farmers of the land; that the Ryot in that part of the country is therefore gradually to be raised from the condition of a mere labourer to that of a farmer; that he is no longer to be made to till the ground for the Government, but to be left to plough it for himself; and that the Government renounce the principle of taking from him all that he is able to pay, and desire now only to receive a fair revenue from the land he cultivates.

308. In conclusion, the Board deem it their duty to call upon each Collector zealously to unite with them in promoting the early and successful introduction into his district of the modified ryotwar settlement above described, so much desired desired by the Honourable Court of Directors. Impressed with the momentous interest involved in the introduction of this new settlement, and with the great responsibility incurred under a system, where so much depends on the acquirements and talents of the local officers, it is expected that each within his sphere will exert them to the utmost, in the service of the Government and the people; and as it is the intention of the Board to ascertain on the spot the manner in which these orders are carried into effect by each Collector, they are willing to hope that their subordinate officers will enable them to satisfy the Government, both here and in England, that their recommendations in their favour continue deserving of a favourable consideration.

EXTRACT PROCEEDINGS of the BOARD of REVENUE,
The 28th May 1818.

To the President and Members of the Board of Revenue, Fort St. George.

GENTLEMEN:

Par. 1. I have the honour to transmit the following statements, explanatory of the settlements of the revenues of the northern division of Arcot in fusily 1225 (or 1815-16) and fusily 1226 (or 1816-17).

Mr. Grœme's Report, 31 March 1818.

A. General statement of the revenues or jummabundy and kistbundy for fusily 1225.

B. Comparative statement of the revenues between fusilies 1224 and 1225.

C. General statement of the revenues or jummabundy and kistbundy for fusily 1226.

D. Comparative statement of the revenues between fusilies 1225 and 1226.

2. But previously to entering into the causes of increase and decrease in these particular fusilies, I beg to submit explanations of the discrepancies in my different jummabundy statements, which were pointed out in the proceedings of the Board of the 16th November 1815, prefacing them with the general observation, that the statements which, in the first instance, I transmitted for the expected revenues of the future fusilies of the decennial lease, necessarily differed in many cases from the statements which were subsequently prepared for the then current years, as many items of revenue were subject to change, and at first could only be estimated. The sornathayum or pullaputtada, for instance, which is settled annually, and many gardens and orchards, which were rented by the year, or for a certain term not exactly corresponding with the general term of the decennial settlement.

3. " The Board observe, that in making a comparison of the decennial " settlement with the settlement of fusily 1220, I have stated the decrease in " the decennial settlement to be Star Pagodas 54,170 39 70 (vide report, 25th " August 1812, paragraph 3), while they are of opinion, the real difference " is Star Pagodas 53,739 27 54."*

4. The Board's supposition, that the real difference between the average decennial settlement and the settlement of fusily 1220, was only Star Pagodas 53,739 27 54, instead of Star Pagodas 54,170 39 70, is perfectly correct. The mistake appears to have originated in a sum of Star Pagodas 431 12 20, increase in the ryotwar rent of the suttavaid talook not having been deducted from the deficiency.

5. " The Board observe, that in the 25th paragraph of my report of the " 25th August 1812, I stated the remission which had been granted to amount " to Star Pagodas 57,708 33 73, but that upon what the remissions had been " calculated was not clearly explained, whether upon the amount of the " average of the triennial lease settlement, or upon the amount of the " settlement of the last year of that lease. That to the Board it appeared that " the amount of the seven years' average collections, Star Pagodas 5,85,775 5 50, " had

* Vide paragraph 19 of the Board's proceedings of 16th November 1815.

Mr. Græme's Report, 31 March 1818.

"had been assumed as the regulating point in the formation of the decennial "settlement, and that the difference between the amount of this seven years' "average and the amount of the settlement for fusily 1220, being Star Pagodas "57,945 4 17, had been considered a remission, viz.

"Settlement of fusily 1220	6,41,720 9 67
"Average of seven years	5,83,775 5 50
"Difference	57,945 4 17"*

6. Though in forming the decennial settlement I was guided by a general view of the average collections of the years, from fusily 1211 to fusily 1217 (as stated in the fourth paragraph of my report of 25th August 1812), and considered any excess above that average to be a good cause for a permanent reduction or remission, yet in drawing the comparison in the 25th paragraph of that report, I only meant to point out how far the positive remissions in some villages (not taking credit for items of increase in others) made the decennial settlement fall short of the settlement of fusily 1220, the last year of the triennial lease, viz.

The positive remissions in some villages below the settlement of fusily 1220, were accordingly	57,708 33 73
The items of increase being deducted, as well for village as ryotwar rent	3,969 6 20
Would leave a difference of	53,739 27 53

7. "The Board observe,† that in columns 54 and 55, No. 2, enclosure in "my report of the 25th August 1812, the decrease and shrayum are respec- "tively entered at Star Pagodas 54,170 39 74, and Pagodas 78,377 42 62, "making together the sum total of Star Pagodas 132,548 37 56: that the "proportions there stated are, however, apparently incorrect, the 'shrayum' "being stated, both in the report and in column 41 of Statement No. 2, at "Pagodas 78,809 10 2, viz.

"Shrayum	78,809 10 2
"Decrease	53,739 27 54
"Total...............	1,32,548 37 56"

8. The shrayum is correctly stated in the report, and in column 41 of Statement No. 2, at Star Pagodas 78,809 10 2.

9. The different amount of Star Pagodas 78,377 42 62, stated in column 55, arose from the mode of making the comparison between fusily 1221 and fusily 1220, that is between columns 22 and 44.

10. From column 49 to column 60 is a babwar comparison (that is, a comparison by items), and it has been customary to shew the net, not the gross increase or decrease in every item: for instance, under the land revenue an increase as well as a decrease could not be shewn at the same time. The actual cause of difference is this. In suttavaid there was a remission in fusily 1221, under the head of shrayum, to the amount of Star Pagodas 673 31 15: there was also an increase in land revenue in the same talook of Star Pagodas 431 12 20. In carrying on the comparison between these two fusilies, the difference only between these two sums, viz. Star Pagodas 242 18 73, is brought to the head of shrayum in column 55. If the whole remission under the head of shrayum had been added, instead of the remaining balance, then the total of column 55 would have been equal to the total of column 41, or Star Pagodas 78,809 10 2.

11. "The Board observe,‡ that the settlement of the land revenue, as "stated in my reports of 19th March and 30th December 1814, and 18th "October 1815, differs from that specified in paragraph 2 of my report of "the 25th August 1812 (or fusily 1221) on the decennial settlement, viz.

12. When I transmitted my report to the Board of 25th August 1812, it was necessary to enter a number of items upon estimate for the year to come; that is, the pullapattada and the rent of gardens and groves, which not being settled for the whole period of the decennial lease were uncertain in their amount. I subjoin the particulars.

Fusily 1222.

	St. Pags.	F.	C.
The actual amount of pullapattada of fusily 1222 exceeded that estimated in	377	14	2
The amount rent of palmira trees exceeded that estimated in	17	11	20

The amount rent of palmira trees of fusily 1223 exceeded the estimated in	107	11	20
The amount pallapattada of fusily 1223 exceeded that estimated in	368	29	10
The amount rent of a garden in the wundawash talook, not included in the jummabundy of fusily 1221, as above stated	6	0	0
	1,339	34	52
This being added to	5,94,904	16	36
Makes it equal to	5,96,244	6	8

Fusily 1224.

The amount rent of the Ambee village of Toleesinga Pillay, as above stated	857	39	22
The amount rent of palmira trees in fusily 1224 exceeded that estimated in	109	11	20

13. " The Board observe,* the enclosure A, accompanying my report of " the 18th October 1815, differs from the similar statement forwarded with " my letter of the 25th August 1812, by stating the number of mowza at " 2,882, instead of 2,881, which apparently arises from the village enjoyed by " Toleesinga Pillay not having lapsed to Government until fusily 1223. That " these accounts further differ in the number of muzras being stated in the " report of the 18th October 1815 at 1474, and in that of the 25th August " 1812 at 1453."

14. The difference of the one mowza arises, as the Board suppose, from the resumption of the ambee village.

15. The addition of muzras is owing to that number having been newly formed since the commencement of the decennial settlement, viz.

In the Sutgud	9	do.

16. " The Board observe,† that in my report on fusily 1222, the number of ' villages sub-rented is entered at 503, the rent of which is stated to bear a ' proportion of forty-six per cent. to the amount of the whole settlement. ' The remaining aumanee villages are entered at 1,890, and adding 107 for ' the suttavaid talook, the total number of villages amount to 2,500, as stated ' in the jummabundy both for fusily 1221 and 1222. But that, in my ' subsequent reports for fusilies 1223 and 1224, the number of Circar villages, ' exclusive of suttavaid, is augmented to 2,604, partly by substituting as in ' Chittoor the number of pottahs for the number of villages, partly by other " alterations,

"alterations, the cause of which the Board are entirely at a loss to conjecture; "and the settlements for fusilies 1223 and 1224 are stated at Pagodas "4,81,664 38 25, and Pagodas 4,83,626 41 32 respectively: sums totally "different from those entered in the sixty-fourth paragraph of the Board's pro- "ceedings of the 16th November 1815, and not to be found in any of the "jummabundy statements for these two years."

Mr. Graeme's. Report, 31 March 1818.

17. In the statements connected with my reports on the settlements of fusilies 1221 and 1222, the number of mouzas or principal villages only were entered. This amounted, in the whole collectorate, to 2,500.

18. In the reports on fusily 1223 and fusily 1224, a number of muzras or dependent villages, which since the commencement of the decennial settlement have been transferred out of the mouzas to separate renters, who have become directly responsible to the Circar, have been included, so as erroneously to swell the number of villages. The number of muzras is 1,474 in the whole of the districts. The only mode of rendering the information clear is by taking the whole number of mouzas at 2,501, and the number of muzras at 1,474 for all the four fusilies. But it does not seem necessary, at this moment, to ascertain and distinguish the mouzas from the muzras in the different columns of the statements.

19. The statements of the revenues of fusilies 1223 and 1224, which exhibit Star Pagodas 4,81,664 38 25 for fusily 1223, and Star Pagodas 4,83,626 41 32 for fusily 1224, are perfectly correct, as far as they bear upon the points which they were intended to elucidate. Their aim was to shew in what manner the renters had managed the villages they had in rent from Government. These partial statements were not meant to detail all the branches and amount of revenue receivable from the districts, and were not, therefore, prepared to correspond with the general jummabundy statement, which was to comprehend every particular.

21. The rains of fusily 1225, though rather late for the better kinds of poonjee crops, were extremely favourable for the inferior species of dry grain; and the regular north-east monsoon, though in most places it was more abundant and favourable than it had been for many years for the nunjah cultivation, was not, however, equal throughout the districts.

22. The items of increase or decrease, which are of consequence enough to remark, are the following.

Of Increase.

23. A shrayum, or progressive rise in the land revenue, which was stipulated for in the original terms of the decennial settlement. Though the amount of shrayum was sanctioned to be reduced which remained uncollected, yet by a modification of the original intention the reduction was made in many cases not

not in the villages in which the shrayum was first placed, but in others, whose circumstances rendered a reduction more necessary. This accounts for the shrayum still being exhibited as an increase. It this year exceeds what it did last year by Star Pagodas 943 29 50.

24. There has been an increase in the pullapattada, or tax upon houses, of Star Pagodas 387 38 40.

25. An increase is also shewn in the rent of cavilly lands of the resumed jaghire villages of Koopum and Shynaverum; Suntanghe, Colatoor, and Vunirmbauk, being now brought to regular account, which formerly used to be carried to sevoy jumma, or extra revenue, amounting to Star Pagodas 130 11 9.

26. In the abkarry from the offers for the arrack farm having been higher, there was an increase of Star Pagodas 1,743 32 68.

27. In the sayer, from the increased importation of certain articles, but principally beetle-nut from the Mysore, Star Pagodas 4,340 18 29.

28. The triputty offerings have always been fluctuating, the amount depending entirely upon the number and description of pilgrims. The fair increase this year has been 8,383 42 54.

29. But the accounts bear a further nominal increase, from the gold and silver ingots and ornaments sent to the Presidency not having been melted down or sold, and their value ascertained in time to bring to the account of the years to which they belonged. This amounts to Star Pagodas 14,563 18 62.

Of Decrease.

30. A certain sum arises from shrayum: it exceeds what fell upon last year by Star Pagodas 274 9 71.

31. Lands have been granted for the erection of charity choultries under the sanction of Government, to the amount of Star Pagodas 133 21 35.

32. Two and a half additional cawnies of lands have been transferred to Soobadar Mahomed Surwar, to complete the grant of forty cawnies ordered by Government, under date 2d December 1806, his land having been found on re-measurement to be deficient in this quantity. The amount rent is Star Pagodas 20 24 8.

33. A garden in the mundial village of the Arcot talook was granted to Meer Mohamed Ally, late Tehsildar of Arcot, for his good conduct in the situation, under the sanction of Government, the rent of which was Star Pagodas 11 5 44.

34. Under farms and licenses there has been a decrease in the barber's farm at Terputty, of Star Pagodas 298.

35. And there are some articles under sayer imported in less quantity than before, which occasioned a decrease of Star Pagodas 415 1 56.

37. The

Mr. Græme's Report, 31 March 1818.

37. The rains of fusily 1226 were scanty, and the season altogether was rather unfavourable, more particularly in the southern districts.

38. The items of increase which have occurred in fusily 1226, are Star Pagodas 929 22 11, from shrayum, or the progressive rise stipulated for this year at the commencement of the lease, of Star Pagodas 212 27 60 in pullaputtada or somathayum, and of Star Pagodas 7,994 19 75 from the jaghires of Satumpauk Samatanghee Daisoor Magurla and Kotnaree Koopum, held under life-grants of this Government, which upon the demise of the incumbents have been resumed.

39. Within the districts lying to the north of the Palar, all the jaghires were surveyed and assessed in fusily 1215 in common with the Circar villages: in making the settlement, therefore, for fusily 1226, for the villages attached to these jaghires which are so situated, the survey rent of fusily 1215 was applied to the actual state of cultivation in fusily 1226, and in consequence of the advanced period of the season at the resumption the villages were generally made over to the head men, at the aggregate amount which thus resulted.

40. In the villages belonging to the south of the Palar, the rate of assessment upon each field was determined by an investigation of the average actual collections for ten or any other number of preceding years, and this rate was applied to the real extent of cultivation.

41. In the Satumpauk jaghire the villages of Satumpauk, Poondee, Tirmulcharry, Goodeemulloor, Unandalay, Kuddapatangul, Kuttayerry, Yadayentangul, Poonapantangul, Oopuruntangul, and Moonjeewaick, are to the north, and the villages of Vuloonoor, Yeshanoor, Koodoodee, Ladavurum, and Poodoopaudy, to the south; both descriptions of settlement, therefore, were made, that founded upon the survey rent of fusily 1215, and that bearing reference to the average collections of preceding years.

42. Samatanghee was settled by the rent of fusily 1215 alone.

43. Daisoor comprises the six villages of Daisoor, Pulkumpoondy, Purvatumpoondy, Peragumpootoor, Torakul, and Shusmungalum. The Jaghiredar had fixed rates of assessment upon the nunjee and poonjee lands, founded upon the average revenues of five years. The cultivation of fusily 1226 was conducted under the pledge of these rates, which upon the resumption of the jaghire were confirmed and allowed to continue at least for fusily 1226, that is, his rates of assessment, which varied according to the quality and supposed capability of each field, were applied to the actual extent of cultivation.

44. Kotmaree Coopum was settled by the assessment of the survey rent of fusily 1215 upon the land cultivated.

45. The jaghire of Magurlah comprehends the villages of Kurragherry, Magurlah, and Bungarum. The offer of the head-men for Kurragherry not being equal to the estimate formed of it, the survey rent of fusily 1215 was levied upon the lands actually cultivated, and the settlement made with the Ryots individually. The other two villages of Magurlah and Bungarum were rented out to the heads of villages from fusily 1226 to fusily 1230 inclusive. The average collections of these two villages in ten years (viz. from fusily 1214 to fusily 1223) amounted to Star Pagodas 787 8 52, and the settlement from fusily 1226 to fusily 1230 was made at Star Pagodas 853 16 7 per annum.

46. The average collections of all the resumed jaghires, from fusily 1211 to fusily 1217 (with the exception of the jaghires of Daisoor and Kotamaree Coopum, from fusily 1216 to fusily 1225, and the villages of Bungarum and Magurlah, from fusily 1214 to fusily 1223) amounted to Star Pagodas 10,887 5 49.

47. The actual settlement of fusily 1226 (including what was previously to the assumption collected by the Jaghiredar) owing to the badness of the season and the advanced period when these jaghires were resumed, is	8,601	42	2

Mr. Greme's Report, 31 March 1818.

48. The revenues of fusily 1226 have suffered a decrease chiefly under the heads of "shrayum," or a reduction under the sanction of the Board and of Government of the assessment in villages which were allowed a temporary abatement in fusily 1221, the first year of the lease, on account of the badness of the season, on condition of their paying it in the subsequent years of the lease. The whole reduction in this year on this account is much greater; but the difference between the reduction this and the last fusily is Star Pagodas 435 27.

49. Other villages, whose particular circumstances rendered it more necessary that they should benefit by the sanctioned remission of the superinduction of fusily 1221, have been reduced to the extent of Star Pagodas 5,355.

50. I transmit a statement,* shewing the villages in which a reduction has been made in the past and future years of the lease on account of their circumstances, though the shrayum did not originally fall upon them; and another statement, containing the villages to which the shrayum was originally attached, and in which a reduction has been made for the future, or the balances of shrayum outstanding, on the 31st January 1817, have been remitted.

51. Certain lands and gardens, formerly in possession of the Jaghiredar of Chittoor, have been restored to the sons of Diller Jung, by order of Government, to the amount of Star Pagodas 166 18 21.

52. The offers for the arrack farm have been less this year by Star Pagodas 1,125 35 32.

53. The sayer has also sustained a decrease in the single item of beetlenut, in consequence of the diminished importation, to the amount of Star Pagodas 3,189 30 64.

54. The triputty offerings have fallen off, from there having been a smaller number of pilgrims, but by far the greater proportion of the apparent decrease is owing to the accounts of the revenue of fusily 1225 having received an addition in sums properly belonging to preceding years, which were late in bringing to credit, from their not having been earlier accounted for by the mint, Star Pagodas 17,116 21 5.

Sig. orig.

55. I beg to refer to the following statements of fusilies 1225 and 1226, to shew the extent to which the renters have sub-rented their villages, the advantage they have derived from the renting system, the degree in which the property of the renters and the under-tenants has been affected by the necessity of distraint, and the balance of the rent which remains unrealized.

56. From the above and other similar statements before furnished for the different years of the lease, it may be deduced that the seasons, not including fusily 1221, but from fusily 1222 to 1226 inclusive, have been generally favourable; that the market prices of grain have been rather advantageous to the farmer, above the standard, which formed the basis of the survey assessment of fusily 1215; that out of 2,632 rented villages (not including the Suttavaid talook and enaum and shotrium villages) Star Pagodas 2,56,276 38 37 have been sub-rented to the Ryots; that the number of persons, whether renters or their sureties, or Ryots whose property has been sold, has been two hundred and thirty-three from fusily 1221 to the end of fusily 1226, the property valuing about Star Pagodas 2,422 24 30; that the net profit which the renters derived, from fusily 1223 to fusily 1226, after deducting the Monigars' pay which was established as an equivalent for their maunium lands and privileges resumed, and which they would have received under any system of management, has been on an average Star Pagodas 6 17 35 per cent.; that the outstanding balance of the settlement is Star Pagodas 10,856 0 11, setting aside the part of the superinduction of fusily 1221, amounting to Star Pagodas 15,161 23 36, which has been remitted under the sanction of Government.

57. I continue to be of opinion, that the preference which I have formerly stated that the Ryots had given in many cases to a money settlement over a settlement in kind, or a division of the crop between them and the renters, was owing to the price of grain, which having generally been favourable to them has enabled them to secure a profit, after paying the rent in money. To this advantage must be added the consideration of being exempted from the vexation vexation of waiting for permission to cut their crops and to take them away when reaped, and from all the impositions to which such vexatious delays render them liable. As this mode of settlement has, I believe, generally been claimed where the lands have been the least uncertain in their source of irrigation and their crops, the preference has not arisen from the reduction of the assessment enabling them to concentrate their stock to particular fields, because the assessment has, under such circumstances, remained unaltered.

* The statements referred to not being necessary to the argument are omitted.

Mr. [redacted] Report, 31 March 1818.

58. The greater readiness which the Ryots appear to have shewn to sub-rent from the renters than from the Government at the commencement of the decennial lease, may be ascribed, in a great measure, to their natural reluctance to a speculation embracing so long a period, big with chance and danger, and to the abruptness with which the project was introduced, to the necessity of their determining within a particular time, leaving them insufficient leisure to digest the advantages and disadvantages of it, and to the intention of making the arrangement universal throughout the districts, and unqualified in its conditions, whilst the renters have had more opportunities of inculcating, and they of seeing, the advantages of the plan, which being found to accord with their interests they have been as willing to accept, as the renters, from the necessity of securing their co-operation, have been obliged to grant . Whilst the Circar only put it to them to take the villages at such an amount, in which point they have generally been inflexible, the renters have not hesitated gradually to make remissions in the survey rates of assessment, securing themselves against losses from this cause by the reservation of certain quantities of waste lands, not of very long standing, which they have dealt out annually according to demand, 59 From a little misunderstanding, too, between the Board and me, as to the mode in which the ryotwar settlement was to be made, I did not extend it so far as a full conviction of their approval of it, and more leisure, might have enabled me to do.

60. Where no reserve of waste has been made, the principle of the renters' settlement with the Ryots has been to distribute the whole of the lands of the village to the Ryots, each Ryot having a fixed separate portion, including cultivated and waste, for the rent of which he is answerable to the end of the period of the decennial lease Each Ryot has his security, but the whole Ryots of a village are not jointly responsible for each other; that is, if one fails his arrear does not professedly fall upon the whole village by an extra assessment.

61. But as one is security for another in a village, and another is security for him, and so on through the whole village, a chain of securities is thus established which is very strong, though it may not in some cases be equal to the joint responsibility, in the event of individual failures introduced in Suttavaid, and in the single village of every talook, settled ryotwarry by the Circar at the beginning of the lease, which distinguished this from the renters' settlement with their Ryots. It may however be observed, that neither in suttavaid nor in the single villages of each talook alluded to, has any instance yet occurred, since the formation of the decennial settlement, of this joint responsibility having yet been had recourse to.

62. The excellence of the ryotwar settlement of one village in each talook would be advanced by the fact, that there has been no balance in any village, except that of Tawvasee in the Tirvuttoor talook, and that owing to some mismanagement, did not the circumstance which I before admitted, that these villages were rather above the common run, detract from its superiority.

63. In finally relinquishing the management of these districts, it may be expected of me to state what may be considered the fair and just revenue to look to from them upon the approaching expiration of the period of the present lease, and what may be, in my opinion, the best mode of administering the revenues for the future.

64. The collections of the last ten years, in the time of the Nabob of the Carnatic, appear higher than the Company's, as far as those accounts go; but many of the villages were then under Jaghiredars, Poligars, and Cavilgars, which are now resumed, and of which there are no accounts of that time: the comparison of the whole collectorate could not, therefore, be complete, even if it were of consequence to enter into it; but what accounts there are are so little to be relied upon as giving a just view of former resources, that it would be a vain task to trace information farther back, and to distinguish the fair from the unfair items of revenue. Besides various arbitrary exactions of the moment, there were a few principal fixed impositions, which seem to have prevailed very generally; that is, the dhan kudayum, or the obliging merchants to receive grain at a fixed price, and entering it in the accounts accordingly, whilst that price much exceeded the selling price of the market. The sums to which Yeomiadars, Tunkadars, and Tumjadars were entitled, were entered in accounts as actually paid to them, whilst the assignment they received in villages for certain quantities of grain fell far short of what was really due to them. Receipts were also taken from tank-diggers for the full sums due to them, which were accordingly entered as payments, whilst their actual receipts of grain in the villages were equally deficient.

65. These items swell the accounts of the resources in the time of the Nabob much beyond what actually reached the public revenue in some cases, and beyond what might be considered at all regular in others, and render the accounts little deserving of consideration in fixing a reasonable demand upon the country.

66. The triennial settlement, from fusily 1218 to fusily 1220, is admitted to have been too high, at least under the occurrence of seasons which too much depreciated the grain and disabled the renters from disposing of their crops; a remission therefore became necessary, and was allowed by the Board and Government.

67. It remains to be considered whether the decennial settlement from fusily 1221 to fusily 1230, and the average collections of the seven years from fusily 1211 to fusily 1217, which formed the basis of the former, are too high for a permanency, or whether they equal the expectations formed of the resources of these districts.

68. It must be observed, that the season of fusily 1221, the first year of the decennial lease, was so unfavourable from the failure of the north-east monsoon and the exhausted means of the renters from the effects of the triennial lease rendered them so little capable of bearing up against a deficiency, that the collections were obliged to be made, for the present, upon the actual state of cultivation for the year, and not upon the general basis of the decennial settlement. The surplus which would have fallen upon renters upon the terms of the lease, I recommended, in my letter of the 2d January 1812, should be postponed, and levied upon the subsequent years of the lease. Considering the settlement to commence from fusily 1221, and wishing to carry it fully into effect, I did not conceive myself authorized to make any but a temporary abatement, and the Board, in their answer of the 20th January 1812, approved of the arrangement under this understanding. At a later period, however, that part of the superinduction of fusily 1221 which then remained uncollected, was at my suggestion sanctioned to be remitted, and a remission on this account has accordingly been made of Star Pagodas 41,936 23 36.

69. This circumstance may be adduced, however, as an evidence, that that average amount of the decennial lease was not considered so low or so moderate as to enable renters to meet any extraordinary failures, or to sustain the loss of one season which was particularly unfavourable. If, excluding this fusily, the seasons of the subsequent five years are looked to, they may be said to have been favourable beyond the general expectations. No extraordinary drought, no extraordinary cheapness of grain has occurred, but grain has kept in all the years above par, that is, above the standard upon which the survey rent of fusily 1215 was formed, which standard, as being intimately connected with the former collections and the amount of the settlement, must be considered an index to the profit or loss of the former.

70. If the seasons were to continue as moderately favourable as the last series of five years, the amount of the decennial settlement might be considered moderate and very advantageous, and likely to stand, for it is estimated that the renters have, upon an average, derived about six per cent. profit from it (vide statement No. 6): but it is impossible to foresee that an extraordinary drought may not occur, when not only would this advantage be absorbed, but a loss would arise, beyond the capability of the renter's means to bear. The apprehension of this contingency, and of being called upon for immediate payment out of their own stock, must deter from a liberal appropriation to improvements of the surplus thus acquired: this amount, therefore, may be judged too high to admit of a large capital being acquired for improvements, either among the higher or the lower farmers, or of rendering them easy and free from hazard against particular adverse seasons, or of the Government relying that this fixed revenue may be undeviatingly collected under all circumstances. The reduction of ten per cent., which I before recommended, and which the Board were so liberally disposed to support, would secure the fulfilment of all these objects, and would be a real boon to the people, worthy of the generosity of Government, and calculated to call forth the warmest gratitude and attachment of the country, whether the settlement were made with the heads of villages or with the inferior Ryots for a term of years; but if made with the former, the latter should have the full benefit of it, by a previous regular and formal reduction of their rates of assessments under written pottahs from the Collector.

Mr. Graeme's Report, 31 March 1818.

71. If a settlement for a term of years is to be continued, partaking of the nature of that mediocrity which is neither very good nor very bad, which is known to be liable to deviation from adverse seasons, then the amount of the decennial settlement certainly should not be exceeded, but a reduction of three or four per cent. should be agreed to, to make good the losses to that extent which some renters have sustained, owing to the bad circumstances of their villages.

72. But without any positive certain sacrifice of the revenues, a reduction of ten or twelve per cent. in the survey rates of assessment of fusily 1215 may be made, and an annual settlement concluded with the Ryots, which will leave to Government all the reasonable advantage which is to be derived from an increase of cultivation pushed to any possible extent.

73. This proportion of reduction should not be uniform upon every field. Some do not require so much, and many require more, according to the nature of their soil, their distance from villages, and the greater labour of improving them.

74. The low terms on which the renters sub-rented to the Ryots would be the best guide in reducing the rates of assessment; but it is of consequence that a statement should be prepared, of what is to be reduced, and submitted to the Board some time before the expiration of the lease, to prevent hurry and confusion afterwards. It will be seen by the subjoined short abstract, that the renters lessened the rates between ten and twelve per cent., not only without injuring their own aggregate collections, but securing to themselves the profit which has before been stated.

Mr. Græme's Report, 31 March 1818.

75. This is a very satisfactory proof that the reduction of twelve per cent, in the first instance, on the part of Government, will not necessarily produce a great diminution of revenue; and it is remarkable that, under the renters' diminished rates, the extent of cultivation in fusily 1,225 has been greater, comprizing all description of cultivation, nunjah, poonjah, and totakal, by 40,967 8¼ cawnies, than that of any year from fusily 1211 to fusily 1217; and that if the survey assessment of fusily 1215 were applied to the extent of cultivation in fusily 1225, the revenue of fusily 1225 would be found to exceed that of fusily 1212 in Star Pagodas 67,112 40 6, or 10 42 40 per cent., and that of fusily 1215 in Star Pagodas 1,03,338 36 5, or 17 40 5 per cent. In fusily 1212 was a village rent, in which whatever might have been the actual cultivation, the settlement was considered very high and heavy, compared with the actual state of cultivation; and in fusily 1215 the amount of the settlement, which was ryotwar, was high also, but it was on account of the peculiarly favourable season. It is not to be supposed, however, that the cultivation of fusily 1225 would have been so great, had the assessment of fusily 1215 prevailed, although the rates of that period are applied, to give a kind of comparative view of the amount of revenue.

76. The following short memorandums exhibit the result stated.

Mr. Graeme's Report, 31 March 1818.

77 In making the ryotwar settlement, however, at the reduced rates, a very free option should be left to the Ryots to throw up any quantity of land, and every restriction removed against obliging them to cultivate more than their interests point out to them. Whatever temporary decrease this may occasion in the Government revenue, it will not be permanent, nor last longer than the time necessary to enable the Ryots to acquire capital and stock sufficient to extend their cultivation. In the mean time, the difference between the full and the diminished rent will give the Ryots something in hand to meet the losses of scanty or withered crops, or other accidents to fields for which they may be under engagements to pay the rent; but if any general failure of rain should cause a material decrease of cultivation, by obliging whole fields to be neglected, then the loss must necessarily fall where it ought, upon Government, and where under any system it must ultimately fall, though under any mode of management less direct with the cultivators, the actual loss, or the persons who really suffered, might not be perceptible for some time.

78. Though it would be proper that agreements should be taken for the cultivation at the beginning of the year, most especial care should be taken not to enforce these agreements rigidly, if the season subsequently fails.

79. Actual cultivation accounts should be prepared for the guide of the Collector's cutcherry once a fortnight, and transmitted to the Board once a month, and the settlement should be conducted more with reference to them than to the early engagements of the year The Reddies and Curnums, it is indispensable, should continue to be under the efficient controul of the Collector, to secure the correctness of their accounts, and the talook and huzzoor revenue establishment should be restored to the efficiency of fusily 1217, the year before the triennial lease. This will occasion an increase in charge of about one-half a pagoda per cent.

80. All the waste lands should bear the same proportion of reduction in the survey assessment as those that have been long cultivated; and if they have been long unfertile, they should not arrive at their full rent for six or seven years, and that by a gradual increase each year. It has always been customary to distribute waste lands on similar terms, but these should not be so low as to induce the Ryots to take them in preference to more productive old lands.

81. There should be a restriction, also, against granting a large quantity of waste land to one individual on very favourable terms, particularly to speculators from the presidency; for as they could then afford to sub-rent at rates lower than the circar rates of the other lands, the old lands would be thrown up, and the whole ryotwar system deranged. The waste should be given only to those who want to cultivate them themselves.

82. It now only remains to offer an opinion as to the mode of administration of the revenues which is preferable. The three plans deserving of consideration are, I think, the annual settlement with the Ryots, the settlement for a term of years with the Ryots individually and collectively, or a settlement for a term of years with the heads of villages. Without adverting at present to the description of persons with whom the settlement is to be made, the term of the settlement is a point worthy of investigation. A long lease seems to hold out the advantage of stimulating the interest of the leaseholders to lay out money in extensive improvements; but the benefit of an annual settlement, if the field assessment is really low, approaching to the case of the suttavaid talook, and all restraint with respect to obliging Ryots to take more land than they require bonâ fide removed, is even greater and more permanent than that of a lease for a term of years, for all risk of having more land to pay for than may be cultivated is abolished, and the rent upon the fields that are cultivated remains unchangeable, leaving the owner to improve them to the utmost extent which good ploughing and rich manuring may make them capable of. A long lease is subject to fluctuations and accidents, when, if the amount is high, it is natural, from the direct Government interference having been withdrawn, to receive with suspicion representations of losses, and difficult to ascertain their extent and apply a reasonable remedy; and if the amount is low, a larger revenue is given up than Government might think it necessary to sacrifice. In the annual settlement or a low field rent, a proper share of the profit is given up to the cultivator, whilst Government retain a claim to extension of cultivation, in which the profit of the cultivator also keeps pace with that which he derives from old possessions.

83. The main point, the low rate of assessment, being once clearly and satisfactorily established, and the object of every system being to ameliorate the condition of the great body of the people, it seems obviously the best plan to secure to them, in the most direct manner possible, all the advantages derivable from this reduction, instead of relying upon the circuitous and problematical tendency of regulations, or the imperfect administration of them, or the variable plans of local management. I am of opinion, therefore, that the settlement, whether annually, or for a term of years, should be made direct with the great body of the cultivators.

84. In all systems, the lowness of the assessment is a point necessary to be preserved with the utmost care and delicacy, and the criteria of it appears to be the unwillingness of proprietors to part with their fields, the readiness of others to take them if there is the probability of their disposal from any cause, and the small number of persons whose property it has been necessary for any period to distrain for the collections of the rents.

85. The ryotwar has been, in my opinion, unjustly charged as an organized system of oppression. Specific acts of severity, which it has been attempted to attach peculiarly and almost exclusively to the ryotwar, have been practised under every species of administration of the revenues under different individuals. They were notorious and carried to great excess in the Nabob's government, under a system of the division of the produce in kind in village rent, or farming by talooks or provinces. Far from these evils having been introduced or confirmed by the ryotwar, they were moderated and nearly exterminated, where the Collector has possessed those feelings for the welfare of the common Ryots for which I give credit to most of the Collectors, who were early educated in an attachment to the revenue line, and particularly in a partiality for a system, whose first inherent principle was to raise the low and to humble the great.

86. It must be acknowledged, that over-assessment under a ryotwar has frequently itself been a cause of oppression. But may not this, without unfairness, be traced to too strict an adherence to the aggregate amount of revenue under former systems; to the unavoidable observance, on the part of subordinate officers, of the expectations formed, and repeatedly inculcated by the superior authorities, that the revenue should not fall short, but should rather rise; to the encomiums universally passed upon those who have raised the Government's demands, without perceiving that there has not always been a real corresponding improvement of the resources to meet these demands. The deference paid to superior authority, a zeal for the supposed interests of their employers, and a tardy acquirement of a knowledge of the true principles on which a revenue administration should be conducted, may have retarded, on the part of the Collectors, an earlier development of the defects of the existing arrangements, and a more clear and decided representation of them to superior authority.

87. The evil of over-assessment has tainted every system: but I sincerely believe that the ryotwar, by exposing more details, by causing a more direct and more constant communication between Collectors, their inferior native officers, and the Ryots, has more early led to the detection of it and to the means of correcting it, and in practice to a more lenient enforcement of the Government dues.

88. It is not the particular interest of native revenue officers to oppress the Ryots on account of Government. The execution of a system of oppression renders their duties more arduous, and rapidly and perceptibly defeats the ends intended by it. Where the object of the presiding authority is unequivocally known to them to be liberal, where too much stress is not laid upon an exorbitant collection, they are not insensible to the feelings of humanity, which an intercourse with mankind so frequently presses upon them, and they are susceptible susceptible of the impressions of popular favour and odium. I have not, therefore, found them obstinate in co-operating in plans of moderation, where the sincerity of the principle has been made clear to them; but relinquishing the previous habits, which they had certainly cherished in a strong degree, of thinking that a high rent must be the primary aim, they have by proper encouragement, represented without reserve where an assessment has borne too severely upon the Ryots. Mr. Grœme's Report, 31 March 1818.

89. I do not mean to say, that the oppression of revenue servants for their own advantage is not to be narrowly and jealously watched; but peculation is more easily practised by a fraudulent deterioration of the public resources, than by too high a legal assessment.

90. To the confidence which the ryotwar system engendered in the hearts of the Ryots, to the jealousy exercised by the revenue administration, to the sufficiency of the native revenue establishment, to the check over the renters which the power of depriving them of their rent, after a certain period, still kept in the hands of the Collectors, and to the poverty of the renters, which still rendered them dependent upon the Ryots, may, in my opinion, be ascribed the success of the village-renting system.

91. To these causes may be added the condition of the remission of assessment in favour of the inferior Ryots in certain cases, which formed part of the renter's agreement with Government; the enforcement of that condition by the revenue servants, where it was not absolutely inexpedient; the advice, the remonstrance, the encouragement, the assistance, and the influence, which were used by the same authority to procure the renters to augment the security of the public revenue, and their own and the Ryot's interests, by making the actual cultivators more direct participators in the benefit of the decennial settlement. This interference of the revenue authorities has partly given the village settlement the character of the ryotwar: but it is of consequence that it should be rendered more perfectly so by a direct settlement with the Ryots, and that the rights of the Ryots should not be exposed to the contingencies of a village system, the benefit of which must depend upon the varying degree of interference and superintendence which it may be thought advisable, or which it may become the custom to exercise over it by the revenue authority, or the extent of interposition which the renters, become more wealthy, might revive hereafter with less opposition.

92. But leave the village lease to the operation of a permanent settlement, or a settlement of long duration, on the principle of the interference of revenue officers being unnecessary, withdraw the efficient revenue establishment and leave the disputes between Ryots to be determined entirely by distant tribunals, and it will end in the subjection of the Ryots.

93. In either of these systems, or in any other, attention to the selection of the controuling authority in the districts seems indispensable; but under a village system, in proportion as the renters acquired wealth they would acquire too great a preponderance, and they would release themselves from the controul which circumstances, rather than the law, have enabled the Collector to exercise over them.

94. By placing renters or proprietors exclusively under the jurisdiction of the civil court, or rather by the free operation of the regulations which have that tendency, a good deal of trouble will, in the first instance, be taken out of the hands of the revenue administration. But by the too great tediousness of judicial process the Ryots must become gradually subjected to the will of the renters, and their wealth and independence undermined, imperceptibly to the officers of Government, as the want of interference will exclude all knowledge of the true state of the country.

95. Aware of the partiality I had for a system which seemed calculated to exalt and to place out of the gripe of oppression the most valuable part of the community, the peasantry, I was nevertheless determined to carry into effect with cheerfulness and fidelity, and to endeavour to render as beneficial as possible, the village-renting system; and I trust that I have stated with candour, in my reports to the Board since the adoption of the decennial settlement, the benefits benefits which have accrued from it. I have suggested, at the same time, the causes which have hitherto preserved it in vigour; but I must confess that I distrust its permanent effect to secure the rights of the Ryots, and that I shall not feel satisfied till they are placed more certainly out of danger.

96. In contrasting the annual ryotwar settlement and the settlement with heads of village for a term of years, the ryotwar may be said to occasion more trouble to the revenue administration, and a greater charge in the first instance, whilst the other diminishes the present expense and removes all detail and annoyance to the courts. But the advantage of the former is, that whatever defects it may have are capable of being readily seen and speedily remedied, whilst the evils of the latter are working imperceptibly to the revenue authorities, and after a lapse of time are irreparable. A village and a ryotwar settlement is equally liable to be too high by the consequence of a wrong judgment. The actual cultivators of the soil may not sufficiently partake of the advantage of a village settlement if it is favourable, and renters may exclusively enjoy that profit which is partly left open to Government by the gradual improvement of cultivation, and partly relinquished to the Ryots under the ryotwar plan.

97. I will now submit a few observations on the meerassy rights said to be existing in these districts.

98. Considering, perhaps, that an absolute proprietary right was contended for, which was likely to curtail the rights and the power which I conceived Government to possess, and my attention not having been specially called to the investigation of any particular rights or privileges, or the extent or division of them, which many Meerassidars of these districts were said to possess, I have perhaps, in my reports, treated of the rights of the heads of villages, in a manner less qualified than I should have done under other circumstances.

99. Though I stated that I had not discovered in this district that any Soodurs possessed the privileges which I described the Bramin Agraharums to have, I have in other places admitted, that the heads of villages, or those who were admitted in the circar pottah, had certain meerassy rights. I did not, however, go so fully as I would have done, had my attention been particularly directed towards it, into the number which in these districts participated in this meerassy, or the nature and extent of meerassy itself.

100. On the first settlement of every village, it has been customary, from time immemorial, to grant to the Graumutta, or head-man of the settlers, an assignment of a certain tract of land, called the gramuttaum maunium, and certain privileges or fees in kind, under the general denomination of graumuttan sosuntrum, bearing a certain proportion to the produce of the land of every cultivator within the extent of the village.

101. Both by the Hindoo and Mahomedan Governments, their property of these descriptions would appear to have been much respected, and it was allowed to descend in hereditary succession, and even to have been left to their disposal to transfer temporarily or permanently to others.

102. But the Graumuttans, or heads of villages, were subject at all times to punishment, by fine or otherwise, for offences, misdemeanours, or by dispossession of their lands and privileges: the latter, however, being considered an extreme act of rigour, which it is pretended was seldom resorted to, except in very urgent cases, such as treason against the sovereign authority, or capital crimes.

103. All the other lands of the village, except the Graumuttan, were at the disposal of Government to manage, as best suited their interest; and there appears to have been no fixed limit of the Government aggregate demand upon the village, which could entitle the Graumuttan of a munevett village, or a village possessed by Soodurs, to be considered an absolute proprietor of the villages.

104. All the munevett villages of the districts, or villages possessed by Soodurs, may be said to be either under the different tenures of yackabhogum, or pushoonkarry, or urdakurry.

105. Ekabhogum

105. Ekabhogum or yekhabhogum, is a village where no other distribution has been made and no shares arranged, besides those of the original graumuttan maunium. In some villages the maunium has remained in the hands of the direct descendants of the original Graumuttan, in others a division of it has taken place among branches of the same family, and from the poverty of some of the branches, at some time or other, individuals of other families, and other castes even, have occasionally been admitted to a participation of the graumuttan maunium and privileges; but as long as the division is confined to the graumuttan maunium and sosuntrum, either according to the Hindoo laws of relationship, or under the urgent necessity from poverty, or other strong cause of admitting individuals of a different caste, the village seems to retain its appellation of yekhabhogum, which in its literal sense is supposed to imply possession or enjoyment by a single person.

Mr. Græme's Report, 31 March 1818.

106. Pushoonkurray seems to have been an association of partners subsequent to the original institution of the village. When the population and cultivation increased, it became necessary to add some new respectable inhabitants to the original proprietors, to assist in repairs of tanks, in the distribution and settlement of the different lands, and to regulate the irrigation But these new partners were not participators in the original graumuttan maunium lands, or any of the sosuntrum, but were partners in the profit and loss of the cultivation of all the lands.

107. Where shares are liable to a periodical interchange among the partners, the village is called pushoonkurray; where the shares remain as at first fixed, urdakurray.

108. The great distinctions drawn between the Bramin ugraharums and the muneevuts seem to be these: that the former derive possession and the power of sale from grants of sovereigns; that the whole lands of the village appear to be in a manner their property divided into so many shares; that each holder of a share has the right to sell his share separately, and that the whole community have a right to sell the whole village; that the ugraharums were originally either shotriums or survamaniems; that under the latter tenure they were entirely exempt from land-tax, and that under the former they paid an easy rent, not depending upon nor proportioned to the annual extent of cultivation, but having the aggregate amount for the whole villages fixed by the grant or dana shasunum.

109. That the latter muneevut or villages possessed by Soodras have no regular grants, that is danaputtrums or danashsanums, or tambur shasanums; that they originally had certain portions of the land of the village, called graumuttan maunium, and certain privileges, tythes, or fees in kind, under the general denomination of sosuntrum; that neither a single graumuttan where one headman possesses the maunium, nor a number where they are several Meerassidars enjoying the maunium, can dispose of any thing but the graumuttan maunium and the sosuntrum fees, all the other lands of the villages being considered out of the power of his disposal, and exclusively belonging to Government: that no permanent rent was ever settled either by grant or custom for the village, but that the annual rent depended upon the actual state of cultivation, the proportions only being fixed by general usage.

110. Except that the proportion of mailwarum which the Circar received was smaller from the ugraharum than from the muneevet villages, it does not appear that the Circar exercised any greater degree of controul over the koodeewarum of the one or the other; that is, as far as regarded those ugraharums, which were at first or afterwards become liable to a certain payment to the Circar, occasional agents were appointed for the proper security of the mailwarum in both, but the management of the koodeewarum seems to have been left as equally to the Graumuttan of muneevet as to the Mahajanum of the ugraharum village.

111. There seems to be another species of tenure in the ugraharum villages, which does not hold good in muneevet villages. This is the urdeekrayum. Urdi would appear to signify permanent or irredeemable, and kurdi krayum an entire permanent sale, which the ugraharum possessors have alone the power of making of whole villages, or of the shares in this; but the denial of this right to the muneevet villages does not bar their right of the sale of graumuttan maunium land, or of shares of it.

power

112. It must be admitted, that it has only been by the Company's Government that a resumption has been made of the maunium land and the privileges in kind, from the mere notion of expediency. The resumption of the lands and privileges in these districts took place in fusily 1213, under the sanction of the Board and Government, on the recommendation of my predecessor, Mr. Cockburn.

113. This I am inclined to believe to have been a measure of unnecessary hardship, particularly as the supposed equivalent in ready money, which was established, is by no means equal to the produce of the maunium lands and sosuntrums, which they formerly enjoyed. It has too much undermined their hereditary attachment, and lessened the interest which they had in increasing the produce of the villages: it has, besides, rendered it too easy under a revenue administration, which does not sufficiently respect ancient rights and customs, to admit strangers to the head of the villages, by the intrigues of revenue servants. I therefore recommend, that their former maunium lands and sosuntrums be restored, whatever system of general management may prevail hereafter for these districts. In a statement which accompanied my letter to your Board of 22d September 1810, they were valued at Star Pagodas 25,773 41 17 (not including those of the assumed pollams, which continue to their ancient Enaumdars), on an average of three years, from fusily 1215 to fusily 1217 inclusive, whilst the equivalent they now receive is only Star Pagodas 12,986 33 66. As a great proportion of waste land is included in this statement, it is not to be supposed that their former possessions were at all times, or one year with another, equal to this valuation.

114. It is equally expedient, for the same reasons, to restore the Curnums' mauniums and privileges, which are estimated to amount to Star Pagodas 26,888 26 60, whilst their present allowances are only Star Pagodas 16,326 43 68.

115. But it is not to be conceived that these possessions existed at any time unconnected with certain civil duties to be performed to the state, such as management of the revenues derivable to Government, the settling of disputes among the inhabitants, the preserving of the community in tranquillity and free from public offenders of every description: and the village institution must be considered essentially and radically defective, without these conditions being attached to the situation of the Graumuttan.

116. The revenue administration, however, would be left very inefficient, if admitting these conditions, it was not clearly understood that they were to be enforced, and that the resumption of the lands and privileges was to be conducted, under certain restrictions, by the controuling revenue authority, and not by the judicial tribunals.

117. Neither the Graumuttan nor the Curnum should be allowed to sell his rights, or mortgage or transfer them in any way, without the concurrence of the Collector, and the transaction being registered; and the Collector should have the power to determine who among the claimants of the Graumuttan and Curnum mauniums and privileges must be considered responsible for the execution of the public duties attached to the station. But no Graumuttan or Curnum should be absolutely dispossessed of his rights without the sanction of the Board of Revenue, upon a full representation of the case by the Collector.

118. Before I quit these districts, I think it a duty to submit, and to recommend strongly the petitions of those interested on two points to which the inhabitants attach some importance, and on which the indulgence of Government will be thankfully received, whilst the sacrifice of revenue can hardly be considered very great or deserving of hesitation, when the comforts of the people are so likely to be secured by it. Your Board and Government have liberally encouraged the erection of public buildings on the high roads for the accommodation of native travellers, by grants of certain quantities of land, a convenience which has already been felt to a great degree and acknowledged knowledged in these districts; but in order to extend the measure as far as the comforts of travellers really require it, it is necessary that the encouragement should be more ample. The Board and Government very readily acquiesced in my recommendation, that two cawnies of nunjah land, or five cawnies of poonjah, should be granted for defraying the expense of keeping up these buildings, and the establishment generally attached to them. It being a new arrangement, I was cautious of soliciting more; but this quantity is obviously insufficient. The partiality of Hindoos for this mode of appropriating their wealth has caused twenty-seven buildings of this description to have been erected under the present terms; but the original projectors themselves very frequently fall into untoward circumstances, and their descendants, equally subjected to the like misfortunes, have not either the same zeal and interest to maintain the works of their ancestors. These useful buildings are therefore likely to be soon neglected, and to fall into disuse and decay, unless the quantity of land with which they are endowed is sufficient at least to feed one person, whose duty would consist in paying attention to the wants of travellers. Of the quantity now assigned, a fourth part of it may be said to be taken up by the buildings themselves, by the wells that are sunk, and by the fences that surround them: I beg therefore to recommend, that not less than five cawnies of nunjah, or twelve cawnies of Poonjah land, should be granted for these truly charitable institutions. This will merely provide for a very small establishment, without at all reimbursing the original expenses, or those which the maintaining the buildings and the wells in proper order will cost. The projectors may be calculated to have laid out from one hundred to five hundred pagodas each in these undertakings. The following abstract shews the places where the buildings have been erected, the annual amount of revenues which has hitherto been granted for them, and the addition which it is farther proposed to relinquish to them, making a yearly increase of Star Pagodas 331 3.

Mr. Græme's Report, 31 March 1818.

119. The remaining request I have to make is in favour of the abolition of certain odious taxes and privileges at Triputty, which are very vexatious to a great number of the people. I should not have deferred the recommendation of this necessary measure to my departure from the districts, had the inconvenience of the impositions been brought to my consideration at an earlier period; but long custom, though the taxes are not of any revered antiquity, had prompted all descriptions of pilgrims to submit to them, without any public appearance of discontent, or any direct representations to public authority. And in ignorance of any popular ill-will towards them, I was not anxious to commence any innovations which might affect the rights of individuals or the prejudices, however absurd, of the Hindoo community. I have ascertained, however, that these taxes and privileges are considered to have derived their origin in a despotic period of government, and to possess no advantages, and to favour no prejudices or superstition, which could make them less vexatious and more acceptable in the eyes of the Hindoos; and there being nothing in the nature of them which will be seen by the following explanations of each item to induce their continuance, I trust there will be little hesitation in doing them away. Though old custom may warrant the levy of them, the judicial courts may require a regulation, authorizing the monopoly of these branches of revenues, before they decree in favour of a prosecution instituted against the infringement of it, and the farmers have often complained of interlopers; but here, where the exclusive privileges only cause vexation to numbers, without adding materially, and certainly not in any due proportion, to the public revenue, there can be little wish to enact that into a law which ought never to have been a custom. The average receipts from fusily 1211 to fusily 1227, a period of seventeen years, under these different items, have been Star Pagodas 4,805 2 42.

120. Tawatora,

Mr. Græme's Report, 31 March 1818.

120. Tawatora, the pagoda cook, or the person who rents the privilege of boiling rice for the nitti-puditerum, and the veshaish-puditerum, the ordinary and extraordinary expenses of the pagoda, and durmal expenses of those respectable persons who support a charitable establishment at the pagoda. His capability of paying the Circar is supposed to arise from the profit he makes in boiling and distributing the rice for these different establishments, and in the quality of it. It is not proper that Government should sanction any profit derivable from such means, by taking a sum of money for it.

121. The Wukubudee renter rents the privileges of selling to pilgrims all rice that is required to be presented before the idol, independent of the fixed supplies for the pagoda and religious establishment, which are previously known. The Wukubudee renter must make over the rice to the renter of the tawatora or the pagoda cook. This profit is derived from the difference between the price which he pays for the article, and the price for which he sells it to the pilgrims: it ought to be abolished.

122. Pudee Maira. The rest is founded upon the profit the renter is supposed to derive from grinding certain articles into flour.

123. Mudapullee Mauniem. The duty of this renter is to see that every thing goes right in the cook-room: the profit he is supposed to gain from this employ enables him to pay a rent to Government.

124. Kanongo Roossum. The Kanongo has the privilege of presenting a certain quantity of rice to be consecrated before the idol; the difference of price at which he buys the rice, and of that for which it sells after consecration, enables him to pay a rent to Government.

125. Muttevar Rossum is a similar farm established on the part of the agent of the Muttevar Rajah.

126. Mungulkutta Every pilgrim not having a husband or a father living (with the exception of those who take special vows) must undergo a shaving at the kuppula tirtum. The fee, from having been only one and a half fanam is now three fanams for each person, owing to competition of this farm. The exclusive privilege is rented by a society of barbers. The Government rent gives a pretence to a proportionate exaction on the part of the barbers, and therefore should be immediately abolished: it is just that the pilgrims should be left to be shaved in the most expeditious and cheapest manner possible.

127. Govendraz Samy. This has been established for a long time back: that is, the renter pays to Government a certain sum for the privilege of making levies from pilgrims who resort to the Govendraz pagoda, in the town of Triputty, and below the hill, which though at first they may have had a limit, seem not at this moment clearly defined. Pilgrims are prevented paying their devotions till the demands of the renter are satisfied. They should be left to make voluntary offerings, the same as at the large Triputty pagoda. From the immense number of people who are drawn from their proper occupations from distant countries, even the voluntary contributions at Triputty cannot be considered an advantageous source of revenue; but it is more objectionable that these contributions should be at all compulsory.

128. Swamy Pooshkurnee. The renter derives his profit from two sources. When Hindoos come to bathe in the tank near the large pagoda on the hill, called Swamy Pooshkurnee, they pay to the renter according to their means, for prayers and ceremonies which he performs for them. As these prayers and ceremonies must be performed, there is no occasion to prohibit the collection of this fee, but they must be left to the voluntary contributions of the pilgrims, and the Government need not sanction it by requiring of him a rent; this is recommended, therefore, to be abolished on the part of Government.

129. Another source of profit is a fee of from one to ten rupees for every Bramin marriage celebrated on the hill, and for the ceremony of vesting with the Braminical thread, in return for some articles used on such occasions, but of value altogether inferior and disproportionate to the amount of the fee. It is not necessary that the persons celebrating the marriage should be supplied with with these articles by the renter: they can procure them without difficulty any where, and they consider this imposition a very great hardship. Hindoos prefer carrying their families to Triputty to celebrate marriage from the greater sacredness of it, and from the idea of its greater cheapness. As the possessors of this privilege claim ancient right to it, and as it might be hard to abolish it entirely, it might be restricted to the collection of one rupee for the ceremony of vesting the Braminical thread, and two for every marriage, and they should be exempted from paying any revenue to Government. Mr Graeme's Report, March 1818.

130. Namal Dookan. The profit from this farm arises from the exclusive privileges of selling the composition with which the different castes of Hindoos mark their forehead. The monopoly being in one person's hands, pilgrims have to wait longer, and to pay dearer for it, than if the sale were open.

131. Moontalungudee. The exclusive privileges of selling to pilgrims images of the deities, and vessels for butter-milk and other things. They are made of the chendana, or red wood, which grows in the immediate vicinity of Triputty.

132. Kuppula teertum, or Ulwaree teertum. A tank so called at the bottom of the hill. The profit arises from the privileges of levying fees from pilgrims, according to their circumstances, for performing ceremonies and prayers when they come to bathe at the tank below the hill, called kuppula teertum. This should be entirely a voluntary contribution, and not sanctioned by the exaction of any rent on the part of Government. The revenue has increased much within these few years by competition in bidding, and the pilgrims have, of course, been made to pay in proportion.

133. To maintain and to improve the resources of the country, and to give greater security to the punctual realization of the revenues, I beg to recommend a more regular and efficient system for the repair of tanks and other sources of fertilization. These undertakings have hitherto generally been too much confined to the execution of those repairs only which were indispensable to obviate an immediate loss of revenue. This caution has arisen from the Collector and his Assistants not having much time, from the business which daily presses upon them in the cutcherry, to devote to their superintendence, to the forms required before estimates can be prepared and sanctioned, to the apprehension of entrusting public servants with large sums of money, the expenditure of which not being within the possibility of their strict supervision, might give rise to extensive embezzlements, and of after-investigations breaking in upon those duties of their situations, which might be considered of more pressing importance. Though this department should not be removed from the general controul of the Collector and his Assistants, there should be an ample establishment for the conduct of the details, which should admit of accounts being prepared, and the works being carried on, without too frequent reference to the Collector's cutcherry. As the Superintendent of tank repairs cannot be supposed to be able to superintend so many collectorates as are placed under his charge with sufficient promptitude, there should be an Assistant-Surveyor to each collectorate, with an adequate establishment, to prepare estimates of repairs required, to superintend the execution of all repairs of any magnitude, and to transmit duplicate accounts of estimates and repairs, one to the Superintending Engineer, and one to the Collector. Neither the contracts with the bricklayers or tank-diggers need be made by the Surveyor, nor the payments of money, but these may be left to the talook revenue servants, as before: only the final disbursement should be deferred, till the Surveyor has superintended and approved the works and the rates of contract or hire. If there are any defects in these points, the Surveyor should communicate to the Superintendent of repairs and to the Collector.

134. Where something now is to be done, it will be proper to investigate all the probable advantages by extension of cultivation before the works are sanctioned. But tanks and other source of irrigation, now out of repair but in use, which have been in a better state within these twenty years, should be restored to that state, without a scrupulous inquiry as to the exact profit to be derived from them. Their repair will certainly be attended with a general advantage to the country.

Mr. Grœme's Report, 31 March 1818.

135. The amount laid out in repairs has hitherto not exceeded, on an average, from fusily 1214 to 1226, about one and a half per cent. on the land revenue; but it should be considered no sacrifice, considering how closely it is connected with the stability of the revenue, to make a regular appropriation of two and a half per cent. for this purpose, or about Star Pagodas 13,000; that is, it should be looked upon as a necessary charge, in order to ensure the realization of the revenue.

136. Though the stipulation to make advances for cultivation (under the name of tuccavy) is excluded from the agreement with the renters, it has hitherto been granted, and should continue to be given, according to the circumstances of the season. It only keeps between fifteen and twenty thousand pagodas floating unavailable to any direct purposes of Government; but as it is generally received with but a small balance at the end of the year, this sum should rather be distributed over a long period of years, when it will appear a mere trifle.

137. Without falling into an indolent relaxation of the Government just demand, I take the liberty, above all, to recommend a lenient collection of the rent, abstaining as much as possible from the harsh and inexpedient extremity of distraining and selling property, except in particular cases of determined contumacy. This necessity arises, in general, from something defective in the assessment, or some particular calamity, which should be diligently traced and speedily remedied. Postponed periods of payment should be allowed, where every endeavour is made on the part of the renters and Ryots to extricate themselves from their difficulties, and to satisfy the Government demand. If the difficulties are real and insurmountable, they should not be driven to despair, but the rent should rather be continued with the old lease-holders than new hands admitted upon an uncertainty. Where the resources are clearly good, and where the renters are extravagant or incapable, and refuse to admit other more respectable partners, then it is necessary, for the security of the revenue, that some severity should be had recourse to.

I have the honour to be, with much respect,
Gentlemen,
Your most obedient and humble servant,

(Signed) H. S. GRŒME,
Collector.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from FORT ST. GEORGE, Dated the 2d October 1819.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 2 Oct. 1819.

Par. 241. On the 20th October 1818 we came to a resolution in the Judicial department, to depute Mr. William Thackeray, Collector of Bellary, to Ganjam, with the view of ascertaining the best means of securing permanently the tranquillity and revenue of that district, where much disorder had long prevailed, and disturbances of a very serious nature had taken place, more particularly in the hill zemindarries.

242. The representations of the acting Collector and Magistrate* which led to the deputation, and the instructions with which Mr. Thackeray was furnished on the occasion, will be brought particularly to the notice of your Honourable Court in the Judicial department, where they are recorded. We shall here, however, beg leave to draw your attention to some proceedings of importance which have taken place in this department, in consequence of the mission of that gentleman to Ganjam.

243. The subject of the first report which we received from Mr. Thackeray, after he had proceeded on his deputation, was the state of the zemindarry of Moherry. In this report Mr. Thackeray endeavours to trace a rebellion or disturbance which he found in that zemindarry to a fraudulent sale said to have been effected in 1810, on the ground of arrears of revenue, by means of which which the zemindarry passed from the ancient line of its holders, and came into the possession of a banyan family, one of whom held the office of Shroff in the Collector's cutcherry. Mr. Thackeray was of opinion, that the ancient family ought to be reinstated; and he suggested several different courses of procedure which might be adopted for that purpose, urgently recommending, at the same time, that early orders should be issued on the subject.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 2 Oct. 1819.

244. We lost no time in referring Mr. Thackeray's report, with its various accompaniments, to the Board of Revenue, for their early consideration and report. We instructed the Board particularly to report on the circumstances under which the Moherry estate went out of the possession of the Zemindar's family, the circumstances under which it was now under the immediate charge of the Collector, and the propriety and practicability of the measures recommended by Mr. Thackeray.

245. The report of the Board of Revenue* having been received, was taken into consideration at our Consultation of the 28th April last. The view taken by them differs very materially from that of Mr. Thackeray, both with regard to what should be considered as the facts of the case, and to what claims the ancient family would have on the Government, supposing the facts to be as he believed. Referring your Honourable Court, however, to the record of our proceedings for full information concerning the sentiments of the Board, as well as those adopted by Mr. Thackeray, we shall here content ourselves with stating the recommendation with which the Board concluded, and the instructions which we deemed it proper to issue.

246. The Board stated, that upon the whole they considered as the safest course to be pursued one which Mr. Thackeray had suggested, of obtaining from the family in possession a surrender of the zemindarry; but they were of opinion, that the recompense to be offered to the family should be limited to the repayment of the purchase-money, in addition to the amount of the surplus collections at present in the hands of the Collector.

247. With respect to the eventual restoration of the zemindarry to the Rannee (the representative of the ancient family), the Board stated, that they considered the question to be one of purely political expediency, and that they were doubtful, therefore, whether they ought to offer any opinion upon it; but as the measures recommended by Mr. Thackeray had been referred to them without any observation, they submitted, that no pledge should be given to restore the zemindarry, that this should be left to the future pleasure of Government, and that, in the mean time, a suitable allowance should be granted to the Rannee for her support.

248. We gave directions that the Board of Revenue, without loss of time, should instruct the Collector to offer the present holder of the zemindarry the original purchase-money (34,000 rupees) for it; and if the offer should be accepted, to take the zemindarry under aumany management; and that, if the offer should be rejected, the Board would, with reference to Mr. Thackeray's opinion on the subject, state what process they would advise to be pursued, for the purpose of obtaining possession of the zemindarry on account of Government.

249. We resolved to grant, from the date of the resolution (the 28th April last), an allowance of not less than nine thousand nor more than twelve thousand rupees per annum, for the support of the ancient Moherry family; and we directed the Board of Revenue to make, in communication with the Collector, a proper distribution of the amount sanctioned among the several members of the family and submit it for sanction.

250. We at the same time took occasion to intimate to the Board of Revenue, that we deemed it of much importance, that if the Bissoyes had really lost their ancient lands and pecuniary allowances (which we had reason to apprehend was the case), these should immediately be restored to them, and to desire that the Board would furnish the Collector with orders to that effect.

251. On

* 28th April 1819, par. 8 and 9.

Revenue Letter from Fort St. George, 2 Oct. 1818

251. On our proceedings under date the 30th of March last are recorded two other reports received from Mr. Thackeray, on the result of his inquiries in the district of Ganjam, to which we beg leave to draw the attention of your Honourable Court. These reports are dated respectively the 15th February and 8th of March.

252. The former, in which he explains his sentiments very fully with regard to the ultimate causes to which the late disturbances in the hill zemindarry of Ganjam are to be attributed, we thougt fit to reserve for future consideration.

253. His report of the 8th March relates chiefly to the state of the zemindarry of Gumsoor, and at our consultation of the date on which it is recorded we proceeded to pass orders with respect to the arrangement to be sanctioned regarding that zemindarry.

254. It appeared that Mr. Thackeray, under the circumstances which had come to his knowledge, had been induced to acquaint Screekara Bunge, the Zemindar family ejected and the father of the last Zemindar of Gumsoor, that he would advise the Government to appoint him Zemindar. In this state of the case we felt ourselves bound, by considerations of good faith and of policy, to adopt Mr. Thackeray's recommendation. Screekara Bunge had already actually acquired the authority of Zemindar during the disturbances which had prevailed in the country. In the assurances given to him by Mr. Thackeray, he would doubtless have regarded that gentleman as the accredited agent of Government; and now exercising the authority of Zemindar, not only in fact but under the sanction of Mr. Thackeray, he could not be dispossessed unless by force of arms: we therefore deemed it advisable to confirm the arrangement made by Mr. Thackeray, as a measure both of expediency and necessity, and not apparently in contradiction to impartial justice. Screekara Bunge was accordingly appointed Zemindar of Gumsoor; but we resolved that, in the cowle to be granted to him, it should be stipulated that at his death the zemindarry should revert to Government, to be disposed of as should then be judged most proper. We also resolved, that the rent should be fixed, as was proposed by Mr. Thackeray, at seventy-five thousand rupees per annum.

255. In consideration of what is stated by Mr. Thackeray concerning Dananjiah Bunge, the last Zemindar, we resolved out of the rent of the zemindarry to settle upon him an allowance of eight thousand rupees per annum, and to cause it to be signified to him, that if his conduct in the interval should be correct his claim to succeed to the zemindarry on his father's decease would at that period be taken into consideration. We also resolved, that Mr. Thackeray should be desired to suggest any further measures which, in his opinion, it might be proper to adopt with respect to Dananjiah Bunge; but we have not since received any further suggestions regarding him from Mr. Thackeray.

EXTRACT FORT ST. GEORGE REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,

The 4th March 1819.

To the Chief Secretary to Government at Fort St. George.

SIR:

Mr Thackeray's Report respecting Moherry, 8 Feb 1819.

Par. 1. On my arrival in this province I found two rebellions or disturbances in Moherry and Goomsur, disturbances again expected in Kimmedy, and possibly in some of the other zemindarries. I have now the honour to report on the Moherry disturbance, which demands immediate attention, and to request early notice of this report.

2. Immediately on my arrival, I published the proclamation which accompanied my letter of the 26th November last, in the hope that the Moherry and Goomsur disturbances would be suspended, when it was known I was coming to investigate the causes of them, and I attended the acting Collector to Kimmedy to endeavour to prevent their breaking out again there. After settling, settling, as far as could be done, the disputes at Kimmedy, and taking measures to secure, as far as could be done, the peace of that zemindarry, I came up here, agreeably to the intention I had announced in my proclamation.

Mr. Thackeray's Report respecting Moherry, 8 Feb. 1819.

3. I had understood that the zemindarry of Moherry had been transferred some years before to the Cutcherry Shroff, Bundum Chellamiah, by sale for arrears of revenue; that it was said there was fraud attending the transaction, and that the old family had been injured; that Mahartah, in whose name the insurgents acted, was a mere peon, attached, it was supposed, to the old family, at least professing attachment to it; that he was supported by the adherents of the old family, and perhaps by some of the Zemindars and country people, because they could not bear to see a Banyan Zemindar of Moherry, because they resented the injury done the old family, and the other Zemindars might fear the same fate themselves. It seemed as if every mischievous person was encouraged to intrigue and promote disturbances. By the suspected nature of the Shroff's title, Mahartah seemed to set up, as the champion of the old family and the landed interest: at least he gave himself out as such; and it was not easy to guess how he had become so formidable, but from the strength he acquired by these popular professions.

4. I found the ancient family in confinement at Chicacole, living on small pensions from the Government. They represented their forlorn condition to me, and demanded justice and inquiry into the facts attending the loss of their patrimony.

5. I found the vain attempt to seize or drive Mahartah from the hills on which he had taken his station had been attended with great loss, that the insurgents were in consequence emboldened, that the immediate inconvenience was intolerable, and the example dangerous. I found a great force, as many as could be spared of two battalions of sepoys, at Itchapore and Berhampore, about two hundred of the rangers and some country peons were employed in guarding all the villages around the hills; that the troops suffered a good deal, but that nevertheless there was no security of person or property in the roads or villages where there were no garrisons; that people were liable to be mutilated, murdered, and robbed, or carried up the hills, where they were kept till they paid ransom. Even the Collector's cutcherry people, though they came in under a strong guard, expressed their fears of being seized, on the last stage into Berhampore. I found many villages, worth ten or twelve thousand rupees a year, deserted: in short, the inconvenience intolerable.

6. Besides the general misery of such a state, it was of consequence to stop these disturbances, at a season when the revenue was coming in. Few outrages have been committed since my proclamation was published; and in the few instances which have occurred, the people and cattle carried off have been returned. I have endeavoured to keep up the effect of my proclamation by my professions of justice and inquiry, to take away any reasonable plea for continuing to plunder. The first step towards establishing authority is to do justice. Inquiry must be made: if there is nothing to complain of, of course nothing but force can be applied; if there are any grievances, they ought to be redressed; and if, after the redress, the disturbances continue, the severest measures should be adopted.

7. I have now the honour to report on the causes of the Moherry disturbances.

8. Though Moherry is one of the hill zemindarries, it is an open country in general: but there is a tract of hill and jungle extending for some miles, which reaches to within three coss of the large and now provincial capital town of Berhampore, which is also the cusbah of the zemindarry, and the former seat of the family. On these hills Mahartah has taken up his station, and from these hills the plundering parties issue. There are some villages of conds and wodiahs about the bottom of the hills, and some huts and cultivation among and upon them. The peons and conds are connected with Mahartah, and, in fact, the people who do the mischief: there may be also some goomsur peons, and some perhaps from the other zemindarries with him. The hills are unhealthy. Mahartah at least professes the cause of the ancient family. The peons

Mr. Thackeray's Report respecting Moherry, 8 Feb. 1819.

peons and conds seem to want their former enaums and payments, and perhaps a pardon for the past.

9. There have been occasional disturbances in Moherry since it came under the Company's Government, and generally carried on in the same way by parties from these hills. The country was sometimes under aumany management, sometimes under the Zemindar's management; but until it was sold in 1810, the management seems to have been carried on in the name of the old family. The Rannee for some years had an allowance of twelve thousand rupees a year; she now gets thirty rupees a month from the Government.

10. The permanent settlement was concluded in 1804, and the Rannee, the widow of the last Zemindar, was constituted Zemindar. It would have been much better for her, the Government, and every body, if she had continued to live on her allowance of twelve thousand a year, and the country had continued under the Collector's management.

11. The country was valued at ninety thousand; it does not however, now seem worth more than eighty thousand. The permanent jummah was fixed at sixty thousand, the supposed two-thirds of the gross revenue.

12. The Rannee lost her zemindarry in 1810, in the manner which I shall now detail for the information of the Right Honourable the Governor in Council. She fell in arrears about thirty thousand. The zemindarry was advertised by the Collector for sale: she got her renters to come forward with an advance of revenue and raised some money herself, altogether about twenty-two thousand, which was paid to the Shroff, Chellamiah, on his promising to prevent the sale or buy it in for her. He however did not prevent the sale, but bought the zemindarry himself in other names, and pacified her with promises of restoring it, and small payments till he died. If the country has not taken up her cause, Mahartah has taken advantage of it. This is the outline of the story: the detail is as follows.

13. The Rannee seems to have gone on pretty well for some years after the permanent settlement was made, but fell in arrears in fusily 1218 and 1219. The arrears of fusily 1218 seem to have been discharged by loans from soucars. In fusily 1219 these loans seem to have been repaid from the revenue of 1219, but at the end of that fusily she was in arrears to Government 30,726 rupees. The extravagance and mismanagement of her servants, disputes, and want of economy in her family, and partly, it may be inferred, her own want of energy and capacity, and the seclusion of her rank and sex, produced these difficulties.

14. The disputes in her family originated in the supposed claim of her brother-in-law, Mooza Deo, to the zemindarry. Mooza Deo prosecuted her, and an order was passed by the Sudder in 1809, confirming a razeenamah between them, ordering she should hold the zemindarry during her life, when it should revert to Mooza Deo. Mooza Deo died lately at Chicacole, but his son is the representative of the family.

15. Opinion was at that time strong in favour of putting the Regulations for the recovery of arrears of revenue into effect. There had been a good deal of trouble about Moherry, and she had fallen for two years in arrears, and her country was accordingly advertised for sale, to take place on the 29th September 1810. The Board of Revenue and the Collector had lost their political and judicial power and feeling, and took of course a fiscal and regulation view of this and every other similar case of arrears. The arrear was due: the mode of proceeding was laid down in the Regulations; they had no business to consider farther. Many advantages may have resulted from this division of duty, authority, responsibility, and feeling; but there is no doubt the people, and the Government too, have suffered from the want of the general inspection, care, and consideration of officers, who considered themselves generally the representatives of the Government.

16. When the Rannee found herself in danger of losing the zemindarry, she does not appear to have been deficient in exertion. She got her renters to agree to come forward with an advance of the then current year's revenue, altogether about seventeen thousand rupees, proposing to raise herself about five five thousand rupees more, altogether twenty-two thousand, in order to save the country. The renters accordingly came to Ganjam with the money, and she raised five thousand rupees; three thousand rupees by loan and two thousand by pledging her jewels. It appears that the Zemindars here frequently resort to the same expedient, and pay the last year's balance by anticipating the first kist of the next year. The Zemindar raises such money on his own credit; for if the country should be sold, the renters would be liable to pay again. The renters, in this case, came forward to assist the Rannee; but they were naturally anxious about the arrangement she might make with a Soucar, or the Circar, because if she lost the country they might lose their money. She also came to Ganjam.

17. It appears that Chellamiah, the Shroff, had had money transactions with her as with other Zemindars; that he enjoyed a jaghire village (Woonnabelly Pilly) in her country, worth six hundred rupees a year, given by her to conciliate his favour; that he was a great Soucar in the country, and a great man in office too, and that he was therefore a proper person to lend his assistance on this occasion. It appears he offered his assistance: at all events, that he agreed to afford it, and on condition the sum the renters had agreed to pay and the Rannee had raised should be delivered to him, promised to make up the remaining balance of about ten thousand himself, either taking a mootah in mortgage for what he should himself advance and put off the sale, or if that could not be done, buy in the zemindarry at the sale for the Rannee. It is impossible to tell what his real intentions were: he might probably at one time intend to restore it to the Rannee. He most likely wanted to get the country and Rannee into his own hands, and then to make the most of them, keeping or giving up the country as circumstances might dictate; and this is the usual way in which money-lenders consider and manage these zemindarry concerns.

18. It must be recollected she was a woman, secluded by her rank and sex, much in the hands of those about her and the cutcherry, in distress, pushed for the money, in fear; that Chellamiah was a Soucar, Company's Shroff, a great man in the office and country too; that he was in the habits of business of this kind with other Zemindars; that paying money to him, and getting him to become answerable for money, was considered nearly as good as a receipt from the Treasury, and that the money transactions of the Ganjam Zemindars, even with the cutcherry, are conducted in an irregular manner. All this accounts for the money being lodged with him in this manner, his undertaking the arrangement, and its being believed he could manage it. No doubt he could.

19. When the Rannee came to Ganjam the arrangement was concluded, and Chellamiah promised, and it appears took an oath to effect it. The money was accordingly either paid, or the necessary assurances given to Chellamiah before the sale took place. All the renters who can be found, and many others recollect, and have given full and clear declarations on oath to the whole transaction, with the exception of three, Damodhur Croh, Gopenauth Mahuntee, and Lutchem Mahuntee.

34. I think it clear the ancient family lost the zemindarry by a cutcherry trick, and that under all the circumstances of the case and country, justice and policy require that the Government itself should do them justice. The injury was done by the officers of the Government, in the cutcherry of the Government, and under the cloak of the Regulations of the Government. The Zemindars and country people can only see the transaction in this light, and expect justice from the Government. They look to the Government, and do not understand the Regulations, nor the nice theory we have endeavoured to introduce: in fact, nobody but the Government can and will do them justice; nobody but the Government is so deeply interested and has the power.

35. It may be said, the ancient family may go to the courts, that they should sue the Bundum family for the zemindarry and the profits for the last eight years, on the promises and payments from and to Chellamiah before and after the sale: but this would not satisfy the people; and, besides the delay and uncertainty of the law, the family are now reduced to abject poverty, and till lately have been in confinement. They, in fact, want sense and purse to prosecute.

Mr. Thackeray's Report respecting Moherry, 8 Feb. 1819.

secute. The injury was done by what the people consider the Government, and after all that has passed in Ganjam, nothing but immediate satisfaction will convince the people that justice will be really done. They cannot believe the Government want the power, that they are really fettered by their own Regulations, and have really tied up their own hands. The Government must restore the ancient family immediately.

36. In order to restore the ancient family, and secure the revenue and tranquillity, this banyan family must be immediately ejected. Their relative Venkatakistnamah, who now manages their concerns, proposes in his arzee to me to resign the zemindarry, if the Government will agree to pay them the original principal of the purchase-money (thirty-four thousand rupees), and the amount of the balance now standing against the country, taking from him the bonds he has got from the renters for their balances. The original purchase-money, and these balances together, would amount to above a lac of rupees, and the recovery of the balances is uncertain.

37. The zemindarry would not be worth a lac of rupees, perhaps, to any individual; but I consider it would be well worth the while of the Government to pay not only a lac of rupees, but a lac of pagodas, if it were necessary, to get back the country, to enable themselves to do justice and recover the attachment of the people, to unloose their own hands now fettered by the transfer to the Bundum family, and it may be hoped, get rid of this rebellion and withdraw the troops and peons, who must cost a lac of pagodas a year, now employed on this service, and to secure the future revenues and the lives and property of the people.

47. As Chellamiah is dead, and his family, though irregularly, have come under the Collector's protection, the Government may possibly not object to the Collector's being authorized to accept the resignation of the zemindarry on reasonable terms. Perhaps the payment to them of the principal of the purchase-money, thirty-four thousand rupees, as I understood, was recommended to them by their friend at Madras; or considering the circumstances of the country, the Collector might be further authorized to buy, upon the best terms he could, the balances, if there should be any obstacles to an early arrangement, and any objection appears to the suit for the forfeiture, and to the immediate assumption of the country. This, however, would be rewarding instead of punishing the fraud.

48. I hardly think such a proposal would weaken the right of the Government to the forfeiture, or injure the suit in the Adawlut to obtain it; because it would be evident the offer was made from the best motives, from a desire to do justice to the old family, and remove the cause of the rebellion and secure peace even at some expense. The security of the revenue, and saving the people and troops, are also laudable motives for such an offer, even though justice may demand the forfeiture. It would be considered, that although the Government see it would be proper to insist on the forfeiture, as an example to deter other public servants from such transactions, yet that the peace of the country, the security of the revenue, and justice to the old family, made it necessary to get the country back immediately; that therefore the punishment of the fraudulent transfer became in the eyes of a considerate Government a secondary consideration, and if the offer should be unwisely rejected by the Bundum family, such a proposal would, I imagine, rather benefit than injure the suit before the Adawlut for the forfeiture.

49. All this, however, I humbly submit with deference to better judgments. It comes within my duty to state what seems the only proper and likely means at present to put a stop to this rebellion. The mode in which it may be legally done may require better judgment and more technical knowledge; the great object is to get rid of the Bundum family immediately, and the Government may do so by assuming the country, but they may prosecute for damages. It is for consideration, how the country may be forcibly assumed by the Government with the greatest safety or the least risk of incurring damages, or a decree for the restoration of the zemindarry to the Bundum family. The Government would sue for the forfeiture, and it is to be hoped would gain the cause; the Bundum family would in the mean time, or hereafter, prosecute the Government

Mr. Thackeray's Report respecting Moherry, 8, Feb. 1819.

Government for the forcible ejection. The object is to eject them in such a way as to avoid, or diminish as much as possible, any damages, fines, or consequences of that nature, under decrees of the courts.

50. If the Government should order the Collector to withhold the countenance and assistance he now irregularly gives the Bundum family in the management of the zemindarry, and to leave them to manage it themselves, they would probably be unable to collect the revenue, and be soon obliged either to throw it up or fall in arrears, when it would be attached and sold, and so the great object of getting it out of their hands would be accomplished. But the public interests would suffer too much from such a measure: the revenue would fall into such a state of disorder, that it would require a long time to recover from; the disturbances might be worse than ever; what authority now remains would be destroyed, and the worst consequences would ensue. Such a course must, of all others, be avoided. The Government, above every thing, must avoid so pusillanimous and dangerous an expedient. Instead of being likely to put down the rebellion, it would probably produce anarchy. The Government must look first to the protection of the people, authority, and good management.

51. If the Bundum family should refuse to give up the zemindarry on fair terms, they will show that no consideration of propriety or humanity can influence them, where their interest is at all concerned or their pride or passions excited. If one-hundredth part of the assistance given them had been given the Rannee, she could have kept her country; yet she was always, in fact, much more fit to be considered an incapacitated proprietor than the Bundum family. This family seems to have no sense of the exertions, loss, and expense incurred in fighting their battles.

52. I have no doubt that they make use of the Collector's name and authority for improper purposes. It is said they have sequestered and kept the revenue of jaghires and enaums, and that the threefold capacity in which the Shroff acts, of Soukar, Zemindar, and merchant, enables him to derive, perhaps, unfair profit at the expense of the Ryots. It is certain that, independently of the circumstances of the original transfer and the caste, the family is unpopular.

53. I have endeavoured, as much as lay in my power, to stop these disturbances by my proclamation, my professions and inquiries, and by assuring the Moherry family and people that I had represented their case to the Government, who would undoubtedly do justice to every body. But it is uncertain whether the inquiries and professions of an inferior officer can have effect long, unless the Government immediately order the Collector to assume the country on their behalf, and assure the ancient family that they shall be restored and allowed a malikana from the revenue, which shall be managed by the Collector till all accounts and balances shall be settled and a proper arrangement made for the future. The Government must also, at the same time, direct the Collector to sue for the forfeiture, and take such other measures as may be considered expedient to save the Government from damages, or other consequences of any law-suits which the Bundum family may hereafter institute.

54. These measures, it is thought, will put a stop to the rebellion: at least they are the first that can be taken to effect that important object, and I humbly recommend they be carried into effect immediately.

55. It possibly may be apprehended, that these measures of conciliation, or rather strict justice, may weaken authority, and encourage others to endeavour to carry points by resistance. I answer, I see no hopes of putting down the rebellion, at least without such exertions and severities as the occasion does not seem at present to authorize and require, except by doing what is considered by the people, and what is in fact, strict justice. So far from being weakened, I think authority will be strengthened; because all authority, especially of the Company in India, ought to be founded on justice.

56. No doubt the Government could put down this rebellion by sheer force, and the people know it well. The Government can do any thing; but it will not employ its armies, and the severities which would be necessary, unless in a case of unquestionable justice and necessity. If after doing justice these disturbances should continue, I would recommend the severest measures.

If any other matters should require inquiry and redress, they should also be looked into. If justice is done, I think no serious resistance can in general be expected. There are, no doubt, many desperate men who can be kept in order only by severity. I would not wish to conciliate such men; but, at all events, justice must first be done, and then severity must, if necessary, be applied.

As there are some thousand Peons and Conds under insurgent chiefs waiting the result of my inquiries, and ready to begin the work of plunder, I may stand excused in pressing upon the Government the necessity of immediate orders to the Collector on the subject of this report. The ancient family must be assured of their right, and the country assumed, and the law process instituted by the Collector.

I may also be excused, if I add, that in the present state of this province, it is necessary that a full Collector should be immediately appointed. The people now do not know who is to govern them, or what measures may be followed up.

If I have been led into an unusual freedom of expression and discussion, I trust it will be attributed to compassion for the people, feeling for the troops, and concern for the honour of the Government. Circumstances have made it necessary to explain every thing.

I have the honour to be, &c.

EXTRACT FORT ST. GEORGE REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,
The 30th March 1819.

READ the following letters from Mr. William Thackeray:

To the Chief Secretary to Government at Fort St George.

SIR:

Mr Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

Par. 1. I have the honour to request you will submit for the consideration of the Right Honourable the Governor in Council the following observations on the present state of the Ganjam province, which now seems to demand some attention from the Government. I should have deferred sending these observations till after I had finished my enquiry at Goomsur, but the state of the country is too evident to make it difficult to form an opinion; and it is necessary for the Government to be fully acquainted with it, when they take into consideration my letter of the 8th instant, respecting the Moherry disturbance, on which they must pass orders without any delay.

2. Ganjam, Vizagapatam, and Rajahmundry, are countries certainly different from all the other territories dependent on Fort St. George, chiefly because bounded to the westward by a wide tract of hill and jungle, inhabited by uncivilized and indeed unconquered barbarians, many of them not even nominally dependent on any Government: their climate and their poverty have secured them from conquest. No great native Government ever seems to have thought this tract worth conquering. It has been left as a waste corner of the earth to wild beasts and Conds: nobody seems even to know the boundary. This tract has never been even explored: there is a blank here, left in the maps.

3. The country at the foot of this range of hills and the vallies which run up between them are fertile, but for the greatest part of the year the climate is deadly to strangers, and at all seasons very unhealthy.

4. The Rajahs, whose countries lay at the foot of these hills, seem rather the descendants of the ancient lords of the country than of the revenue and police police officers of the great native governments. As the Zemindars were to be considered in other countries completely subdued, it matters little now how the ancestors of the Rajahs got their seats; but it is certain the Mogul Government, even when strong, exercised little or no real power in their countries. They exacted only a small peshcush, and required the Rajahs to refrain themselves from plunder, and to protect the low country from the Conds

5. These Rajahs are to be considered rather as captains of the borders and lords of the marches, chiefs of the hills, than as private landholders. Their easy peshcush enables them to maintain peons, and the protection of the low country must be considered one of the conditions of their tenure, and one of the chief considerations which influenced the great Government under which they have lived to fix their peshcush so low.

6. The Rajahs are connected with the Conds. All the Conds, indeed, who inhabit their own hills are their subjects, reduced and kept in subjection, partly by force, but chiefly by pay and presents, and the advantage of their connection. The Circar officers never seem to have established a direct communication with the Conds; at least, no successful steps have been taken to bring them under the immediate controul and influence of the Government. I do not think there are many Conds, but they extend all along the range to beyond the Godavery behind Polaveram, and are again found, under the name Chinchoowars, when the range again arises south of the Kistna.

7. The peons who inhabit the villages at the foot of the range are more devoted to their Rajahs, almost as little known to the Circar officers, and as little connected with the Government as the Conds. The inhabitants of this tract, to the northward, are wodras, said to be less civilized than other Hindoos, but not deficient in good sense, at least in cunning.

8. The Committee of Circuit state the force of these hill Rajahs, as kept up. Perhaps they do not keep so many peons now; and of course, it is so much the better, if they can manage the duty with fewer, because they will find it easier to pay their peshcush: but on this feudal principle, instead of doing every thing to make them diminish the number of their peons, it would be the duty of the Circar officers to see they kept up their quota, to turn out against banditti or Pindarries, or a French invasion.

9. With respect to the administration of justice, the Committee (the best authority) observe, small matters are settled by the head of the village, greater by the Rajah or rather his panter. This was in 1786. No alteration took place till the establishment of the courts; till when, no great Government, in fact, ever attended further to these Rajahs, than to get a light peshcush from them, and make them do their duty as feudal chiefs.

10. The Company have been sovereigns of the Circars for above fifty years; and, it may be said, but little has been comparatively done towards establishing the authority of the Circar. Some Rajah or other has almost always been in rebellion, or there has been some disturbance somewhere, arising from disputes among the Rajahs themselves, or intrigues among their own people against them. These disturbances altogether have cost more trouble, lives, and expense, than any of those foreign wars by which the Company have gained so much

11. The usual course is for the Rajah to stop payment, or to refuse to attend in person to answer some criminal charge, true or false, his rivals, or the party hostile to him, may bring forward, and the local authorities may think it necessary to notice. The Rajah is seized and confined, or flies to the jungle; and, in either case, his adherents or banditti, who act in his name, plunder and murder those of the adverse party, who then generally get possession of the revenue management, and who then become the government party. Troops are sent into the country, great exertions are made generally without success, by forced marches, to catch the insurgents, and by small detachments to protect the villages. The loss, and in fact disgrace of such a warfare become intolerable. Every body suffers: the Rajah is confined and deprived of his country, often plundered; or if not confined, suffers with his adherents great distress in the jungles: the Ryots are maimed, murdered, and plundered, plundered, the Government loses its revenue, the troops are harassed and lose great numbers by sickness; at least every body seems to get tired of such a state, and a peace is patched up by restoring the old Rajah, or by setting up another of the family, who by the countenance of the Government is in a few months able to establish his own authority.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

12. The few attempts in this part of the country to establish a Circar management under an Aumildar, seem to have been unsuccessful. Perhaps the Ryots and shopkeepers might have been taught, under a very good administration, to have preferred a direct communication with the Circar; but the leading men in the country, and particularly those of the military caste, seem always and naturally to have preferred a Rajah, and the Ryots under a Circar management were exposed to so much violence, that they too must have preferred the protection of a Rajah. Perhaps there must be a Rajah. An able Collector and able Aumildars might possibly manage these countries; but the Government could hardly expect a succession of able men in a climate where there must be so frequent death: It would be hardly worth while to pay able men for such a service. The prejudices of the people are against a Circar management, and a Rajah seems a necessary evil.

13. It may perhaps be said, there might not have been a good Circar management, and the proper measures might not have been taken to conciliate the leading and military part of the people. However, I doubt whether any measures would have succeeded.

14. All we could ever do in these countries was to expel one obnoxious Rajah and to set up another of the same family in his place. The old rebel Rajah was usually either confined and pensioned, or if at liberty was recorded as an outlaw, but in fact privately provided for. In short, the Circar management was always found so insufficient, that the Government were at last compelled to have recourse to a Rajah.

15. It is now impossible to tell the causes of these rebellions for fifty years; but there is reason to suppose the Circar officers were, in general, as much or more in fault, than the Rajahs. In former times, at least, private exaction by Dobashes and Circar servants rendered it difficult for the Rajahs to pay their peshcush, and led them to expect indulgencies and remissions the Government could not always be ultimately brought to allow.

16. The Rajahs, with all the faults imputed to them, do not appear unwilling to perform what they consider their allegiance requires. So long as they are treated with justice, they seem ready, if they can, to pay their peshcush. They generally manage to pay it, though sometimes with some difficulty, and after some delay, generally arising from the roguery of their own servants or perhaps the Circar servants, and the exactions of Soucars and other creditors, who take advantage of their indolence, incapacity, or distress, and extort usurious bonds from them. They never seem to have been connected with the public enemy; and I may even venture to say, that eight or ten years ago, if a foreign force had driven the Collector with his cash chest from Ganjam, he might have found a safe retreat in Kimmedy or Goomsur. The Ganjam Zemindars seem to have shewn their fidelity in 1782 and 1783.

17. The permanent settlement, it is true, put a stop to the direct bribes of the Circar officers: but I have no doubt the court and cutcherry servants have still found means to raise contributions on the Rajahs, and the exactions have been felt more, because formerly, when bribes were paid, the Rajah got some exemption or abatement of peshcush in proportion.

18. The government of the chiefs and council might have been more corrupt; but it was perhaps, considering other circumstances, more efficient, and I should think more popular that it has been since. Then, if the Rajahs bribed high, they secured staunch and powerful friends. The chiefs never pretended to take the police into their own hands: seldom, and then only in particular cases, where the Company's weavers or the gentlemen's were concerned, interfered with the administration of justice. They interfered little more with the revenue management than now.

19. The

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

19. The Rajahs are indeed indolent, ignorant, superstitious, expensive, dissipated, haughty, suspicious of Circar officers, and they wish to consider themselves rather tributary chiefs than common subjects. Injuries, intrigues, and sometimes insults, produce naturally the most violent effects on such men. Fear and suspicion particularly, and sometimes anger, take possession of them: they then do something desperate, and must be considered mad. A wise government must, if possible, prevent such explosions

20 The judicial system and the permanent settlement were suddenly introduced among these chiefs about fifteen years ago; and would, it was supposed, prevent or provide a remedy for all these evils, then recently felt at Ganjam. But it was forgotten that they had never been subdued, and that a complicated system put an ignorant nobility still more in the hands of cunning dependants of Europeans, who could take advantage of it.

21. The authority of the Government ought to have been completely established, before they could expect the innovations which were made to accompany these systems could be suddenly and rigorously introduced without resistance. The fixing the peshcush was no doubt wise, particularly as it was in general easy; but the selling ancient zemindarries at once for arrears, the substitution of a government police for the ancient institutions, the new and complicated, and where these chiefs were concerned, perhaps harsh process, both in civil and criminal matters, the extensive power arising from the judicial and police interference of the local officers, and therefore of their native servants, the treating them with lawyer-like sharpness, instead of the paternal protection they expect, at least talk of, from the Circar, the transfer of them, in short, from the political to the judicial department, were great innovations.

22. The Government also gave up a great deal in the way of inquiry, information, and controul. They relieved the Rajahs of duties they had always discharged, and they only could effectually discharge; the police, for instance. They also shut themselves out from any communication with the people, and in many respects tied up their own hands, while they at the same time imposed, if not fresh burdens on the Rajahs, new, and it would seem dangerous modes of exacting, what the Rajahs no doubt owed, and admitted they owed to the state.

23. In short, the Government then altered the constitution. They weakened their own hands, too, when in fact they wanted more power than ever; because they undertook, in Ganjam at least, more than ever, for they undertook to administer strict and equal justice, without regard to rank, among a lawless, unwilling, and unsubdued, or at least a hitherto privileged order of men.

24. There were only two ways of getting the Rajah to submit to the courts: either to give them a court and system so suited to their dispositions and situation, with a judge so wise and so good that they should submit voluntarily, or to force them to submit. They must of course, and actually do, dislike the courts, which they consider meant to make them pay their debts and punish their offences, so that it became necessary to force them to submit.

25. We could not expect to establish the supremacy of the courts by force, without sending an army into the country, fighting Aumildars with great bodies of Peons into their districts, and executing martial law with severity, and thus actually setting aside the courts, whenever, like Danunjiah Bunge, they refused to surrender to a warrant, or, like the Moherry family, they lost their country for an arrear.

26. This, however, with the best revenue administration, would have been found a more difficult business than the subjugation of the southern pollams, Wynaud, the Ceded Districts, and other countries, where resistance has been put down with a strong hand; because the people are more devoted to their Rajahs, even than the followers of those southern chiefs, and because, though perhaps less warlike, they have a much stronger hill and frontier country, and even a worse climate in their favour, which have hitherto enabled them to maintain so much barbarous independence, and with their poverty may enable them to maintain the struggle, till the Government give it up as not worth supporting. All the twenty-one Rajahs together do not pay one lac and thirty thousand pagodas: not much more than one good Aumildar in Tanjore or the Ceded Districts.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

27. During the last three years we have tried what martial law and troops could do. It is true, the revenue management, perhaps, may not have been very efficient, or the Circar officers not clearly in the right, and therefore it may not be thought a fair experiment; but supposing the cause and management good, I hardly think it worth while to force a new system upon them. If one Rajah fail in his duty, Government must punish him and put up another of his family. This seems the custom of the country, and what all former governments have done.

28. If the revenue administration can be improved, it may be acceptable to them, and of advantage to the Government for the Collector to take the countries to nurse, when they may be involved in difficulties, giving them a malikana, and assuring them that they should have their country again if they conducted themselves properly, after their affairs should be settled, and they could make satisfactory arrangements for their future management. If they have full confidence in the cutcherry, I have no doubt they would be brought to acquiesce in an arrangement of this kind, and might probably be restrained from improper interference and irregular collections.

29. Supposing even the Company had come into the Circar as conquerors, as they entered the new provinces in 1800, and ever so efficient a revenue administration had been introduced, I doubt whether it would have been thought worth while to reduce these Rajahs to the condition of common subjects. A light peshcush and general allegiance, under the controul of a political agent, acting immediately under the orders of the Government, as occasion required, on fixed principles, but not under cramping rules, would have been as much as could have been expected from them. An arrangement of this nature would have saved the Government, the Rajahs, and the people a great deal of trouble and misery. These Rajahs are not to be managed on justice of the peace principles.

30. But these new systems were suddenly introduced after a bad government under the Company of thirty years. Our character was much lower than in the new provinces. We had come, and had generally acted as merchants, rather than as conquerors and sovereigns. There had unquestionably been much corruption; but, in fact, there never has been a strong government in the Circar. For seventy years they were in great confusion, when Monsieur Bussy attempted to reform the police and the revenue, When Colonel Ford had expelled the French, the English authorities seem to have been confounded at the vast country subjected to them; or if they had spirit and comprehension to feel their situation, they were either too weak or too ignorant of the country languages and customs, or possibly corrupt, to act as sovereigns. For some years after Colonel Ford's conquest there was a general anarchy, and indeed from that time till the permanent settlement was made, the Circar authority had never been effectually established, except in the immediate vicinity of our settlements. The meagre accounts of the Committee of Circuit, but the best ever got, shew that in Ganjam at least there was neither real information nor authority.

31. If authority was not established before, it could not be expected to be done immediately after the permanent settlement was made. That settlement was, in fact, in many respects a permanent resignation of power, and the means of obtaining that information and influence which were necessary to enable the Government to administer equal justice, as they undertook, to high and low, Rajah and Ryot.

32. To enable themselves to have performed effectually what this extensive, and here perhaps novel obligation, required, they ought to have done what they did in other provinces, now under better government, sent an army into the country, placed the revenue administration in the ablest hands, deferred the courts of justice, suspended the Zemindars when suspected or incapable, given them a malikana, placed their own Aumils in charge of the revenue and police, taking accurate accounts, particularly of all enaums, and made the settlements with Ryots themselves.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

33. Under such a strong and good provincial administration, the Zemindars would have been treated differently, according to their character, caste, conduct, and situation.

34. They may be considered of three descriptions. The hill Râjahs, never thoroughly subdued by the great native government: a fixed and easy peshcush was no doubt the wise way of settling with them. The good effects of the permanent settlement have been amply felt in Ganjam; it kept things quiet for many years. These chiefs were tributaries rather than common subjects. The police should have accompanied the revenue, and it would have been better to have put them under a separate and simpler system. Such Rajahs belong rather to the political department: they should be governed on fixed principles, but not by complex untried rules, which fetter the Government on the one hand, and expose the ignorant Rajahs, on the other, to the arts of men more knowing than themselves.

35. Other Zemindars, too, were men of military castes, Rachawars and Velma Dhoras, whose ancestors were men of influence in the country perhaps, or even officers of the Hindoo government at the Mahomedan conquest, continued, or newly appointed, revenue and police officers by the new Government. In general, it might have been better for these Zemindars if they had got their malikana, and their countries had been kept under a Circar management.

36. There were other Zemindars, men of cultivating caste, who answered more to the Mogul, and indeed English idea of Zemindars: head farmers or Potails of districts. Some of these might have been continued in the management, and would have made indifferent Tehsildars. But wherever it was not necessary to have Rajahs under a separate system, wherever Government intended their new judicial process to be acted on, and to reduce every body to the condition of subjects, it would have been wrong to make a permanent settlement with Zemindars at all, if the Government had had any confidence in the revenue administration. Nothing but the well known corruption of the native servants, and the experienced inefficiency of the revenue management in the Circars, could make a permanent settlement with such Zemindars, and in such cases, proper. In such cases the permanent settlement was an evil; but better perhaps than other greater evils. Annual settlements were known to be attended with such abuses, that any thing was better. In fact, there never was a good revenue system in the Circars There may have been able Collectors and good servants, but no good system ever appears to have been established: the permanent settlement may be considered made, because the Government despaired of reforming these inveterate abuses.

37. But though the peculations which followed annual settlements were stopped in the Circars by the permanent settlement, the Government lost a great deal: indeed, the Government professed to give up a good deal. They were at once cut off from any communication with the people, but through the courts, where nobody comes willingly. We none of us like to appear in court, or before a magistrate, with the oaths and forms accompanying such appearance; but the people of India like the cutcherry of the Collector: it is the great gate of communication between the Government and the people. This is no reflection on the Courts: it is the same in England.

38. Even in those cases where the Zemindars were continued in the exercise of that office merely as Zemindars, not as Rajahs on a separate system, it was necessary to have made them continue to manage the police as they had done for ages, according to the custom of the country and their original institution. It was necessary to do so, if no permanent settlement had been made with them; but it was perhaps even more necessary after making that settlement. Instead of doing this, the Government then gave up to them for ever the revenue management, that is, the source of influence and information, and relieved them from this important part of their duty. When I say police, I do not mean the cognizance of petty officers, but the preservation of the peace.

39. In

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

39. In former times, wherever the Government was strong and pretended to administer impartial justice, they necessarily exercised the strictest controul over the Zemindars. They knew the revenue officers only could conduct the police; that, in fact, a good revenue management is a good police: they therefore always entrusted this duty to the Zemindars, and exacted it from them.

40. Our Government has done the reverse: they converted offices into lots of land, they treated tributary Rajahs and great revenue and police officers as mere landholders. This was, perhaps, one of the greatest innovations ever introduced into any country, except perhaps the general transfer of land from English to Normans after the Conquest. It had its advantages, no doubt, and answers in some places.

41. When the Government confirmed, and in some respect increased, the influence of the Zemindars, but at the same time relieved them from the responsibility and duty of the police, they transferred these duties and obligations to the zillah Judge; but they could not, at the same time, transfer the command of services and information necessary to enable him to perform what these obligations required, because they had previously made them over to the Zemindars. It was with that command of service and information that the Zemindars always had and always could maintain order in their countries. It was only when the Government was weak or tyrannical, and the Zemindars in rebellion, that there were any disturbances.

42. The zillah Judge, when he came to discharge these duties, found himself totally destitute of any real information or authority in the country. He was obliged to sit down contentedly ignorant of every thing that passed five miles from his dwelling, or had recourse to hired Darogahs and Peons, a new establishment, unknown in the country before, and unconnected with the country people. These new police officers did much more harm by their intrigues and extortions, than any little good that could possibly arise from their information and services.

43. They were almost always either bribed by the Zemindars and country people, or endeavouring to extort money from them, or at least shewing their usefulness and importance, by dragging to light, and often exaggerating their transgressions. Most of the Judges seem to have considered them very corrupt. There is but one opinion of them among the country people, wherever I have had an opportunity of inquiring.

44. The Darogahs were generally low men, such as Cutwals, turned-off writers, Dobashes, and butlers, the dregs of the courts and cutcherry: their Peons good for nothing, batta Peons, such as hang about every cutcherry, and follow the Dobash. Sending such men into the zemindarries was as if the Government, an hundred years ago, had sent a dozen London attorneys' clerks, with some Bow-street runners, to the Highlands of Scotland, to controul those proud chiefs, and establish a good police in that country.

45. Relieving the Zemindars from the police was, in fact, an injury to them, because as no other efficient system could be introduced, their Ryots and revenue were exposed to the consequences of a bad police, and they themselves to the intrigues, extortion, and insults of low men.

46. Great exertions have no doubt been made. The seizure, more through the Nizam's police than ours, and punishment, in 1813, of Venkal Row, Jimma Rouze, and other banditti, who had plundered the country between the Kistna and Godavery for twenty years, re-established for the present the tranquillity of that tract; but all the country north of the Kistna is still liable to disturbance. Perhaps the Collectors may do something by employing the Zemindars under Section 39, Regulation XI, 1816. But I think that section deficient, because the magistrate should have been expressly authorized to employ the servants of the Zemindars, who are, in fact, in all respects better calculated for this duty than their masters, particularly because they can be brought forward with less trouble, if accused of any abuse, in the discharge of it. This section is also objectionable, because it allows the magistrate to employ the Zemindars on his own responsibility. Now few men will become personally personally responsible for the acts of any native. It ought to have been made part of the system, as it always was till the permanent settlement was made.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

47. Most of the Zemindars, too, are unfit, and many now refuse to take the duty; and in other cases, in a minority for instance, the double managements and divided influence may prevent the Magistrate establishing an efficient police: but wherever the Zemindars and their servants are not bad characters, and will undertake it, it may be best to entrust it to them.

48. It may be said they will abuse it. I answer, if their general character is too bad to be trusted with the police, they should not have been trusted with the revenue, which is what really gives them the means of doing good or mischief. If they are good enough for the revenue, they are good enough for the police, which to be efficient always has and must accompany the revenue; and there can be no police but through the people of the country.

49. We must engage them in the service or nothing can be done. But, besides this, the Zemindars, their servants, and the country people, who can only be brought to act under them, are undoubtedly more respectable than the low people sent from courts and cutcherries on this duty.

50. If it was proper to continue the police with Zemindars, it was indispensably necessary with the hill Rajahs. They keep up, and in fact, by their low peshcush and original institution and tenure, are bound to keep up a police establishment. They are the natural channels of influence and controul over the lands, the only efficient captains of the borders. They hate our new police, and we cannot expect to establish any police in spite of them. If inclined, they will just as soon commit acts of violence without as with the police. I think they would be under some check if they had the police duty, and responsibility might be imposed upon them, perhaps, in such a way as to make them more careful.

51. The new police is said to have contributed to produce the disturbances in Ganjam. At present, indeed, the police of the hill zemindarries is three battalions and two companies of Sepoys, a battalion of hill rangers, and an host of country Peons, detached in small parties, to protect every village for which a guard can be spared. Perhaps the most costly and least efficient police in the world, especially as the old police zemindarry Peons are still maintained, and in fact by the Government, who gave up so much revenue when they fixed the peshcush so low. These Peons are now paid as before; but employed in making, not putting down these disturbances. There are the men, and paid, but no longer under the old discipline.

52. These disturbances are the real objects of police. Common cases of murder and even robbery are scarce in India, particularly in Ganjam: it is gang robbery, by parties from fifty to five hundred, that is the great evil.

53. It is true, many abuses, sometimes even enormities, may be practised in the zemindarries. Whenever there is a Rajah there is danger. There is danger when they are poor, and when they are rich; from their own servants, and from machinations of circar servants against them. If poor, they cannot pay their peshcush; if rich, may get insolent, or may be objects of plunder. They are in general too indolent, and incapable to manage themselves; their servants will occasionally get them into scrapes: but, on the whole, there may be less mischief if they have the police, than if we attempt setting a police over them.

54. In fact, the Government cannot now protect the people in these hill countries, except through the Rajahs. The people know this, and naturally look to the Rajahs, and not to the Government. It may be said, this will not be the case when the English Government is better known, our regulations introduced, and the people more civilized. I answer, I can perceive nothing very effectual done towards establishing a good Government police. I can see no instruments to maintain tolerable order but the Rajahs, nor are we likely to find others: they are the country gentlemen here. If our system, our officers, and the people are likely to improve, why not the Rajahs? They are at least as likely to improve as the low people generally employed by the court and cutcherry cherry in Ganjam. Why should not the men of rank and fortune improve as fast as any body else? Lord Cornwallis expected their improvement, and it was one of his best reasons for making the permanent settlement. I have no doubt there has been a great improvement here, on the whole, since the country has been under the Company's Government, though much slower than in other countries. In 1806 Lord William Bentinck proposed to trust the Zemindars in the circars with the police, though the Supreme Government overruled it.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

55. The Rajahs or their servants commit frequently irregularities, sometimes enormities, but these stories are generally exaggerated by the party hostile to the existing Rajahs. Sometimes some police, or revenue, or court officer, joins the party, and they try either to take advantage of the Rajah's transgressions to extort money from him, or to get the Government to take up the cause against him, that he may eventually lose his zemindarry. His brother or cousin, with some of the public servants, are perhaps at the bottom of the intrigue, which sometimes may extend to the hills, when the Conds may be brought down to plunder his villages, and so disable him from paying his peshcush. It is a struggle for the zemindarry or revenue management, which, of course, where the peshcush is so low, is a profitable concern. In other provinces the Government give up revenue to keep people quiet; here, sometimes, to make a disturbance.

56. I believe the Rajahs, in their management of their servants, and the Conds particularly, are sometimes obliged to exercise severities, which are in fact not criminal, when absolutely necessary to maintain the peace. The Government has no natural right to question them for such acts. The Government cannot protect the people. If the Rajahs, as captains of the borders, do not take on themselves such necessary severities, the country might be a scene of plunder. The law, perhaps, cannot allow of such acts, but they would hardly ever be brought forward, unless the Magistrate went out of his way to drag them forth. Even then they would not be established in court, because the people and servants about the Rajah would never speak out against him, when his life and dignity were concerned. The Government would not be brought to give them the power of life and death; but it would be better to do it at once, than to leave the country to be plundered by the Conds.

57. Sometimes one Rajah is accused of raising disturbances against another. Pudmanabha Deo, proprietor, in fact Zemindar, of Teckally, is the son of Doogarauze, who was related to the Kimmedy family, and managed that hill zemindarry many years. When he died his son succeeded to the management; but a party was soon formed against him, who intrigued with Peons and Conds, who began to plunder the country, and at last drove him from the management: another manager was appointed, and Pudmanabha Deo retired to his zemindarry of Teckally. In a short time fresh disturbances were raised against the new management. Pudmanabha Deo was accused of exciting them: he was tried and acquitted before the court of circuit. His son, a mere boy, was sentenced to death by a court martial for assisting the insurgents, but reprieved. It seems generally believed Pudmanabha Deo got off by large bribes to lawyers and witnesses. It is doubtful whether he was concerned. He says the party which at first excited disturbances against him, when they had thereby effected their object and succeeded to the management, did not perform what they had promised to the banditti they employed; and that, in revenge, the banditti again rose against their old employers, now got into power, and created the troubles of which he was accused. At all events, whether Pudmanabha Deo really instigated these second disturbances, it was improbable he should have employed his only son in such a dangerous intrigue, when he could so easily have communicated with the insurgents through any of those confidential people he was also accused of employing.

58. If Pudmanabha Deo had not been Zemindar of Teckally he would probably have escaped this misfortune. Teckally was a circar district next to Kimmedy, sold by the Government to his father. One would suppose experience had shewn there were Rajahs enough before, but there are no less than ...... Sic. orig.
new proprietors or Zemindars in Ganjam on the estates sold when the permanent settlement was made. The Government were not in distress for the money, and wanted the influence and information the management only can give. If these new Zemindars were fit to be trusted with the revenue, they ought to have the police too. If the revenue management here was so bad as to justify such a new creation of Rajahs, the police has surely been bad enough to let that follow. Even the people, though many of them are spectators, are more respectable, I should think at all events must have more at stake, and must feel more interest in supporting good order, than the police or even revenue officers now usually employed.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

59. It may be observed, every body has an advantage in these disturbances, except the Ryots and the Rajah, or Circar. When the country is zubted, the Circar servants in charge, and perhaps their relations in the cutcherry, get something in the scramble. The country peons get pay and batta for turning out against the insurgents; the favoured Ryots get remissions for real or supposed plunder; the insurgents live on the plunder and never get punished; the Government is plagued, the troops suffer, the poor Ryots are mutilated and murdered.

60. These disturbances are the country way of scrambling for power and emolument, or complaining of grievances, like the fires in Constantinople. If one party can get the court or Collector to take their part, especially with troops, they gain a great point, because the other party then become rebels, and are generally forced to submit. It is not very easy to discover which party is most in the right, or rather least in the wrong, and there is almost as much chance of Government supporting the wrong as the right side.

61. If the cutcherry could have been so good that every body had confidence in it; if the truth had been brought out on every inquiry; if strict justice had always been done; if every thing had been conducted publicly, and doubtful points referred to a punchayet, the Rajahs, and those who have rank and property, and therefore influence, would probably by this time have gladly resorted to such a cutcherry, as a sure asylum and place of security against all impositions and tricks, especially those of their own servants. They are now said to be more inclined to try other modes of righting themselves, and others follow their example.

62. In general it will now be the safest policy to support the existing Rajahs or management; and on this principle, too, to entrust it with the police.

63. It is bad when Government set up a man of straw as manager or Rajah, whom no party supports, but worst of all, when Government set up an odious stranger, whom all unite to oppose. In Moherry, for instance, the cutcherry Shroff has managed by some means to get the zemindarry and the support of the Government. None of the other Zemindars or country people support his family; and if it is thought that he got the zemindarry by a trick, others may now attempt by intrigue, and perhaps by encouraging the insurgents, to drive him from a situation, and deprive him of a profitable concern, to which any other court or cutcherry dependant thinks he has as much right, if his tricks succeed, as the Shroff himself. He is a Rajah with a bad title.

64. The Magistrate must be on his guard against the intrigues of his own servants, and those who have risen from nothing to be leading men about the cutcherry, as well as of the party hostile to the Rajahs. He should certainly, at least, have a discretion to act or not, as may appear prudent, instead of being forced by imperative Regulations to take immediately what are violent measures where Rajahs are concerned, on any person coming forward, from whatever motives, with a charge against them. Issuing a warrant against a Rajah is, in fact, a violent measure.

65. Some Rajahs have been suddenly seized, and at least said to be plundered, so that when a Rajah is conscious of any transgression or is in arrears, he is afraid of being seized too. Those who have access to him, and to whom he applies for advice and information, perhaps work on his fears, and drive him to some desperate measure, which may ruin him, though in fact he had really got into no serious scrape before.

66. It

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

66. It has frequently been said a great force was necessary to overawe the Rajahs. If two or three battalions are always to be kept here for this purpose, the army must be increased to two or three battalions more than if they were not required. This increase of force would eat up all the revenue paid by these Rajahs together: but, besides the expense, I have doubts whether they do not do more harm than good, by the alarm and state of warlike preparation in which they keep the Rajahs and their Peons. It is not necessary a force should be within a day's march of Poligars: it is sufficient if they know the Government can march an army. It would not be safe, indeed, to remove the troops till the Goomsur and Moherry businesses are settled; but then one battalion ought to be quite sufficient for the northern part of this province, or it is hardly worth keeping.

67. It must be kept in mind, that every Rajah, especially if rich, is an object of prey to Circar servants, his own servants and relations and peons, and to Circars. He is frequently robbed by these people. When he wants to settle any business at the cutcherry, his Vakeel may tell him two or three thousand rupees are necessary: the Rajah sends the money, which is divided perhaps between the Vakeel and one of the servants. The Rajah is told, perhaps, the gentleman got the money, which silences him for ever.

68. The Government must take them as much as possible under their own protection. It is easier, wiser, and more humane, to govern them with paternal care, than have to fight or exterminate them. They should be taken as much out of the hands of the local officers as possible. When any thing goes wrong, some new man should be sent to inquire immediately.

69. A great deal has been said about disarming the people. I, as a Collector, would wish all my Zemindars armed, and if possible every Ryot paying revenue to Government, particularly in frontier provinces, to have a pike and a matchlock in his house. I had rather have to fight them occasionally, than to protect them always; and neither insurgents nor Pindarries, as experience here has shewn, could have plundered a village full of pike and matchlockmen. There might be more affrays with bloodshed; but these are trifles, compared with the general plunder to which they are now exposed.

70. If the Zemindars, particularly those of Kimmedy and Goomsur, had been on their old footing, and ordered to keep their people ready, I do not think a Pindarry could have got alive out of the country, nor would these disturbances perhaps have taken place at all: they all began with the measures pursued against Danunjiah Bunge.

71. The diminution of the Rajah's power, so far from adding to the security of the Government and the people, has had the contrary effect. Considering times and circumstances, there never, at any period I can trace, was more confusion and plunder than lately. There is, in fact, no efficient authority in any of the zemindarries now under the Collector's management, no efficient Circar authority in any of those managed by its Rajah, and it is only by the influence their situation naturally gives them, and of which the Magistrates have tried to deprive them in vain, that the Rajahs are still able to afford protection to their own Ryots and revenue. It is in spite of our endeavours, it may perhaps be said, that peace is any where preserved. Except in Kimmedy, Goomsur, and Moherry, under the Collector's management, there has been no disturbance.

72. As the Government undertook the police without the Rajahs and their Peons, they will now be compelled to have recourse to Sepoys and martial law, those last resources of a bad police: but it would take half the army to garrison every village, and in Moherry and Goomsur every village not garrisoned is exposed to plunder.

73. Two battalions, two hundred rangers and Peons, who cost one thousand and fifty rupees a month, have been employed on this service in Moherry: yet the insurgents are as able as ever, the people where there are no garrisons as much exposed. The loss has been great in the Moherry war. Seven officers* and

and three hundred sepoys have died of the fever, and diseases arising from the climate and exposure on the service, besides those invalided, pensioned, disabled, wounded, and in hospital or gone home. The murder, mutilation, and plunder, has also produced a great sum of misery; altogether more than all the personal crimes committed by all these Rajahs together for the last century.

74. Moherry is valued at ninety thousand rupees by the Board of Revenue. I imagine too high: but the permanent settlement with these hill Rajahs was fixed at only two-thirds of the supposed gross revenue. In Moherry, on that principle, at sixty thousand rupees. Why go on the principle of giving up one-third, if not to enable the Zemindar to keep up the usual peon establishment, and make the usual payment and presents to the Conds? all which is police. The seventeen bissoyes or head peons, with their establishments in Moherry, used to get nominally from the old Zemindars about 5,499 rupees in money, 3,730 rupees in land, yearly; but it is supposed 5,000 rupees is as much as they ever got, or need get.

75. The banyan family, which now holds the zemindarry has paid no part of these old allowances, though at the instance of the present acting Collector, they have lately agreed to pay half the peons he entertained for the protection of the villages. The banyans say, you have undertaken the police: you must protect us and our revenue. We cannot collect it all. We ought to get twenty or thirty thousand rupees a-year clear profit; we do not, however, get near so much, owing to these disturbances, which you engage to prevent. You must grant a remission, or we shall petition the Board. The banyans do not care if the Government lose ten thousand men and spend ten lacs, so as that at last, by all this blood and treasure, their banyan boy may be fought in to be Zemindar of Moherry. If the lands and payments of the bissoyes have been discontinued many years, the loss has not been forgotten. They are supposed to have invited and to support Mahartah, though many of them at present are in the Collector's pay.

76. If the people were armed and the old zemindarry institutions revived, they could generally protect themselves, but never have, nor will pretend to oppose the Company's arms. They plunder defenceless villages: this is their warfare; and if the troops follow them into the jungles, shoot a few arrows, or fire a few matchlocks, which now and then may kill a man: but the history of the circars hardly shews an example of their opposing the troops of the Government, at least with any success. It is their climate and their plundering parties, not their arms, that make them formidable.

77. The Kimmedy zemindarry produces a gross revenue of 1,50,000 rupees. The Company's peshcush is only 80,000 rupees; the clear revenue to the Rajah is about 70,000 rupees. The expenditure of the saumustan is however very heavy; it amounts to at least 47,000 rupees. It is for the management of the zemindarry, and the distribution of this money, and other good things the party in the management enjoy, that intrigues and disturbances are excited. Nothing but a strong Rajah management can maintain order here. There are nine hills or forts, as they are called, in Kimmedy, and a bissoye or captain to each. There are one thousand one hundred and ten peons belonging to the bissoyes, who get 2,100 rupees a-year in money, and 5,620 rupees in land, and pay a cuttoo buddy of Rupees 2,530: they therefore get nominally 5,190 rupees a-year. When the permanent settlement was made, that cuttoobuddy was made payable directly to Government; but the charge seems to have had no other effect than to make them more lawless than before. They profess, indeed, devotion to the saumustan and the person of the Rajah; but if his authority is not a good deal diminished, the circar authority, at all events, is not at all increased. These bissoyes are, in fact, entirely independent of the circar authority, and can only be managed through a strong Rajah government. There are also some hundred turbulent town peons, who receive nine thousand rupees a year in ready money from the Rajah. These establishments are police establishments: they only require to be put under proper discipline to maintain the peace effectually. Instead of maintaining, they now endanger

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

the tranquillity of the country, and we are obliged to keep two companies of Sepoys there, in fact, to check them. The Rajahs used to govern their Peons and hill people with a rod of iron. The present Rajah is a minor; the country under the Collector's management There are two Raunies or queens, grandmothers of the Rajah, who are rivals: they have each a party among the peons and hill people, and it is the squabbles of these parties for power and emolument, which produce the disturbances in Kimmedy. There have always been occasional troubles. There is a long story of a massacre of hill chiefs about fifty years ago by the Rajah's order, a subsequent rebellion among the hills, and an expedition with all the zemindarry force into the hills, which at last succeeded, and the hill people were forced to submit.

78. The great responsibility of taking the police, that is, setting aside the ancient institutions of the country without substituting any other efficient system in their place, was not considered. The Government, without means, then undertook the protection of each individual. All the other Rajahs have their Conds, and Peons for the protection of their country against the Conds. The Committee of Circuit, in general, states the supposed number of the Peons.

79. This seems the natural and only effective police of the country. The Government may get the police by succeeding to the power now actually possessed, though not ostensibly exercised, or only perverted, by the Rajahs. This may happen in the course of time, by steady management and good faith, in paying the malikana of Rajahs whose countries may fall in. We can never establish a judicial or police authority, in spite of the Rajah; not perhaps even when he is in confinement, as appeared in Goomsur, in the case of Danunjiah Bunge: but we may, as experience has shewn in former times, by putting our own officers in charge with the concurrence of the Rajah. Whatever is now done by the circar authority in these zemindarries, is by the sufferance of the Rajah, who admits it sooner than quarrel with the Circar.

80. With respect to the state of these hill zemindarries, I have already, and in my letter of the 8th February, explained the manner in which the Moherry family lost their zemindarry, and the consequences which have ensued. It seems to have been thought necessary to seize every opportunity of punishing the Rajah by the loss of his lands, when he fell in arrears,* to make others more careful, by the example. I think this principle was carried much too far. The Rajahs seem in general to have paid with punctuality since the permanent settlement was made: at all events, the object is not to get the money by ruining, or at least impoverishing the Rajah, but to get the money and save the Rajah too. During the last three years of disturbance, the Rajahs have paid punctually, and they now seem disposed to pay. In one or two instances the Rajah is involved and cannot perhaps pay.

81. The Moherry family was ruined: other Zemindars have been impoverished by the sale of their countries. The chigutty man fell in arrears: a mootah was put up to sale and bought in by the Shroff, Chellamiah. The Rajah could not bear the loss of his land, and afterwards paid Chellamiah, I understand, ten thousand rupees in addition to the original purchase-money, and got back his country. The chigutty man is now in difficulty, and the present acting Collector is now trying to extricate him, without having recourse to the desperate measure of selling his country. His present difficulties must have been increased, though they might not altogether proceed from the loss of these ten thousand rupees. In this case our Zemindar was impoverished, and the revenue rendered so much less secure; while a banyan about the cutcherry cleared a large sum by this in fact gambling speculation. The chigutty man had not the money to pay at the time, or he would have paid. How much better it would have been, if the Collector had managed the mootah the Shroff bought till the balance had been collected, when the Zemindar might have got back his country without losing so large a sum.

82. Da-

* Vide Collector's letter to the Board, dated 20th September 1810, paragraph 8.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

82. Danunjiah Bunge fell in arrear in fusily 1219: he said the money was on the road, and only stopped because the rivers were down. There was no doubt of his ability to pay. It was indeed said he was contumacious; and the purchasers got, I understand, twenty thousand rupees, besides the original purchase-money, by re-selling it to the Zemindar. Here was another Zemindar impoverished by our system, and thus our future revenue so far rendered less secure. It is true Danunjiah Bunge ought to have been punctual, and deserved some punishment for the delay; but still this does not make the selling the land for arrears good policy. If the revenue is not paid, the Zemindar fails in his agreements, and his country should revert to the Government.

83. The Bunaghur man fell in arrears Rupees 2,709 in fusily 1219. Part of his country was sold to Lutchmi Narsoo, the pensioned police officer. The Bunaghur Rajah says the mootah then sold is worth ten thousand rupees a year, while Lutchmi Narsoo pays only 1,750 rupees for it. The Rajah now wants it back again, but says Lutchmi Narsoo asks such an enormous price, and knows its value so well, that he despairs of recovering the mootah. He deserves some credit for not having recourse to the usual mode of redress in such cases, plundering and burning, to impede Lutchmi Narsoo's collections. It does not much signify what really prevented the Bunaghur man from paying; but it is clear it would have been better for the Government to have taken this mootah, than to have sold it to Lutchmi Narsoo. They would have derived power and profit, and left themselves at liberty to restore the mootah, if it should be politic, if they had taken it

84. These transfers are in general gambling speculations. They are unjust to the Rajahs, for their zemindarries are of inestimable value to them, because their hereditary seats: they are also of great value to them, from their local interest, and the revenue they can without opposition draw from them. They are also of great value to the Government, on account of the political interest connected with them; but they are, in fact, of little value in the market, because the new purchaser is likely to meet opposition from the ancient proprietor and his friends. They are only valuable in the market as a gambling means of extorting money from the old proprietors. I need not point out the dangerous responsibility of the Government, in undertaking to put and keep the new purchasers, perhaps men of straw or odious strangers, in possession. If the old Zemindar does not get the country back, there is discontent, perhaps a rebellion; if he does repurchase it, he begins again loaded with debt. I do not recollect any other transfers of ancient zemindarries.

85. In case of default, whether the Government take the country or sell it, the old Zemindar is to be kept from interfering or making disturbances by the power of the Government. The Government will be much stronger when they keep the country themselves than when they sell it; they will also be unfettered. These countries are so easily assessed, that if there are no disturbances the arrears may in general be paid off from the profits. It would be better, therefore, to give up the country to another member of the old family, if he could manage it, for nothing, than sell it for a few thousand rupees to a stranger, who may require support and troops.

86. The sale of these ancient zemindarries is a bad mode of recovering arrears: it impoverishes the Zemindars, and only puts money into the pockets of money-lenders, who take advantage of the distress of the Zemindar, either to extort usurious bonds from him before, or large additions to the original purchase-money after the sale of his lands The Government is not pressed for the money; and if another mode of recovering arrears were adopted, the Zemindars would not be so pushed, as either to borrow on such hard terms, or have to repurchase their lands with such ruinous loss. The Government might always zubt the country.

87. The consequences of the sale or forfeiture of these ancient zemindarries was not foreseen. The apparent tranquillity of Goomsur for the first two years after Danunjiah Bunge was confined, served to deceive us further. It was his orders, orders, not the Pindarries, which occasioned the disturbances. His father, Srekara Bunge, after his escape from confinement, took the vacant radje, and unless some arrangement is now made he will revive them. He is now, in fact, master of the country.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

88. The system, as far as regards these Rajahs, must be altered. If the same system should be administered in the same manner for a few years longer, we may have half the Rajahs in confinement, the other half outlaws in the jungles, and the whole country a scene of confusion and plunder. It would be better to rent the country to the Nagpore Rajah.

89. There are now three most important points for the wisdom of the Government to consider.

1st. The process to be pursued when these Rajahs are accused of serious crimes.

2d. The rules under which the Rajahs and their servants shall manage the police.

3d. The mode of recovering arrears of revenue and private debts.

90. The Government may perhaps think it expedient to put these Rajahs under a separate tributary system; at all events, to modify the present Regulations, with respect to them. If it is thought expedient to frame a new Regulation, the shorter the simpler; the more it leaves to the discretion of the Government the better.

91. In the first place, it might provide that where certain Rajahs, whose names and countries must be specified, shall be accused of murder, gang robbery, &c. serious offences, the Magistrate shall summon them by Vakeel, and make a full inquiry into the circumstances; and if there should be strong grounds to suppose the Rajah guilty, the Magistrate shall submit the case, with all the papers and information which may be necessary, for the orders of the Government, who shall direct the mode to be observed for apprehending and bringing the Rajah to trial.

92. This would prepare the Government against the consequences of resistance, would enable them to defer acting where it might be expedient, till opportunity offered, and would leave to them also the court before which the Rajah should be tried, and the decision of any other question that might arise. The Mahomedan law, with the present modifications, is not ill adapted to the Rajahs, and will hang over their heads to deter them from committing enormities. In general, the provincial court would be a very proper tribunal, with the usual reference to the Sudder. When the Rajah was once apprehended, the present proceedings of the Courts of Circuit and Sudder are sufficiently suitable; flight or resistance might be punished with forfeiture, confinement, or death. The Government could always put in one of the family after the forfeiture or execution of the offending Rajah.

93. In the second place, the Regulation might provide for the discharge of the duties of the police, through the Rajahs, the panters and peons. Every body but the Rajah himself should be amenable to the common courts. This would prevent any extensive abuses. Too much in the way of the returns and reports should not be expected, and instead of making minute rules for reporting common offences, the Regulation might provide, as far as can be done, for the general security, by making the Rajah answerable for any plunder committed by his people or banditti, who may take refuge or get assistance from his talooks. Forfeiture of his zemindarry should be held out as the punishment for any connivance in this respect. The Rajah and all his people should be bound not only to maintain the peace of his own district, but should also be liable to be called on to assist in putting down disturbances in the neighbourhood. The rules should be clear and simple. I would endeavour not to give power so much as to regulate power, now actually held and covertly exercised. It is not to punish petty offences, but to prevent general plunder. We try to give the Rajah power, and make it his duty to prevent plunder; but, at the same time, prevent his abusing it. As the Raje would then again become an office, office; the nomination to the succession might be vested in the Government, which would give them power, without depriving them of the option of referring cases of disputed succession, where no political interests were concerned, to the usual courts, whose decrees the Government would only have in such cases to confirm. This is a point for consideration; but I think the Government should keep as much power as it can in their own hands. These Rajahs should certainly be considered in the political rather than the judicial department.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

94. In the third place, the Regulation should provide for the recovery of arrears and private debts. The present practice of selling their zemindarries for arrears should be discontinued. Whenever the Rajah should run in arrears, the zemindarry would revert to the circar, because the Rajah had not fulfilled the conditions of his cowle, and should be zubted by the Collector under the orders of Government, who should pay the Zemindars a malikana, and manage the country till the arrears might be discharged. If the Rajah could satisfy the Government that he could establish an efficient management for the future, and policy required it, he or one of his family might be restored to it. This has been the custom of all governments in this country.

95. The malikana and hopes of restoration would, it may be expected, keep the Rajah from improper interference and irregular collections, and leave the Collector to establish a strong circar management. It would be quite different from the present management under the Court of Wards. The interference of the Court of Wards should be discontinued, and the countries of incapacitated Rajahs managed by the Collector, in the same manner as the countries of defaulters and debtors. No minute rules should be enacted to cramp either the Government or the Collector. In order to secure the success of such a system, it is necessary to have a good cutcherry in which the whole country may have confidence. All accounts and business should be transacted in public, all doubtful points referred to a punchayet. When they saw this was always the case, that the truth always came out, and strict justice was always done, the Rajahs themselves, instead of being jealous of the circar officers, would feel satisfaction in having their officers in such pure and strong hands. The circar would be father and mother to them, instead of being attorney's office. The Collector should not receive any commission in such cases: he then becomes the servant of his own Zemindar. In Moherry, the Collector is the servant of his own Shroff. The Government must pay the Collector well itself. Every thing depends on him. A few thousand pagodas is well expended in buying the service of an able and good man; but he must be considered a high officer, and have no per centages from Zemindars, which, at the least, must tend to lower his authority with the people at large: it may also create jealousy of the arrangement. I need not add, it would be necessary to have able revenue servants on high salaries in the cutcherry, to put them above temptation.

96. In the case of the private debts, the suit might perhaps be heard in the usual courts; but it is incumbent on them not to decree at once upon bonds given by the Rajahs, however regular and formal such bonds may appear. The court must inquire into the facts, and look at the accounts. Such bonds are often exacted by Soukars and other creditors, when the Rajah is in distress. He may want five thousand to pay his kist: the Soukar agrees to advance five thousand, provided he gives a bond, and perhaps mortgages a district for the amount of some former debt, with interest, at two per cent. a month. The Rajah is pushed for the money, and signs the bond for the old debt with this usurious interest, and perhaps the new debt also included. The whole transaction, and the whole accounts, in such cases, must be clearly understood. What the court may decree after such an examination might be recoverable by the Collector, by the same process as arrears of revenue; but in all cases the Rajah must have a subsistence. It must be the duty of the Collector to save the Rajahs, as much as he can, from such usurers and from ruin. The malikana might be generally fixed at ten per cent., but at less where the Rajah conducted himself ill, and his debts were very heavy; but when all were paid, he ought to get the difference between the Company's jummah and the net collections of the country.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

country. Some rules of this kind may be devised to prevent Rajahs from running in arrears or debt, with an intention of then throwing up their country. It will be one advantage of this new system, that the Rajahs need not run in debt to Soukars, because they will prefer letting their country fall into the Collector's management for a time, than borrow at enormous interest, which they are now forced to do. If there was a good cutcherry, it would probably be generally done by the application of the Rajah himself to the Collector for advice and assistance, before his affairs got too far involved. The Government, by the present system, now give the Zemindars the means of borrowing and receiving themselves. The system leads to the general transfer of land to satisfy the debts of Soukars.

97. The Government will observe, that I consider the interference of the Collector necessary, and more to be depended on than any rules and principles which can be devised. This is the very reverse of the present system, and indeed of English government, which leaves nothing to discretion, lays down imperative rules, and in fact lets an ignorant and imprudent Rajah ruin himself irreparably. It always supposes the parties competent to manage their affairs themselves, and the authority of the Government fully established. But this country is not in a state for such a system, and it is easier and wiser, for the present at least, to adapt our management to the state of the country. Any Regulation made for the government of these Rajahs should be clear and short, and contain every thing so as to prevent doubts and reference to other Regulations: it should also give power to the Government, not fetter the Government. The details would, of course, require much consideration: it is for the wisdom of the Government to settle them.

98. I also think that the proposed Regulation should give the Government the power to remove from the zillah, and keep in confinement any person found in it. I recommend this arbitrary, but in all eastern government necessary power, not so much for the Ryots, who seem to give nearly as much trouble when confined, as when at liberty, as for the mischief-making and perhaps now discarded servants, who may have acquired by cunning and money, got by former tricks, a greater degree of influence than is suspected.

99. I think a regulation on these principles will enable the Collector to prevent mischief in future; but as some time must elapse before such a Regulation can be passed, I recommend that the Collector and Magistrate of Ganjam be immediately directed

First.—On the receiving a criminal charge against any of the twenty-one hill Rajahs, to make such inquiry as may be necessary; and if there are grounds to suppose the Rajah guilty, and resistance or a subsequent rebellion likely, submit the result, with all the papers and other information it may be proper to lay before the Government, and receive their orders, before he proceeds against the person of the Rajah. I, as a Magistrate, would not act now, unless pretty sure of succeeding in securing the Rajah without a rebellion: but another Magistrate may think the present Regulations so imperative, as to force him to issue a warrant at all risk. It seems necessary for the Government to explain, that discretion is a part of a Magistrate's duty, who has to maintain the peace generally, as well as to secure particular offenders.

Secondly.—That the Collector be directed to buy in, on account of the Government, any parcels, or if necessary, the whole of any of these hill zemindarries which may be put up to public auction for arrears of revenue or private debts; but that, in the first instance, he do every thing in his power to prevent such sales, by endeavouring to settle the affairs of the Rajah in the cutcherry amicably and prevent his ruin.

100. It will be necessary, for the present, for martial law to continue in force, if the disturbances continue, to be executed on the spot, without reference beyond the officer commanding the division; but there might be some limitation with regard to the persons brought to trial. Perhaps no person should be brought to trial before a court martial, except on a written charge counter signed by the Magistrate.

101. The

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

101. The Government may, on a full consideration of the situation of these countries, put the Goomsur and Kimmedy Rajahs at least under a separate tributary system. I understand the Government has adopted a plan of this kind in other parts of India. It is for the wisdom of the Government, not for an inferior officer, to offer to decide such questions.

102. If these Rajahs should be made independent in all respects but the payment of tribute, they would no doubt sometimes put people to death unjustly. This is a great evil, certainly; but it must happen under the Nizam and every other native state, which would fall to pieces immediately, or which never would have existed, without the aid of the British Government. We neither made nor maintain these Rajahs: they maintain themselves, in spite, indeed, of our endeavours to destroy their power. If the Government gives its own creatures the power of life and death, I do not see why they should make quixotic attempts to deprive these self-created Rajahs of it, especially if it should be necessary to maintain order in their countries and families? I venture these hints, to put the question in every point of view.

103. If these Rajahs are to be considered common subjects, the Government undertake a great responsibility, and perhaps a more arduous task than the reduction of any great native state. If it is wished to extend the sphere of British justice, it would seem better to extend it in the Nizam's open country. If more revenue was wanted, it would be quite as fair and more politic to take some of the Nizam's fine districts, than exact more from these hill chiefs.

104. My own humble opinion is, that the intrigues, the mistakes, the struggle, with all its attending mischief, which must follow the present system in these hill zemindarries, are greater evils than any additional crimes the Rajahs, if left to themselves, would be able or tempted to commit. If they got very tyrannical, their own people would have recourse to the eastern mode of reforming the state. Some middle plan may answer.

105. With respect to the sale of these ancient zemindarries, I must add that any person of any caste or country may now purchase. But the people dislike strangers, and men of particular castes: they seem to think it a breach of caste, good government, and decorum, that a banian should be Zemindar of Moherry. We profess, and the Acts of Parliament and Regulations for the government of this country enjoin in the strongest terms, that the rules of caste and ancient institutions should be strictly observed. The people, here, however, consider the innovations to which I have alluded contrary to caste and ancient institution.

106. The Rajahs may think, from the mode in which this new system has been in some cases administered, that it is intended gradually to deprive them of their ancient possessions. It might be better if there were no Rajahs, perhaps, or at least no troublesome Conds and Peons in the country, who require Rajahs with power to manage them: but we may be doing harm by diminishing the authority of the Rajahs. At all events, we shall not find it worth while to exterminate them. I should think they are too well off in general, not to prefer a quiet life and peace to a quarrel with the Government. I have not been long enough here to judge of these Rajahs, but in other countries the Zemindars, when easily assessed, avoid any thing to bring them under the displeasure of the Government.

107. I am directed to state my opinion as to the usefulness of the hill rangers. I am not a judge of the military value of this corps, but I have no doubt every thing has been done by the late Captain Jobson, who lost his life by his exertions in the Moherry war, and by the gentleman who now commands it, to bring it to as great a degree of military perfection as it may be susceptible of.

108. I may venture to say, that the old Ganjam police corps, on which this corps was formed, was the very reverse of the forty-second, nineteenth, and thirty-sixth regiments, or of any of those renowned old corps; and that if a new corps was required here, it had better not have been raised on such a foundation:

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

foundation: that it must be much inferior in a military point of view to the regular troops, while the men of which it is composed are hardly more inured to the climate, or in any other respect calculated for the duties on which it is employed; that the recruiting of the regular army is impeded by the preference which likely recruits naturally give to a local corps, not likely to be removed to a distance from their homes; that if it should be disbanded, a number of good men would immediately enlist in the regular battalions, where they would become more useful and respectable soldiers; that the principles of governing troops are well understood, and no where better than in the Madras army, and therefore that any corps, not entirely governed on the same principles as the rest of the army, must of course be inferior; that it is therefore spending money on an inferior description of troops, which should be confined to the increase and improvement of the regular army. I should certainly propose to have no troops but regular troops, at least under the regular military government. The Government and the military authorities may determine, after the corps shall have been transferred to that department, whether a local corps of rangers will be a cheap and efficient branch of the army: from some calculations it would seem so. It is for the military authorities to decide whether the force of regular battalions is in proportion to the greater expense.

109. As a Collector and Magistrate, I should always wish to employ the regular force of the state where opposition was to be expected and force was required. Peons, indeed, are necessary also; but I think there should be no middle description. They should be either regular troops or peons like the Asham Peons in the Ceded Districts, with their own country arms, discipline, and principles, under the immediate direction of the revenue officers.

110. By employing the country Peons, besides getting our treasure and prisoners and dufters guarded, and similar services performed, we may connect ourselves with the military caste; and if we do not always get much service out of the peons, may at least hope, in some measure, to prevent them and their relations from plundering themselves. But the country peons will not enlist in a police corps, where they are dressed, drilled, and commanded by an European officer. Such peons should be kept entirely on the country principles, and under the Revenue officers, who alone know how to manage and use them.

111. I think, too, that the old Ganjam police peons, if they knew the country, were also well acquainted with the arts of extortion, and though they may be just now under some controul in this respect, there is always danger of their trying to get money from the Zemindars and country people.

112. With respect to the political power and duty of inquiry and information proposed to be given to the officer commanding the hill rangers, I must declare I think it highly improper. Nobody should have any political power, any right to enquire or interfere with the country people or business, except the Collector and Magistrate. Any interference from any other quarter divides and weakens authority, and opens a door to intrigues, mistakes, and the worst consequences in a country like this.

113. I have the honour to recommend that the hill rangers be discontinued or transferred to the military establishment, to be treated on such principles, and disposed of in such a way as may appear proper to the military authorities. If it is discontinued before the transfer, it will be proper, I imagine, to pension some individuals in it, to dismiss others either with or without some gratuity, according to their services, merits, or engagements, and to transfer others, who are willing and fit, to the regular or new extra battalions, and the few who are properly country peons to the Collector, to be employed under the revenue servants.

114. The Collector must have peons. The present acting Collector thinks that three hundred peons would, after tranquillity is re-established, be sufficient to guard his treasures and dufters, attend his servants among the hills, seize and guard offenders, and perform the other duties of a police and revenue nature, now performed by the rangers.

115. The present constitution of the corps is well explained in Lieutenant M'Pherson's letter of the 3d July 1818, from which it will be observed that the corps is not formed of the materials, nor on the principles the Government at least ultimately proposed. Mr. Thackeray's Report on Ganjam, 15 Feb. 1819.

116. The country has been in so much confusion for two or three years, that it may be expected the Conds and Peons may continue, now and then, to plunder for some time to come; and the hill rangers should not be entirely discontinued, therefore, until the end of the fusily year, when the Magistrate will, it is to be hoped, be able to recommend them as no longer necessary.

I have the honour to be, &c.

EXTRACT FORT ST. GEORGE REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,
The 30th March 1819.

To the Chief Secretary to Government at Fort St. George.

SIR:

Par. 1 Goomsur is a large and fertile zemindarry, composed of vallies running up between the hills of the great range dividing Ganjam from the Mahratta country, and a wide extent of hill and jungle on the frontier. In regard to hills and hill fever, jungles and Conds, it is one of the most marked as a hill zemindarry. It is the second, in point of importance, in the province. The permanent jumma is seventy thousand rupees: the annual revenue at least one lack and a half rupees when under a Rajah's management and well managed. The Rajahs are said to have been always turbulent; but when the weakness of our Government for many years, and the strength and climate of this country are considered, it is only surprising how they were brought to pay their peshcush at all in times of public difficulty Mr. Thackeray's Report on Goomsur, 30 March 1819.

2. The former history of all these hill zemindarries is much the same: it is now hardly worth while to go into it.

19. I find the country in great confusion, a great loss of revenue, a great expense and loss of troops. I find the true Zemindar in the country apparently well disposed to discharge his duty. It is true he was deprived near twenty years ago, because he had been so exasperated by oppression that the Collector could not then treat with him. I see no objection, and much probable advantage, from treating with him now.

20. Sirkara Bunge remained unmolested by the Circar officers for fifteen years after his deprivation. If he was accused sometimes by his son of making disturbances, he might retort that the mootah assigned for his maintenance had been taken from him. He appears latterly to have gone about the country on pilgrimages, and to have occasionally visited the gentlemen.

21. The son, Danunjiah Bunge, seems to have gone on well for several years, from 1801 to 1812. Both father and son may now, perhaps, be considered on nearly the same footing, as to merit, before the Government. The father was driven from his zemindarry, as a rebel, near twenty years ago; but he was, in fact, forgotten if not forgiven, because Mr. Brown allowed of the provision made for him, and reported it to Government, who at least tacitly acquiesced, and he went about for many years unmolested, until the new magistrate conceived it his duty to apprehend him, because the Government had desired some explanation of the extraordinary circumstances of a charge against the son being received from the father, who was in such a predicament as Sirkara Bunge.

22. After he was apprehended, the Magistrate was at a loss on what charges he was to be tried. He seems to have led a long and inoffensive life, with the exception

Mr Thackeray's Report on Goomsur, 30 March 1819.

exception of the short period about 1800 and 1801; and his offences, whatever they might have been during that period, may be supposed sufficiently punished by the deprivation, poverty, and imprisonment he has suffered since. It is a pity he was not formally pardoned some years ago.

23. His escape from the guard can hardly be considered a crime. He was apprehended when he and every body thought his former offences, whatever they might have been, were forgotten, if not forgiven, and when he was coming in, in fact, under what may be considered a cowle from the late Magistrate to prosecute his son. He was confined a long time without inquiry; and considering his time of life, habits, and situation, may be easily supposed to have found so long an imprisonment too irksome not to escape if an opportunity offered: I imagine we should all do the same in such circumstances.

24. After his escape he went to his native hills, and in a short time got possession of the vacant raje, and for the last six months has done every thing to restrain the Conds and preserve tranquillity. It is chiefly to his forbearance that we owe the peace of Goomsur and the revenue collected this year. He thought it an opportunity to acquire the favour of the Circar, and this good conduct is an earnest of the future. If he behaved so well, and has done so much good as an outlaw, he may be hoped now to go on well as a Zemindar.

31. With respect to the resistance of process for which the zemindarry was declared forfeited, it may be said in his favour, he never opposed the Government, only the constables; that the forfeiture of his zemindarry, which to an Indian chief is ruin, and generally imprisonment, is perhaps too severe a punishment for such an offence; that, at all events, it is hard the whole family should suffer so much for the offence of an individual; that it is not the custom of the country to deprive the family of the zemindarry, though one member may be expelled. It may also be said in favour of the individual, that the proceedings on which the forfeiture is founded were, in fact, in a great degree ex parte, and that no doubt the Rajah has a great deal to urge in extenuation of his conduct. When Mr Travers reported that the Rajah had surrendered, the Chief Secretary, in a letter dated the 7th July 1815, declared that the Rajah was "entitled "to the full benefit of that proceeding;" which could mean nothing more than that the forfeiture for not obeying process in that particular instance should not be insisted on: but it could not mean that they would not insist on the forfeiture, if on a deliberate review of this Rajah's whole conduct the Government should deem it necessary to exclude him from the zemindarry, which he had legally forfeited. The forfeiture appears to have been conducted with the necessary forms on good legal grounds, and to be complete, as a judicial act. The Government are, however, still at liberty to restore the family, and even Danunjiah Bunge himself, if such a measure should be prudent and proper.

32. So much has been written about Danunjiah Bunge, that I have perhaps not had an opportunity of reading it all; but from what I have seen, I am led to think that independently of any political necessity, and the prejudice arising from a perusal of the trial and other proceedings, there is nothing found against Danunjiah Bunge on the score of resistance to process, which need compel the Government to insist on excluding the family, or even him eventually, from the zemindarry.

33. Of the four charges which accompany Mr. Woodcock's return of the 16th January 1816, and which must be considered supplementary to that adverted to in Mr. Secretary Strachey's letter of the 7th July 1815, there seems nothing very serious, except that part of the first charge relating to the Rajah's personal resistance to a warrant on the 20th August 1813, and perhaps that part of the fourth charge relating to sending five hundred armed men to carry away the police Darogah at Bogada, about August 1814.

34. It is not surprising, however, that this Rajah should have opposed the police in August 1813, when not much more than a month before his palankeen it seems had been stopped, and his sword and gun taken away, and, as he said, his women insulted by the police officers at Nowgaum: and it is to be observed, the Rajah seems to have attributed this insult to Mr. Woodcock himself, for he said no inferior officer would have done so without some idea of its being being acceptable to his superior. It seems the Rajah was in the right in this instance, for the police Soobadar was punished for his conduct.* It appears, indeed, from every paper, that the Rajah was always squabbling with the police stationed in his country; and I have no doubt, from this and other instances, his complaints of their misconduct were well grounded. From Mr. Woodcock's being obliged to punish this Soobadar, it may be inferred their usual conduct was at least not very conciliating. Sending such people into such a zemindarry was itself almost enough to drive the Rajah into rebellion, and must have contributed to drive him mad. The Rajah's conduct was, no doubt, intemperate and illegal; but considering his situation, and provocation, this offence is not so great as to demand the ruin of one of the first families in the country.

35. If any other of the Rajahs were provoked, in an unlucky moment, in the same way, he might be equally expected to do something to bring on the forfeiture of his zemindarry.

36. With respect to the Bogoda tumult, the armed rabble only threatened; they did not actually proceed to violence. Perhaps it was meant only to frighten the Police Darogah and the sepoys away: perhaps it was as much the country people themselves as the Rajah who wanted to get rid of the police. The guard was small, and they might have been easily overpowered by the armed multitude, which seems to have been commanded by the Bogoda Cauzie, or head-man. Considering this affair took place after the Zemindar had so much lost the command of himself that he might be considered mad, it is surprising, if the multitude acted by his orders, that no further violence was committed.

37. I consider the sending the police at all into this zemindarry contrary to custom, and a dangerous measure. It must, and by Mr. Woodcock's own account,† did irritate the Rajah, and may be considered immediately conducive to his phrensy, while it could be no real check upon him. Mr. Woodcock says, "It was not until the middle of the year 1814 that any material occurrence in "this zemindarry was brought to my notice: but about this time the Zemin- "dar appears to have lost all controul over his passion, venting it at one time "on his immediate dependents, at another in language highly indecent and "offensive addressed directly or indirectly to the Magistrate; and finally, on "finding himself foiled in obtaining a favourite, but altogether unwarrantable "object, in coming to the desperate resolution of driving out of the zemin- "darry every police officer, whom he considered, though unhappily they have "proved but a slight, check upon his criminal proceedings." The irritation and uselessness of the police seem admitted here, and all the circumstances shew they did harm, but no good. Police in such a zemindarry must always have the same effects. This is even supposing the conduct of the police unexceptionable: their conduct was, however, there is reason to suppose, exceptionable, and therefore the consequences must have been still worse.

38. In a quarrel of this kind, the Rajah may say, "I am a Company's "Zemindar; I pay them a great peshcush; I am one of the first men in this "country; I am treated with distinguished compliments, whenever I visit the "officers of the Company; I am one of the ancient nobility of the country, a "tributary prince rather than a subject. Why am I obliged to account for "my conduct to such low people as you police officers? I am much more "worthy of trust than you: I have more at stake. Why do the gentlemen "prefer you and your word to me and mine? Why am I plagued with you? "No former government ever sent such a set of people into my country: it is "against custom, and my honour and tranquillity. If I do not make a stand "now, what else may I not expect?"

39. It is evident, from his letters, that the Rajah argued in this manner; and I own I agree with him. I disapprove of the attempt to lower the authority of the Rajahs in these hill zemindarries, and consider the sending police

* Vide extract of return made by Goomsur Zemindar to precept of the 14th July 1815, with Mr. Woodcock's return of the 16th January 1816.

† Vide return to the Sudder Court, dated the 16th January 1816.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Goomsur, 30 March 1819.

police officers into the country one of the most odious and dangerous modes of attempting it. I think the Rajah the natural head of the country, the only efficient channel of Circar controul and influence. When one Rajah behaves ill he may be set aside, and another put up in his place; but the office cannot be lowered, in the present state of these countries, without danger.

40. The Rajah has a valuable country and great income, a reputation to preserve, generally some treasure, a large family. He has a great deal that is tangible: he is always tangible till desperate. The Government can generally come upon him, at least much easier than upon most others in the country. He is therefore a safer instrument than Circar servants, who may run away, or the womayots or hill chiefs and the peons, who are hardly in any way tangible to the Circar except through the Rajah.

41. In Goomsur and Kimmedy, the hill chiefs, bissoyes and womayots, have lately got bold for want of the authority of a Rajah. Any authority is better than anarchy. Without a Rajah these hill zemindarries might soon be depopulated by robbers. At all events, there would be a very long interval between the disruption of the Rajah's authority and the establishment of that of the Circar. Such, indeed, is the country and climate, that possibly the Circar authority might never be properly established at all; and after all, the misery of the struggle, and a state of anarchy for some years, nothing better than the present indifferent government by Rajahs might be established at last. It is the last country in the world to make experiments in. The cutcherry can hardly go even for a fortnight into one of these zemindarries. Even during the best season, tolerable tranquillity and a light peshcush is all we can for the present expect. The Rajahs and their people will, and indeed have improved, under a great and strong Government, which has only to govern them well by their own institutions.

42. If these Rajahs commit crimes, we must endeavour to punish, at least prevent them in future; but not by a new system not calculated for them. We must not lower their authority, nor employ other less efficient and indeed less responsible agents, who may irritate but cannot check them.

43. The veneration in which the hill chiefs and peons hold the Rajah is almost the only hold we now have upon this troublesome race. These people can almost always elude us: we can never come in contact with them. We can substitute no principle for their loyalty to their Rajah. We have a hold on the Rajah, and through him on his peons: destroy his authority, and you destroy your own. We must be very sure of our new system before we try to shake the old. These unwholesome vallies have been reclaimed from the jungle, and cultivated and peopled under the protection and government of these Rajahs, and the Conds have been subdued and are now kept in order by them. The great extent of paddy fields is at least one proof of good government.

44. The more we respect custom the stronger we shall be. When once we give up, or require more than custom, which in India is justice, we are repaid with imposition or resistance: if we set aside custom we teach the people to dispute every thing: it is weakening our own claims. If we exact or impose more, or in a new way, we must expect opposition or evasion, and, at all events, shake that veneration for custom, which is what chiefly makes the government of this country, in general, so easy.

45. We must improve the people here through the Rajahs. The Rajahs have great faults; but if not now better, are from their rank and wealth likely to become better than the other inhabitants of their countries.

46. On all these grounds, Danunjiah Bunge had a right, at all events, to complain of the police sent into the country; and it is evident, from several circumstances, their conduct was not unexceptionable. The new Regulations of 1816 positively forbid the introduction of police into these zemindarries when they have not been usual. Danunjiah Bunge resisted what the Regulations have since prohibited.

52. Danunjiah Bunge is a prisoner. I am ordered to report on the family. He is not present and cannot speak for himself: it is my duty to state what is to be said in his favour. He seems always to have been a good subject; he always paid his revenue. I cannot but believe he could offer some good excuse for not paying the four thousand rupees in fusily 1219, for which two of his mootahs were sold It was too small a sum to be withheld but from some petty cause. He paid regularly all the time he knew a force was prepared to advance against him. If disaffected, he would have withheld forty thousand rupees: at all events he was sufficiently punished for this default of four thousand rupees, for he paid twenty thousand rupees for it. He was injured in the reports made of his rebellious intentions and proceedings, and I have no doubt his other offences were exaggerated. He did nothing worse, I imagine, than his ancestors or the other Zemindars, till he went mad in 1813, or at all events in 1814. It is not easy to determine whether the hostility of the Magistrate and the native servants about the court and in the police contributed to this phrenzy. He considered himself rather a tributary prince than a subject, and thought perhaps he had a right to commit what the law perhaps considered crimes. In such a country, with such a people and such a family, severities which the law cannot allow may be sometimes necessary. Perhaps, however, one of these Rajahs may be allowed to put people in his family in irons: if the Mahommedan law does not allow it, it seems to receive evidence in such cases very scrupulously, and acquitted Danunjiah Bunge.

Mr. Thackeray's Report on Goomsur, 8 March 1819.

53. He is active, a man of business, and managed his country well. He has suffered a great deal. He is an object of pity, not of anger; and the Government should, in my humble opinion, make his situation as comfortable as they can, and eventually restore him to his country, if it should ever appear consistent with prudence and humanity. The time may come when the Government may hope he will not again fall into that phrenzy which led him to these acts of outrage and folly which produced his fall.

54. I cannot avoid, in this place, a few observations on the bad consequences of proceeding too far against these Rajahs in such cases. The obligation of the Government to notice and punish the crimes of which the Rajah was accused produced the Goomsur disturbances. After all, what good has been done? The Rajah was acquitted. If he was guilty, justice was not vindicated; if innocent, his injuries are very great indeed, It may be safely asserted, perhaps, our interference to punish these supposed murders has only added evil to evil; and it may be added, perhaps, supposing them true, if the Rajah had been an independent prince they would not have been carried so far. He would not have feared intrigues against him so much, he would have had no reason to be so severe: he would have had his own way, and would not have gone mad. The punishment he has suffered for his cruelties, supposing them true, has been inflicted not by the laws and justice of the Government, but by the rapacity and violence of those employed to reduce him, and the political act of the Government in confining and removing him to Chingleput. He has been plundered and is a prisoner. The loss of his zemindarry is a consequence, not of the cruelties of which he was acquitted, but of a resistance for which there is much to plead in excuse. Besides the evils he has suffered, many brave men have lost their lives from the climate of Goomsur, a great many innocent people have been driven from their homes and avocations.

59. The expense, at the same time, of this kind of Circar management has been enormous. There have been three or four hundred regular sepoys in the country, detached from the battalion which seems to have been kept at Aska entirely for the protection of Goomsur; so that the whole expense of this battalion, about two lacs and a half of rupees a year, is to be set against the revenue we have got: and besides this battalion, the aumeen and sibbendy establishment employed in the zemindarry cost 24,240 rupees a year. The battalion at Askah is said to be nearly ruined in this service.

72. I have been three weeks in Goomsur, and done every thing to get information. It is true, our information in these hill zemindarries is not to be entirely depended upon; but it is too evident that any arrangement would be preferable to the Circar management there. The revenue servants and peons employed by the Collector seem to have taken service merely in the hope of pilfering as much as they can during the confusion, which it is their interest to encourage. They seem to tell falsehoods and play tricks without fear and shame; nor do I see any hopes of improvement under any Circar management which can be established at present. Some revenue and tranquillity have latterly been obtained, by the ascendancy Sirkara Bunge has acquired and his proper conduct.

80. Having now submitted the result of my inquiries in Ganjam, I request to be relieved from this inquiry. My health is very precarious; I have a very long march before me in the hottest season; I am naturally anxious to join my station. I know the risk attending a succession of Acting Collectors for many months; and, I may venture to add, I know that authority and responsibility in Ganjam should not be divided.
